On coming of age in 1809 he took his seat in the House of Lords, but with party politics would have nothing to do on either side. After wild revels at Newstead, Byron with his friend Hobhouse left England on July 2 for his first tour on the Continent. Throughout his letters at this period it is easy to trace his varying moods: the excitements of his travels when "I was very happy at Lisbon because I love oranges, talk bad Latin to the monks . . . ride on an ass or mule, and swear Portuguese"; again, his passion for Nature and love of solitude—"My old seas and mountains are the only acquaintances I ever found improve upon me." "Twelve months of any given individual was perfect pecaúanha", and throughout all we find an underlying bitterness that merged into the melancholy so peculiarly his own. "I begin to find out that nothing but virtue will do in this damned world. I am tolerably sick of vice . . . I am very serious and cynical, and a good deal disposed to moralise."

His return to England in July 1811 was marked by the loss of his friend Matthews, who was drowned while bathing, and the death of his mother on August 1. Byron was a dutiful son, and despite her faults would hear no ill spoken of her: "Cost what it may, gold or blood, I will pursue to the last the cowardly calumniator . . . of a defenceless woman."

"A wife would be the salvation of me," he once wrote in his Journal, so in 1813, when he met the clever, beautiful, and wealthy only child of Sir Ralph Milbanke, it was, to use his own words to her, "the first approach ever made on my part to a permanent union with any woman;" she refused the offer, but a meeting twelve months later ended in their marriage at Seaham on January 2, 1815. They lived together, first at Seaham, then in London, a life of hopeless financial embarrassment and painful disagreements, doubtless there were faults on both sides, though Byron chivalrously takes the blame: "Where there is blame it belongs to myself, and if I cannot redeem I must bear it."

The birth of their baby girl in December made matters no better, and in January 1816 Lady Byron, to outward appearance quite friendly, left him on a temporary visit to her parents, she never returned, and on April 21 a legal deed of separation was made. Lady Byron died in 1860, and their daughter, Ada, afterwards Lady Lovelace, in 1852.

Four days after the deed was signed, Lord Byron left England never to return. During his wanderings he made the acquaintance of the Shelleys and Claire Clairmont, the mother of Allegra, and on the tragic death of Shelley, Byron witnessed the grim rite of cremation on the shore of the Italian lake.

In 1823, when Greece was struggling for independence, the poet threw all his energies into the cause, "the imaginative poet became a practical politician, and the unrestrained libertine changed to a sturdy military disciplinarian." "I have come to help none of you as a partisan, but all of you as a friend," and his whole heart, mind, and body were given to his self-imposed task, until seized with sudden illness on February 15, 1824. He lingered for two months in distressing suffering, and died at Missolonghi in Western Greece on Easter Monday, April 19, "engaged in the glorious attempt to restore that country to her ancient freedom and renown." His body was brought to England and laid to rest in the family vault at Hucknall Torkard.

HIS WORK

Whatever view we British people may hold of Byron's work, there can be no doubt that on the Continent he was in his own day, and still is in ours, one of the greatest figures in English literature. There is no other poet in the Romantic Revival who touched Europe so unmistakably as Byron. Yet his detractors are many and formidable, and there are not a few critics who would deny him any place in the firmament of great poets. Let us admit his faults at the outset if we would judge him fairly. His slovenliness of diction, his cheap rhetoric, his gross errors of taste, these things are obvious enough, and infect his work just as his theatricality and lack of self-control condition any personal estimate we make of the man. Yet it is hard to understand how any careful student of his writings can help feeling that many splendid flashes of beauty and insight overshadow the faults in any final appreciation of his work as a whole.

In the first place, he had from the outset an instinct for admirable and telling prose. His letters scintillate in racy humour and lively personal touches, they are rarely negligible, for Byron was a sound critic—exaggerations notwithstanding—and an excellent observer of men and manners. As a writer of verse his progress was more chequered.

In his experimental period his poetic style is often commonplace and tawdry. The experimental years start in 1807 with Hours of Idleness, include English Bards and Scotch Reviewers, and end with the Siege of Corinth. Even here the intellectual power of the man triumphs over the faulty medium, just as his genuine love of beauty raises some of the rhetoric to a high level. But the work is very uneven. After 1816, the era of his exile, the style improves steadily, and there is an ampler power of self-expression. If we except the majority of his dramas, mostly uneasy experiments, we may trace a gradual progress of his art until, in Don Juan and the Vision of Judgment, we have the richest fruits of his genius—richest not merely because of their hardly acquired artistic excellencies, but because the various sides of the man, his wit, his fancy, his passion for beauty, his graphic actuality, find here in these poems their happiest expression.

His Bold Imagination

Lacking the intensity of Wordsworth, the subtlety of Coleridge, the receptivity of Keats, the aerial fire of Shelley, Byron possessed a breadth and vigour of imagination beyond that of any contemporary. Nowhere is this more agreeably illustrated than in his love of Nature. In this love he is at one with all the Romantic poets, and he expresses it quite in his own particular way, there is no meditative musing, little sense of mystery, but a very live sense of wonder and delight in the energising glories of Nature.

"The morn is up again, the dewy morn
With breath all incense and with cheek all bloom,
Laughing the clouds away with playful scorn,
And living as if earth contained no tomb
And glowing into day—we may resume
The march of an existence."

It is "over the hills and far away" with Byron. Nature for him is a splendid background against which human activities depict themselves. There is no mistaking the sincerity of his enthusiasm, or the attractive glow it gives to his facile rhetoric. Nature intoxicates him with an almost heady delight.

"To sit on rocks, to muse o'er flood and fell,
To slowly trace the forest's shady scene,
Where things that own not man's dominion dwell,
And mortal foot had no' or rarely been
To climb the trackless mountain all unseen
With the wild flock that never needs a fold,

Alone o'er steep and foaming falls to lean—
This is not solitude: 'tis but to hold Converse with Nature's charms, and view her stores unroll'd."

In his descriptive passages we are reminded of Scott at his best. There is the same easy vigour and fire. Such poems as the Siege of Corinth are rich in brilliant sketches like this:

"'Tis midnight on the mountains brown
The cold, round moon shines deeply down;
Blue roll the waters, blue the sky
Spreads like an ocean hung on high,
Bespangled with those isles of light. . . .
The waves on either shore lay there
Calm, clear, and azure as the air,
And scarce their foam the pebbles shook,
But murmur'd meekly as the brook
The winds were pillow'd on the waves;
The banners droop'd along their staves. . . .
And that deep silence was unbroke,
Save where the watch his signal spoke,
Save where the steed neigh'd oft and shrill . . .
And the wide hum of that wild host Rustled like leaves from coast to coast. . . ."

His Strong Individuality

He was a poet, with phases of simplicity and naturalness; an actor with a strain of fierce sincerity, a revolutionary in thought and a conservative in art. A man of violent emotion, he was constantly betrayed into extravagant assertion. But he was by no means so unstable as he seemed. He loved to shock people and magnify his lawlessness. But he was not a bad man, he was merely a man who did bad things. The distinction is a real one. Considering his wretched childhood, with a "brutal roysterer" for a father, and a virago for a mother, there is scant wonder that his temper was so gusty, and his emotional life so exaggerated. But he had fine enduring traits: courage, generosity, and a capacity for friendship.

He was one of the most widely travelled of our poets, and what he paints he paints from actual observation. The local colour is not "mugged up." A man who lived with Byron for several years declared that on certain days he was mad, while at other times, in presence of beautiful things, he became sublime. Scott spoke of him as "being a man of real goodness of heart, and the kindest and best feelings, miserably thrown away by his foolish contempt of public opinion. Instead of being warned or checked by public opposition, it roused him to go on in a worse strain, as if he said, 'Ay, you don't like it; well, you shall have something worse for your pains.'"

But such as he was, with all his contradictions, his sensuality, his sublimity, his wit, his spleen, his moody restlessness, his individuality is so strong that it breaks through all his poems. There is no poet less objective than he. His heroes and villains (the distinction is not always apparent) are coloured stage editions of himself. Manfred, Childe Harold, Lara, Don Juan, we can see the insolent dandy, the daring adventurer, the intrepid fighter, the amorist in each. Such force of personality will not be schooled to the requirements of a finished art. No great poet has ever been more shamelessly bombastic and turgid; but amidst stanzas of third rate rhetoric are passages of real power and beauty.

"I stood in Venice, on the Bridge of Sighs;
A palace and a prison on each hand,
I saw from out the wave her structure rise
As from the stroke of the enchanter's wand
A thousand years, their cloudy wings expand
Around me, and a dying Glory smiles
O'er the far times, when many a subject land
Look'd to the winged Lion's marble piles,
Where Venice sate in state, throned on her hundred isles."

What from this barren being do we reap?
Our senses narrow, and our reason frail,
Life short, and truth a gem which loves the deep,
And all things weigh'd in custom's falsest scale,
Opinion an omnipotence, whose vol
Mantles the earth with darkness, until right
And wrong are accidents, and men grow pale
Lest their own judgments should become too bright,
And their free thoughts be crimes, and earth have too much light."

His Wit

If the flexibility of Byron's verse was well adapted for rhetorical purposes, it was equally well adapted for satiric use. His satire, indeed, is more remarkable than even his rhetoric. Beppo and Don Juan scintillate with humour. There is no delicacy, no subtlety about it, but it has a daring and liveliness that reminds one of the Restoration wits rather than of any contemporary models. Moreover, there is abundant sound sense in Byron's persiflage.

"One hates an author that's all author, fellows
In foolscap uniforms turn'd up with ink,
So very anxious, clever, fine, and jealous,
One don't know what to say to them, or think,
Unless to puff them with a pair of bellows,
Of coxcombry's worst coxcombs e'en the pink
Are preferable to these shreds of paper,
These unquench'd snuffings of the midnight taper
Of these same we see several, and of others,
Men of the world who know the world like mon,
Scott, Rogers, Moore, and all the better brothers,
Who think of something else beside the pen
But for the children of the 'mighty mothers,'
The would be wits, and can't be gentlemen,
I leave them to their daily 'tea is ready,'
Smug coterie, and literary lady."

Slovenly and meretricious Byron can be, and often is. Scarcely ever does he lack vitality. He has been accused of insincerity, and insincere he could be when he wished. But it was a thing done deliberately—malice aforethought; an actor's pose. Despite occasional attitude-making in the limelight, there was an elemental greatness and fierce integrity about the man. For this reason preference must be given to Don Juan above all his other work. For there you have the real Byron—a medley of perverse humour, keen-sighted wit, heady passion, and—its coarseness notwithstanding—with that unmistakable thrust after beauty which you find in none but the live and genuine poet.

As an artist it is interesting to compare his quick, vivid impressionism with the caressing exactitude of Keats. He has an eye for essentials, and can dash off a pictorial effect or a character sketch with amazing dexterity and skill. The effect may be rather of the flamboyant poster type than that of the finished picture. But, allowing for this, there can be no question of his success. Wholly admirable in its way is the pen sketch of London:

"A mighty mass of brick and smoke and shipping,
Dirty and dusky, but as wide as eye
Could reach, with here and there a sail just skimming
In sight, then lost amidst the forestry
Of masts, a wilderness of steeples peeping
On tiptoe thro' their sea-coal canopy,
A huge, dim cupola like a foolscap crown
On a fool's head—and there is London Town."

It might serve as a motto to a Whistler study. The magic of London held Juan as it has held many since:

"But Juan saw not this each wreath of smoke
Appear'd to him but as the magic vapour
Of some alchymic furnace, from whence broke
The wealth of worlds (a wealth of Tax and paper)
The gloomy clouds, which o'er it as a yoke
Are bow'd and put the Sun out like a taper—
Were nothing but the natural atmosphere,
Extremely wholesome, tho' but rarely clear."

Of his lyrics it may be said that while lacking the elusive delicacy of Shelley, and the noble distinction of Wordsworth, they have none the less a hitting charm and gracious music of their own.

That well-known lyric,

"She walks in beauty, like the night
Of cloudless climes and starry skies"

will take its place beside the best lyrics in our language.

Profoundly touched at certain points by romanticism, Byron was never a poet of romanticism in the sense that Shelley, Scott, and Coleridge were. Like Wordsworth and Southey, he is deeply touched by its influences at one moment, but is far away at the next. A certain stolidity in Wordsworth's nature, coupled with a charmness in yielding to emotions, give his romanticism very definite limitations, while about both Southey and Byron there was a strong practicality, a vivid sense of the present that circumscribe their romanticism. Of all the great poets of the time, Byron presents the curious and piquant combination of an ardent romantic imagination, and an intellect and outlook essentially worldly and matter-of-fact. With Keats it was the past, with Shelley the future, with Byron it is the present that really interests and grips him. His ardent fancy dallied with the past on occasion, but he is most at home with the England of his day, the Europe of his day, its social hypocrisies, its literary conventions and affectations. He is always at heart a society gentleman, and both in its good and bad sense, a man of the world. Here is the explanation of his genuine admiration for Pope and the Popian methods, and his attack on Bowles (see English Bards and Scotch Reviewers) for depreciating Pope. He never took his Childe Harold as seriously as the English Bards—which is purely eighteenth-century in spirit—and thought far more of his Vision of Judgment, which is pure satire, than of his Corsair. His own slap-dash methods of writing were not after Pope, it is true, but none knew this better than he did, and he criticised his own slovenliness of writing and lauded the careful finish and polish of Pope. No doubt there is a touch of personal malice in his early attack on Wordsworth and his circle, and for this reason he exaggerated all that was anti-romantic in his nature. But, while making allowance for this, there was real sincerity in his critical attitude; real value also at a time when romanticism was at its height, and when the eighteenth-century poets suffered a good deal of undeserved obloquy. But the spirit of the age was too strong for him. He may have felt scornful of the saccharine joys of romanticism, but he had a sweet tooth and yielded to its blandishments. On the whole Byron was more interesting as a man, a personality, than a writer, because of his complex nature and of his picturesque setting in the social conditions of his time. His influence for a time was tremendous, though always at bottom more personal than literary. Then, as is always the case when the spell waned, the reaction ran violently to the other extreme, and the Victorian unduly depreciated him. Perhaps we are beginning to-day to get the right perspective of this strange compound of greatness and littleness. If not one of our greatest poets, there are few literary personalities more interesting than he, and he was undoubtedly a powerful force in English letters.

DON JUAN

A long, long kiss, a kiss of youth and love,
And beauty, all concentrating like rays
Into one focus, kindled from above,
Such kisses as belong to early days,
Where heart, and soul, and sense, in concert move,
And the blood's lava, and the pulse a blaze,
Each kiss a heart-quake,—for a kiss's strength,
I think it must be reckon'd by its length
By length I mean duration; theirs endured Heaven knows how long—no doubt they never reckon'd,
And if they had, they could not have secured
The sum of their sensations to a second
They had not spoken, but they felt allured,
As if their souls and lips each other heekon'd,
Which being join'd, like swarming bees they clung—
Their hearts the flowers from whence the honey sprung.
They were alone, but not alone as they
Who shut in chambers think it loneliness,
The silent ocean, and the starlit bay,
The twilight glow, which momentarily grew less,
The voiceless sands, and dropping caves, that lay
Around them, made them to each other press,
As if there were no life beneath the sky
Save theirs, and that their life could never die
They fear'd no eyes nor ears on that lone beach,
They felt no terrors from the night—they were
All in all to each other, though their speech
Was broken words, they thought a language there,—
And all the burning tongues the passions teach
Found in one sigh the best interpreter
Of nature's oracle—first love,—that all
Which Eros has left her daughters since her fall
Haidée spoke not of scruples, ask'd no vows,
Nor offer'd any she had never heard
Of plight and promises to be a spouse,
Or perils by a loving maid incur'd;
She was all which pure ignorance allows,
And flew to her young mate like a young bird,
And never having dreamt of falsehood, she
Had not one word to say of constancy.
She loved, and was beloved—she adored,
And she was worshipp'd, after nature's fashion,
Their intense souls, into each other pour'd,
If souls could die, had perish'd in that passion,—
But by degrees their senses were restored,
Again to be overcome, again to dash on;
And, beating against his bosom, Haidée's heart
Felt as if never more to beat apart

Alas! they were so young, so beautiful,
So lonely, loving, helpless, and the hour
Was that in which the heart is always full,
And, having o'er itself no further power,
Prompts deeds eternity cannot annul,
But pays off moments in an endless shower
Of hell-fire—all prepared for people giving
Pleasure or pain to one another living
Alas! for Juan and Haidée! they were
So loving and so lovely—till then never,
Excepting our first parents, such a pair
Had run the risk of being damn'd for ever—
And Haidée, being devout as well as fair,
Had, doubtless, heard about the Stygian river,
And hell and purgatory—but forgot,
Just in the very crisis she should not.
They look upon each other, and their eyes
Gleam in the moonlight, and her white arm clasps
Round Juan's head, and his around her head
Half buried in the tresses which it grasps,
She sits upon his knee, and drinks his sighs,
He hers, until they end in broken gasps,
And thus they form a group that's quite antique,
Half naked, loving, natural, and Greek
And when those deep and burning moments pass'd,
And Juan sunk to sleep within her arms,
She slept not, but all tenderly, though fast,
Sustain'd his head upon her bosom's charms
And now and then her eye to heaven is cast,
And then on the pale cheek her breast now warms,
Pillow'd on her o'erflowing heart, which pants
With all it granted, and with all it grants.
An infant when it gazes on the light,
A child the moment when it drains the breast,
A devotee when soars the Host in sight,
An Arab with a stranger for a guest,
A sailor when the prize has struck in fight,
A miser filling his most hoarded chest,
Feel rapture—but not such true joy are reaping
As they who watch o'er what they love while sleeping.
For there it lies so tranquil, so beloved,
All that it hath of life with us is living—
So gentle, stressless, helpless, and unmoved,
And all unconscious of the joy 'tis giving,
All it hath felt, inflicted, pass'd and proved,
Hush'd into depths beyond the watcher's diving;
There lies the thing we love with all its errors,
And all its charms, like death without its terrors.
The lady watch'd her lover—and that hour
Of Love's, and Night's and Ocean's solitude,
O'erflow'd her soul with their united power;
Amidst the barren sand and rocks so rude,
She and her wave-worn love had made their bowet,
Where nought upon their passion could intrude,
And all the stars that crowded the blue space
Saw nothing happier than her glowing face
Alas! the love of women! It is known
To be a lovely and a fearful thing,
For all of theirs upon that die is thrown,
And if 'tis lost, life hath no more to bring
To them but mockeries of the past alone,
And their revenge is as the tiger's spring,
Deadly, and quick, and crushing, yet, as real
Torture is theirs, what they inflict they feel
They are right; for man, to man so oft unjust,
Is always so to women—one sole bond
Awaits them, treachery is all their trust,
Taught to conceal, their burning hearts despond
Over their idol till some wealthier lust
Buys them in marriage—and what rests beyond?
A thankless husband, next a faithless lover,
Then dressing, nursing, praying, and all's over
Some take a lover, some take drams or prayers,
Some mind their household, others dissipation,
Some run away, and but exchange their cares,
Losing the advantage of a virtuous station;

Few changes e'er can better their affairs,

Thers being an unnatural situation,
From the dull palace to the dirty hovel;
Some play the devil, and then write a novel

Haidée was Nature's bride, and knew not this.

Haidée was Passion's child, born where the sun
Showers triple light, and scorches even the kiss

Of his gazelle-eyed daughters, she was one
Made but to love, to feel that she was his

Who was her chosen: what was said or done
Elsewhere was nothing. She had nought to fear,
Hope, care, nor love beyond, her heart beat here

PERCY BYSSHE SHELLEY (1792-1822)

HIS LIFE

The poet Shelley was the eldest son of the narrow-minded representative of an old county family, the Shelleys of Field Place, Sussex, where this "brilliant, wayward, ill-fated youth" was born on August 4, 1792.

A mischievous, lovable lad, of independent, energetic, generous disposition, with large, beautiful blue eyes, long bushy hair, delicate features, and strong, slender figure, his whole appearance, it is said, "breathed an animation, a fire, an enthusiasm, a vivid and preternatural intelligence." Yet how many of his contemporaries have also likened him to a flower. "An elegant and slender flower whose head drooped from being surcharged with rain," said one, with features of "an unhealthy paleness, like a flower that has been kept from the light of day," was the remark of another; while a third tells us that his form, "graceful and slender, drooped like a flower in the breeze."

Shelley's early education was given at home in company with his sisters, in 1802 he went to school at Sion House, Brentford, where he was looked upon as "a strange, unsocial being," and three years later passed into Eton. His school experiences, however, were somewhat unfortunate, he hated tyranny and brutal force, and the system of flogging was utterly repugnant to the boy's love of freedom and independence.

"I will be wise,
And just, and free, and mild, if in me lies
Such power, for I grow weary to behold
The selfish and the strong still tyrannize
Without reproach or check."

The choice of tutor for a boy with a disposition such as Shelley's was also an unwise one, the pupil himself tells us that "he was one of the dullest men in the establishment."

"And from that hour did I with earnest thought
Heap knowledge from forbidden mines of lore,
Yet nothing that my tyrants know or taught
I cared to learn."

Withal, he became a good Greek scholar, produced a considerable amount of Latin verse, and with still greater zest pursued his experiments in chemistry and electricity, that culminated in many boyish pranks—from an electric shock to a tutor to the setting on fire of a haystack, "because he wanted to have a hell of his own." It was his delight to dress his sisters and himself "in strange costumes to personate spirits or fiends, to take a fire-stove and fill it with some inflammable liquid, and to carry it flaming into the kitchen," and "it seemed too probable," says his sister, "that some day the house would be burned down."

From Eton he went up to Oxford in 1808, revolutionary in spirit and bitterly opposed to the existing state of society; he was a diligent student, read hard if not along the lines prescribed by the university, and with frank independence spoke and wrote as he thought. It is therefore needless to say that when his pamphlet, The Necessity of Atheism, appeared, it caused considerable friction with the authorities, but, having the courage of his conviction, he asked them to discuss the subject with him, and was met with an indignant refusal—he must subscribe to the college rule of faith or depart. Refute his pamphlet he would not, so he was dismissed, and with his friend Thomas Jefferson Hogg, left Oxford for London with the impression that the world is against him and a determination from henceforth to be against the world. His expulsion but fixed the more firmly his revolutionary and atheistical ideas, and his father, by withdrawing his allowance, alienated his affection without any good result.

Shelley was but nineteen when he first met Harriet Westbrook. She quickly aroused his sympathy by hints of tyranny and persecution from members of the home circle, and a few months later they eloped to Edinburgh. At first they appear to have been quite happy: "My wife," says Shelley, "is the partner of my thoughts and feelings."

Always on the side of liberty, in 1812 the cause of Catholic Emancipation in Ireland claimed Shelley's attention, and with his wife and her sister he crossed the Channel. An Address to the Irish People was printed and circulated, in which he asked them, "Does not your heart bound at the bare possibility of your posterity possessing liberty and happiness? . . . Oh! if your hearts do not vibrate at such as this; then ye are dead and cold—ye are not men." There was, however, no warmth in the response to his kind offices, the police were also beginning to suggest that his departure would not be lamented, so on April 7 the trio left for Wales. After a brief sojourn at Tremadoc they returned to London, where Ianthe, their first child, was born in June 1813, the second, a boy, was born at Bath the following year.

Shelley's love for his children is well known, but for some reason his wife was an indifferent mother, and to this is attributed the beginning of his coldness towards her. With Godwin and his family Shelley was on intimate terms, and the gradual estrangement from the now uncongenial companionship of his wife and her sister, threw him more and more into the Godwin circle and the society of Godwin's daughter, a girl of sixteen, "fair and fair-haired, pale indeed, and with a piercing look," with whom, finding much in common, he fell passionately in love.

Gradually the rift widened between Shelley and his wife, and in June 1814 they agreed to separate; Harriet went to her father at Bath, and Shelley quite openly left London with Mary Godwin. The tragic circumstances of Harnet's death, two years later, are well known.

At first we may be tempted to blame the youthful Mary Godwin for the step she had taken, until we call to mind her antecedents and upbringing; and may quote Lady Shelley in extenuation:

"By the words of her father whom she loved—by the writings of her mother whom she had been taught to venerate, it was natural that she should listen to the dictates of her own heart, and willingly unite her fate with one who was so worthy of her love."

In 1816, immediately after the death of his wife, Shelley spent some days with Leigh Hunt at Hampstead, Alastor was published, and on December 30 married Mary Godwin in London, early in the following year he made frantic efforts to regain the control of his motherless children, but the law, in the person of Lord Eldon, then Chancellor, decided that he was "unfitted for parental responsibilities." Smarting with indignation, worried in mind, ill in body, and socially ostracised, Shelley and his wife left England in March 1818, with no prospect, as he wrote bitterly, of returning to a country where "I am regarded as a rare prodigy of crime and pollution, whose look oven might infect."

The last four years of Shelley's life (1818-1822), spent mainly in Italy with his friends Byron and Leigh Hunt, were also the most prolific in his work, he had believed thoroughly in his own early work, frequently quoting Milton's words, "There is something in my writings that shall live for ever"; towards the end he became somewhat pessimistic, and used to say that, "produce what I may, I am doomed to be unread." Though not indifferent to fame, the attack of an anonymous critic afforded him "exquisite entertainment," and while "perhaps justly condemned," wrote Shelley, "I feel that I am there sitting, where he durst not soar."

The year before his tragic death, Shelley was living a quiet, studious life at Pisa, translating Spinoza, in which he was assisted by his wife, seeing much of Byron and Byron's friends, devoting considerable time to boating and fishing, but although never happy away from the water he was unable to swim. On one occasion he resolved to try, and had it not been for Trelawney would have perished. "I always find the bottom of a well," he said to his rescuer, "and they say Truth lies there. In another minute I should have found it."

"I always go on until I am stopped," said Shelley, "and I am never stopped." Had he been less headstrong and fearless he would probably have taken the advice of those friends who endeavoured to restrain him from leaving Leghorn in that frail boat so unskilfully handled, "the smoke on the water, and the devil brewing mischief." In the white fog the Ariel was soon enveloped, and nothing more was seen of boat or occupants until two months later, when the bodies of Shelley and his friend Williams were found upon the shore of the lake; pending the arrival of Byron and Leigh Hunt, Shelley's body was buried in the sand, to be burned later in the presence of his friends, with a strange ritual of wine poured over the body. "This, with the oil and salt, made the yellow flames glisten and quiver. The heat from the sun and fire was so intense that the atmosphere was tremulous and heavy." The ashes were collected, and with the heart, that Trelawney had snatched from burning, were placed in a box and eventually buried in Rome.

"The fine spirit that had animated us and held us together is gone," wrote Trelawney, "and left to our own devices we degenerated apace."

HIS WORK

Shelley exhaled verse as a flower exhales fragrance, and just as the fragrance of a blossom varies in quality and power, so did Shelley's verse vary in poetic merit. The essential point is that there was no effort or laborious artistry about it at any time. He may not always have been a great poet—much in Queen Mab is second-rate poetry—but he was always a poet. Rhythm came as naturally to him as breathing. This distinguishes him at once from his contemporaries, several of whom served a laborious apprenticeship to the poetic Art. Keats especially, whom one always thinks of in connection with Shelley, for personal reasons, strove long and arduously before he arrived at that consummate art that conceals art in such flawless gems as the Ode to Autumn.

One other thing distinguishes Shelley from his contemporaries. He is a reformer as well as a poet. Little interested in the past, mindful only of the present when it jarred on his social idealism, his eyes are fixed intensely on the future. To renovate the world, to bring about Utopia, that is his constant aim, and for this reason we may regard Shelley as emphatically the poet of eager, sensitive youth, not the animal youth of Byron, but the spiritual youth of the visionary and reformer. In his earlier years Godwin was the figure who most readily impressed his mobile imagination, and in many of the poems dealing with social subjects—Queen Mab, and The Revolt of Islam—he is little more than Godwin made musical. In later life Wordsworth's influence is more clearly discernible. But the most potent inspiration came from Greek literature, first brought before his notice by his kindly friend and critic, Peacock.

Shelley, like his admirer Browning, needed the sunshine of the South to rouse his finest powers. Alastor is the splendid product of his first acquaintance with the Alps, and his loveliest lyrics were written under Italian skies.

Two notes dominate all Shelley's work, epic, narrative, and lyric alike—his devotion to liberty, and his whole-hearted belief in love as the prime factor in all human progress. The Revolution to Shelley was much more than a political upheaval, it was a spiritual awakening, the beginning of a new life. All that was evil in life he traced to Slavery. Natural development for him was the only development. He believed that men would never be men, never give what was best in them until they could give it out freely. Master yourself, he cries, and external freedom will enable you to realise your utmost capabilities. These are the thoughts underlying The Revolt of Islam, The Masque of Anarchy, Julian and Maddalo, and the noble lyric drama, Prometheus Unbound. Liberty, in Shelley's eyes, was freedom from external restraint. It is opposed to licence, for to "rule the Empire of Self" was, with Shelley, a moral necessity. What then, if force is withdrawn from Society, is to take its place? Shelley's answer is, Love. Love is to reign supreme, for only in an atmosphere of love can liberty efficiently work. Love is, with Shelley, a transcendental force kindling all things into beauty. In his treatment of it we miss the more concrete touch of Keats, and the homeliness of Wordsworth's steady affection.

But Shelley was no ordinary human being. There is a touch of elfin magic about all his work; he sings of human passions, yet as one almost aloof from them or feeling them only in some etherealised way. This is at once his great merit and his weakness. Consider, for instance, the Epipsychidion, where the poet pictures certain influences that have come into his life. Here surely is a subject wrought out of the poet's most intimate experiences, which might have been profound, vital, and stirring: the love of woman and the power of that love in shaping human life!—how poignantly and graciously has Browning dealt with this in his dramatic romances, with what quiet strength does Wordsworth suggest its spiritual aspects, with what fierce ardour does Byron surround its physical manifestation; or look, on the other hand, at the subtle witchery of Sex that Keats gives us in La Belle Dame, and Coleridge in Christabel. Yet none of these things move Shelley. No poet felt more deeply the dynamic influence of love in moulding human destiny, none realised more utterly the insignificance of life devoid of love, yet Shelley's women are merely lovely wreaths that greet us to the strains of delicious music. For instance:

"See where she stands! a mortal shape inducd
With love and life and light and duty,
And motion which may change but cannot die;
An image of some bright eternity;
A shadow of some golden dream, a splendour
Leaving the third sphere pilotless; a tender
Reflection of the eternal Moon of Love
Under whose motions life's dull billows move,
A metaphor of Spring and Youth and Morn'g,
A vision like incarnate April, warning
With smiles and tears, Frost the anatomy
Into his summer grave."

A mortal shape, the poet assures us. Can we believe him? The shape is more impersonal than the Princess of some old fairy tale. The poet has visualised a thing of beauty, but surely not a woman, merely an exquisite abstraction, a charming metaphor. The only touch of reality in the poem comes with the scenic setting, that indeed is palpable enough, and has no peer in English verse save in the Lotus land of Tennyson.

"And all the place is peopled with sweet airs;
The light clear element which the isle wears
Is heavy with the scent of lemon flowers,
Which floats like mist laden with unseen showers,
And falls upon the eyelids like faint sleep,
And from the moss violet and jonquils peep,
And dart their arrowy odour through the brain
Till you might faint with that delicious pain.
And every motion, odour, beam, and tone,
With that deep music is in unison—
Which is a soul within the soul—they seem Like echoes of an antenatal dream,—"

It is an isle 'twixt Heaven, Air, Earth, and Sea,
Cradled, and hung in clear tranquillity;
Bright as that wandering Eden, Lucifer,
Washed by the soft blue Oceans of young air."

But if, when dealing with human passions, the dreamlike quality of Shelley's verse is a defect rather than a merit; yet given a note of fantasy to start with, no poet can compel our imagination as he does. The spontaneity, the splendid abandonment, the musical rush of the lines, these things make us his willing captives. He has made our hard, sibilant language a thing of fire and air. The beauty of the visible world strikes his prismatic imagination and is dissolved into rainbow colours, the very personality of the singer melts into his song, until he ceases to be a man and becomes a voice, a lyric incarnate.

Yet, for all the visionary quality of the verse, for all that strange aloofness, there is no vagueness of effect, or intellectual mistiness. The outlines may be faint, but they are unmistakable, and in such incomparable lyrics as The Cloud and The Ode to the West Wind, there is a logical development of idea that blends perfectly with the exquisite music, making it a thing of thought and beauty all compact.

Passing from these general considerations of Shelley's work, let us watch for a while the artistic growth of the poet. His earliest work, Queen Mab (1813), is individual enough in its outcry against the unspiritual forces that weigh down mankind, but is crude in expression, and is obviously written under the influence of Southey's Orientalem. In the next poem, Alastor (1816), Shelley found his true greatness for the first time. Written under the inspiration of congenial companionship and of the glories of Alpine scenes, we find ourselves bathed in that atmosphere of luminous beauty and ethereal music so peculiarly Shelleyan. The aspiring youth in the poem is the poet himself on his life quest, and if the story becomes at times obscure and over digressive, the main drift is clear enough. It is the revolt of the imagination against the limitations of human life. Following this poem, and spiritually akin to it, is the fine Hymn to Intellectual Beauty (1816), and the glowing tribute to Mont Blanc (1816).

Like at West Marlow (1816–1817) brought the poet into intimate contact with social misery, and the outcome of this may be seen in The Revolt of Islam (1818), with its passionate plea for freedom. The poem abounds in fine imagery and musical cadences, but is marred by incoherence, and charms the fancy rather than holds the imagination. Still less successful is the diatribe against marriage, Rosalind and Helen (1819), unexpectedly strong and forceful at times, but on the whole weak and ineffectual.

The skilful use of the heroic couplet in Julian and Maddalo (1818) is interesting, and the picture of Byron is vivid and intimate, but there is too much screaming, too much verbal hysteria, to make it great or memorable: very different are the Lines written among the Euganean Hills in the same year, where the discords of life and the passionate idealism of the poet, hoping against hope, are present with supple grace and power. In Prometheus Unbound

(1818-1819), the Shelleyan thirst for freedom reappears in a noble and expansive setting. The machinery of this mystical drama is as usual none too clear, and even when clear, anything but convincing, but the meaning of the poem is clear enough, and the poetic symbolism used to depict the joy of Nature at the liberation of Prometheus is magnificent. "The bright blue sky of Rome and the effect of the vigorous awakening spring in that divinest climate, and the new life with which it dominates the spirits even to intoxication were the inspiration of this drama." Thus wrote Shelley, and in the fresh loveliness of the jets of song that break forth from time to time, we can realise the measure of the poet's spiritual intoxication.

If the Prometheus is mainly remarkable for its lyrical greatness, Shelley was soon to show in The Cenci (1819) that he was not lacking in dramatic power.

The story of Beatrice Cenci is just such an one as would have stirred the Jacobean dramatists, who loved a theme at once tragic and morbid, and Shelley's drama has been compared with the work of Webster and Tourneur, both of whom were known to the poet. But Shelley's imagination lacked both the passionate intensity of Webster and the coarse, undisciplined violence that accompany his genius. Webster would have made the play much more vital; at the same time he would have made it too horrible. Shelley, deliberately eschewing here poetic beauties and giving it that touch of aloofness inherent in all his work, makes it not horrible, merely terrible. The Cenci, in fact, with its austere atmosphere and undeviating thread of tragedy, has more points in common with the Greek than the romantic drama.

Although Shelley had no genuine sense of humour he had a quiver, elfish spirit of mockery, and this breaks out (perhaps as a relief to the strain of The Cenci) in his next work, Peter Bell the Third.

It is instructive to compare this satirical attack on Wordsworth with Byron's English Bards and The Vision of Judgment. Byron is in his element: Shelley is not. The criticism in Peter Bell is not unfair—he is never spiteful like Byron—but the jostling has no savour, and as a satire it is only excelled in ineffectiveness by Swellfoot the Tyrant.

Swellfoot the Tyrant (1820) deals with the King and Queen Caroline. Shelley is far more happily inspired by current affairs in his stirring protest, written after the Peterloo Massacre at Manchester—The Masque of Anarchy.

About this time the Shelleys change their residence for the hilly region of Pisa, and the year 1820 sees the birth of Shelley's most exquisite imaginings. Of these, The Witch of Atlas is the most ambitious. The witch is a beautiful goddess who watches human destinies; she is tender and beneficent, yet with a calm detachment from human passion. She visits mortal beings and gives them fair dreams of beauty.

The treatment is delicately fantastic, and the spell of fantasy is never rudely broken. In the Letter to Maria Gaborne, the vein of fantasy runs into a lighter and more jesting mood. This poem is the nearest approach to real humour that may be found in Shelley:

"The liquor doctors rail at—and which I
Will quaff in spite of them—and when we die
We'll toss up who died first of drinking tea,
And cry out—heads or tails?—where'er we be."

To some critics this is a triumphant refutation of the charge of "no humour" brought against him. I cannot see it in this light; there is a sportive gaiety about the piece that, had he never known Byron, might have served as some evidence on the vexed problem. As it is, we have to remember the close friendship with Byron—that certainly will serve to explain the form and visage that his gay obulations took at times; while the whole tenor of Shelley's life, the character of his letters, afford overwhelming evidence to the contrary. But the poem, all the same, is an agreeable soufflé.

The Sensitive Plant (1819) is less satisfying as a fantasy than The Witch of Atlas, but has a delicate, exotic grace and many haunting lines.

Greatest, however, are the lyrical pieces, where Shelley's genius always exults. The Skylark (1820), the most popular of these, though not the finest, is rich in melodious charm (too often mangled by intrepid reciters), but infinitely superior in imaginative conception and metrical power are The Cloud (1820) and the Ode to the West Wind (1819).

The Cloud is a nature myth of flawless beauty. The complete identification of the poet with his subject, the superb rush of music, the crystalline clearness of the picture, not for a moment marred by over-profusion of metaphor as in The Skylark, these things make criticism tongue-tied. Even to comment on its beauties is an unpertinence. It is made for our wonder and delight.

The Ode to the West Wind is not greater artistically—that were impossible; but it has an intellectual and human interest designedly absent from the shorter piece.

The logical development of the imaginative idea is so admirable that it deserves the fullest attention. Walking along the banks of the Arno, the poet has seen from the wood hard by the rising autumnal storm carrying with it its freight of leaves. Surging along comes this beneficent destroyer, scattering the black, scarlet, and yellow leaves far and wide:

"Yellow, and black and pale, and hectic red,
Pestilence-stricken multitudes: O thou,
Who chariotest to their dark wintry bed
The wingèd seeds, where they lie cold and low,
Each like a corpse within its grave, until Thine azure sister of the spring shall blow
Her clarion o'er the dreaming earth, and fill (Driving sweet buds like flocks to feed in air)
With living hues and odours plain and hill:
Wild Spirit, which art moving everywhere;
Destroyer and preserver; hear, O hear!"

The "wild Spirit" is then both "a destroyer and preserver."

As the wind purifies the woods, so does the wind sweeten the sky, clarify the ocean, and make stronger and sounder the heart of man.

With each fresh variation of the original thought the poet gives us a flood of superb imagery, strengthening the main theme, never weakening by far-fetched concerts We pass in turn over earth, sky, and sea, the music growing fuller and more majestic as the poem sweeps on, "O lift me as a wave, a leaf, a cloud" And as in the visible world so in the poet's soul, the wind is both Destroyer and Preserver.

"Make me as thy lyre, even as the forest is :
What if my leaves are falling like its own !
The tumult of thy mighty harmonies
Will take from both a deep, autumnal tone,
Sweet though in sadness . . .
Drive my dead thoughts over the universe
Like withered leaves to quicken a new birth !"

Then from the individual the poem passes to the universal The old world must go, a new world must come with the Spring, laden with fresh sweet promises for suffering humanity :

"O, wind,
If Winter comes, can Spring be far behind ?"

Thus does this wonderful lyric end There is no greater lyric in our language

In the following year, 1821, came Adonais, a noble and eloquent elegy, deliberate and concentrated in its method, the finest of his non-lyrical pieces As in Adonais he celebrates his love and admiration of a brother poet, so in Epipsychidion does he voice his affection for certain feminine influences that have entered his life The poem is rich in atmosphere, but not the warm, vibrant atmosphere we are anticipating

Hellas (1822) is inspired by the Greek Revolution, to which Byron gave his life and Shelley some of his most impassioned music As a garner of lyrical song it is a worthy pendant to Prometheus Unbound, reflecting not merely the superb lyrical invention of the poet but his live and intense humanitarianism Then, in the early flush of the Italian summer, came the Triumph of Life—a beautiful fragment left incomplete by his death

Turning from his verse to his prose, we are struck by its own clarity and sober sense His letters have not the pungency of Byron's, but they are never dull, and the later ones abound in rich and satisfying phrases. Certainly the prose is worthy of the poet

As a thinker starting with the crude materialism and extreme social ideals of Godwin, he accommodated Godwin's philosophy to his own sensitive and imaginative nature, but under the influence of Plato, Godwin's materialism dropped out of the way, although there was much in Godwin's thought that always appealed to him He believed to the end that the unaided reason would put an end to wickedness and error, and that all government was oppression But Reason with him lacked the cold and formal quality of Godwin's tenets, being transformed with the poet's ardent love His philosophy is often pantheistic in expression—notably in Adonais, and he is frequently spoken of as a pantheist; but he obviously vacillates between dualism and pantheism, and the struggle between the good and evil Deities is clearly the burden of such poems as Alastor and Prometheus On the whole, he believes that the light will swallow up the darkness, but, like most optimists worth their salt, he has moods of doubt and dejection. In his attitude towards art and the relation between art and conduct, he is as clear-headed as Coleridge, and saw plainly the quagmire of didacticism into which Wordsworth had fallen. As he says in his Defence of Poetry, "the great instrument of moral good is the imagination"; thereby touching in a simple phrase the ethereal power of all great literature, parting company with those who think that the poet can only reform mankind when he does so in the form of Dr. Watts' moral songs

Although in Shelley's diction we find favourite words like "curse," "poison," "demon," that remind us of the Gothic school of terror, where Horace Walpole and Mrs Radcliffe ruled, yet the mediæval note is strikingly absent from Shelley's poetry He cared as little for the past as did Byron, and the dim cloistral mysticism of the Middle Ages, with its magic and its pageantry, stirred no pulse-beat in the author of Hellas His passion for freedom, his craving for moral harmony, drew him towards Greek ideals Intellectually his sympathies were always with Greek thought; though temperament and idiosyncrasies made his own poetic art something very different from the measured, orderly beauty of Hellenic culture Yet we must not make too much of this disparity Despite the hectic note in Shelley and the difficulty he experienced in schooling his impetuous and ready muse, his constructive power is remarkable in his later work, and the Hellenic ideal is assuredly not lost sight of This is especially noticeable in the briefer lyrics, where his mastery is more apparent There the form, the idea, the development from start to finish are beautifully fashioned and correlated The stream of song is bright and clear; and while apparently rushing anywhere, pursues a definite course and achieves a definite purpose with marvellous ease and absence of conscious effort

The peculiar quality of Shelley's lyrical genius demands some comment As a rule our great lyric poets have excelled in portraying sexual emotion, sometimes striking the note of elemental passion, as did the Elizabethans and Robert Burns, sometimes improvising tender sentimentalism and exquisite conceits around the primitive themes, as the Caroline singers and Tennyson were wont to do But, whether directly or indirectly, the call of Sex has evoked their finest songs This is not the case with Shelley

It is somewhat of a paradox that a poet to whom human love is the vital inspiration of his art should prove so elusive in his love lyrics. The sentiment is so rarefied, so readily does he pass from the personal to the universal, so engrossed is he with love as an abstract ideal, that as a love poet, as we ordinarily understand the term, he is curiously unsubstantial and ineffective Certain events in his own life tend to persuade one here, that this quality in his love songs, satisfying in every respect save as expressions of love, is due to an elfin, a non-human element in the man's nature But the real solution does not lie here, I think, though there may be a grain of truth in the view.

In some ways Shelley is intensely human, vividly passionate; but he is far more easily stirred by an idea than by a person; and his singularly subtle intellect exercises a cooling and impersonal influence upon his imaginative life.

We cannot read of his life at Marlow without feeling the tender, sympathetic side of the man; his many rich friendships attest his sympathetic personality, but he lives so much in the future, he looks up so long at the sky that he seems to lose touch of earth. His intellect rules him, not any human emotion. He is quickly, not deeply emotional.

Liberty for the downtrodden, hope for the oppressed, peace for the storm-tossed, these are things that fire his songs and stir his imagination to its depths. For this reason The Masque of Anarchy, the Prometheus Unbound, Hellas, the Ode to the West Wind move us in a way that none of his love poetry does, and for the rest, when he holds us with his magic music, it is when he becomes as one of the elements himself, and, stripping himself of human emotion and thought, projects himself into the universe, loses his own self-identity, and charms us in just the same way as might a storm, a sunset, or the moon upon the waters.

HELLAS

The world's great age begins anew,
The golden years return,
The earth doth like a snake renew
Her winter weeds outworn
Heaven smiles, and faiths and empires gleam
Like wrecks of a dissolving dream

A brighter Hellas roars its mountains
From waves serenely far,
A new Peneus rolls his fountains
Against the morning star,
Where fairer Tempes bloom, there sleep
Young Cyclops on a sunnier deep.

A loftier Argo cleaves the main,
Fraught with a later prize,
Another Orpheus sings again,
And loves, and weeps, and dies;
A new Ulysses leaves once more
Calypso for his native shore

O write no more the tale of Troy,
If earth Death's scroll must be—
Nor mix with Larian rage the joy
Which dawns upon the free,
Although a subtler Sphinx renew
Riddles of death Thetis never knew.

Another Athens shall arise,
And to remoter time
Bequeath, like sunset to the skies,
The splendour of its prime;
And leave, if naught so bright may live,
All earth can take or Heaven can give

Saturn and Love their long repose
Shall burst more bright and good
Than all who fell, than One who rose,
Than many unsubdued—
Not gold, not blood, their altar dowers,
But votive tears and symbol flowers

O cease! must hate and death return?
Cease! must men kill and die?
Cease! drain not to its dregs the urn
Of bitter prophecy!
The world is weary of the past—
O might it die or rest at last!

MUSIC

I pant for the music which is divine,
My heart in its thirst is a dying flower;
Pour forth the sound like enchanted wine,
Loosen the notes in a silver shower,
Like a herbless plain, for the gentle rain,
I gasp, I faint, till they wake again.

Let me drink of the spirit of that sweet sound,
More, oh more,—I am thirsting yet,
It loosens the serpent which care has bound
Upon my heart to stifle it,
The dissolving strain, through every vein,
Passes into my heart and brain.

THE CLOUD

I bring fresh showers for the thirsting flowers,
From the seas and the streams,
I bear light shade for the leaves when laid
In their noonday dreams
From my wings are shaken the dews that waken
The sweet buds every one,
When rocked to rest on their mother's breast
As she dances about the sun
I wield the flail of the lashing hail,
And whiten the green plains under,
And then again I dissolve it in rain,
And laugh as I pass in thunder.

I sift the snow on the mountains below,
And their great pines groan aghast,
And all the night 'tis my pillow white,
While I sleep in the arms of the blast
Sublime on the towers of my sky bowers,
Lightning my pilot sits,
In a cavern under is fettered the thunder,
It struggles and howls at fits,
Over earth and ocean, with gentle motion,
This pilot is guiding me
Lured by the love of the gent that move
In the depths of the purple sea,
Over the rills, and the crag, and the hill,
Over the lakes and the plains,
Wherever he dream, under mountain or stream,
The Spirit he loves remains;
And I all the while burn in heaven's blue smile,
Whilst he is dissolving in rains

The sanguine sunrise, with his meteor eyes,
And his burning plumes outspread,
Leaps on the back of my sailing rack,
When the morning star shines dead,
As on the jag of a mountain crag,
Which an earthquake rocks and swings,
An eagle alit one moment may sit
In the light of its golden wings
And when sunset may breathe, from the lit sea beneath,
Its ardours of rest and of love,
And the crimson pall of eve may fall
From the depth of heaven above,
With wings folded I rest, on mine airy nest,
As still as a brooding dove.

That orb'd maiden with white fire laden,
Whom mortals call the moon,
Glides glimmering o'er my fleece-like floor,
By the midnight breezes strewn;
And where'er the beam of her unseen feet,
Which only the angels hear,
May have broken the woof of my tent's thin roof,
The stars peep behind her and peer,
And I laugh to see them whirl and flee,
Like a swarm of golden bees,
When I widen the rent in my well-huilt tent,
Till the culm rivers, lakes, and seas,
Like strips of the sky fallen through moor and high,
Are each paved with the moon and these.

I bind the sun's throne with a burning zone,
 And the moon's with a girdle of pearl;
 The volcanoes are dim, and the stars reel and swim,
 When the whirlwinds my banner unfurl.
 From cape to cape, with a bridge-like shape,
 Over a torrent sea,
 Sunbeam-proof, I hang like a roof,
 The mountains its columns be.
 The triumphal arch through which I march
 With hurricane, fire, and snow,
 When the powers of the air are chained to my char,
 Is the million-coloured bow,
 The sphere-fire above its soft colours wove,
 While the moist earth was laughing below.

I am the daughter of earth and water,
 And the nursing of the sky;
 I pass through the pores of the ocean and shores,
 I change, but I cannot die.
 For after the rain when with never a stain,
 The pavilion of heaven is bare,
 And the winds and sunbeams with their convex gloams,
 Build up the blue dome of air,
 I silently laugh at my own cenotaph,
 And out of the caverns of rain,
 Like a child from the womb, like a ghost from the tomb,
 I arise and unbuild it again.

JOHN KEATS (1795-1821)

His Life

An ostler who married his master's daughter, acquired the business of his father-in-law, and set up at the Swan and Hoop, Finsbury Pavement. Such was the poet's progenitor, and in the atmosphere of a thriving inn was the author of Endymion reared. Parontage assuredly throws no light on genius here. The father was a shrewd, careful man of business, the mother a lively young woman, fond of enjoyment; but not only did neither parent exhibit any taste or feeling for art of any kind, but, so far as we know, neither did any other member of the family.

Popular estimation pictures Keats as a morbid, hysterical youth. As a matter of fact he was a bright, enthusiastic youth, shy and reserved at times, but in the company of friends sane and cheerful in talk, often with a vivacious humour of which there is little trace in his work. Afterwards disease sapped his energies and he became moody, but to the last he was brave and stoical. The best side of Keats' nature is not displayed in the love letters to Fanny Brawne.

Nor did he show any special intellectual interests as a boy. He was not a dreamer like young Coleridge, nor a voracious reader like the youthful Morris. He was just a high-spirited boy with the ordinary boy's love of outdoor sports, simple in his tastes, and lovable in his nature. His one hobby was for fighting. "He would fight anyone," said one of his school friends, "morning, noon, and night," and was noted for his "terrier courage." Then suddenly, in his fourteenth year, the mind woke up and he gave to his books the energy and zest he had before bestowed on games. He read all day—just as before he had sparred all day. Classical antiquity especially appealed to him, and even the somewhat arid charm of Lemprière's Classical Dictionary held him in thrall. His parents died while he was still a lad, and his guardians took him from school at the age of fifteen and apprenticed him for five years to a surgeon, Hammond, who lived at Edmonton. But his heart was not in the problems of compound fractures, but in literature, and his leisure time was devoted to his books.

A notable event was the reading of the Faerie Queene, lent him by his friend Cowden Clarke. Through Spenser's romantic realms "he romped," said his friend, "like a young horse turned into a spring meadow, revelling in the rhythmic beauties and sensuous charms." No other writer had so utterly possessed his imagination, and his earliest poetic effort was to imitate his master.

Thus did he begin to find his powers; and later on, when his poetic apprenticeship was past, achieved one of his great successes with the Spenserian stanza in The Eve of St. Agnes.

In the spring of 1816 we find him "a dresser" at Guy's Hospital, assisting the surgeons and dreaming of fairyland all the while with a detachment of mind that would have horrified both the operator and the patient had they known about it.

Little wonder that he soon gave up all thought of a medical career, and devoted himself to literature. Spenser had been his first enchanter, the second was Homer. Once again the introducer was Cowden Clarke. After poring over Chapman's Iliad and Odyssey with fascinated delight, he wrote his fine sonnet. He had found his "Peak in Darien" and never deserted it.

In 1816 Keats made the acquaintance of Leigh Hunt, whose agreeable personality and cultured tastes attracted him at once. This "matchless fireside companion," as Elia called him, proved an excellent mentor, and in the rural retirement of Hunt at Hampstead, Keats spent many happy days. "No imaginative pleasure was left unnoticed by us or unenjoyed, from the recollection of the bards and patriots of old to the luxury of a summer rain at our window, or the clicking of the coal in winter-time." Thus wrote the author of Rimini in later years. Another friend at this time was the brilliant and unfortunate painter, Robert Haydon, whom the young poet addressed in enthusiastic verse:

"Great spirits now on earth are sojourning:
 He of the cloud, the cataract, the lake,
 Who on Helvellyn's summit, wide awake,
 Catches his freshness from Archangel's wing;
 Ho of the rose, the violet, the spring,
 The social smile, the chain for Freedom's sake;
 And lo! whose steadfastness would never take
 A meander sound than Raphael's whispering
 And other spirits there are standing apart
 Upon the forehead of the age to come,
 These, these will give the world another heart,
 And other pulses. Hear ye not the hum
 Of mighty workings!—
 Listen awhile, ye nations, and be dumb."

Indeed, Keats was in a circle where great spirits abounded. Wordsworth and Lamb and Leigh Hunt met the young enthusiast, and each in his own way fed the poetic enthusiasm. Hunt has neatly and admirably etched for us Keats' portrait during these years:

"He was under the middle height; and his lower limbs were small in comparison with the upper, but neat and well-turned. His shoulders were very broad for his size; he had a face in which energy and sensibility were remarkably mixed up; an eager power, checked and made patient by ill-health. Every feature was at once strongly cut, and delicately alive. If there was any faulty expression, it was in the mouth, which was not without something of a character of pugnacity. His face was rather long than otherwise, the upper lip projected a little over the under, the chin was bold; the cheeks sunken, the eyes mellow and glowing; large, dark, and sensitive. At the recital of a noble action, or a beautiful thought, they would suffuse with tears, and his mouth trembled. In this there was ill-health as well as imagination, for he did not like these betrayals of emotion: and he had great personal as well as moral courage. He once chastised a butcher, who had been insolent, by a regular stand-up fight. His hair, of a brown colour, was fine, and hung in natural ringlets. The head was a puzzle for phrenologists, being remarkably small in the skull—a singularity which he had in common with Byron and Shelley, whose hats I could not get on."

About this time he met Shelley, but did not take to him so unreservedly as he had done to the others. Shelley, on the other hand, was greatly struck by Keats, and his admiration for the poet impelled him to one of his supreme inspirations, years afterwards, when the tragedy of Keats' life had closed.

After publishing his first volume of verse, Keats went to the Isle of Wight in order to obtain the quietude and freedom from distraction that was needed for the ripening of his powers. Haydon had advised this, but the advice ill-suited one of Keats' temperament. He needed the stimulus of friendly intercourse, and grew restless and nervous when left to his own resources. So he returned to London, and at the close of the year had completed the first draft of Endymion—the last lines being written during an excursion to Burford Bridge, near Dorking. The reception of the poem was unfavourable. Keats' association with Leigh Hunt was sufficient in itself in certain quarters to discredit him, for Hunt's political radicalism had made him odious to the great Tory Reviews. Keats, always sensitive, and at this stage beginning to feel the onset of the disease that finally overwhelmed him, took the savage onslaught of the critics deeply to heart. But it is a mistake to think that he was killed by criticism—"snuffed out by an article", deeply as he resented the gross unfairness of the attack, he soon took their snarlings at their proper valuation. "Praise or blame has but a momentary effect on the man whose love of beauty in the abstract makes him a severe critic on his own works. My own domestic criticism has given me pain without comparison beyond what Blackwood or the Quarterly could inflict. and also when I feel I am right, no external praise can give me such a glow as my own solitary re-perception and ratification of what is fine. J. S. is perfectly right in regard to the 'shipshod Endymion.' That it is so is no fault of mine. No! though it may sound a little paradoxical, it is as good as I had power to make it by myself. Had I been nervous about it being a perfect piece, and with that view asked advice, and trembled over every page, it would not have been written, for it is not in my nature to fumble. I will write independently. I have written independently 'without judgment'—I may write independently and with judgment, hereafter. The Genius of Poetry must work out its own salvation in a man. It cannot be matured by law and precept, but by sensation and watchfulness in itself. That which is creative must create itself. In Endymion I leapt headlong into the sea, and thereby have become better acquainted with the soundings, the quicksands, and the rocks, than if I had stayed upon the green shore, and piped a silly pipe, and took tea and comfortable advice. I was never afraid of failure; for I would sooner fail than not be among the greatest."

But misfortunes accumulated. In 1818 his brother Tom died of consumption, while his other brother, George, emigrated to America. Keats himself fell ill and never recovered fully from the fever that had ravished him. Yet in this and the next year he wrote some of his greatest poems, for while his body was wasting away his imagination was becoming more vital, his creative power more wonderful. The love affair with Fanny Brawne came at a time when his nerves were already strained to breaking point by physical frailties, so that the letters to that young woman, on which the popular estimate of Keats' character is largely based, must be taken as showing the poet at a special disadvantage, and in no way expressing his naturally virile and courageous self.

In February 1820 he caught a chill and spat blood. "I know the colour of that blood," he said to a friend, "it is arterial blood. . . that drop of blood is my death warrant—I must die."

A slight rally following upon a change of air heartened his friends, but a relapse soon followed, and the doctor warned him that to winter in England would be fatal. Quotely and resolutely, though it agonised him to part from Fanny, who had nursed him during his illness, he made plans to travel with a friend, Joseph Severn, and on September 8 set sail from Gravesend. He realised he would never return, and in a letter home said piteously, "I can bear to die—I cannot bear to leave her." Gradually his grief lost its first poignancy, and at the end he was reconciled to his fate. Early in 1821 he passed away, in the arms of his loyal and tender-hearted friend, Severn, and found his last resting-place in the Protestant cemetery at Rome.

HIS WORK

Intellectually Keats was strongly in sympathy with Shelley and Byron. Indeed in religious philosophy he was really more extreme, more wholeheartedly pagan than either. Byron, for all his cynicism, never freed himself entirely from the spell of Christianity, and Shelley's transcendental fervour is far more obvious than his so-called atheism. But Keats had no religion save the religion of beauty, no God save Pan. the Earth was his great comfort, and so passionately did he love her, with a love far more concrete and personal than that of Wordsworth or even Shelley, that no other consideration impinged upon his work. So, whatever his political sympathies were, he never suffered them to colour his poetry. He fled from the work-a-day world into an enchanted realm of his own jealously closed against the intrusion of ordinary human affairs. Shelley's idealism is continually coloured by his revolutionary ardour. Keats' idealism reflects nothing of the life of his day. He took from Mediaevalism and Hellenism material for fashioning his sequestered land of beauty, but what he found here he used for sensuous delight, not ethical inspiration.

To Scott the appeal of the landscape lay in its historical associations, to Keats in its legendary inspiration. As Leigh Hunt said of him, "He never beheld the oak tree without seeing the Dryad."

At the same time it is well to remember that this artistic eclecticism, so uncongenial to some minds, was the eclecticism of youth. There are indications towards the end of his brief career which show that he was approximating gradually to the actualities of life, and in criticising his exclusive preoccupation with Arcady and Fairyland, we must make allowances for the rich, artistic endowment of a very young man who responded more readily to the glories of art than to the problems of life. None of his contemporaries saw more clearly than he, precisely where Pope and his school failed. It was not merely a matter of prosody, not merely a question of subject matter—Town versus Country. Keats reproached Pope as

"forgetting the great end
Of Poetry, that it should be a friend
To soothe the cares and lift the thoughts of man."

Where Wordsworth spiritualises, and Shelley intellectualises Nature, Keats is content to express her through the senses: the colour, the scent, the touch, the pulsing music, these are the things that stir him to his depths, there is not a mood of Earth he does not love, not a season that will not cheer and inspire him. "The setting sun will always set on to rights, or if a sparrow come before my window, I take part in its existence and pick about the gravel."

When first he began to write, the wealth of his perceptive life bewildered and embarrassed him. The influence of mediaeval Italy and its store of legend, the pastoral sweetness and sensuous beauty of Spenser, coming upon him in his early impressionable years, almost overpowered his abnormal sensibility. He owed much to his friend Leigh Hunt for wise and generous encouragement and direction, and at a time when he was all tremulous with delight at the imaginative feast before him, there came another revelation, the revelation of Greek Art and Life through the medium of Chapman's Homer. The splendid sincerity of that famous sonnet attests the mental state of the man:

"Then felt I like some watcher of the skies
When a new planet swims into his ken;
Or like stout Cortez when with eagle eyes
He star'd at the Pacific—and all his men
Look'd at each other with a wild surmise—
Silent, upon a peak in Darien."

Need we wonder that the "wild surmise" on the peak in Darien which he had climbed, led at first to an extravagance of speech and excess of emotion? Need we wonder that his early experiments in verse, Calidore, Sleep and Poetry, even Endymion, are overcharged with Spenserian imagery, and Elizabethan conceits? Yet even here there is an individual note, and in I stood tip-toe upon a little hill, there are touches that no other poet but Keats could have given us

"A little noiseless noise among the leaves,
Born of the very sigh that silence heaves."

Sleep and Poetry is faulty in execution, but the point of view of the young poet is unmistakable.

"Beauty was awake:
Why were ye not awake?"

We read these early efforts, discerning amid all their ornate extravagances, their abuse of double rhymes, their faulty emphasis, their occasional vulgarities, the stammerings of a great poet. The soul is already there, the gift of satisfying speech is at present denied. But the inspiration of Greece will prove his guerdon if we give him time. Surely from a youth of nineteen who could give us On first looking into Chapman's Homer, splendid things may be expected.

Meanwhile there is the glorious promise and immature fulfilment of Endymion. The old myth concerned with the secret for ideal beauty with all its mythological accessories is but indifferently told, and much of the descriptive writing is weak and diffuse. But there are Songs by the Way, for which, as in Tennyson's Princess, we may forgive many a nerveless line, and no lover of poetry would forego the lovely "roundelay" to Sorrow, and the splendid Bacchanalian Ode.

In one of his happy phrases Keats tells us that "Poetry should please by a fine excess", and no one could strike the note of "fine excess" more triumphantly. Yet in his most perfect work, in the Odes, La Belle Dame sans Merci, and that fragment The Eve of St. Mark, he shows that the pleasure of poetry depends no less on the fine restraint.

It is the lack of this restraint that troubles us in the rarely imaginative version of a tale from Boccaccio, Isabella; in the glowing diction of Lamia, in the tapestried beauty of The Eve of St. Agnes.

Of these, perhaps, Isabella, despite its morbid sensibility, alone achieves its purpose. Lamia, with its serpent woman, certainly fails to grip the imagination in the way intended. To realise how imperfectly Keats has wrought his atmosphere of mystery, one has only to compare it with the Christabel of Coleridge. There is mystery in the one and genuine diablerie in the other. But Keats can no more make the flesh creep, than the Fat Boy in Pickwick.

Regarded as a piece of richly decorative verse, The Eve of St. Agnes is pleasant enough with its "lucent syrups tinct with cinnamon." But the "lucent syrups" are too generously supplied, and there are times in the poem when we would gladly welcome the romantic vigour and directness of Scott to give life and zest to the story.

In all these poems, mediaevalism serves as the inspiration, and though it gave him ample opportunities for that richness of colouring that was at once his merit and his failing, it did not appeal to the strongest side of his nature. On two occasions, by some happy chance, it inspires him in high vein, that is, in his ballad La Belle Dame and the Ode to a Nightingale, but it is under Hellenic influence as a rule that he gives us of his best.

Placing on one side for the moment the Odes, let us consider The Eve of St. Mark. We have here only the Prologue to the poem, for the legendary subject of the poem is never reached. But how consummately the scene is set; the atmosphere suggested. The quaint old-world town with its leisurely quietude, the girl brooding intently on the legend, half fascinated, half afraid; the chilly sunset tremulous with premonition.

The picture is perfectly visualised, and the details so unobtrusively given, so cunningly observed, make the whole thing amazingly actual. The restraint, the balance, the simplicity, the ease, are beyond praise, with rare economy of effort, he arrests the reader and makes him feel the impending tragedy.

But just as Byron finds the ultimate and most complete expression of his personality and temperament in Don Juan, so in the Odes does Keats give us most of his inmost self, and when he does so it is with the sure hand of the great artist. Not all the Odes stand on this footing. The Ode to Indolence, faithfully portraying as it does a transient mood, has no high beauty to commend it, the Ode to Psyche, reminiscent of his mythological loves, shows too clearly the tool mark of the craftsman. But the Ode to a Nightingale, the Ode on a Grecian Urn, the Ode on Melancholy, and the Ode to Autumn are among the mightiest achievements of English verse. The note of sadness sounds through all, that insistent minor that rings dirge-like through all the haunting music of Nature and of Art; and the vivid joy of the perceptive life, the ideal permanence of Art, the glamour of romance, the benison of Nature's varying moods, are contrasted with the mutability of life and the transience of pleasure.

Melancholy, as he knew,

" . . . dwells with Beauty—Beauty that must die;
And joy, whose hand is ever at his lips
Bidding adieu, and aching Pleasure nigh,
Turning to poison while the bee-mouth sips:
Ay, in the very temple of Delight
Veil'd Melancholy has her sovran shrine. . . ."

The Ode to a Nightingale, embodying the very spirit of old romance, is the most voluptuous and passionate in its emotion. At points the emotion threatens to overpower the writer, and an hysterical euphuism here and there jars on the reader. But for the most part the passion, for all its intensity, is focussed and controlled, as for instance in such inspired felicities as the oft-quoted (and mis-quoted):

" . . . magic casements, opening on the foam
Of perilous sea, in fairy lands forlorn";

in the lovely image of Ruth,

" . . . when, sick for home
She stood in tears amid the alien corn", and above all, in the wistful beauty of the stanza, where the poet cries out to

"Fade far away, dissolve, and quite forget
What thou among the leaves hast never known,
The weariness, the fever, and the fret
Here, where men sit and hear each other groan;

Where palsy shakes a few, sad, last grey hairs,
Where youth grows pale, and spectre-thin, and dies;
Where but to think is to be full of sorrow
And leaden-ey'd despairs,
Where Beauty cannot keep her lustrous eyes,
Or new Love pine at them beyond to-morrow."

Passages such as these are among his choicest and best.

The solace of romance is exchanged for the solace of art in the Ode on a Grecian Urn. Human life and happiness may be brief, yet Art may enshrine them with an ideal beauty that outlives the years. The figures and all they symbolised are gone, but Art has given them a lasting durability, and so links the ages together.

Most satisfying of all the Odes, in thought and expression, is the Ode to Autumn. Most satisfying because, for all the splendour of diction in the others, there are times when the poetic fire dwindles for a moment, whereas in this Ode, from its inception to its close, matter and manner are not only superbly blended, but every line carries its noble freight of beauty. The first stanza is a symphony of colour, the second a symphony of movement, the third a symphony of sound. The artist shapes the first and last, and in the midst the man, the thinker, gives us its human significance. Thus is the poem perfected, its sensuous imagery enveloping as it were its vital idea.

Hyperion, written about the same time as the Odes, is a fine fragment marked, on the whole, by an austere Miltonic beauty that shows how far Keats had travelled since Endymion days. That Keats was for some reason dissatisfied with it, we know, for when he reviewed it later it was to revise, not to continue it. Perhaps there were elements in the story that did not appeal to him; perhaps the interest of the old Greek legend was yielding to the more compelling interest of actual human life, and he felt he could express himself more amply and more happily in another form. Be the reason what it may, the poem is left unfinished; to show the heights of metrical achievement to which the poet could rise, and to hint that with fuller life and development he might have added a great epic poem to our language. With the merest smattering of mediæval life and literature, he has yet seized upon certain aspects of its magic more surely than any other English poet. With a rough second-hand knowledge of Greek art and culture, he grasped the secret of Hellenism in a way never attained by poets far richer than he in Hellenistic lore—Shelley, Landor, and Swinburne. He saw by the intuition of genius into the spirit of the people, and we are really little concerned by such technical slips as the mention of Cortez in place of Balboa, as the discoverer of the Pacific, or the anachronistic reference to carpets in The Eve of St. Agnes.

Among the formative influences in his work, Spenser stands first, but Chaucer and Milton influenced only in a secondary degree his poetic style and vocabulary; lesser poets, like Chapman, William Browne, and his friend Leigh Hunt, affected him especially in his earlier work, in his choice of words and phrases, and in his search for colour. But the finest part of Keats' work owes nothing to a derivative source In the fragmentary Ode to Mona, with its purity of phrase and chastened beauty, there are no echoes, no obligations :

"O, give me their old vigour, and unheard
Save of the quiet Primrose, and the span
Of heaven and few ears,
Rounded by thee, my song should die away
Content as theirs,
Rich in the simple worship of a day."

Perhaps his most notable divergence as a poet, from his contemporary Shelley, is that he elects, as a rule, to deal with sensations rather than ideas, with concrete life than with abstract imaginings—Sight and hearing respond to ideas, touch, to sensations. The metaphysical power that charges with intellectual fire the visions of Shelley, is outside of his scope. Not that he eschews ideas, the Odes eloquently refute such a suggestion, but when he elects to deal with ideas, he chooses such human things as love, sorrow, life, and beauty, and presents them in concrete shape.

"The moving waters at their priest-like task
Of pure ablution round earth's human shores"

"She cannot fade, though thou hast not thy bliss
For ever wilt thou love, and she be fair"

Thus do his ideas, like his memory, become incarnate with the shaping splendour of the consummate Artist; and thus does he help us to realise, as no other poet has done since Shakespeare, the oneness of Truth and Beauty.

TO AUTUMN

Season of mists and mellow fruitfulness !
Close bosom-friend of the maturing sun ;
Conspiring with him how to load and bless
With fruit and vines that round the thatch-eaves run ;
To bend with apples the moss'd cottage-trees,
And fill all fruit with ripeness to the core ;
To swell the gourd, and plump the hazel shells
With a sweet kernel, to set budding more,
And still more, later flowers for the bees,
Until they think warm days will never cease,
For Summer has o'er-brimm'd their clammy cells.

Who hath not seen thee oft amid thy store ?
Sometimes whoever seeks abroad may find
Thee sitting careless on a granary floor,
Thy hair soft-lifted by the winnowing wind ;
Or on a half-reap'd furrow sound asleep,
Drows'd with the fume of poppies, while thy hook
Sparcs the next swath and all its twined flowers ;
And sometimes like a gleaner thou dost keep Steady thy laden head across a brook ;
Or by a cider-press, with patient look,
Thou watchest the last oozings hours by hours.

Where are the songs of Spring ? Ay, where are they ?
Think not of them, thou hast thy music too,—
While barr'd clouds bloom the soft-dying day,
And touch the stubble-plains with rosy hue ;
Then in a wailful choir the small gnats mourn
Among the river sallows, borne aloft
Or sinking as the light wind lives or dies ;
And full grown lambs loud bleat from hilly bourn ;
Hedge-crickets sing, and now with treble soft
The red-breast whistles from a garden-croft
And gathering swallows twitter in the skies.

ODE ON A GRECIAN URN

Thou still unravish'd bride of quietness,
Thou foster-child of silence and slow time,
Sylvan historian, who canst thus express
A flowery tale more sweetly than our rhyme :

What leaf-fring'd legend haunts about thy shape
Of deities or mortals, or of both,
In Tempe or the dales of Arcady ?
What men or gods are these ? What maidens loth ?
What mad pursuit ? What struggle to escape ?
What pipes and timbrels ? What wild ecstasy ?

Heard melodies are sweet, but those unheard
Are sweeter : therefore, ye soft pipes, play on :
Not to the sensual ear, but, more endear'd,
Pipe to the spirit ditties of no tone
Fair youth, beneath the trees, thou canst not leave
Thy song, nor ever can those trees be bare ;
Bold lover, never, never canst thou kiss,
Though winning near the goal—yet, do not grieve ;
She cannot fade, though thou hast not thy bliss,
For ever wilt thou love, and she be fair !

Ah, happy, happy boughs ! that cannot shed
Your leaves, nor ever bid the Spring adieu ;
And, happy melodiad, unwearied,
For ever piping songs for ever new :
More happy love ! more happy, happy love !
For ever warm and still to be enjoy'd,
For ever panting, and for ever young ;
All breathing human passion far above,
That leaves a heart high sorrowful and oloy'd,
A burning forehead, and a parching tongue

Who are these coming to the sacrifice ?
To what green altar, O mysterious priest,
Lead'st thou that heifer lowing at the skies,
And all her silken flanks with garlands drest ?
What little town by river or sea shore,
Or mountain-built with peaceful citadel,
Is emptied of its folk, this pious morn ?
And, little town, thy streets for evermore
Will silent be ; and not a soul to tell
Why thou art desolate, can e'er return.

O Attic shape ! Fair attitude ! with brede
Of marble men and maidens overwrought,
With forest branches and the trodden weed ;
Thou, silent form, dost tease us out of thought
As doth eternity. Cold Pastoral !
When old age shall this generation waste,
Thou shalt remain, in midst of other woe
Than ours, a friend to man, to whom thou say'st,
"Beauty is truth, truth beauty,"—that is all
Ye know on earth, and all ye need to know

ON FIRST LOOKING INTO CHAPMAN'S HOMER

Much have I travelled in the realms of gold,
And many goodly states and kingdoms seen
Round many western islands, have I been
Which bards in fealty to Apollo hold
Oft of one wide expanse have I been told
That deep-brow'd Homer rul'd as his domesne
Yet did I never breathe its pure serene
Till I heard Chapman speak out loud and bold :
Then felt I like some watcher of the skies
When a new planet swims into his ken ;
Or like stout Cortez when with eagle eyes
He star'd at the Pacific—and all his men
Look'd at each other with a wild surmise—
Silent, upon a peak in Darien

THE EVE OF ST. MARK

A Fragment

Upon a Sabbath-day it fell :
Twice holy was the Sabbath bell,
That call'd the folk to evening prayer ;
The city streets were clean and fair
From wholesome drench of April rains ;
And, on the western window panes,
The oblique sunset faintly told
Of unmat'ur'd green valleys cold,
Of the green thorny bloomless hedge,
Of rivers new with spring-tide sedge,
Of primroses by shelter'd rills,
And daisies on the aguish hills,

Twice holy was the Sabbath-bell;
 The silent streets were crowded well
 With staid and pious companies,
 Warm from their fire-side oratories;
 And moving, with demurest air,
 To even-song, and vesper prayer,
 Each arched porch, and entry low,
 Was fill'd with patient folk and slow,
 With whispers hush, and shuffling feet,
 While play'd the organ loud and sweet.

The bells had ceas'd, the prayers begun,
 And Bertha had not yet half done
 A curious volume, patch'd and torn,
 That all day long, from earliest morn,
 Had taken captive her two eyes,
 Among its golden broideries
 Perplexed her with a thousand things,—
 The stars of Heaven, and angels' wings,
 Martyrs in a fiery blaze,
 Azure saints and silver rays,
 Moses' breastplate, and the seven
 Candlesticks John saw in Heaven,
 The winged Lion of Saint Mark,
 And the Covenantal Ark,
 With its many mysteries,
 Cherubim and golden mice.

Bertha was a maiden fair,
 Dwelling in th' old Minster Square;
 From her fire-side she could see,
 Sidelong, its rich antiquity,
 Far as the Bishop's garden-wall;
 Where sycamores and elm-trees tall,
 Full leav'd, the forest had outstript,
 By no sharp north wind ever nipt,
 So shelter'd by the mighty pile,
 Bertha arose, and read awhile,
 With forehead 'gainst the window-pane.
 Again she try'd, and then again,
 Until the dusk eve left her dark,
 Upon the legend of St. Mark.
 From plaited lawn frill, fice and thin,
 She lifted up her soft warm chin,
 With aching neck and swimming eyes,
 And daz'd with sauntly imagines

All was gloom, and silent all,
 Save now and then the still foot fall
 Of one returning homewards late,
 Past the echoing minster-gate
 The clamorous daws, that all the day
 Above tree-tops and towers play,
 Pair by pair had gone to rest,
 Each in its ancient belfry-nest,
 Where asleep they fall betimes,
 To music and the drowsy chimes.

All was silent, all was gloom,
 Abroad and in the homely room—
 Down she sat, poor cheated soul
 And struck a lamp from the dismal coal
 Lean'd forward, with bright drooping hair
 And slant book, full against the glare.
 Her shadow, in uneasy guise,
 Hover'd about, a giant size,
 On ceiling-beam and old oak chair,
 The parrot's cage, and panel square;
 And the warm angled winter-screen,
 On which were many monsters seen,
 Call'd doves of Siam, Lama mice
 And legless birds of Paradise,
 Macaw, and tender Avadavat,
 And silken-furr'd Angora cat.
 Untir'd she read, her shadow still Glower'd about, as it would fill
 The room with wildest forms and shades
 As though some ghostly queen of spades
 Had come to mock behind her back,
 And dance, and ruffle her garments black.
 Untir'd she read the legend page,
 Of holy Mark, from youth to age,

On land, on sea, in pagan chains,
 Rejoicing for his many pains,
 Sometimes the learned eremite,
 With golden star, or dagger bright,
 Referr'd to pious poems
 Written in smallest crow-quill size
 Beneath the text, and thus the rhyme
 Was parcell'd out from time to time:

"Als writth he of swevenus,
 Men han beforne they wake in bliss,
 Whanne that hir friendes thynke him bound
 In crimped chroude farre under grounde,
 And how a litling child mote be
 A saint er its nativite,
 Gif that the modre (God her blesse!)
 Kepen in solitarie,
 And kisson devoute the holy croce
 Of Goddes love, and Sathan's force,—
 He writth, and thinges many mo
 Of swiche thinges I may not show
 Bot I must tellen verlihe
 Somdel of Sainté Ciche,
 And chuefie what he auctorethe
 Of Sainté Markis life and dethe:"

At length her constant eyelids come
 Upon the fervent martyrdom;
 Then lastly to his holy shrine,
 Exalt amid the tapers' shine
 At Venice, . . .

LA BELLE DAME SANS MERCI

Ah, what can ail thee, wretched wight,
 Alone and palely loitering,
 The sedge is wither'd from the lake,
 And no birds sing

Ah, what can ail thee, wretched wight,
 So haggard and so woe-begone?
 The squirrel's granary is full,
 And the harvest's done.

I see a lily on thy brow,
 With anguish moist and fever dew;
 And on thy cheek a fading rose
 Fast withereth too.

I met a lady in the meads
 Full beautiful, a faery's child:
 Her hair was long, her foot was light,
 And her eyes were wild

I set her on my pacing steed,
 And nothing else saw all day long;
 For sideways would she lean, and sing
 A faery's song

I made a garland for her head,
 And bracelets too, and fragrant zone;
 She look'd at me as she did love,
 And made sweet moan

She found me roots of relish sweet
 And honey wild, and manna dew;
 And sure in language strange she said,
 I love thee true

She took me to her elfin grot,
 And there she gaz'd and sigh'd deep,
 And there I shut her wild sad eyes—
 So kiss'd to sleep

And there we slumber'd on the moss,
 And there I dream'd, ah woe betide,
 The latest dream I ever dream'd
 On the cold hillside

I saw pale kings, and princes too,
 Pale warriors, death-pale were they all—
 Who cry'd—"La belle Dame sans merci
 Hath thee in thrall!"

I saw their starv'd lips in the gloom,
 With horrid warning gap'd wide,
 And I awoke, and found me here
 On the cold hillside.

And this is why I sojourn here
Alone and pælely loitering,
Though the sedge is wither'd from the lake,
And no birds sing.

LEIGH HUNT (1784-1859)

Closely connected with the great triumvirate of poets, is that agreeable and versatile man of letters, Leigh Hunt. His career and his prose work have been dealt with elsewhere, here it remains to touch on his share in the Romantic movement of the time so far as poetry is concerned; and of his influence upon Keats in particular.

It would be hard to overestimate the work done by Hunt in reviving the interest of the reading public in Italian literature. While yet a lad in Christ's Hospital, he had been drawn to Ariosto, being attracted by a picture in a studio of Angelica and Medoro; and when in 1822 he came to Italy to stay with Byron and Shelley, he pursued his Italian studies with a livelier zest than ever, and obtained a firmer mastery of the Italian tongue. Some years before this, in 1816, he had published what the critical wags of Blackwood's called "Mr Hunt's smutty story of Rimini"—it would have been more to the point to have called it "sugary." The story itself is a grim study of primal passion of the Paolo and Francesca drama, but Hunt sweetened and sentimentalised this tale of Dante's, making of its tragedy melodrama, turning its passion into a "pretty-pretty" amourousness. The poem has good points; it exhibits Hunt's undoubted skill in picturesque description, daintiness of phrasing, and an intimate ease that is pleasant enough when it does not descend (as it has a way of doing) into mere vulgar loquacity. But Hunt's strength lay really in interpretative rather than in creative work. He was a fine scholar, an excellent "taster," and is acknowledged universally as an admirable translator. More important than his Rimini, therefore, was the volume of Stories from the Italian Poets, published in 1846, where he paraphrases freely The Divine Comedy, and passages from Ariosto, Tasso, and other Italian poets. With Ariosto and Tasso he had some temperamental kinship, a nature more opposed to Dante's at every point one could not imagine, with his almost porky optimism, and carpet-slipper attitude towards life. Notwithstanding this, his catholicity of taste made him a just and fair critic in many ways of Dante's greatness, and it is certainly true to say of him that "in his view of the sacred art of the Italian Middle Ages, he anticipated the Pre-Raphaelite and the modern interpreter of Dante."

Hunt's influence on Keats was on the whole certainly for good. If Keats owed to him many of his cumbrous rhymes and his early lapses from good taste, he owed also his introduction into the rich pasturage of mediæval romance. Hunt was a better monitor than his verse sometimes suggested, and his critical acumen and wide reading did a good deal to inspire the eager imaginative life of the youthful genius.

On the whole, Hunt's chief merit as a poet lies in his short pieces. His Sonnet on the Nile is one of remarkable beauty, and was written in amicable rivalry between himself and his friends, Keats and Shelley.

Competition, however friendly, is not congenial to genius, and there is little reason for surprise that Hunt's poem should excel those of his greater friends. The most surprising part is the intrinsic excellence of Hunt's work under these conditions. Here are the three sonnets, and the reader may judge for himself of their merits.

LEIGH HUNT

It flows through old hushed Egypt and its sands,
Like some grave mighty thought threading a dream,
And times and things, as in that vision, seen—
Keeping along it their eternal stands,—
Caves, pillars, pyramids, the shepherd bands
That roamed through the young world, the glory extreme
Of high Sesostris, and that southern beam,
The laughing queen that caught the world's great hands.

Then came a mightier silence stern and strong,
As of a world left empty of its throng,
And the void weighs on us, and then we wake,
And hear the fruitfin' stream lapsing along
'Twixt villages, and think how we shall take
Our own calm journey on for human sake.

KEATS

Son of the old meen-mountains African I
Chief of the Pyramid and Crocodile!
We call thee fruitful, and, that very while
A desert fills our seeing's inward span.
Nurse of swart nations since the world began,
Art thou so fruitful? or dost thou beguile
Such men to honour thee, who, worn with toil,
Rest for a space 'twixt Cairo and Decan?

O may dark fancies err! They surely do,
'Tis ignorance that makes a barren waste
Of all beyond itself. Thou dost bedew
Green rushes like our rivers, and dost taste
The pleasant sun-rise. Green isles hast thou too,
And to the sea as happily dost haste.

SHELLEY

Month after month the gathered rains descend,
Drenching von secret Ethiopian dells,
And from the desert's ice-geirt pinnacles
Where frost and heat in strange embraces blend
On Atlas, fields of moist snow half depend
Girt there with blasts and meteors Tempest dwells
By Nile's aerial urn, with rapid spells
Urging those waters to their mighty end

O'er Egypt's land of memory floods are level
And they are thine, O Nile—and well thou knowest
That soul-sustaining air and blasts of evil
And fruits and poisons spring where'er thou flowest.
Beware, O Man—for knowledge must to thee
Lure the great flood to Egypt, over bo.

With the exception of the line "their eternal stands," which illustrates Hunt's unhappy tendency to plunge into bathos, with disconcerting unexpectedness, the poem is wholly admirable. In another bout of rivalry, this time dealing with the Grasshopper and Cricket, Hunt was worsted, if not badly. This sonnet is a lively and genial piece of verse, though undistinguished. Keats keeps less to the subject at hand, but achieves a beauty of phrasing here and there, far excelling Hunt's. Cowden Clarke thus records the incident:

"No one but myself was present, and they accordingly set to." Keats was the first to finish his task. "The after scrutiny . . . was one of many such occasions which have riveted the memory of Leigh Hunt in my affectionate regard and admiration for unaffected generosity and perfectly unpretentious encouragement." On reading Keats' poem "a sincere look of pleasure" came into his face, and he read out the first line—"The poetry of earth is never dead." "Such a prosperous opening!" exclaimed Hunt. Later, when he came to the tenth and eleventh lines:

"On a lone winter evening, when the frost
Has wrought a silence . . ."

"Ah, that's perfect! Bravo, Keats!" And then, says Clarke, "he went on in a dilatation on the dumbness of nature during the season's suspension and torpidity."

Here is Hunt in one of his blithe and graceful fancies:

JENNY KISS'D ME

Jenny kiss'd me when we met,
Jumping from the chair she sat in—
Time, you thief, who love to get Sweets into your list, put that in!
Say I'm weary, say I'm sad,
Say that health and wealth have miss'd me,
Say I'm growing old, but add,
Jenny kiss'd me.

WALTER SAVAGE LANDOR (1775-1864)

Very different in temperament and craftsmanship was Walter Savage Landor, who lived through the Romantic movement, witnessed its glorious achievements and decline, and saw the rise and meridian of the greatest Victorians.

Born at Warwick, January 30, 1775, he signalled early his characteristic tempestuousness by expulsion from Rugby at the age of ten. Later on at Oxford, he took an encore, and "the mad Jacobin," as he was called, suffered rustication for firing a gun in the room of a Tory undergraduate and declining to explain his conduct. Shortly after this there was a fresh explosion of Landor's "life-force," a quarrel with his father which led to a temporary separation. Fortunately, a reconciliation was patched up, but the young firebrand found it better to retreat to South Wales with £150 a year, "one servant and a chest of books."

His first volume of poems had been published in 1795 and in 1798 came Gebir, the fruits of studying Milton and Pindar. Gebir is an Oriental tale, told with an artistic reserve that signalled his lack of sympathy with the prodigal exuberance of his great contemporaries.

In 1802 and 1804 came Chrysaor and Gunlaug and Helga. The first is a classic legend congenial to the poet's methods. Chrysaor is "wielder of the golden sword," defies the Titan, and pays for his temerity by the summary vengeance of Neptune. The second poem, Norse in inspiration, is less happily suited to Landor's style and spirit. In 1805, on his father's death, the poet settled in Bath, but he did not treat his material means with the same reserve as he did his artistic. After an experiment in military adventure (1806), when with a few volunteers raised at his own expense he went to Spain in order to help to emancipate the Spaniards from the tyranny of Buonaparte, he returned to England, bought an estate in South Wales, and soon managed, despite his more laudable intentions, to alienate all his neighbours and bring himself to the verge of financial ruin. His marriage in the meantime (1811) with a lady whom he had met at a ball and knew nothing about, proved equally disastrous. But troubles notwithstanding, his literary ardour never abated, and his tragedy of Don Julian, published at this period, found an enthusiastic admirer in De Quincey.

A stay in France was followed by a wander journey to Italy. He lived successively at Comc, Pisa, and Florence, and wrote under a southern sky his Imaginary Conversations, the most notable of his writings.

Critical and creative work in prose and verse came rapidly from his pen during the ensuing years, naturally varied by some external excitement, thus time in the shape of an action for libel, at home. Finally, he made his home at Florence, where his rooms were constantly visited by the most eminent men of the day, and here, the "unsubduable old Roman," as Carlyle called him, died in September 1864.

HIS PERSONALITY AND WORK

Handsome and impressive in appearance, passionate and self-willed, yet lovable, irrational with a strain of admirable sense, Landor is one of the most striking and original figures of his age. The external history of his life exhibits him at the least favourable point of view, for there was something noble and great about the man deep down, as his many friends were quick to recognise. Dickens' portrait of Boythorn, in Black House, is no unkindly sketch, making allowances for the usual Dickensian extravagances, but does not indicate the intellectual vigour of Landor.

Yet despite the ardent admiration and homage of a few, his work appeals but slightly to the many. Splendid in patches, his work as a whole is too eclectic and circumscribed, and lacks the universal appeal that gives durability to the work of men like Shelley and Keats, Coleridge and Wordsworth.

As a literary artist he stands rather by himself though intellectually he had much in common with the Hellenistic sympathies of Keats and Shelley. There is no mistaking his Revolutionary ardour: he is with Freedom wherever he finds it, whether in Ancient Greece or Republican Rome, or in the dusty arena of modern politics. With no little of Byron's contempt for the crowd, but with a surer instinct for the true aristocrat, he admired heartily such democrats as Mazzini. Yet in his presentation of Greek ideals he is closer to the bare splendour of Wordsworth's style than to the rich colouring of Keats, and though like Byron in his scorn of conventions, and resembling Shelley in his belief in liberty, his fastidious and measured workmanship has neither the careless ease of the one, nor the lyrical spontaneity of the other.

His earlier work is almost wholly poetical, and for the most part in heroic blank verse, excelling in detailed effect and isolated passages, and lacking organic unity and homogeneity of style. Then came the Imaginary Conversations, planned on the principle of the De Consolatione Philosophi of Boethius, though unlike him in method. If he has any master here it is Plato, against whom he ever harboured one of his inexcusable critical perversities. These Conversations are, in substance, varying heroic and idyllic episodes, strong in primal passion and tender grace, and recounted with a noble beauty of style and a subtle appreciation of "the sense of tears in mortal things." Occasionally the strength degenerates into weakness as in the dialogue of Peter the Great and Alexis, but it is more often immensely effective, with a throbbing, full-blooded vitality, more Elizabethan than modern, yet with nothing of the Elizabethan extravagance and coarse profusion. Marcellus and Hannibal is an example in point, with its poignant pathos, and Tiberius and Vipsania, with its dramatic intensity. The idyllic dialogues present another side of Landor, that of the gracious and kindly companion of women. Asop and Ahodope is exquisite in its tender pathos; Euthymedas and Thelymnia is delightful in its light gaiety. Bosquet and the Duchess de Fontanges, Eugenius IV and Livipi, show a rich sense of ironical humour, that remind one of Browning's full-length portraits.

The more argumentative Conversations are less interesting, not because of any intellectual weakness in the writer—Landor's level is uniformly high—but because of a certain monotony of style and lack of plasticity in treatment. He is at his best when illustrating some phase of human nature, where a more generous call is made on his power of fancy and emotion.

Alike in his prose and verse, Landor is sculptural in method, with all the merits of the sculptured style, and with its concomitant weakness in literature. That is to say, he excels in epigrammatic power, fine distinctions of phrase, delicately wrought embellishments of fancy, and suffers from a certain stiff restraint and monotony of effect.

In the early work the defects are more obvious than the merits, and Gebir, for all its occasional magnificence, has too chilly a beauty to capture the reader's imagination. There is the same chill though rather more beauty about the rough-hewn drama of Count Julian. Here the blank verse rises to a height of gracious dignity and force that is only equalled by Wordsworth's finest work, yet the cumulative effect is not happy. We are constantly led to the verge of some great moment, some splendid scene that shall take us by the throat, and it never comes. The exquisite marble needs to be kissed into life.

With his lyric poems and briefer excursions in verse, this charriness of praise is no longer needed, nowhere is he more original or distinctive, nowhere is he less affected by the literary influences of his age, or of any other age. There is nothing of Byron, Shelley, Keats, or Scott in his lyrics; he belongs far more by spiritual affinity to the late Elizabethans, and his kinship with Ben Jonson has been noticed by many critics.

His love poems are suffused with stately chivalry rather than with passion, clear and sweet they always are, thrilling never. But they exhibit deep feeling none the less, and are strong in epigrammatic power.

"Stand close around yet Stygian set
With Dires in one boat convey'd
Or Charon, seeing may forget
That he is old, and she a shade."

He is equally happy in the mood of pensive reminiscences. It is impossible to overpraise the mellow beauty of those well known lines:

"I strove with none, for none was worth my strife;
Nature and I loved and, next to Nature, Art:
I warmed both hands before the fire of life;
It sinks, and I am ready to depart;"

or the delicate charm of his poetic compliment to E. Arundell:

'Nature! thou may'st fume and fret:
There's but one white violet
Scatter'd o'er the vernal ground,
Faint resemblances around,
Nature! I will tell thee yet
There's but one white violet."

Sometimes in his "invocations and reminiscences" he strikes a gay and playful note, but it is not the playfulness of the Romantics, it is of the gay and polished verse of such men as Prior that we are reminded. He never forsakes classical traditions. Shelley's lyrics embody the very spirit of incarnate youth; and Landor expresses the spirit of middle age. For this reason if for no other, their popularity and appeal is necessarily limited. There is not and cannot be the same glamour and magic round maturity, though to the few, and in certain moods perhaps to all, the philosophic calm and genial breadth of Landor has a fascination all its own. Yet the last word on Landor must always concern his prose. He is a striking and scholarly poet, with occasional flashes of greatness; he is a noble master of prose, with occasional tracts of cultured dullness. He was sufficiently imbued with the romanticism of his time to endow prose with the glow and colour of a poetic imagination, while his self-critical and classical sympathies gave it body and dignity. If he lacked De Quincey's touch of mystery, the tender whimsicality of Lamb, the brilliant incisiveness of Hazlitt,—his prose could rise to greater heights of sonorous and chastened beauty, and enjoyed a wider range of artistic effects, from the calm and stately to the tender and playful.

TO IANTHE

Away, my verse, and never fear,
As men before such beauty do,
On you she will not look severe,
She will not turn her eyes from you
Some happier graces could I lend
That in her memory you should live,
Some little blemishes might blend,
For it would please her to forgive
On the smooth brow and clustering hair
Myrtle and rose! your wreath combine,
The duller olive I would wear,
Its constancy, its peace, be mine.
There is a flower I wish to wear,
But not until first worn by you—
Heartsease—of all earth's flowers most rare;
Bring it, and bring enough for two.
It often comes into my head
That we may dream when we are dead.
But I am far from sure we do.
O that it were so! then my rest
Would be indeed among the blest;
I should for ever dream of you.

All tender thoughts that e'er possess'd
The human brain or human breast,
Centre in mine for thee—
Excepting one—and that must thou
Contribute: come, confer it now
Grateful I fain would be.

Pleasure! why thus desert the heart
In its spring-tide?
I could have seen her, I could part,
And but have sigh'd!
O'er every youthful charm to stray,
To gaze, to touch—
Pleasure! why take so much away,
Or give so much?

MARCELLUS AND HANNIBAL

MARCELLUS, the Commander of the Roman army, lies before HANNIBAL, mortally wounded

Hannibal. Could a Numidian horseman ride no faster? Marcellus! oh! Marcellus! He moves not—he is dead! Did he not clasp his fingers? Stand wide, soldiers—wide, forty paces—give him air—bring water—halt! Gather those broad leaves, and all the rest, growing under the brushwood—unbrace his armour. Loose the helmet first—his breast rises. I fancied his eyes were fixed on me—they have rolled back again. Who presumed to touch my shoulder? This horse? It was surely the horse of Marcellus. Let no man mount him. Hal! hal! the Romans, too, sink into luxury: here is gold about the charger.

Gaulish Chieftain. Execrable thief! The golden chain of our king under a heast's grinders! The vengeance of the gods hath overtaken the impure—

Hannibal. We will talk about vengeance when we have entered Rome, and about purity among the priests, if they will hear us. Sound for the surgeon! That arrow may be extracted from the side, deep as it is—The conqueror of Syracuse lies before me—Send a vessel off to Carthage. Say Hannibal is at the gates of Rome—Marcellus, who stood alone between us, fallen. Brave man! I would rejoice and cannot—How awfully serene a countenance! Such as we hear are in the islands of the blessed. And how glorious a form and stature! Such too was theirs! They also once lay thus upon the earth wet with their blood—few other enter there. And what plain armour!

Gaulish Chieftain. My party slew him—indeed I think I slew him myself. I claim the chain—it belongs to my king, the glory of Gaul requires it. Never will she endure to see another take it.

Hannibal. My friend, the glory of Marcellus did not require him to wear it. When he suspended the arms of your brave king in the temple, he thought such a trinket unworthy of himself and of Jupiter. The shield he battered down, the breast-plate he pierced with his sword—these he showed to the people and to the gods, hardly his wife and little children saw this, ere his horse wore it.

Gaulish Chieftain. Hear me, O Hannibal!

Hannibal. What! when Marcellus lies before me? when his life may perhaps be recalled? when I may lead him in triumph to Carthage? when Italy, Sicily, Greece, Asia, wait to obey me? Contend thee! I will give thee mine own bridle, worth ten such.

Gaulish Chieftain. For myself?

Hannibal. For thyself.

Gaulish Chieftain. And these rubies and emeralds, and that scarlet—

Hannibal. Yes, yes.

Gaulish Chieftain. O glorious Hannibal! unconquerable hero! O my happy country! to have such an ally and defender. I swear eternal gratitude—yes, gratitude, love, devotion, beyond eternity.

Hannibal. In all treaties we fix the time: I could hardly ask a longer. Go back to thy station—I would see what the surgeon is about, and hear what he thinks. The life of Marcellus! the triumph of Hannibal! what else has the world in it? Only Rome and Carthage: these follow.

Marcellus. I must die then? The gods be praised! The commander of a Roman army is no captive.

Hannibal. (To the Surgeon.) Could not he bear a sea-voyage? Extract the arrow.

Surgeon. He expires that moment.

Marcellus. It pains me: extract it.

Hannibal. Marcellus, I see no expression of pain on your countenance, and never will I consent to hasten the death of an enemy in my power. Since your recovery is hopeless, you say truly you are no captive. (To the Surgeon.) Is there nothing, man, that can assuage the mortal pain? for, suppress the signs of it as he may, he must feel it. Is there nothing to alleviate and allay it?

Marcellus. Hannibal, give me thy hand—thou hast found it and brought it me, compassion. (To the Surgeon.) Go, friend, others want thy aid; several fell around me.

Hannibal. Recommend to your country, O Marcellus, while time permits it, reconciliation and peace with me, informing the Senate of my superiority in force, and the impossibility of resistance. The tablet is ready: let me take off this ring—try to write, to sign it at least. Oh, what satisfaction I feel at seeing you able to rest upon the elbow, and even to smile!

Marcellus. Within an hour or less, with how severe a brow would Minos say to me, "Marcellus is this thy writing?" Rome loses one man: she hath lost many such, and who still hath many left.

Hannibal. Afraid as you are of falsehood, say you this? I confess in shame the ferocity of my countrymen. Unfortunately, too, the nearer ports are occupied by Gauls, infinitely more cruel. The Numidians are so in revenge; the Gauls both in revenge and in sport. My presence is required at a distance, and I apprehend the barbarity of one or other, learning, as they must do, your refusal to execute my wishes for the common good, and feeling that by this refusal you deprive them of their country, after so long an absence.

Marcellus. Hannibal, thou art not dying.

Hannibal. What then? What mean you?

Marcellus. That thou mayest, and very justly, have many things yet to apprehend. I can have none. The barbarity of thy soldiers is nothing to me: mine would not dare be cruel. Hannibal is forced to be absent, and his authority goes away with his horse. On this turf lies defaced the semblance of a general, but Marcellus is yet the regulator of his army. Dost thou abdicate a power conferred on thee by thy nation? Or wouldst thou acknowledge it to have become, by thy own sole fault, less plenary than thy adversary's? I have spoken too much: let me rest, this mantle oppresses me.

Hannibal. I placed my mantle on your head when the helmet was first removed, and while you were lying in the sun. Let me fold it under, and thou replace the ring.

Marcellus. Take it, Hannibal. It was given me by a poor woman who flew to me at Syracuse, and who covered it with her hair, torn off in desperation that she had no other gift to offer. Little thought I that her gift and her words should be mine. How suddenly may the most powerful be in the situation of the most helpless! Let that ring and the mantle under my head be the exchange of guests at parting. The time may come, Hannibal, when thou (and the gods alone know whether as conqueror or conquered) mayest sit under the roof of my children, and in either case it shall serve thee. In thy adverse fortune, they will remember on whose pillow their father breathed his last, in thy prosperous (Heaven grant it may shine upon thee in some other country!) it will rejoice thee to protect them. We feel ourselves the most exempt from affliction when we relieve it, although we are then the most conscious that it may befall us. There is one thing here that is not at the disposal of either.

Hannibal. What?

Marcellus. This body.

Hannibal. Whither would you be lifted? Men are ready.

Marcellus. I meant not so. My strength is failing. I seem to hear rather what is within than what is without. My sight and my other senses are in confusion. I would have said—This body, when a few bubbles of air shall have left it, is no more worthy of thy notice than of mine; but thy glory will not let thee refuse it to the pity of my family.

Hannibal You would ask something else. I perceive an inquietude not visible till now.

Marcellus Duty and Death make us think of home sometimes.

Hannibal Thitherward the thoughts of the conqueror and of the conquered fly together.

Marcellus Hast thou any prisoners from my escort?

Hannibal A few dying lie about—and let them lie—they are Tuscans. The remainder I saw at a distance, flying, and but one brave man among them—he appeared a Roman—a youth who turned back, though wounded. They surrounded and dragged him away, spurring his horse with their swords. These Etrurians measure their courage carefully, and tack it well together before they put it on, but throw it off again with lordly ease. Marcellus, why think about them? or does aught else disquiet your thoughts?

Marcellus I have suppressed it long enough. My son—my beloved son!

Hannibal Where is he? Can it be? Was he with you?

Marcellus He would have shared my fate—and has not Gods of my country! beneficent throughout life to me, in death surpassingly beneficent: I render you, for the last time, thanks!

FAME, AND TRUE AND FALSE GREATNESS

Dante

Greatness is to goodness what gravel is to porphyry; the one is a movable accumulation, swept along the surface of the earth, the other stands fixed, and solid, and alone, above the violence of war and of the tempest; above all that is residuous of a wasted world. Little men build up great ones, but the snow colossus soon melts, the good stand under the eye of God; and therefore stand.

DIOGENES AND PLATO

Diogenes The great man is he who hath nothing to fear and nothing to hope from another. It is he who, while he demonstrates the iniquity of the laws, and is able to correct them, obeys them peaceably. It is he who looks on the ambitious both as weak and fraudulent. It is he who hath no disposition or occasion for any kind of deceit, no reason for being or for appearing different from what he is. It is he who can call together the most select company when it pleases him.

Plato There are great men of various kinds.

Diogenes No, by my beard, are there not.

Plato What! are there not great captains, great geometricians, great dialecticians?

Diogenes Who denied it? A great man was the postulate. Try thy hand now at the powerful one.

Plato On seeing the exercise of power, a child cannot doubt who is powerful, more or less, for power is relative. All men are weak, not only if compared to the Demurgos, but if compared to the sea or the earth, or certain things upon each of them, such as elephants and whales. So placid and tranquil is the scene around us, we can hardly bring to mind the images of strength and force, the precipices, the abysses—

Diogenes Prythee hold thy loose tongue, twinkling and glittering like a serpent's in the midst of luxuriance and rankness. Did never this reflection of thine warn thee that, in human life, the precipices and abysses would be much farther from our admiration, if we were less inconsiderate, selfish, and vile? I will not however stop thee long, for thou wert going on quite consistently. As thy great men are fighters and wranglers, so thy mighty things upon the earth and sea are troublesome and intractable incumbrances. Thou perceivest not what was greater in the former case, neither art thou aware what is greater in this. Didst thou feel the gentle air that passed us?

Plato. I did not just then.

Diogenes. That air, so gentle, so imperceptible to thee, is more powerful not only than all the creatures that breathe and live by it; not only than all the oaks of the forest, which it rears in an age and shatters in a moment; not only than all the monsters of the sea, but than the sea itself, which it tosses up into foam and breaks against every rock in its vast circumference; for it carries in its bosom, with perfect calm and composure, the uncontrollable ocean and the peopled earth, like an atom of a feather.

To the world's turmoils and pageantries is attracted, not only the admiration of the populace, but the zeal of the orator, the enthusiasm of the poet, the investigation of the historian, and the contemplation of the philosopher: yet how silent and invisible are they in the depths of air! Do I say in those depths and deserts? No, I say at the distance of a swallow's flight; at the distance she rises above us, ere a sentence brief as this could be uttered.

What are its mines and mountains? Fragments welded up and dalaocated by the expansion of water from below, the most part reduced to mud, the rest to splinters. Afterwards sprang up fire in many places, and again tore and mangled the mutilated carcass, and still grows over it. What are its cities and ramparts, and moles and monuments? Segments of a fragment, which one man puts together and another throws down. Here we stumble upon thy great ones at their work. Show me now, if thou canst, in history, three great warriors, or three great statesmen, who have acted otherwise than spiteful children.

Anaxagoras. It will appear wonderful and perhaps incredible to future generations, that what are now considered the two highest gifts of man, oratory and poetry, should be employed, the one chiefly in exciting, the other in emblazoning, deeds of slaughter and devastation. If we could see, in the nature of things, a child capable of forming a live tiger, and found him exercising his power of doing it, I think we should say to him, "You might employ your time better, child!"

CHARLES JEREMIAH WELLS (1800–1879) was an early companion of Keats, and like Keats, went to mediæval Italian romance for his more youthful inspiration. But his most important work, the drama Joseph and his Brethren, suggests the influence of Marlowe and Peele, rather than any Italian source. This lengthy drama was published in 1824, under another name, and attracted little attention. Years after it was discovered by Rossetti, who was much impressed by its magnificence of diction, and beside this distinguished admirer it enjoyed further the enthusiastic commendation of Swinburne. The poem was re-written, and has recently been published in the "World's Classics" with Swinburne's eulogy and an interesting note on Rossetti and Charles Wells by Mr. Theodoro Watts-Dunton.

The following fine passage is certainly not unworthy of the creator of Tamburlaine:

"Within the oar

Sat Pharaoh, whose bare head was girt around

By a crown of iron, and his sable hair,

Like strakey as a mane, fell where it would,

And somewhat hid his glossy sun-brent neck

And carcanet of precious sardonix.

His jewell'd armlets, weighty as a sword,

Clasp'd his brown naked arms—a crimson robe

Deep edg'd with silver, and with golden thread,

Upon a bear-skin kirtle deeply bluish'd,

Whose broad resplendent braid and shield-like clasps

Were boss'd with diamonds large, by rubies fir'd,
Like beauty's eye in rage, or roses white
Lit by the glowing red Beside him lay
A bunch of popped corn, and at his feet
A tamed lion as his footstool crouch'd
Cas'd o'er in burnish'd plates I, hors'd, did bear
A snow-white eagle on a silver shaft,
From whence great Pharaoh's royal banner stream'd,
An emblem of his might and dignity. . . ."

The love scenes centring round Potiphar's wife, are less in the Marlowe vein than in that of some of the post-Shakespearean dramatists. There is something of Webster's full-blooded intensity in the love passages, though little of his vivid dramatic power. Indeed, the Elizabethan and Jacobean analogy must not be pressed too far, and relates to the poetical substance rather than to the dramatic imagination. For, as Mr Watts-Dunton points out, "Joseph and his Brethren does not pretend to be a play. It is the precursor of those dramatic poems such as Festus, &c., which were once the fashion."

The Elizabethan drama came into its own again in the age of Wordsworth. Lamb, Hazlitt, Coleridge, De Quincey, had rediscovered not merely the greatness of Shakespeare but, as we have seen, the greatness of many a fugitive dramatist, and in the years that followed, this enthusiasm exhibited itself in many dramatic experiments. As dramas, none of these experiments are of much value; but they exemplify the Romantic tendencies of the time and the legacy of the Romantics to the age succeeding.

Along with Wells may be mentioned THOMAS WADE (1805-1875), also a narrative and dramatic poet of power. Wade's imagination is less rich and concrete than Wells', and whereas Wells and Keats may be associated together, Wade has more spiritual affinity with Shelley. His drama, Woman's Love, or the Triumph of Patience, met with success at Covent Garden. His lyrics and sonnets are more agreeably typical of his gifts. A collection of these, Munds et Cordis Carmina, was published in 1835.

THE HALF-ASLEEP

O for the mighty waking that aroused
The old-time prophets to their missions high;
And to blind Homer's inward sunlike eye
Show'd the heart's universe who he caroused
Radiantly the Fishers poor unhoused,
And sent them forth to preach divinity,
And made our Milton his great dark defy,
To the light of one immortal theme espoused!
But half-asleep are those now most awake;
And save calm-thoughted Wordsworth, we have none
Who for eternity put time at stake,
And hold a constant course as doth the sun.
We yield but drops that no deep thirstings slake,
And feebly cease ere we have well begun.

Two other poets of distinction are BRYAN WALLER PROCTER (1787-1874), known as "Barry Cornwall," and GEORGE DARLEY (1795-1846). Procter enjoyed the greater popularity, and much of his verse appeared before the great Romantic singers had departed. Mediæval and Elizabethan inspiration is once more to be noted, it may be traced in the Dramatic Scenes (1819), that won the praise of Lamb. In later volumes, the influence of his great contemporaries is too overpowering for the modest creative impulse of the writer. The most interesting is the volume of English Songs (1832), where he makes a not unsuccessful attempt to give the public popular lyrics on familiar themes, agreeable and musical in quality. These show little originality or senso of style, but are frankly unpretentious, and in the opinion of the not over-fastidious, supplied a genuine want.

"Barry Cornwall" was also a playwright, whose tragedy Miranda made a mark at Covent Garden. But Miranda has no vitality as a drama, and Cornwall is best remembered as a writer of pleasant verse, and as a staunch friend of the unhappy Beddoes.

Less facile and more individual is George Darley. Like many a greater writer, his dramas are more remarkable for their incidental songs than for their dramatic texture. Sylvia, or the May Queen (1827), is a medley of fairy fantasy; and he has steeped himself to good purpose in his Shakespeare here, for both the fantasy proper and incidental songs abound in charming fancies and sweet melodies.

But though his indebtedness to the Elizabethans is obvious, he is by no means so imitative as Procter. He is a talented disciple, derivative rather than imitative. His lyric, It is not beauty I demand, is a case in point. One cannot imagine it being written without the Elizabethan model; but conceding the framework and turn of speech, the shaping imagination is distinctive and happy. It is an inspiration from, not an echo of the past.

In fact there is real brainwork in Darley's writings, and even when the poetic fancy runs thin as it does in some of his songs, he never quite loses this distinctive and original touch.

As a prose writer he is light and informing, very often more readable than in his verse. But there is less distinction here. In style he is a blend (considerably diluted) of Lamb and Hazlitt. He has a share of Elia's whimsicality, a larger share of Hazlitt's incisive humour. But his vigorous intellect is always to the fore, and he has that saving quality—a real delight in literature and a contagious zest and relish in dealing with his enthusiasms. With the exception of Hazlitt, no contemporary wrote more luminously about Fletcher than he.

TO HELENE

I sent a ring—a little band
Of emerald and ruby stone,
And bade it, sparkling on thy hand,
Tell thee sweet tales of one
Whose constant memory
Was full of loveliness, and thee.
A shell was graven on its gold,—
'Twas Cupid fix'd without his wings—
To Helene once it would have told
More than was ever told by rings.
But now all's past and gone,
Her love is buried with that stone.
Thou shalt not see the tears that start
From eyes by thoughts like these beguiled,
Thou shalt not know the beating heart,
Ever a victim and a child
Yet Helene, love, believe
The heart that never could deceive
I'll hear thy voice of melody
In the sweet whispers of the air;
I'll see the brightness of thine eye
In the blue evening's dewy star;
In crystal streams thy purity,
And look on Heaven to look on thee.

A SONG

Sweet in her green dell the flower of beauty slumbers,
 Lull'd by the faint breezes sighing through her hair;
 Sleeps she and hears not the melancholy numbers
 Breathed to my sad lute 'mid the lonely air

Down from the high cliffs the rivulet is teeming
 To wind round the willow banks that lure him from above,
 O that in tears, from my rocky prison streaming,
 I too could glide to the bow of my love!

Ah! where the woodbines with sloopy arms have wound
 her,
 Ope she her eyelids at the dream of my lay,
 Listening, like the dove, while the fountains echo round
 her,
 To her lost mate's call in the forest far away

Come then, my bird! For the peace thou ever bearest,
 Still Heaven's messenger of comfort to me—
 Come—this fond bosom, O faithfullest and fairest, Bleeds with its death-wound, its wound of love for thee!

THE FALLEN STAR

A star is gone! a star is gone!
 There is a blank in Heaven;
 One of the cherub choir has done
 His airy course this even.

He sat upon the orb of fire
 That hung for ages there,
 And lent his music to the choir
 That haunts the nightly air

But when his thousand years are pass'd,
 With a cherubic sigh
 He vanish'd with his car at last,
 For even cherubs die!

Hear how his angel brothers mourn—
 The minstrels of the spheres—
 Each chiming sadly in his turn
 And dropping splendid tears.

The planetary sisters all
 Join in the fatal song,
 And weep this hapless brother's fall,
 Who sang with them so long.

But deepest of the choral band
 The Lunar Spirit sings,
 And with a bass-according hand
 Sweeps all her sullen strings.

From the deep chambers of the dome
 Where sleepless Uriel lies,
 His rude harmonic thunders come
 Mingled with mighty sighs

The thousand car-borne cherubim,
 The wandering o'leven,
 All join to chant the dirge of him
 Who fell just now from Heaven

Among all these derivative forces of Romanticism, there is no figure, excepting Landor's, so considerable as that of THOMAS LOVELL BEDDOES (1803-1849). Profoundly affected by his great contemporaries Keats and Shelley, he yet retains an individuality of his own. At Oxford he had saturated himself with the Elizabethans, later in Germany he felt the magic of Goethe at a time when the great man was yet unknown to the majority of Englishmen. But he was too exclusively romantic in temperament and outlook to be a whole-hearted admirer of Goethe, and his admiration fell short of that of Carlyle. Death's Jest Book (1825) is the title of his most characteristic work, and abounds in all the extravagance of Gothic fancy. Beddoes is richer indeed in fancy than in imagination, and shows a quick sense of the picturesque and bizarre. But there is more than fancy and grotesquerie in his work, there is real if fitful emotional power; and in his rapid transition of mood one is reminded often of Heine.

He died by his own hand, of poison, in 1849. Death always fascinated him, finally, from a literary inspiration it became an obsession.

He is an admirable song writer, and his best lyrics have a magic all their own. As a literary critic he is often excellent, if not wholly reliable; and his opinions are never echoed but are always well thought out, while as a letter writer he ranks high.

WOLFRAM'S DIRGE

If thou wilt ease thine heart
 Of love and all its smart,
 Then sleep, dear, sleep;
 And not a sorrow
 Hang any tear on your eyelashes;
 Lie still and deep,
 Sad soul, until the sea-wave washes
 The rim o' the sun to-morrow,
 In eastern sky

But wilt thou cure thine heart
 Of love and all its smart,
 Then die, dear, die,
 'Tis deeper, sweeter,
 Than on a rose-bank to be dreaming
 With folded eye,
 And there alone, amid the booming
 Of Love's stars, thou'lt meet her
 In eastern sky.

A SONG

How many times do I love thee, dear?
 Tell me how many thoughts there be
 In the atmosphere
 Of a now-fall'n year,
 Whose white and sable hours appear
 The latest flake of Eternity.

So many times do I love thee, dear.
 How many times do I love again?
 Tell me how many beads there are
 In a silver chain
 Of evening rain,
 Unravell'd from the tumbling rain,
 And threading the eye of a yellow star
 So many times do I love again.

(a) ROMANTICISM IN ENGLISH FICTION

JUST as Bishop Percy's Reliques and Macpherson's Osian heralded in the romantic revival in poetry, so did HORACE WALPOLE's Castle of Otranto (1764) proclaim its entrance into fiction. The story is placed in mediæval Italy (about the twelfth century), but an historical background was no integral part of Walpole's plan of fiction. He merely wished to remove his characters from a present-day environment, and a mediæval castle, with its sombre tower and secret passages, seemed the best way of effecting this. The actual tale need not detain us, for its puerility is extreme, and its interest to-day is merely an historical one, as the pioneer of the so-called Gothic romance.

Distressed ladies, and spectral appearances, set in a background of mediæval upholstery, no longer appeal to our taste, but the sudden change from the hoisterous realism of much contemporary fiction was significant. That the change was welcome to many, whose imaginations had been starved on "common-sense" fare, is quite clear from Gray's letter to Walpole: "It makes some of us cry a little, and all in general, afraid to go to bed o' nights." To-day it would serve more likely as a safe hypnotic. None the less, it produced a considerable stir, and seemed to have inspired many talented imitators.

Walpole was a virtuoso and collector of no slight knowledge, but he knew more about mediæval art than literature, and even the mediævalism of The Castle of Otranto is a very indifferent matter.

THE CASTLE OF OTRANTO

The lower part of the castle was hollowed into several intricate cloisters, and it was not easy for one under so much anxiety to find the door that opened into the cavern. An awful silence reigned throughout those subterranean regions, except now and then some blasts of wind that shook the doors she had passed, and which, grating on the rusty hinges, were re-echoed through the long labyrinth of darkness. Every murmur struck her with new terror, yet more she dreamed to hear the wrathful voice of Manfred urging his domestics to pursue her.

She trod as softly as impatience would give her leave, yet frequently stopped and listened to hear if she was followed. In one of those moments she thought she heard a sigh. She shuddered and recoiled a few paces. In a moment she thought she heard the step of some person. Her blood curdled, she concluded it was Manfred. Every suggestion that horror could inspire rushed into her mind. She condemned her rash flight, which had thus exposed her to his rage in a place where her cries were not likely to draw anybody to her assistance. Yet the sound seemed not to come from behind. If Manfred knew where she was he must have followed her. She was still in one of the cloisters, and the steps she had heard were too distinct to proceed from the way she had come. Cheered with this reflection, and hoping to find a friend in whoever was not the Prince, she was going to advance, when a door that stood ajar, at some distance to the left, was opened gently: but ere her lamp, which she held up, could discover who opened it, the person retreated precipitately on seeing the light.

Isabella, whom every incident was sufficient to dismay, hesitated whether she should proceed. Her dread of Manfred soon outweighed every other terror. The very circumstance of the person avoiding her gave her a sort of courage. It could only be, she thought, some domestic belonging to the castle. Her gentleness had never raised her an enemy, and conscious innocence made her hope that, unless sent by the Prince's order to seek her, his servants would rather assist than prevent her flight. Fortifying herself with these reflections, and believing by what she could observe that she was near the mouth of the subterranean cavern, she approached the door that had been opened, but a sudden gust of wind that met her at the door extinguished her lamp, and left her in total darkness.

Words cannot paint the horror of the Princess's situation. Alone in so dismal a place, her mind imprinted with all the terrible events of the day, hopeless of escaping, expecting every moment the arrival of Manfred, and far from tranquil on knowing she was within reach of somebody, she knew not whom, who for some cause seemed concealed thereabouts, all these thoughts crowded on her distracted mind, and she was ready to sink under her apprehensions. She addressed herself to every saint in heaven, and inwardly implored their assistance. For a considerable time she remained in an agony of despair.

At last, as softly as was possible, she felt for the door, and having found it, entered trembling into the vault from whence she had heard the sigh and steps. It gave her a kind of momentary joy to perceive an imperfect ray of clouded moonshine gleam from the roof of the vault, which seemed to be fallen in, and from whence hung a fragment of earth or building, she could not distinguish which, that appeared to have been crushed inwards. She advanced eagerly towards this chasm, when she discerned a human form standing close against the wall.

Miss Reeve thought to improve upon the original and economised with her supernatural effects; but she only succeeded in exceeding Walpole's tale in its tedium, repeating most of his absurdities and showing even less acquaintance with mediæval life.

A more interesting romance than either Walpole's or Clara Reeve's had been published in 1762. This was Longsword, Earl of Salisbury, and is really the first historical romance in our fiction. It was written by an Irish cleric, THOMAS LELAND, and despite the inability to reproduce the language and customs of the time, there is a genuine attempt at historical detail, the period being the reign of Henry III.

A more remarkable force in romantic fiction appeared in the pen of ANNE RADCLIFFE (1764-1823), the lonely wife of a busy journalist. To wile away the time, she wrote five romances, that displayed a lively if undisciplined imagination, and a skilful faculty of depicting wild scenery. Her stories were published between 1789 and 1797. The elements of mediævalism are all here: monks, inquisition, disguises, intrigues, escapes, gloomy castles, fierce banditti—with scenery and language to match.

Despite wild improbabilities and conventional characterisation, there is power and charm in the writing Mrs Radcliffe makes greater use of the prevalent sentimentalism than her contemporaries, weaving it skilfully into her sensational melodrama. Her heroines are generally affected by their scenic surroundings, shudder at the whistling winds, dissolve into tears when the moon shines upon them, though they would have been more acceptable young women had they been blest with a sense of humour.

It is interesting to note the influence upon Mrs Radcliffe of the Thomsonian school of verse, with its increased sensibility to Nature, and the way she combines this with the influence of Richardson. The heroines are true sisters of Clarissa, both in emotional expression and in moral impeccability.

Her best stories were The Mysteries of Udolpho (1794) and The Italian (1797), those being the two latest. The former is a tale of the sixteenth century, and the latter of the eighteenth century. There are some spirited and vivid passages describing the ritual of the Roman Church in The Italian, and the scenic effects in Udolpho, though highly coloured, show real appreciation of the sublime in nature. Certainly they influenced Scott, just as Mrs Radcliffe's picturesque, dark-browed villains reappeared later in Byron's Lara and Manfred. That sense of mystery which was so noted a characteristic of romances, is certainly better exemplified in these fictions than those with which we have dealt. She could create an atmosphere of suspense and dread.

As an illustration of her style.

MYSTERIES OF UDOLPHO

The sun at length set behind the western mountains, the fiery beams faded from the clouds, and then a dun, melancholy purple drew over them, and gradually involved the features of the country below. Soon after, the sentinels passed on the rampart to commence the watch.

Twilight had now spread its gloom over every object: the dismal obscurity of her chamber recalled fearful thoughts, but she remembered that to procure light she must pass through a great extent of the castle, and, above all, through the halls, where she had already experienced so much horror. Darkness, indeed in the present state of her spirits, made silence and solitude terrible to her, it would also prevent the possibility of her finding her way to the turret, and condemn her to remain in suspense concerning the fate of her aunt: yet she dared not to venture forth for a lamp.

Daylight dispelled from Emily's mind the glooms of superstition, but not those of apprehension. The Count Morano was the first image that occurred to her waking thoughts, and then came a train of anticipated evils which she could neither conquer nor avoid. She rose, and to relieve her mind from the busy ideas that tormented it, compelled herself to notice external objects. From her casement she looked out upon the wild grandeur of the scene, closed nearly on all sides by Alpine steeps, whose tops, peeping over each other, faded from the eye in misty hues, while the pronouncements below were dark with woods, that swept down to their base, and stretched along the narrow valleys. The rich pomp of these woods was particularly delightful to Emily, and she viewed with astonishment the fortifications of the castle spreading along a vast extent of rock, and now partly in decay, the grandeur of the ramparts below, and the towers and battlements and various features of the fabric above. From these her sight wandered over the cliff, and woods into the valley, along which foamed a broad and rapid stream, seen falling among the crags of an opposite mountain, now flashing in the sunbeams, and now shadowed by overarched pines, till it was entirely concealed by their thick foliage. Again it burst from beneath this darkness in one broad sheet of foam, and fell thundering into the vale. Nearer, towards the west, opened the mountain vista, which Emily had viewed with such sublime emotion on her approach to the castle, a thin, dusky vapour, that rose from the valley, overspread its features with a sweet obscurity. As this ascended and caught the sunbeams it kindled into a crimson tint, and touched with exquisite beauty the woods and cliffs, over which it passed to the summit of the mountains, then, as the veil drew up, it was delightful to watch the gleaming objects that progressively disclosed themselves in the valley—the green turf—dark woods—little rocky recesses—a few peasants' huts—the foaming stream—a herd of cattle, and various images of pastoral beauty. Then, the pine forests brightened, and then the broad breast of the mountains, till, at length, the mist settled round their summit, touching them with a ruddy glow. The features of the vista now appeared distinctly, and the broad, deep shadows, that fell from the lower cliffs, gave strong effect to the streaming splendour above, while the mountains gradually sinking in the perspective, appeared to shelve into the Adriatic Sea, for such Emily imagined to be the gleam of bluish light that terminated the view.

Another romancer is WILLIAM BECKFORD (1760–1844) a wealthy dilettante whose imagination sought in the fables of the East the inspiration others had found nearer home. In 1782, he wrote in French an "Arabian tale," Vathek, which was translated and published without his consent in England, before its publication abroad. Satiro mingles with sensation in Beckford's fiction, but the horrors of Beckford are drawn with greater power than those of Walpole or Mrs Radcliffe. Beckford was certainly a man of considerable force of intellect and brilliant though hectic imagination.

He was influenced to an extent by the satirical romances of Voltaire, and stands somewhat apart from other fantastic writers of the time.

THE PALACES OF THE CALIPH VATHEK

He (the Caliph Vathek) surpassed in magnificence all his predecessors. The palace of Alkorommi, which his father, Motassom, had erected on the hill of Pied Horses, and which commanded the whole city of Samarah, was in his idea far too scanty, he added, therefore, five wings, or rather other palaces, which he destined for the particular gratification of each of his senses. In the first of these were tables continually covered with the most exquisite dainties, which were supplied both by night and by day, according to their constant consumption, whilst the most delicious wines and the choicest cordials flowed forth from a hundred fountains that were never exhausted. This palace was called the Eternal, or Unsatisfying Banquet. The second was styled the Temple of Melody, or the Nectar of the Soul. It was inhabited by the most skilful musicians and admired poets of the time, who not only displayed their talents within, but dispersing in bands without, caused every surrounding acoustical to reverberate their songs, which were continually varied in the most delightful succession.

The palace named the Delight of the Eyes, or the Support of Memory, was one entire enchantment. Rarities collected from every corner of the earth were there found in such profusion as to dazzle and confound, but for the order in which they were arranged. One gallery exhibited the pictures of the celebrated Mani (the founder of the Manichæans, who was famed as a magician and painter), and statues that seemed to be alive. Here a well-managed perspective attracted the sight; there the magic of optics agreeably deceived it;

whilst the naturalist, on his part, exhibited in their several classes the various gifts that Heaven had bestowed on our globe. In a word, Vathek omitted nothing in this palace that might gratify the curiosity of those who resorted to it, although he was not able to satisfy his own, for he was of all men the most curious.

The Palace of Perfumes, which was termed likewise the Incentive to Pleasure, consisted of various halls, where the different perfumes which the earth produces were kept perpetually burning in censers of gold. Flambeaux and aromatic lamps were here lighted in open day. But the too powerful effects of this agreeable delirium might be alleviated by descending into an immense garden, where an assemblage of every fragrant flower diffused through the air the purest odours.

The fifth palace, denominated the Retreat of Mirth, or the Dangerous, was frequented by troops of young females, beautiful as the Hours and not less seducing, who never failed to receive with caresses all whom the caliph allowed to approach them and enjoy a few hours of their company. For he was by no means jealous, as his own women were secluded within the palace he inhabited himself.

The lineal descendant of Mrs Radcliffe was MATTHEW LEWIS (1775-1818), who tried his best to excel her in mystery and sensation.

In 1795 he published The Monk, and was afterwards known as "Monk" Lewis. Byron's lines describe him neatly and humorously.

"O wonder-working Lewis, Monk or Bard,
Who fann would'st make Parnassus a churchyard,
Lo! wreaths of yew, not laurel, bind thy brow,
Thy muse a sprite, Apollo's sexton thou,
Whether on ancient tombs thou tak'st thy stand,
By gibbering spectres hailed, thy kindred band,
Or tracest chaste descriptions on thy page,
To please the females of our modest age—
All hail, M.P.,¹ from whose infernal brain
Thin-sheeted phantoms glide, a grisly train."

Magio and witchcraft were to him congenial matters for the business of fiction. "A ghost or a witch," he says, "is a sine qua non ingredient in all the dishes of which I mean to compose my hobgoblin repast."

Lewis's acquaintance with Shelley was not without literary results; these may be seen in Mrs Shelley's extraordinary romance, Frankenstein.

Contemporary with this Gothic romance, where "horrors on horrors' head accumulate," and the main idea seems to be the reproduction of ancient sorceries and superstitions, is a type of fiction, where romance is only an ingredient and the didactic note is especially emphasized.

Among makers of fiction, WILLIAM GODWIN (1756-1836) takes the most important place. He had absorbed the principles underlying the French Revolution, and aimed at reconstructing a new society.

Godwin's social writings are so matter-of-fact, that it comes as a surprise in The Adventures of Caleb Williams to find a writer of such genuine imaginative power. Caleb Williams is a good sensational story that may be read with no little enjoyment, if one skips the didactic discussions interwoven with it. In his subsequent novels, St Leon (1799) and Fleetwood (1804), Godwin's skill as a story-teller is even better exemplified. The supernaturalism of St. Leon, if not wholly convincing, is certainly a tour de force for one with Godwin's materialistic views; while in Fleetwood, it would really seem as if Godwin the novelist has to some extent triumphed over Godwin the matter-of-fact philosopher and champion of reason.

ST. LEON GAINS THE ELIXIR OF LIFE

Months, years, cycles, centuries! To me all these are but as indivisible moments. I shall never become old. I shall always be, as it were, in the porch and infancy of existence; no lapse of years shall subtract anything from my future duration. I was born under Louis the Twelfth, the life of Francis the First now threatens a speedy termination; he will be gathered to his fathers and Henry his son will succeed him. But what are princes and kings and generations of men to me? I shall become familiar with the rise and fall of empires, in a little while the very name of France, my country, will perish from off the face of the earth, and men will dispute about the situation of Paris, as they dispute about the site of ancient Nineveh and Babylon and Troy. Yet I shall still be young. I shall take my most distant posterity by the hand, I shall accompany them in their career, and when they are worn out and exhausted shall shut up the tomb over them, and set forward. . . . I could have been well contented to be partaker with a race of immortals, but I was not satisfied to be single in this respect. I was not pleased to recollect how trivial would appear to me those concerns of a few years, about which the passions of men are so eagerly occupied. I did not like the deadness of heart that seemed to threaten to seize me. I began to be afraid of vacancy and torpor, and that my life would become too uniformly quiet. Nor did it sufficiently console me, to recollect that, as one set of friends died off the stage, another race would rise to be substituted in their stead. I felt that human affections and passions are not made of this transferable stuff, and that we can love nothing truly, unless we devote ourselves to it heart and soul, and our life, as it were, bound up in the object of our attachment.

It was worse when I recollected my wife and children. When I considered for the first time that they were now in a manner nothing to me, I felt a sensation that might be said to amount to anguish. How can a man attach himself to anything, when he comes to consider it as the mere plaything and amusement of the moment? Past times had attached me deeply irrevocably, to all the members of my family. But I felt that I should survive them all. They would die one by one, and leave me alone. I should drop into their graves the still renewing tear of anguish. In that tomb would my heart be buried. Never, never, through the countless ages of eternity, should I form another attachment. In the happy age of delusion, happy and auspicious at least to the cultivation of the passions, when I felt that I also was a mortal, I was capable of a community of sentiments and a going forth of the heart. But how could I, an immortal hope ever hereafter to feel a serious, an elevating and expansive passion for the ephemeron of an hour!

The didactic note persists through the tales of Mrs OPE (1769-1853), who wrote Adeline Mowbray, or the Mother and Daughter (1804), and Mrs INCHBALD's more artistic work, A Simple Story (1791), and Nature and Art (1796), while the sudden passion for educational fiction aroused by Rousseau's Emile found expression in a number of didactic and extremely dull stories for children, including Thomas Day's Sandford and Merton.

Finally, there remains for us to note the immediate predecessors of Scott in historical fiction.

Longsword for a time found no successor, though it gave a vogue to historical background in romance, more or less successfully introduced by Mrs. Radcliffe.

Then in 1783, SOPHIA LEE wrote the first part of a tale dealing with the days of Queen Elizabeth, published later in parts in 1786. Here the sentimentalism of Richardson and Sterne is noticeable.

More adventurous, and in the Smollett vein, are JAMES WHITE'S Adventures of John of Gaunt, and Earl Strongbow. But none of these writers of fiction equal in power and knowledge JANE PORTER (1776-1850), whose Scottish Chiefs (1810) is an excellent melodramatic romance dealing with the time of Wallace, and Thaddeus of Warsaw (1803), concerned with the partition of Poland, an earlier and well-written story.

JOSEPH STRUTT'S Queenhoo Hall brings us to Scott himself.

Strutt was an antiquary who left behind him a half-finished romance. The story, completed by Scott and published in 1808, exhibits more knowledge of mediæval England than previous writers had shown, and his picture of the manners and customs of the time—the pageants, the May games, and the social life of the streets and taverns—is admirably well informed. Unhappily, there is no lifting power of imagination to fuse the ambiguous knowledge, and Jane Porter with her more limited historical knowledge remains the most able historical romancer previous to Scott.

II. PROSE: THOMAS LOVE PEACOCK

THOMAS LOVE PEACOCK, 1785-1866

HIS LIFE

THOMAS LOVE PEACOCK, born on October 18, 1785, at Weymouth, was the only son of a glass merchant. His boyhood was spent chiefly at Chertsey, and from his seventh to his thirteenth year he was educated at a private school in Englefield Green. He proved an apt and industrious student, took instinctively to literature and broke out into verse-writing as most book-loving boys do at an early age.

In 1808 he was employed on a man-of-war, being assistant secretary to Admiral Popham, but found his duties on this "floating inferno" did not conduce to literary study, so gave up the appointment within the year. Soon after this he found employment at the East India House, but never took kindly to any business occupation. During a tramp in North Wales he fell in love with a pretty Welsh girl, and when his finances were in a more settled condition, wooed and won her. She was the "Carmarthen nymph" whom he mentions in a letter to a friend as having "pleased him by talking of Scipio and Hannibal and the Emperor Otho." Evidently the interest felt in this young lady was not so entirely academic as he wished to make out. Certainly Jane Gryffyd was much more than a Cymric edition of Cornelia Blimber. The marriage, in 1820, proved a long and happy one despite the delicate health of Mrs. Peacock.

Previous to his marriage, Peacock had published a volume of verse, and three of his satires and romantic novels: Headlong Hall (1816), Melincourt (1817), Nightmare Abbey (1818). In the year of his marriage he published his Four Ages of Poetry. In 1822, his most romantic and least satirical fiction, Maid Marian. his Arthurian fantasy The Misfortune of Elphin (1829), Crotchet Castle (1831), then after a long interval, Gryll Grange in 1860, written when he was an old man.

After he had married, Peacock lived in the country near Shepperton. He was not a sociable man, though kindly in his own household, but he was much attached to a few friends such as Hobhouse (Lord Broughton), and the poet Shelley; and though a quick-tempered man and something of a crank, was essentially lovable. He was passionately fond of wild scenery, a fact obvious to readers of his fiction, where he never loses an opportunity of satirising landscape gardening. His acquaintance with Shelley started in 1812, and in 1813 we find Peacock, Shelley, and Harriet Irving together at Edinburgh. Peacock introduced Shelley to Greek literature and read Greek with him during the next five years. He tried to wean the poet, moreover, from his vegetarian fare and monotonous round of lemonade, tea, and bread and butter, so dieted him for a while with well-peppered chops. Thus, in his own words, he "gave him one week of thorough enjoyment." His friendship with Shelley may have predisposed him to regard with disfavour the so-called Lake Poets. In any case he never did justice to the genius of Wordsworth and Coleridge, and some of his poorest humour is seen in his satires of these poets. Though his enthusiasm was focussed upon literature he was an able business man, often helped Shelley in his affairs, and looked after the interests of Harriet on Shelley's behalf, when the two had separated.

Apart from literature, music was his only other relaxation, and for some years he attended the opera and wrote criticisms for the Globe and Examiner. He had no little of Landor's independence and self-sufficiency, as well as his fiery nature.

Both writers are acquired tastes; and both appeal very strongly to the select few, but have no universality of appeal. An interesting link between the age of Shelley and the age of Meredith is found in the first marriage of the Victorian novelist with the oldest daughter of Peacock. Meredith's first volume of verse is dedicated to his father-in-law with "affectionate respects," and the influence of Peacock as a writer may be traced in some of Meredith's scenes and characterisation, such for instance as the interview between Sir Willoughby Patterne and Dr. Middleton over the old port.

Peacock died in January 1866.

HIS WORK

Peacock's association with the literary history of the earlier years of the nineteenth century were many and interesting. He was the friend and adviser of Shelley, knew most of the Benthamite Radicals, and had written for many of the important reviews and magazines, including Bentley's (which he helped to start) and Fraser's. Byron admired his work, especially Melincourt, and his literary eclogue exhibits traces of Peacock's influence.

Robert Buchanan admitted frankly to his influence, while a modern writer like Dr Garnett shows unmistakably the Peacock touch in his Twilight of the Gods. Thackeray and Frederick Locker admired his verse and have recorded their admiration, while, putting aside his son-in-law's appreciation and probable indebtedness, the majority of the best critics to-day are unanimous in their praise of Peacock's power.

In fact, we shall find that the further we move from Peacock's time, the more considerably has Peacock's reputation advanced. With a few exceptions he was practically disregarded when at the height of his powers, and never received the critical meed of praise that was his due. The reason for this may be found in the character of the satirist's work. Writing in the full flush of the Romantic revival, Peacock is far too eclectic in his tastes to catch the ear of the lover of Romanticism.

Nor did he fit in any better with the literary tendencies of the succeeding age, neither with the democratic ideals of the early Victorian Era, nor the scientific tendencies of the Mid-Victorian, had he anything especially in common. He declines to be placed. No label fits him. The friend of Shelley, he rocks at romanticism. A lover of the Classics, he is far too idiosyncratic a writer to observe the classical conventions, a writer of fiction, he flouts all those points over which the novelist usually expends his art, there is the roughest characterisation, next to no plot, scarcely any action and no passion. As a witty controversialist he is no more likely to attract those who care for didactic writing, for he plays with rather than advocates opinions, and makes merry at everyone's expense. Life for Peacock was a pleasant holiday where everything was fit food for laughter. Yet to the few who are attracted by the cynic's attitude, once again Peacock proves disconcerting. He is for ever railing at men and women, but there is no bitterness in his mockery. Yet there is not, as there was with men like Hood, warm democratic feeling at the back of his jesting. He is kindly enough, but an intellectual aristocrat to the core. "I am more afraid of deference to public clamour," he said, "than I am of anything under heaven."

Here then one may think to fix Peacock—among the Tory thinkers of his day, and his abuse of the present, his praise of the past, would tend to suggest that view. Yet once again he eludes. With a strong Conservative bias in his nature there existed a contradictory strain of Liberalism. Most of his friends were Radicals, and his own seal bore the Horatian tag, "I neither follow in the rear, nor pursue those who go before me." He loved the past, not with the Tory love of tradition, but for certain harmonious elements which he found lacking in the present.

In short, this paradoxical personality, with its many contradictions, must be taken as an independent force in letters and not bound over to any school. The one thing about him that is clear, straightforward and indisputable, is that he was an artist in irony, who loved to depict human frailties from sheer high spirits. And so he made of farcical extravagance a fine art. He is serious about nothing save his work as an artist. As Friar Tuck said, "The worst thing is good enough to be laughed at, though it be good for nothing else; and the best thing, though it be good for something else, is good for nothing better."

It is this point that divides Peacock from the contemporary satirists of his day. Dickens, Thackeray, Disraeli, were moralists as well as satirists, humour with them subverted a serious purpose. Peacock is as guiltless of preaching as was Jane Austen. He did not laugh at the world to improve its morals but merely to improve his own digestion. It pleased him to do so, and he would laugh at his best friends or himself with the same zest as he laughed at those whom he disliked.

His style is admirable: lucid, harmonious, apposite. In his care for achieving his effects, in his fastidious sensibility for the precise phrase and proper emphasis, he reminds one rather of the great eighteenth-century humorists than of his contemporaries. We think of Congreve rather than Hood, of Sterne rather than Thackeray. Romantic, satirical, tender, sardonic, reactionary, liberal, a cynic to outward appearance, a sensitive and affectionate man beneath the cold exterior. Let us not be misled by his ironic detachment, and devotion to the comic spirit, it was an artist's pose to conceal from the world a proud and over delicately responsive nature. He jested wildly often as Lamb did, to conceal some inner ache. And he pays the penalty as a writer for thus concealing his finer qualities as a man. But all who care for ironic humour, flecked with flashes of poetic feeling, will hold Peacock in affectionate remembrance.

A DISCUSSION AT HEADLONG HALL

The Reverend Doctor Gaster seated himself in the corner of a sofa near Miss Philomela Poppyseed. Miss Philomela detailed to him the plan of a very moral and aristocratic novel she was preparing for the press, and continued holding forth, with her eyes half shut, till a long-drawn nasal tone from the reverend divine compelled her suddenly to open them in all the indignation of surprise. The cessation of the hum of her voice awakened the reverend gentleman, who lifting up first one eyelid, then the other, articulated or rather murmured, "Admirably planned, indeed!"

"I have not quite finished, sir," said Miss Philomela, bridling. "Will you have the goodness to inform me where I left off?"

The doctor hummed awhile, and at length answered, "I think you had just laid it down at a position, that a thousand a year is an indispensable ingredient in the passion of love, and that no man who is not so supplied by nature, can reasonably presume to feel that passion himself, or be correctly the object of it with a well-educated female."

"That, sir," said Miss Philomela, highly incensed, "is the fundamental principle which I lay down in the first chapter, and which the whole four volumes, of which I detailed to you the outline, are intended to set in a strong practical light."

"Bless me!" said the doctor, "what a nap I must have had!"

Miss Philomela flung away to the side of her dear friends Call and Trocloe, under whose fostering patronage she had been puffed into an extensive reputation much to the advantage of the young ladies of the age, whom she taught to consider themselves as a sort of commodity, to be put up at public auction, and knocked down to the highest bidder. Mr. Nightshade and Mr. MacLaurel joined the trio, and it was secretly resolved, that Miss Philomela should furnish them with a portion of her manuscripts, and that Messieurs Gall and Co should devote the following morning to cutting and drying a critique on a work calculated to prove so extensively beneficial, that Mr Gall protested he really craved the writer.

While this amiable and enlightened quintette were busily employed in flattering one another, Mr Cramm retired to complete the preparations he had begun in the morning for a lecture, with which he intended, on some future evening, to favour the company. Sir Patrick O'Prin walked out into the grounds to study the effect of moonlight on the snow clad mountains, Mr Foster and Mr Escot continued to make love, and Mr Panscope to digest his plan of attack on the heart of Miss Cephalus. Mr Junkson sat by the fire, reading Much Ado About Nothing the Reverend Doctor Gaster was still enjoying the benefit of Miss Philomela's opiate, and serenading the company from his solitary corner. Mr Chromatic was reading music, and occasionally humming a note, and Mr Milestone had produced his portfolio for the education and amusement of Miss Tenorina, Miss Graziosa, and Squire Headlong, to whom he was pointing out the various beauties of his plan for Lord Littlebrain's park.

Mr Milestone This, you perceive, is the natural state of one part of the grounds. Here is a wood, never yet touched by the finger of taste, thick intricate, and gloomy. Here is a little stream, dashing from stone to stone, and overshadowed with these untrimmed boughs.

Miss Tenorina The sweet romantic spot! How beautifully the birds must sing there on a summer evening!

Miss Graziosa Dear sister! how can you endure the horrid flutket?

Mr Milestone You are right, Miss Graziosa, your taste is correct—perfectly en règle. Now, here is the same place corrected—trimmed—polished—decorated—adorned. Here sweeps a plantation, in that beautiful regular curve, there winds a gravel walk, here are parts of the old wood, left in these majestic circular clumps, disposed at equal distances with wonderful symmetry, there are some single shrubs scattered in elegant profusion, here a Portugal laurel, there's a juniper, here a laurustinus, there a spruce fir, here a larch, there a lile, here a rhododendron, there an arbutus. The stream, you see, is become a canal, the banks are perfectly smooth and green, sloping to the water's edge, and there is Lord Littlebrain, rowing in an elegant boat.

Squire Headlong Magical, faith!

Mr Milestone Here is another part of the grounds in its natural state. Here is a large rock, with the mountain-ash rooted in its fissures, overgrown, as you see, with ivy and moss, and from this part of it bursts a little fountain, that runs bubbling down its rugged sides.

Miss Tenorina O how beautiful! How I should love the melody of that miniature cascade!

Mr Milestone Beautiful, Miss Tenorina! Hideous, base, common, and popular. Such a thing as you may see anywhere, in wild and mountainous districts. Now, observe the metamorphosis. Here is the same rock, cut into the shape of a giant. In one hand he holds a horn, through which that little fountain is thrown to a prodigious elevation. In the other is a ponderous stone, so exactly balanced as to be apparently ready to fall on the head of any person who may happen to be beneath, and there is Lord Littlebrain walking under it.

Squire Headlong Miraculous, by Mahomet!

Mr Milestone This is the summit of a hill, covered, as you perceive, with wood, and with those mossy stones scattered at random under the trees.

Miss Tenorina What a delightful spot to read in, on a summer's day! The air must be so pure, and the wind must sound so divinely in the tops of those old pines!

Mr. Milestone Bad taste, Miss Tenorina. Bad taste, I assure you. Here is the spot improved. The trees are cut down, the stones are cleared away: this is an octagonal pavilion, exactly on the centre of the summit, and there you see Lord Littlebrain, on the top of the pavilion, enjoying the prospect with a telescope.

Squire Headlong Glorious, egad!

Mr Milestone Here is a rugged mountainous road, leading through unpervious shades: the ass and the four goats characterise a wild uncultured scene. Here, as you perceive, it is totally changed into a beautiful gravel road, gracefully curving through a belt of limes: and there is Lord Littlebrain driving four-in-hand.

Squire Headlong Egregious, hy Jupiter!

Mr Milestone Here is Littlebrain Castle, a Gothic, moss-grown structure, half-bosomed in trees. Near the casement of that turret is an owl peeping from the ivy.

Squire Headlong And devilish wise he looks.

Mr Milestone Here is the new house, without a tree near it, standing in the midst of an undulating lawn, a white, polished, angular building, reflected to a nicety in this waveless lake, and there you see Lord Littlebrain looking out of the window.

Squire Headlong And devilish wise he looks too.

You shall cut me a giant before you go.

Mr Milestone Good! I'll order down my little corps of pioneers.

During this conversation a hot dispute had arisen between Messieurs Gall and Nightshade, the latter pertinaciously insisted on having his new poem reviewed by Treacle, who he knew would extol it most loftily, and not by Gull, whose sarcastic commendation he held in superlative horror. The remonstrances of Squire Headlong silenced the disputants, but did not mollify the inflexible Gall, nor appease the irritated Nightshade, who secretly resolved that, on his return to London, he would beat his drum in Grub Street, form a mastigophonic corps of his own, and hoist the standard of determined opposition against this critical Napoleon.

AN EPISODE IN "MAID MARIAN"

Matilda, not dreaming of visitors, tripped into the apartment in a dress of forest green, with a small quiver by her side, and a bow and arrow in her hand. Her hair, black and glossy as the raven's wing, curled like wandering clusters of dark ripe grapes under the edge of her round bonnet, and a plume of black feathers fell back negligently above it, with an almost horizontal inclination, that seemed the habitual effect of rapid motion against the wind. Her black eyes sparkled like sunbeams on a river, a clear, deep, liquid radiance, the reflection of ethereal fire—tempered, not subdued, in the medium of its living and gentle mirror. Her lips were half opened to speak as she entered the apartment, and with a smile of recognition to the friar, and a courtesy to the stranger knight, she approached the baron and said, "You are late at your breakfast, father."

"I am not at breakfast," said the baron. "I have been at supper, my last night's supper, for I had none."

"I am sorry," said Matilda, "you should have gone to bed supperless."

"I did not go to bed supperless," said the baron: "I did not go to bed at all, and what are you doing with that green dress and that bow and arrow?"

"I am going a hunting," said Matilda.

"A-hunting!" said the baron. "What, I warrant you, to meet with the earl, and slip your neck into the same noose?"

"No," said Matilda: "I am not going out of our own woods to-day."

"How do I know that?" said the baron. "What surety have I of that?"

"Here is the friar," said Matilda. "He will be surety."

"Not he," said the baron: "he will undertake nothing but where the devil is a party concerned."

"Yes, I will," said the friar. "I will undertake anything for the lady Matilda."

"No matter for that," said the baron: "she shall not go hunting to-day."

"Why, father," said Matilda, "if you coop me up here in this odious castle, I shall pine and die like a lonely swan on a pool."

"No," said the baron, "the lonely swan does not die on the pool. If there be a river at hand, she flies to the river, and finds her a mate, and so shall not you."

"But," said Matilda, "you may send with me any, or as many, of your grooms as you will."

"My grooms," said the baron, "are all false knaves. There is not a rascal among them but loves you better than me. Villains that I feed and clothe."

"Surely," said Matilda, "it is not villainy to love me: if it be, I should be sorry my father were an honest man." The baron relaxed his muscles into a smile. "Or my lover either," added Matilda. The baron looked grim again.

"For your lover," said the baron, "you may give God thanks of him. He is as arrant a knave as ever poached."

"What, for hunting the king's deer?" said Matilda. "Have I not heard you rail at the forest laws by the hour?"

"Did you ever hear me," said the baron, "rail myself out of house and land? If I had done that, then were I a knave."

"My lover," said Matilda, "is a brave man, and a true man, and a generous man, and a young man, and a handsome man, aye, and an honest man too."

"How can he be an honest man?" said the baron, "when he has neither house nor land, which are the better part of a man?"

"They are but the husk of a man," said Matilda, "the worthless coat of the chestnut: the man himself is the kernel."

"The man is the grape stone," said the baron, "and the pulp of the melon. The house and land are the true substantial fruit, and all that give him savour and value."

"He will never want house or land," said Matilda, "while the meeting houghs weave a green roof in the wood, and the free range of the hart marks out the bounds of the forest."

"Vert and venison! vert and venison!" exclaimed the baron. "Treason and flat rebellion. Confound your smiling face! what makes you look so good-humoured? What! you think I can't look at you, and be in a passion? You think so, do you? We shall see. Have you no fear in taking thus, when here is the king's begonian come to take us all into custody, and confiscate our goods and chattels?"

"Nay, Lord Fitzwater," said Sir Ralph, "you wrong me in your report. My visit is one of courtesy and excuse, not of menace and authority."

"Then it is," said the baron, "every one takes a pleasure in contradicting me. Here is this courteous knight, who has not opened his mouth three times since he has been in my house except to take in provision, cuts me short in my story with a flat denial."

"Oh, I cry you mercy, sir knight," said Matilda, "I did not mark you before. I am your debtor for no slight favour, and so is my liege lord."

"Her liege lord!" exclaimed the baron, taking large strides across the chamber.

"Pardon me, gentle lady," said Sir Ralph. "Had I known you before yesterday, I would have cut off my right hand ere it should have been raised to do you displeasure."

"Oh, sir," said Matilda, "a good man may be forced on an ill office; but I can distinguish the man from his duty." She presented to him her hand which he kissed respectfully, and simultaneously with the contact thirty-two invisible arrows plunged at once into his heart: one from every point of the compass of his pericardium.

"Well, father," added Matilda, "I must go to the woods."

"Must you?" said the baron. "I say you must not."

"But I am going," said Matilda.

"But I will have up the drawbridge," said the baron.

"But I will swim the moat," said Matilda.

"But I will secure the gates," said the baron.

"But I will leap from the battlement," said Matilda.

"But I will lock you in an upper chamber," said the baron.

"But I will shred the tapestry," said Matilda, "and let myself down."

"But I will lock you in a turret," said the baron, "where you shall only see light through a loophole."

"But through that loophole," said Matilda, "will I take my flight, like a young eagle from its acerie and, father, while I go out freely, I will return willingly: but if once I slip out through a loophole—" She paused a moment, and then added, singing.

"The love that follows fair
Will never its faith betray—
But the faith that is held in a chain
Will never be found again
If a single link give way."

The melody acted irresistibly on the harmonious propensities of the friar, who accordingly sang in his turn.

"For hark! hark! hark!
The dog doth bark,
That watches the wild deer's lair,
The hunter awakes at the peep of the dawn,
But the lair is empty, the deer is gone,
And the hunter knows not where."

Matilda and the friar then sang together.

"Then follow, oh follow! the hounds do cry:
The red sun flames in the eastern sky
The stag bounds over the hollow
He that lingers in spirit, or loiters in hall,
Shall see us no more till the evening fall,
And no voice but the echo shall answer his call:
Then follow, oh follow, follow
Follow, oh follow, follow!"

During the process of this harmony, the baron's eyes wandered from his daughter to the friar, and from the friar to his daughter again, with an alternate expression of anger differently modified: when he looked on the friar, it was anger without qualification; when he looked on his daughter it was still anger but tempered by an expression of involuntary admiration and pleasure. These rapid fluctuations of the baron's physiognomy, the habitual, reckless, resolute merriment in the jovial face of the friar,—and the cheerful, elastic spirits that played on the lips and sparkled in the eyes of Matilda,—would have presented a very amusing combination to Sir Ralph if one of the three images in the group had not absorbed his total attention with feelings of intense delight very nearly allied to pain. The baron's wrath was somewhat counteracted by the reflection that his daughter's good spirits seemed to show that they would naturally rise triumphant over all disappointments: and he had had sufficient experience of her humour to know that she might sometimes be led, but never could be driven. Then, too he was always delighted to hear her sing: though he was not at all pleased in this instance with the subject of her song. Still he would have endured the subject for the sake of the melody of the treble, but his mind was not sufficiently attuned to unison to relish the harmony of the bass. The friar's accompaniment put him out of all patience and "so," he exclaimed, "this is the way you teach my daughter to renounce the devil, is it? A hunting friar, truly! Who ever heard before of a hunting friar? A profane, roaring, hawling, bumper-bibbing, neck-breaking, catch-singing friar?"

"Under favour, bold baron," said the friar, but the friar was warm with canary, and in his singing vein; and he could not go on in plain unmusical prose. He therefore sang in a new tune

" 'Though I be now a grey, grey friar,
Yet I was once a hale young knight:
The cry of my dogs was the only cheer
In which my spirit did take delight

Little I recked of matin bell,
But drowned its toll with my clanging horn:
And the only beads I loved to tell
Were the beads of dew on the spangled thorn.' "

"OVER, OVER!"

A damsel came in midnight rain,
And called across the ferry
The weary wight she called in vain,
Whose senses sleep did bury
At evening, from her father's door
She turned to meet her lover
At midnight on the lonely shore,
She shouted, "Over, over!"

She had not met him by the tree
Of their accustom'd meeting,
And sad and sick at heart was she,
Her heart all wildly beating
In chill suspense the hours went by,
The wild storm burst above her
She turned her to the river lugh,
And shouted, "Over, over!"

A dim, discoloured, doubtful light
The moon's dark veil permitted,
And thick before her troubled sight
Fantastic shadows flitted
Her lover's form appeared to glide,
And beckon o'er the water
Alas! his blood that morn had dyed
Her brother's sword with slaughter.

Upon a little rock she stood,
To make her invocation
She marked not that the rain-swoll'n flood
Was islanding her station
The tempest mocked her feeble cry
No saint his aid would give her
The flood swelled high and yet more high,
And swept her down the river.

Yet oft beneath the pale moonlight,
When hollow winds are blowing
The shadow of that maiden bright
Glides by the dark stream's flowing
And when the storms of midnight rave,
While clouds the broad moon cover,
The wild gusts waft across the wave
The cry of "Over, over!"¹

LOVE AND AGE

I played with you 'mid cowslips blowing,
When I was six and you were four,
When garlands weaving, flower-balls throwing,
Were pleasures soon to please no more
Through groves and meads, o'er grass and heather,
With little playmates, to and fro,
We wandered hand in hand together,
But that was sixty years ago

You grew a lovely roseate maiden,
And still our early love was strong;
Still with no care our days were laden,
They glided joyously along,
And I did love you very dearly,
How dearly words want power to show;
I thought your heart was touched as nearly,
But that was fifty years ago

Then other lovers came around you,
Your beauty grew from year to year,
And many a splendid circle found you
The centre of its glittering sphere
I saw you then, first vows forsaking,
On rank and wealth your hand bestow,
Oh, then I thought my heart was breaking—
But that was forty years ago

And I lived on to wed another,
No cause she gave me to repine,
And when I heard you were a mother,
I did not wish the children mine
My own young flock, in fair progression
Made up a pleasant Christmas row.
My joy in them was past expression—
But that was thirty years ago

You grew a matron, plump and comely,
You dwelt in fashion's brightest blaze;
My earthly lot was far more homely,
But I too had my festal days
No morrow eyes have ever glensied
Around the hearthstone's wintry glow,
Than when my youngest child was christened—
But that was twenty years ago

Time passed My eldest girl was married,
And I am now a grandsire grey,
One pet of four years old I've carried
Among the wild-flowered meads to play.
In our old field of childish pleasure,
Where now, as then, the cowslips blow,
She fills her basket's ample measure—
And that is not ten years ago

But though first love's impassioned blindness
Has passed away in colder light,
I still have thought of you with kindness,
And shall do, till our last good-night,
The ever-rolling silent hours
Will bring a time we shall not know,
When our young days of gathering flowers
Will be an hundred years ago¹

II. PROSE: (b) Criticism and the Essay. Charles Lamb—William Hazlitt—S. T. Coleridge—Thomas de Quincey—Leigh Hunt.

CHARLES LAMB (1775–1834)

HIS LIFE

CHARLES LAMB was cradled in the quiet cloisters of the Temple, and the old-world atmosphere of the Temple clung about him all his life. Like the mediæval retreat that nestles in the very heart of Fleet Street, lapped by its ceaseless flow of life, so did Lamb, hugging always the concrete actualities and humanities of the great City, keep none the less a cloistral recess in his nature, redolent of old-time ways and fashions

The first seven years of his impressionable youth were passed within the precincts of Crown Office Row (1775–1782), and in one of his many introspective musings he has pictured for us with finely sympathetic touch his father, "a man of an incorrigible and losing honesty," once "the liveliest little fellow breathing . . . brimful of rogueries and inventions"; later, "in the last sad stage of human weakness, a remnant most forlorn of what he was."

John Lamb was a barrister's clerk, with seven children, and had to fight hard against the encroachments of poverty. Little money could be spared for educational purposes, and it might have fared ill with Charles had not Samuel Salt, his father's patron, obtained for him, when he was seven, a presentation to Christ's Hospital. He could thus bid farewell to his earlier mentor, "Mr William Bird, eminent writer and teacher of languages," whose readiness with the birch was more obvious than his readiness with learning.

At Christ's Hospital he stayed for another seven years. Here he made the acquaintance of the youthful Coleridge, three years his senior, and the acquaintance soon ripened into a friendship that was to last a lifetime. Lamb proved a fairly good scholar, and when he left in November 1789, obtained a post in the South Sea House, where the friendly Salt was a Deputy Governor. His family had left the Temple, the father by reason of increasing infirmities having retired on a small pension, and we find them in Little Queen Street, Holborn.

In his scanty leisure, Lamb threw himself with keen zest into the joys of reading, a joy he shared with his sister Mary. This was varied by occasional visits to the theatre, a brief excursion to Hertfordshire—where some of his happiest moments were spent, and where the one romance of his life budded and faded. His home life was wearisome and gloomy. His father was growing childish and querulous, his mother was an invalid, and the strain of insanity in the family suddenly showed itself in poor Mary, upon whom all the household cares had devolved. In a fit of frenzy she pursued a girl apprentice, and upon her mother interfering turned upon her with a knife that she had snatched up. It seemed as if Mary's only future lay within the walls of a public asylum, but her brother Charles offered to be her guardian, and this alternative was accepted, but it involved the sacrifice of Lamb's romantic dreams, and of many other ambitions, for Charles would have realised full well the probable strain upon his care and attention, and the necessary elimination of many congenial ties and distractions; but he neither hesitated at the time, nor complained afterwards, accepting the duty cheerfully and courageously. In her lucid intervals Mary was an interesting if trying companion—what those were, has not "Elia" pictured for us with tender charity and humorous toleration; but as time went on the intervals of mental obscurity became more frequent, and the life of "dual loneliness" must have proved more and more irksome.

While brother and sister moved from lodging to lodging, the incessant change of place being a painful necessity, Charles started in his literary career. His early verse was inspired, with that of his friend Coleridge, by the quiet charm and pensive delicacy of W. L. Bowles. It served well to enshrine some of these memories, that always formed the staple of Lamb's original work.

Financial necessities urged Lamb to try his hand at a farce, though his previous Elizabethan experiment, John Woodvil (1802) was much more to his taste. He had, however, little dramatic power, and Mr H— proved no more successful than the poetic play. It was characteristic of Lamb that with critical detachment and unflinching humour he should have seen the weakness of Mr H—, and joined heartily in the hisses that greeted the performance.

Writing about the farce to Hazlitt, he said: "I know you'll be sorry, but never mind. We are determined not to be cast down, I am going to leave off tobacco and then we must thrive. A smoky man must write smoky farces." His friendship at this time with that eccentric philosopher, William Godwin, provided the opportunity for Lamb's first literary success. In 1807, he and Mary wrote the familiar Tales from Shakespeare, Mary undertaking the comedies, Charles the harder task of making the tragedies acceptable and understandable by children. The result was sixty guineas—and fame.

Between 1807 and 1817, Lamb's contributions to literature were frequent and important, though we must think of him during this time as the critic rather than as the intimate essayist.

In 1817 the Lambs left the Temple for Covent Garden, and an interesting chapter in his life was closed, for it was at the Temple where the famous Wednesday evening gatherings took place—at the Temple moreover, where he made so many of his lasting friendships.

The most interesting chapter in his literary life was to start, however, in 1820, when Hazlitt introduced him to the editor of the London Magazine, and the famous Elia essays came into existence.

In the summer of 1823 the Lambs once again migrated yet further north, this time to Islington. Failing health made Lamb consider the question of retirement, and he was delighted when in the spring of 1825 a pension—practically three-quarters of his salary—was awarded him. "After thirty-three years' slavery, here am I a freed man." Thus he wrote to Wordsworth. But the change did not carry with it all the delight he had hoped for. The routine had been irksome, but to an extent with one of his habits, had proved not unsalutary; his unconditional liberty bewildered and confounded him.

Perhaps the loss of some of his best friends weighed upon him also. The fact remains that neither brother nor sister got so much pleasure from this retirement as had been anticipated.

He found the folk at Enfield slow, and too prone to talk about cattle. To relieve his boredom he would indulge in farcically extravagant letters—such as the following to Coventry Patmore:

"Excuse my anxiety, but how is Dash? Are his intellects sound, or does he wander a little in his conversation? All the dogs here are going mad, if you believe the overseers, but I protest they seem to me very rational and collected. Nothing is so deceitful as mad people to those who are not used to them. Try him with hot water, if he won't lick it up it is a sign he doesn't like it. Does his tail wag horizontally or perpendicularly? That has decided the fate of many dogs in Enfield. Has he bit any of the children yet? If he has, have them shot, and keep him as a curiosity."

and so on in the same ridiculous strain.

Mary's health grew worse, the country life that was best for her did not suit Charles. He was ill at ease away from Fleet Street and the ready touch of people for whom he cared.

"The lighted shops of the Strand and Fleet Street; life, awake, if you awake at all, at all hours of the night, the impossibility of being dull in Fleet Street, the crowds, the print shops, the old book-stalls, the pantomime, London itself a pantomime and a masquerade, all these things work themselves into my mind, and feed me without the power of satiating me. The wonder of these nights compels me into night walks about her crowded streets, and I often shed tears for fulness of joy at so much life."

In a letter to another friend, he says

"Aren't you mightily inoped on the banks of the Cam? Had you not better come and set up here? You can't think what a difference, all the streets and pavements are pure gold, I warrant you, at least I know an alchemy that turns her mud into that metal, a mind that loves to be at home in crowds."

The death of Coleridge depressed him, the friendship had been so long and precious a one, and when owing to an accident he fell ill of erysipelas, the disease easily mastered his devitalised body. He passed away painlessly on December 27, 1834, his sister surviving him nearly thirteen years.

HIS WORK

Lamb started as a writer about 1795, when Burke and Gibbon were at the height of their glory, and some years before Scott had given romantic narrative verse its astonishing vogue. He experimented both in prose and verse, sonnet-making, play-writing, with a mild excursion into fiction—Rosamund Gray. Here one may see traces of his as yet undeveloped literary gifts, but the most notable characteristic of this early work is its Elizabethan inspiration, and its power of literary mimicry. Then, in the pot-boiler written by Mary and himself, the Tales from Shakespeare (1807), his Elizabethan affinities are exhibited more fully, and prepare the way for the specimens of English Dramatic Poets who lived about the time of Shakespeare (1808).

The tenderness of Lamb, and his genius for reminiscence, find expression in Mrs Leicester's School and Poetry for Children (1809)—works written also in collaboration and designed for Mrs. Godwin's "Juvenile Library."

For some years he wrote little, but his literary friendships helped to stimulate his slowly maturing powers, and in 1820 he finds in the person of "Elia" the medium best fitted to display his peculiar qualities.

Beginning as a writer, therefore, in the days before the Romantic Revival, he "found himself" in its last phase, when Wordsworth and Coleridge had done their best work, and Keats and Shelley were the great stars in the firmament of poetry.

His verse owes nothing to modern romantic inspiration, it has something of Cowper's tender homeliness, but is more in tune with the wistful Jacobean singers, and has a distinct if not very strong individuality in its gravity and delicacy of touch.

The same gift of pathos, the same delicacy of touch we find in Rosamund Gray, but this little tale, written in Lamb's twenty-third year, is on the whole too timid and conventional in treatment to arouse more than a mild interest. The Tales from Shakespeare, written one year later, show the rapid development of the writer's powers, and testify to the way in which he had steeped himself in Elizabethan literature until he could tell the stories of Shakespeare's plays in childlike language without making them childish—a distinction of the first importance in juvenile literature. Mary Lamb must share with her brother the praise due to this memorable and difficult effort; though it was naturally easier to deal with the comedies than with the tragedies.

Lamb thus explains the principles of his diction:

"Diligent care has been taken to select such words as might least interrupt the effect of the beautiful English tongue in which he wrote, those few words introduced into our language since his time have been as far as possible avoided."

Shakespeare's speech, clarified and simplified, is used with admirable effect. The tales themselves are not sentimentalised, but the passion is presented with the strength and dignity of the old fairy stories, yet with a reticence that keeps back anything that might shock or disturb a child's mind.

Scarcely less excellent, though less popular, is the Adventures of Ulysses. Lamb, like Keats, had been stirred by the voice of Chapman "loud and bold," and his version of the Homeric story is therefore Elizabethan in its dress, rather than Greek. But here again he adheres rigidly to the note of simplicity, and leaves necessarily Chapman's method again and again. It is assuredly not merely a prose version of Chapman, any more than it is a prose version of Homer, but an original and charming blend.

Mrs Leicester's School was written conjointly with his sister. It consists of various tales told by the girls themselves, tender, graceful little things, somewhat conventional in theme, but abounding in that happy gift of reminiscence to be employed amply later on with such inspiring results.

To turn to Lamb's dramatic experiments. John Woodvil, written in 1802, and called originally Pride's Cure, exhibits his power of reproducing the Elizabethan diction, and was sufficiently happy to deceive Godwin, who imagined it to be a genuine old play. But if the dramatic verse has power and beauty, there is little trace of dramatic imagination in the telling of the story.

Of the farce Mr H—, little can be said. It had next to no story, while the form was of the thinnest, and though the play was well acted, nothing could save it. Lamb the playwright deplored the failure; Lamb the critic knew the failure was deserved.

And Lamb's quality as a critic of the first order, was soon after this to make an undeniable appeal. As a result of a commission he produced the famous Specimens of English Dramatic Poets contemporary with Shakespeare. The principle on which these Specimens were selected, is made clear in the preface:

"The kind of extracts which I have sought after have been, not so much passages of wit and humour—though the old plays are rich in such—as scenes of passion, sometimes of the deepest quality, interesting situations, serious descriptions, that which is more nearly allied to poetry than to wit, and to tragic rather than comic poetry. The plays which I made choice of have been with few exceptions those which treat of human life and manners, rather than masques and Arcadian Pastorals, with their train of abstractions, unimpassioned duties, passionate mortals, Claus, and Medorus, and Amintas, and Amaryllis. My leading design has been to illustrate what may be called the moral sense of our ancestors. To show in what manner they felt when they placed themselves by the power of imagination in trying situations, in the conflicts of duty and passion, or the strife of contending duties; what sort of loves and amities theirs were, how their griefs were tempored, and their full-swollen joys abated; how much of Shakespeare shines in the great men his contemporaries, and how far in his divine mind and manners he surpassed them and all mankind."

Shakespeare is taken as the standard by which his contemporaries were to be measured, and this standard was faithfully kept in view and was provocative of some illuminative comparisons. The importance of this volume cannot be over estimated. When it was published, the Elizabethan dramatists were little known to the public at large, and Lamb was the first to sound the note of high praise. Coleridge did not lecture on the Shakespearean drama until three years later, and Hazlitt was still an Elizabethan critic of the future. So we may fairly regard Lamb as the pioneer of the New Criticism.

Together with the Specimens with their notes may be placed Lamb's Essay on the Tragedies of Shakespeare, and that On the Genius and Character of Hogarth. Lamb's qualities as critic are, his gift of luminous enthusiasm, his faculty for distinguishing the human qualities from the academic. But he has neither Hazlitt's breadth of range, nor Coleridge's subtlety of analysis, and he is happier in noting the mountain tops than in estimating the sweep of tableland.

Lamb's work as a critic precedes his work as an essayist, though the essays no less than the letters scintillate in brilliant flashes of criticism. His earlier essay work, between 1811 and 1820, is scarcely up to the level of Leigh Hunt's. The flowering time came in 1820 when "Ella" entered upon his own and started with the South Sea House, rich in observant humour and reminiscent charm.

In 1833, the final fruits of Lamb were gathered together in The Last Essays of Elia.

The genius of Lamb lay in his power of visualising memories. As a stylist does he walk in the past, gathering to himself the pleasant tricks and mannerisms of bygone writers, just as a girl plucks flowers instinctively that blend with her looks and carriage. The blossoms are culled from other men's gardens, but their blending is all Lamb's own. Passing through Lamb's imagination, they become something fresh and individual. His style is a mixture certainly of many styles, but a chemical not a mechanical mixture.

The matter harmonises with the manner. It also belongs to the past, its charm, too, is a retrospective one. In his dearly loved haunts it is the shadow of bygone times that he sees, rather than present actualities, a vanished face, a hushed voice, a recollected gesture, some familiar friend from bookland, the memory of some treasured joyance. But Lamb's memories are not like Wordsworth's, "emotions recollected in tranquillity." He recalls them not to wring from them some spiritual rapture, or eternal significance, but merely as material for his intellect and fancy to play upon. He plays with his thoughts as the wind plays with the leaves, tossing them hither and thither, circling them round in strange eddies, scattering, combining, in all manner of queer ways. Dearly did he love "to chew the cud of a bygone vision," to dally with his dreams, to reinvest the common streets of London, and her well-worn sights, with a glamour of retrospective fantasy.

All the conventional approaches of the Essay are quietly ignored by him. Never was any man more intimate in print than he. He has made of chatter a fine art, for he is curiously easy with no suspicion of vulgarity, simple in his choice of subjects, never trite in his treatment, and he can trifle delicately without being trivial.

A visualiser of memories! Yes, it is this faculty for haunting the past in the familiar habitments of to-day, of suggesting a shadow city beyond the actual London he sketches with such caressing zest, that gives Lamb's method its compelling appeal.

If we analyse their appeal still further we shall see how admirably the atmosphere of his mind reflects the pictures that he conjures up.

"Some things are of that nature as to make one's fancy chuckle while his heart doth ache," wrote Bunyan. The nature of things mostly appealed to Lamb in that way. Humour with him is never far from tragedy, through his tears you may see the rainbow in the sky, for his humour and pathos are really inseparable from one another, they are different facets of the same gem, or to change the simile, one may say that Lamb's moods, whether grave or gay, are equally the natural effervescence of an exquisitely mobile imagination. Whether you call it humour or pathos depends entirely upon where the light may strike the bubbles.

Some, like Carlyle, who did not understand the man, were puzzled and offended by the wildness of some of his verbal extravagances. They looked on them as the irresponsible fooling of a shallow nature, never realising that these absurd antics were but safety-valves for a hypersensitive mind, that had to fight hard for its sanity, on occasion.

It is characteristic of the Romantic writer that he should be confidential. As a rule he tells the world more about himself than he tells his friend. This is due to no morbid egotism, no mere loquacity, it is a necessity of his nature to express himself. In fiction it is the least apparent, because of the exigencies of this particular art form. A novelist may dramatise his moods and experiences, and thus to an extent disguises his self-revelation; but in the essay form the intimate confidential note is the most obtrusive, and the disregard for classical standards and rigidity of form that is peculiar to romantic literature of all kinds, necessarily helps this self-revealing process.

For this reason the Essays of Elia especially, and the critical essays to a less extent, are practically autobiographical fragments, from which we may reconstruct with little difficulty the inner life and no little of the outer life of Lamb.

We may learn of the boyish Charles in Night Fears, and in Christ's Hospital, be introduced to his family in The Old Benchers of the Inner Temple and in My Relations, read of his youthful experiences in Mackery End in Hertfordshire, get a vivid glimpse of his long intimacy with Mary in Mrs. Battle's Opinions, of his official work in The South Sea House, of his sentimental memories in Dream Children, of his prejudices and temptations in Imperfect Sympathies and The Confessions of a Drunkard.

Even in his most irresponsible dalliings there are flashes of self-revelation, and his Popular Fallacies might be described as personal idiosyncrasies in terms of factual humour.

There is no touch of vulgarity in these intimacies; for all their frank unreserve we feel the delicate refinement of the man's spiritual nature, and—paradoxical though it may sound—the continual presence of a fine reticence. If we wish to compare Lamb with another garrulous self-revealer who lacks that fine reticence, we have but to turn to the Confessions of Rousseau. Lamb omits no essential, he does not sentimentalise, and he does not brutalise his memories. He poetises them, preserving them for us in an art that can differentiate between genuine reality and crude realism.

Lamb's Essay work is so individual in its cumulative effect, despite the borrowed ornaments of style, that we cannot place him in any particular school of prose. The formal quality of his work approximates often to the eighteenth-century essay or "Character Sketch" of Addison and Steele, especially Steele. Yet no sooner do we think we detect the hand of Steele, than we find the voice is the voice of Sir Thomas Browne, and no sooner have we caught the echoes of Browne than a richer and intenser music hurries us through the years to the prose utterances of Keats.

Nor is this due in any way to a merely versatile gift of imitableness. Lamb's reminiscences of style are really due to the fact that he is a poet at heart and unconscious suits his manner to his matter. Every essay is in essence a tone poem, set in the proper key and never transgressing it, the variations are many, but never away from the central theme, and its apparent discord resolves itself to a higher harmony. Or to vary the metaphor, we may describe Lamb's discursive papers as arabesques, observing geometrical patterns, seemingly careless but following out cunningly preconceived designs, seemingly digressive but with every by-path leading back unto the high road.

Within the boundaries of his temperament, Lamb was a great critic. His Elizabethan affinities made him a fine interpreter of the beauties of that age; while his insight into the merits of the Jacobean and Caroline dramatists was even more remarkable, even allowing for certain extravagances of praise into which his enthusiasm led him. It was sufficient for him that many Jacobean dramatists were cold-shouldered and ignored, and with the warmth of the partisan he is led to over-emphasize the undoubted beauty and strength scattered over their work.

Comparing his work here with Hazlitt's brilliant and more astrigent criticism, one must admit to a preference for the saner perspective of Hazlitt. Lamb's defence of the Restoration dramatists, on the other hand, is not merely the masterpiece of special pleading that at first sight it appears. It indicates the best possible way for a modern reader to appreciate the mingled wit and innocency of such men as Wycherley and Congreve—and that is not to judge the plays by ordinary human standards at all, nor to measure their trend by the foot-rule of conventional morality, but to look upon the world of the Restoration dramatists as an unreal fantastic world, where the only thing that matters is the intellectual delight of the flash of repartee, or witty illumination of character.

In short, they must be appraised not as emotional human beings but as unmoral puppets. Such an attitude is scarcely possible to the average reader, who is far more likely to endorse the verdict of Macaulay upon these writers, but the mood it postulates for a right enjoyment, is one that has a real and solid value in the realm of literary criticism. Indeed it lies at the root of the difference between comedy and tragedy. Tragedy must be adjudged on the plane of the human passions, it lies at the very heart of life, and is or should be a vital and elemental thing. Comedy is of the head rather than the heart, it plays with ideas, sports with intellectual fancies. If you deny Lamb's way of approach you will miss much of the provocative brilliance in Mr. Bernard Shaw's plays and entirely clude (as many people do) the peculiar genius of Oscar Wilde.

Lamb's appreciation of verse is more limited, less catholic than his appreciation of prose. In dealing with prose, two sides of his nature are brought into operation, the warmly imaginative concrete side that loves the human quality in things, and the cool intellectual relish for incongruities and extravagances. In his own creative work these sides blend and amalgamate, while his basic material is ever the concrete aspect of life, and over the concrete picture tingling with tender emotions and extravagant sympathies he weaves his fantasies, with the deliberate joy of the inventive logician. But when as a critic he turns to poetry, this intellectual, fantastic Lamb disappears, strength and passion, nobility of thought, are the qualities that chiefly move him here. He can admire the austere dignity of Wordsworth and the vigorous sledge-hammer satire of Dryden, but Byron disgusts him and Shelley leaves him cold. It seems strange that he should have found nothing to admire or take pleasure in as regards Byron's work except, as Talfourd tells us, "the apostrophe to Parnassus"; but his attitude to both Byron and Shelley helps us to understand the man's attitude towards poetry and his limitations as a critic. It shows quite clearly that the fantastic dreamer in Elia is not an imaginative or poetic dreamer but an intellectual and logical dreamer, otherwise he would have felt otherwise towards the visionary Shelley and the fanciful mythology of Southey, and would not have welcomed with a shout of joy the intellectually brilliant but coldly imaginative work of the Restoration dramatist.

Keeping this view of Lamb in mind, the whimsical quality of his work and its apparently inconsequential ramblings assume a rather different complexion from that popularly assigned them. The reiterated apostrophes to the "gentle Charles," the references to Lamb as a writer that suggest him as a quaint, soft-hearted prattler, or irresponsible jester, convey a wrong impression of the man's personality. Tender he was, inasmuch as his intense humanity made him tolerant and charitable to those around him, but there was behind the tenderness a stern inflexibility of character. The man who could deliberately put aside his youthful dreams of love, who could set himself to watch over and guard, unremittantly and uncomplainingly, a mentally afflicted sister not for a brief space but for a lifetime, and who could fight so grimly and persistently his own weaknesses, handicapped as he was by something of the same darkness that was always obscuring his sister's life—such a man was not the mild sentimentalist of popular estimation. There is a strain of iron in a nature that could shape his destiny along these lines of self-discipline and disinterested affection, and compel the love and admiration of fiery, impatient souls like Hazlitt.

His very extravagances are not the ebullitions of an irresponsible personality but the distractions of a strong and afflicted one. The jester does not frolic out of lightness of heart, but to escape from the gloom that might otherwise crush.

Thus may we leave him, reserved beneath all his confidences, serious behind all his whimsical gaieties; true and steadfast at the back of his wilful caprices—a strong, lovable, human soul.

THE OLD FAMILIAR FACES

I have had playmates, I have had companions,
In my days of childhood, in my joyful school-days—
All, all are gone, the old familiar faces.

I have been laughing, I have been carousing,
Drinking late, sitting late, with my bosom cronies—
All, all are gone, the old familiar faces.

I loved a Love once, fairest among women,
Closed are her doors to me, I must not see her—
All, all are gone, the old familiar faces.

I have a friend, a kinder friend has no man,
Like an ingrate, I left my friend abruptly,
Left him, to muse on the old familiar faces.

Ghost-like I paced round the haunts of my childhood,
Earth seem'd a desert I was bound to traverse,
Seeking to find the old familiar faces.

Friend of my bosom, thou more than a brother,
Why wert not thou born in my father's dwelling?
So might we talk of the old familiar faces—

How some they have died, and some they have left me,
And some are taken from me, all are departed—
All, all are gone, the old familiar faces.

GRACE BEFORE MEAT

I own that I am disposed to say grace upon twenty other occasions in the course of the day besides my dinner. I want a form for setting out upon a pleasant walk, for a moonlight ramble, for a friendly meeting, or a solved problem. Why have we none for books, those spiritual repeats—a grace before Milton—a grace before Shakespeare—a devotional exercise proper to be said before reading the Fairy Queen?—but the received ritual having prescribed these forms to the solitary ceremony of manducation, I shall confine my observations to the experience which I have had of the grace, properly so called. The form, then, of the benediction before eating has its beauty at a poor man's table, or at the simple and unprovocative repast of children. It is here that the grace becomes exceedingly graceful. The indigent man, who hardly knows whether he shall have a meal the next day or not, sits down to his fare with a present sense of the blessing, which can be but feebly acted by the rich, into whose minds the conception of wanting a dinner could never, but by some extreme theory, have entered. The proper end of food—the animal sustenance—is barely contemplated by them. The poor man's bread is his daily bread, literally his bread for the day . . .

When I have sate (a rarus hospes) at rich men's tables, with the savoury soup and messes steaming up the nostrils, and moistening the lips of the guests with desire and a distracted choice, I have felt the introduction of that ceremony to be unseasonable. With the various organs upon you, it seems impertinent to interpose a religious sentiment. It is a confusion of purpose to mutter out praises from a mouth that waters. The heat of epicurism puts out the gentle flame of devotion . . .

I hear somebody exclaim,—Would you have Christians sit down at table like hogs to their troughs, without remembering the Giver?—No—I would have them sit down as Christians, remembering the Giver, and less like hogs.

A QUAKERS' MEETING

Reader, would'st thou know what true peace and quiet mean, would'st thou find a refuge from the noises and clamours of the multitude, would'st thou enjoy at once solitude and society, would'st thou possess the depth of thine own spirit in stillness, without being shut out from the consolatory faces of thy species, would'st thou be alone and yet accompanied, solitary, yet not desolate, singular, yet not without some to keep thee in countenance—a unit in aggregate, a simple in composite—come with me into a Quakers' Meeting.

Dost thou love silence deep as that "before the winds were made"? go not out into the wilderness, descend not into the profundities of the earth, shut not up thy casements, nor pour wax into the little cells of thy ears, with little-faith'd self-mistrusting Ulysses. Retire with me into a Quakers' Meeting.

For a man to refrain even from good words, and to hold his peace, it is commendable, but for a multitude it is great mastery.

What is the stillness of the desert compared with this place? what the uncommunicating muteness of fishes?—here the goddess reigns and revels—Boreas, and Cæcias and Argestes loud" do not with their interconfounding uproars more augment the brawl nor the waves of the blown Baltic with their clubb'd sounds—than their opposite (Silence her sacred self) is multiplied and rendered more intense by numbers, and by sympathy. She too hath her deeps, that call unto deeps. Negation itself hath a positive more or less; and closed eyes would seem to obscure the great obscurity of midnight.

There are wounds which an imperfect solitude cannot heal. By imperfect I mean that which a man enjoyeth by himself. The perfect is that which he can sometimes attain in crowds, but nowhere so absolutely as in a Quakers' Meeting. Those first hermits did certainly understand this principle, when they retired into Egyptian solitudes, not singly, but in shoals, to enjoy one another's want of conversation. The Carthusian is bound to his brethren by this agreeing spirit of incommunicativeness. In secular occasions, what so pleasant as to be reading a book through a long winter evening with a friend sitting by—say, a wife—he, or she too (if that be probable), reading another without interruption, or oral communication?—can there be no sympathy without the gabble of words?—away with this inhuman, shy, single, shade-and-cavern-haunting solitariness. Give me, Muster Zimmerman a sympathetic solitude.

WITCHES, AND OTHER NIGHT FEARS

From my childhood I was extremely inquisitive about witches and witch-stories. My maid and more legendary aunt supplied me with good store. But I shall mention the accident which directed my curiosity originally into this channel. In my father's book-closet the history of the Bible by Stackhouse occupied a distinguished station. The pictures with which it abounds—one of the ark, in particular, and another of Solomon's Temple, delineated with all the fidelity of ocular admeasurement, as if the artist had been upon the spot—attracted my childish attention. There was a picture, too, of the Witch raising up Samuel, which I wish that I had never seen. We shall come to that hereafter. Stackhouse is in two huge tomes; and there was a pleasure in removing folios of that magnitude, which, with infinite straining, was as much as I could manage, from the situation which they occupied upon an upper shelf. I have not met with the work from that time to this, but I remember it consisted of Old Testament stories, orderly set down, with the objection appended to each story, and the solution of the objection regularly tacked to it. The objection was a summary of whatever difficulties had been opposed to the credibility of the history by the shrewdness of ancient or modern infidelity, drawn up with an almost complimentary excess of candour. The solution was brief, modest, and satisfactory. The bane and antidote were both before you. To doubts so put, and so quashed, there seemed to be an end for ever. The dragon lay dead, for the foot of the voracious babe to trample on. But—like as was rather feared than realised from that slain monster in Spenser—from the womb of those crushed errors young dragons would creep, exceeding the prowess of so tender a Saint George as myself to vanquish. The habit of expecting objections to every passage set me upon starting more objections, for the glory of finding a solution of my own to them. I became staggered and perplexed, a sceptic in ling-coats. The pretty Bible stories which I had read, or heard read in church, lost their purity and sincerity of impression, and were turned into so many historic or chronologic theses to be defended against whatever impugnors. I was not to dishonour them but—the next thing to that—I was to be quite sure that some one or other would or had disbelieved them. Next to making a child an infidel is the letting him know that there are infidels at all. Credulity is the man's weakness, but the child's strength. O, how ugly sound scriptural doubts from the mouth of a babe and a suckling!—I should have lost myself in these mazes, and have perished away, I think, with such unfit sustenance as these husks afforded, but for a fortunate piece of ill-fortune which about this time befell me. Turning over the picture of the ark with too much haste, I unhappily made a breach in its ingenuous fabric—driving my inconsiderate fingers right through the two larger quadrupeds, the elephant and the camel, that stare (as well they might) out of the two last windows next the steerage in that unique piece of naval architecture. Stackhouse was henceforth locked up, and became an interdicted treasure. With the book, the objections and solutions gradually cleared out of my head, and have seldom returned since in any force to trouble me. But there was an impression which I had imbibed from Stackhouse which no lock or bar could shut out, and which was destined to try my childish nerves rather more seriously—That detestable picture!

I was dreadfully alive to nervous terrors. The night-time, solitude, and the dark, were my hell. The sufferings I endured in this nature would justify the expression. I never laid my head on my pillow, I suppose, from the fourth to the seventh or eighth year of my life—so far as memory serves in things so long ago—without an assurance, which realised its own prophecy, of seeing some frightful spectre. So old Stackhouse then acquitted in part, if I say, that to the picture of the Witch raising up Samuel—(O that old man covered with a mantle!)—I owe—not my midnight terrors, the hell of my infancy—but the shape and manner of their visitation. It was he who dressed up for me a hag that nightly sate upon my pillow—a sure bedfellow, when my aunt or my maid was far from me. All day long, while the book was permitted me, I dreamed waking over his delineation, and at night (if I may use so bold an expression) awoke into sleep, and found the vision true. I durst not, even in the daylight, once enter the chamber where I slept, without my face turned to the window, averely from the bed where my witch-ridden pillow was. Parents do not know what they do when they leave tender babes alone to go to sleep in the dark. The feeling about for a friendly arm—the hoping for a familiar voice—when they awake screaming—and find none to soothe them—what a terrible shaking it is to their poor nerves! The keeping them up till midnight, through candle-light and the unwholesome hours, as they are called, would, I am satisfied, in a medical point of view, prove the better caution.

THAT WE SHOULD LIE DOWN WITH THE LAMB

We could never quite understand the philosophy of this arrangement, or the wisdom of our ancestors in sending us for instruction to these woolly bedfellows. A sheep, when it is dark, has nothing to do but to shut its silly eyes and sleep if he can. Man found out long ago—Hail, candle-light! without disparagement to sun or moon, the kindest luminary of the three—if we may not rather style thee their radiant deputy, mild viceroy of the moon!—We live to read, talk, sit silent, eat, drink, sleep, by candle-light. They are everybody's sun and moon. This is our peculiar and household planet. Wanting at what savage unsocial nights must our ancestors have spent, wintering in caves and unilluminated fastnesses? They must have lain about and grumbled at one another in the dark. What repartees could have passed, when you must have felt about for a smile and handled a neighbour's cheek to be sure that he understood it? Jokes came in with candles. We wonder how they saw to pick up a pin, if they had any. How did they sup? what a mélange of chance carving they must have made of it?—here one had got a leg of a goat when he wanted a horse's shoulder—there another had dipped his scooped palm in a kid-skin of wild honey, when he meditated right marro's milk. There is neither good eating nor drinking in fresco. Who, even in these civilized times, has never experienced this, when at some economic table he has commenced dining after dusk, and waited for the flavour till the lights came? The senses absolutely give and take reciprocally. Can you tell pork from veal in the dark? Take away the candle from the smoking man, by the glimmering of the left ashes he knows that he is still smoking, but he knows it only by an inference; till the restored light, coming in aid of the olfactory, reveals to both senses the full aroma.

WILLIAM HAZLITT (1778-1830)

William Hazlitt, son of a Unitarian minister of Irish blood, was born at Maidstone in 1778, and nurtured in the keen atmosphere of progressive thought. Social and political problems preoccupied him as a youth, and he paid more attention to these matters than to theology, which annoyed his tutors at the Unitarian College. It was soon quite obvious that the ministry for which he had been intended exercised no compelling interest upon his energies, and he gave up the idea of becoming a minister. From Radical politics he plunged into philosophy and studied the philosophic thinkers of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries.

Hitherto the intellectual life had been fostered somewhat at the expense of the imaginative, but in 1796 Burke's Letter to a Noble Lord arrested his attention, and the rich eloquence fascinated him. The influence of Burke was reinforced by the yet greater influence of Coleridge in 1798, and Hazlitt's account of their first meeting is written in his happiest vein. Clearly it was a spiritual crisis in his life.

"I was at that time dumb, inarticulate," he wrote, "but now my ideas float on winged words." He had little thought of earning a livelihood by literature, however, at this time, despite his ambition to write an essay on the Principles of Human Action, and tried to earn a living as a portrait painter.

In 1807 he published some political essays, including a reply to Malthus, and in 1808 married Miss

Stoddart, and went to live at Winter Stow in Wiltshire.

Meanwhile portrait painting had chiefly occupied him. In 1802 he had gone to Paris to study art, and despite the fact that financial straits and unusually cold weather made this sojourn a trying and exacting one, his tremendous enthusiasm, and youthful capacity for extracting joy out of life, made the stay a happy and agreeable one.

On his return he became an itinerant portrait painter, which suited his tastes, if it did not fill his pocket. He loved tramping over the roads, and he had plenty of self-confidence and sufficient ability to get work of a kind. He was more fortunate with his rich manufacturers than with his poets. Southey compared his picture of Coleridge with a "horse-dealer on his trial, evidently guilty, but clever enough to have a chance of getting off," while Wordsworth's portrait was stated by another critic to be like "a criminal on the gallows deeply affected by a fate he held to be deserved."

Hazlitt bore these criticisms with good humour, perhaps he did not take his art very seriously, and was only too delighted when after receiving a small commission he could dine on sausages and mashed potatoes, "a noble dish for strong stomachs."

Hazlitt certainly loved his work, and his Essay on the Pleasures of Painting lets us into his state of mind at this period.

"The first head I ever tried to paint was an old woman with the upper part of the face shaded by her bonnet, and I certainly laboured at it with great perseverance. It took me numberless sittings to do it. I have it by me still, and sometimes look at it with surprise, to think how much pains were thrown away to little purpose, yet not altogether in vain if it taught me to see good in everything, and to know that there is nothing vulgar in Nature seen with the eye of science or of true art. Refinement creates beauty everywhere, it is the grossness of the spectator that discovers nothing but grossness in the object. Be this as it may, I spared no pains to do my best. If art was long, I thought that life was so too at that moment."

His last portrait, and one of his best, was that of Charles Lamb, now to be seen in the National Portrait Gallery.

In 1805 he abandoned painting as a profession, and for the time gave his best energies to literature.

Previous to his marriage with Jane Stoddart, he had figured in various rural love affairs, in one of which he narrowly escaped ducking in the village pond. Amorous by nature and susceptible to feminine charms, he was continually falling in and out of love, and his marriage with Miss Stoddart was not such a love match as to absorb all of Hazlitt's emotional nature.

In 1812 Hazlitt came up from Wiltshire and settled in London, first of all in 19 York Street, Westminster, where Milton had lived for some years; he gave lectures on philosophy at the Russell Institution in Bloomsbury, and wrote for the Morning Chronicle and Examiner. He was Parliamentary reporter at first, and then became dramatic reporter. Both experiences enriched his position as a writer; the House of Commons with its flights of oratory and ad captandum appeals; the theatre, by stimulating his liking for dramatic literature. But he was less of a theatrical critic than a dramatic critic, he judged a play rather by its literary qualities than its stage effectiveness.

Meanwhile his married life was no smooth one. His wife was matter-of-fact and angular in character, and a poor housewife. Hazlitt found no congenial life at home, sought for it elsewhere, and found it in the friendship of Lamb. Lamb understood him better than most men, and discerned sterling qualities beneath his moodiness and capricious temper. Hazlitt's tastes were simple and inexpensive, and it was chiefly due to this rather than to any domestic economy on the part of Mrs. Hazlitt, that he got along so tolerably as he did, for his finances were never otherwise than modest.

He lectured in 1818 at the Surrey Institution on the English Poets, and those lectures met with better success than his previous ones. Talfourd's account of the lectures gives us an excellent idea of Hazlitt's method and reception.

"Mr. Hazlitt delivered three courses of lectures at the Surrey Institution, to the matter of which we have repeatedly alluded—on 'The English Poets,' on 'The English Comic Writers,' and on 'The Age of Elizabeth'—before audiences with whom he had but 'an imperfect sympathy.' They consisted chiefly of Disraelis, who agreed with him in his hatred of Lord Castlereagh but who 'loved no plays'; of Quakers who approved him as the opponent of Slavery and Capital Punishment, but who 'heard no music'; of citizens devoted to the main chance, who had a hankering after 'the improvement of the mind,' but to whom his favourite doctrine of its natural disinterestedness was a riddle; of a few enemies, who came to sneer, and a few friends, who were eager to learn and to admire. The comparative insensibility of the bulk of his audience to his finest passages sometimes provoked him to awaken their attention by points which broke the train of his discourse, after which he could make himself amends by some abrupt paradox which might set their prejudices on edge and make them fancy they were shocked. He startled many of them at the onset by observing that since Jacob's dream 'the heavens have gone further off and become astronomical' a fine extravagance, which the ladies and gentlemen who had grown astronomical themselves under the preceding lecturer felt called on to resent as an attack on their severer studies. When he read a well-known extract from Cowper, comparing a poor cottager with Voltaire and had pronounced the line 'a truth the brilliant Frenchman never knew,' they broke into a joyous shout of self-gratulation, and they were so much wiser than a wicked Frenchman. When he passed by Mrs. Hannah More with observing that 'she had written a great deal which he had never read,' a voice gave expression to the general commiseration and surprise by calling out 'More pity for you!' They were confounded at his reading with more emphasis perhaps than discretion. Gay's epigrammatic lines on Sir Richard Blackmore, in which scriptural persons are freely hatched into rhyme, but he went doggedly on to the end, and, by his perseverance baffled those who, if he acknowledged himself wrong by stopping, would have hushed him without mercy. He once had an edifying advantage over them. He was enumerating the humanities which endeared Dr. Johnson to his mind, and at the close of an agreeable catalogue mentioned, as last and noblest, his 'carrying the poor victim of disease and dissipation on his back through Fleet Street,' at which a titter arose from some, who were struck by the picture as ludicrous, and a murmur from others, who deemed the allusion unfit for ears polite. He paused for an instant, and then added in his sturdiest and most impressive manner, 'an act which realises the parable of the Good Samaritan,' at which his moral and delicate hearers shrank rebuked into deep silence. He was not eloquent in the true sense of the term, for his thoughts were too weighty to be moved along by the shallow stream of feeling which an evening's excitement can arouse. He wrote all his lectures, and read them as they were written; but his deep voice and earnest manner suited his matter well. He seemed to dig into his subject—and not in vain. In delivering his longer quotations, he had scarcely continuity enough for his verification of Shakespeare and Milton, 'with linked sweetness long drawn out', but he gave Pope's brilliant satire and divine compliments, which are usually complete within the couplet, with an elegance and point which the poet himself would have felt as their highest praise."

In 1819 his wife and he had separated, and in 1823 they were divorced. Between this period came the episode of the "cold and sullen" Miss Walker and Hazlitt's mad infatuation for her. This episode he afterwards turned to literary account in the Liber Amoris, a brilliant though morbid piece of work. Undeterred by his unhappy matrimonial experience and by his chronic ill success as a porripatetic lover, Hazlitt married in 1824 a widow lady whom he had met for the first time in a stage coach. With her Hazlitt travelled abroad, and seems to have enjoyed his travels more than he did his wife's companionship, judging by the negative part she plays in his literary record. In Florence, Hazlitt made the acquaintance of Landor, and the two men, who had no little in common, got on excellently well.

During the return journey the second Mrs Hazlitt left her husband, and they never lived together again.

During the next few years some of his finest essay work was published. But about 1828 his health, that had been always indifferent, became worse, and his last few years were darkened by physical disabilities and money troubles. But he continued writing gamely up to the very end, despite all the miseries of gastric inflammation. His mind was clear and vigorous despite his enfeebled body, and when dying he remarked to his friend Proctor, "Well, I've had a very happy life."

HIS WORK

Hazlitt's intellectual awakening came on that eventful morning when he listened to the talk of Coleridge: "The light of his genius shone into my soul, like the sun's rays glittering in the puddles of the road." This was in 1798. His earlier literary labour had been chiefly philosophical; and formal at that. He had not, as yet, found individuality of style, nor the kind of work in which he could amply and characteristically express himself. The first taste of the real Hazlitt is not to be found in his political pamphleteering (Free Thoughts in Public Affairs, 1806), nor in his Principles of Human Action, nor his Reply to Malthus, but in the vivid portraits of Walpole and others that served to introduce "the eloquence of the British Senate"; while his work as a dramatic critic, even his experience in art, served as a valuable apprenticeship to the Hazlitt of the Table Talk and The Characters of Shakespeare's Plays.

Between 1816 and 1822 Hazlitt had passed through the experimental stage and reached to maturity. His Shakespearean criticism, rich in incisive vigour and freshness of imagination, his English Poets (1818) and English Comic Writers

(1819), caustic in wit yet with the salt of true critical wisdom, his Dramatic Literature of the Age of Elizabeth, with its fine catholicity of taste—all these are memorable additions to English critical literature. Captious at times (it would not otherwise be Hazlitt), they none the less exhibit an astonishing vitality of thought, a pungency of expression, unexcelled even among the great names of English criticism. With a large measure of Dryden's freshness and acumen he combines the romantic fervour of Coleridge. f

As a critic of Elizabethan literature he is more reliable but less eclectic than Lamb. The Round Table (1817), and Table Talk (1821-22), exhibit more particularly his aphoristic power. He forgets his domestic troubles, his infirmities of health, and plunges with keen and warm delight into the sea of literature, relishing the buffeting of the billows, contending hilariously with the cross currents, pursuing, with the joy of the discursive mind, every vagrant eddy and tributary stream.

In 1823 came the Liber Amoris. Despite its psychological power, this record of his violently morbid attachment for Sarah Walker is unworthy of his great reputation. But great things were still before him. In his book of maxims, Characteristics, he does but mark time, in his Notes of a Journey through France and Italy (1820) he gives us some of his best things on the Fine Arts, while The Plain Speaker (1826) shows him at his mellowest as a discursive essayist. Then came the Spirit of the Age (1825), where his scintillating humour reaches its highest point of ironical invective. As a piece of brilliant literary portraiture, the book is a masterpiece. After this he did nothing of the first order, for his Life of Napoleon is a dull and lifeless thing. But when he died at fifty-two he might well look back with a certain fierce complacency at what he had achieved. Whether as a discursive essayist, a critic of the arts, or a taster of books, he is supremely excellent.

Wordsworth claimed for imaginative vision an inner veracity, a power of penetrating to the root of things, but it was Coleridge who first appropriated this faculty of the imagination for critical purposes. Thus he made criticism, no less than poetry, a creative art. Hazlitt was his lineal successor in criticism, and if less penetrating in insight he yet transcended his master in lucidity and incisive vigour. Hazlitt's personality was a complex one. There are two strongly marked opposing tendencies in his nature that called for no ordinary power of co-ordination. On one side we have the austere, individualistic Puritan strain that came from his Presbyterian forefathers, on the other a sensuous, voluptuous strain that often ran athwart his Puritanism and occasioned him many a mental struggle. The general effect of these two elements in his nature was this: in matters of the intellect the Puritan was uppermost, in the realm of the emotions you felt the dominant presence of the opposing element.

In his finest essays one feels the presence at once of the Calvinist and the Epicurean, not as two incompatibles, but as opposing elements that have blent together into a noble unity, would-be rivals that have co-ordinated so that from each the good has been extracted, and the less worthy sides eliminated. Thus the sweetness of the one and the strength of the other have combined to give more distinction and power to the utterance.

Take this passage from one of his lectures :

"The poet of nature is one who, from the elements of beauty, of power, and of passion in his own breast, sympathises with whatever is beautiful, and grand, and impassioned in nature, in its simple majesty, in its immediate appeal to the senses, to the thoughts and hearts of all men ; so that the poet of nature, by the truth, and depth, and harmony of his mind, may be said to hold communion with the very soul of nature, to be identified with, and to foreknow, and to record, the feelings of all men, at all times and places, as they are liable to the same impressions, and to exert the same power over the minds of his readers that nature does. He sees things in their eternal beauty, for he sees them as they are, he feels them in their universal interest, for he feels them as they affect the first principles of his and our common nature. Such was Homer, such was Shakespeare, whose works will last as long as nature, because they are a copy of the indestructible forms and everlasting impulses of nature, welling out from the bosom as from a perennial spring, or stamped upon the senses by the hand of their Maker. The power of the imagination in them is the representative power of all nature. It has its centre in the human soul, and makes the circuit of the universe."

And thus :

"The child is a poet, in fact, when he first plays at hide-and-seek, or repeats the story of Jack the Giant-killer, the shepherd boy is a poet when he first crowns his mistress with a garland of flowers, the countryman when he stops to look at the rainbow, the city apprentice when he gazes after the Lord Mayor's show, the miser when he hugs his gold, the courtier who builds his hopes upon a smile, the savage who paints his idol with blood, the slave who worships a tyrant, or the tyrant who fancies himself a god, the vain, the ambitious, the proud, the choleric man, the hero and the coward, the beggar and the king, the rich and the poor, the young and the old, all live in a world of their own making, and the poet does no more than describe what all the others think and act."

"Poetry is not a branch of authorship, it is the stuff of which our life is made."

The artist is speaking in Hazlitt, but beneath the full, rich exuberance of the artist you can detect an undernote of austerity.

Then, again, his memorable utterance about the Dissenting minister from one of his essays on Court Influence :

"A Dissenting minister is a character not so easily to be dispensed with and whose place cannot be well supplied. It is a pity that this character has worn itself out, that that pulse of thought and feeling has ceased almost to beat in the heart of the nation, who, if not remarkable for sincerity and plain downright well-meaning, are remarkable for nothing. But we have known some such, in happier days, who had been brought up and lived from youth to age in the one constant belief in God and of His Christ, and who thought 'all other things but dress compared with the glory to be hereafter revealed.' Their youthful hopes and vanity had been mortified in them even in their boyish days, by the neglect and supercilious regards of the world ; and they turned to look into their own minds for something else to build their hopes and confidence upon. They were true priests. They set up an image in their own minds—it was truth ; they worshipped an idol there—it was justice. They looked on man as their brother, and only bowed the knee to the Highest. Separate from the world, they walked humbly with their God, and lived in thought with those who had borne testimony of a good conscience, with the spirits of just men in all ages. . . . Their sympathy was not with the oppressors, but the oppressed. They cherished in their thoughts—and wished to transmit to their posterity—those rights and privileges for asserting which their ancestors had bled on scaffolds, or had pined in dungeons, or in foreign prisons. Their creed, too, was 'Glory to God, peace on earth, goodwill to man.' This creed, since profaned and rendered vile, they kept fast through good report and evil report. This belief they had, that looks at something out of itself, fixed as the stars, deep as the firmament ; that makes of its own heart an altar to truth, a place of worship for what is right, at which it does reverence with praise and prayer like a holy thing, apart and content ; that feels that the greatest Being in the universe is always near it, and that all things work together for the good of His creatures, under His guiding hand. This covenant they kept, as the stars keep their courses, the principle they stuck by, for want of knowing better, as it sticks by them to this last. It grows with their growth, it does not wither in their decay. It lives when the almond tree flourishes, and is not bowed down with the tottering knees. It glimmers with the last feeble eyesight, smiles in the faded cheek like infancy, and lights a path before them to the grave."

Here is a man of Puritan lineage speaking, but is it the voice of Puritanism only ? Surely it is a Puritanism softened and refined, a Puritanism which is free of those harsh and unpleasing elements that have too often obscured its finer aspects. I know of no passage in his writings which for spacious eloquence, nobleness of thought, beauty of expression can rival this. It was written in 1818, when Hazlitt was forty years old, and in the plenitude of his powers.

But the power of co-ordination was not always exerted, perhaps not always possible. There are times when the Puritan element disappears, and it is Hazlitt the eager, curious taster of life that is presented to us. For there was the restless inquisitiveness of the literary vagabond about him. This gives such delightful piquancy to many of his utterances. He wanders far and wide, and is willing to go anywhere for a fresh sensation that may add to the flavour of his intellectual life. He has no patience with readers who will not quit their own small back gardens. He is for ranging "over the hills and far away."

No sympathy he with the readers who take timid constitutionalism in literature, choosing only the well-worn paths. He is a true son of the road, the world is before him, and high roads and byways, rough paths and smooth paths, are equally acceptable, provided they add to his zest and enjoyment.

Not that he cares for the new merely because it is new. The essay On Reading Old Books is proof enough of that. A literary rambler must not merely be novel, it must have some element of beauty about it, or he will revisit the old haunts of whose beauty he has full cognizance.

Appreciative as he is of primal qualities, of sincerity and simplicity, he has not the patience of Wordsworth to disengage these things from the unattractive aspects of rural life. He cannot forgive dullness, and is far more alive to the failings of country people than to their solid merits.

"All country people hate one another," he says. "They have so little comfort that they envy their neighbours the smallest pleasure and advantage, and nearly grudge themselves the necessities of life. From not being accustomed to enjoyment, they become hardened and averse to it—stupid, for want of thought, selfish, for want of society."

No it is the sheer joy of being in the open, and learning what Whitman called "the profound lesson of reception" that attracted Hazlitt. "What I like best," he declares, "is to lie whole mornings on a sunny bank on Salisbury Plain without any object before me, neither knowing nor caring how time passes, and thus with light-winged toys and feathered idleness, to melt down hours to moments." A genuine vagabond mood this.

Hazlitt, like De Quincey, had felt the glamour of the city as well as the glamour of the country, not with the irresistibility of Lamb, but for all that potently. Yet an instinct for the open, the craving for pleasant spaces, and the longing of the hard-driven journalist for the gracious leisure of the country, these things were paramount with both Hazlitt and De Quincey.

In Hazlitt's case there is a touch of wildness, a more primal delight in the roughness and solitude of country places than we find in De Quincey.

"One of the pleasantest things," says Hazlitt, in true vagabond spirit, "is going on a journey, but I like to go by myself."

He justifies his feeling thus with an engaging frankness.

"The soul of a journey is liberty, perfect liberty to think, feel. Do just as one pleases. We go a journey chiefly to be free of all impediments, and of all inconveniences, to leave ourselves behind, much more to get rid of others. It is hard if I cannot start some game on these lone heath. I laugh I run I leap, I sing for joy. From the point of a sander rolling cloud I plunge into my past being and revel there, as the sunburnt Indian plunges headlong into the wave that wafts him to his native shore. Then, long-forgotten things like 'sunken wrack and sunless treasures' burst upon my eager sight, and I begin to feel, think, and be myself again."

Moody as he was at times, sour-tempered and whimsical as he could be, yet there was a fine quality of joy about Hazlitt. It is this quality of joy that gives his sparkle and relish to his essays. He took the same joy in his books as in his walks, and he communicates this joy to the reader. He appears misanthropic at times, and rages violently at the world, but it is merely a passing gust of feeling, and when over, it is easy to see how superficial it was, so little is his general attitude affected by it.

Trying beyond doubt as was the wayward element in Hazlitt's disposition to his friends, it is not without its charm, as a literary characteristic. His bitterness against Coleridge in his later years leads him to dwell the longer upon the earlier meetings, upon the Coleridge of Wem and Nethor Stowey, and thus his very prejudices leave his readers frequently as gainers.

A passing whim, a transient resentment, will be the occasion of some finely discursive essay on abstract virtues and vices. And, after all there is at bottom such noble enthusiasm in the man, and whose his subjects were not living people, and his judgment is not blinded by some small prejudices, how fair, how just, how large and admirable his view. His faults and failings were of such a character as to bring upon the owner their own retribution. He paid heavily for his mistakes. His splenetic moods and his violent dislikes arose not from a want of sensibility, but from an excess of sensibility. So I do not think they need seriously disturb us. After all, the dagger he uses as a critic is uncommonly like a stage weapon, and does no serious damage.

Better even than his brilliant, suggestive, if capricious criticisms, are his discursive essays on men and things. Those abound in a tonic wisdom, a breadth of imagination as welcome as they are rare.

Although Hazlitt gave up the brush, he never gave up painting, and his brilliant audacities in prose have survived his experiments in pigment.

Shy and reserved as he was, no one could be more confidential with a pen in hand. Every essay is a fragment of autobiography and every sentence a confession. There is something of Rousseau's sentimental garrulousness about Hazlitt, and this increases the human interest of his writings. We may dissent from his conclusions, or take exception to certain moods, but he never bores us.

As examples of his powers of portraiture a passage or so from his papers on Wordsworth and Tom Moore will suffice. Here we shall find mingled honey and gall.

What could be better than the eulogium of Wordsworth:

"He gathers manna in the wilderness, he strikes the barren rock for the quaking moisture. He elevates the mean by the strength of his own aspirations; he clothes the naked with beauty and grandeur from the stores of his own recollections. No city press grove lends him verse with funeral song, but his imagination lends a sense of joy

"To the bare trees and mountains bare,
And grass in the green fields."

No storm, no shipwreck smites us by its horrors, but the rainbow lifts its head in the clouds and the breeze sighs through the withered fern. No sad vicissitude of Fate, no overwhelming catastrophe in Nature deforms his page; but the dewdrop glitters on the bending flower, the tear collects in the glazing eye. As the lark ascends from its low bed and salutes the morning skies, so Mr. Wordsworth's unpretending muse in russet guise scales the summit of reflection, while it makes the round earth its footstool and its home."

But the man who wrote these honeyed words could write also words of gall, as that genial but certainly second-rate poet, Tom Moore, found to his cost. It would be hard to deny the truth of the criticism, despite its almost brutal frankness.

"Mr. Moore has a little mistaken the art of poetry for the cosmetic art. He makes out an inventory of beauty, the smile on the lips, the dimple on the cheeks, item golden locks, item a pair of blue wings, and thinks it a character and story. This dissipated, fulsome, painted patchwork style may succeed in the levity and languor of the boudoir, but it is not the style of Parnassus nor a passport to immortality. We cannot except the Irish melodies from the same criticism. If these national airs do indeed express the soul of impassioned feeling in his countrymen, the case of Ireland is hopeless. There are no tones to awaken liberty, to console humanity. Mr. Moore converts the wild harp of Erin into a musical snuff-box."

More interesting, however, than these clever portraits, are his Miscellaneous Essays and Table Talk, as they enable the writer better to display his wit, fancy, and originality of thought. How profoundly suggestive is his essay on Cant and Hypocrisy. The following fragment may convey some idea of the line of thought, but the essay must be read in its entirety to be fully appreciated.

"We often see that a person condemns in another the very thing he is guilty of himself. Is this hypocrisy? Not necessarily (is Hazlitt's reply). If he really feels none of the disgust and abhorrence he expresses, this is quackery and impudence. But if he really expresses what he feels then this is not hypocrisy, but want of strength in the moral sense. All morality consists in squaring one's actions and sentiments to one's ideas of what is fit and proper, and it is the incessant struggle and alternate triumph of the two principles that is one great source of all the good and evil in the world. The mind of man is like a clock that is always running down and requires to be as constantly wound up. The ideal principle is the master key that winds it up, and without which it will come to a stand. A man is only a thorough hypocrite when he has not even the wish to be what he appears. Anyone may yield to temptation and yet feel a sincere love and aspiration after virtue. The hypocrisy of priests has been a butt for ridicule in all ages, but I am not sure that there has not been more wit than philosophy in it. I cannot admit that though he may exaggerate or even make an ostentatious display of religion and virtue through habit and spiritual pride, that this is a proof he has not those sentiments in his heart, or that his whole behaviour is the mere acting of a part. One of the finest remarks that has been made in modern times is that of Lord Shaftesbury, that there is no such thing as a perfect Theist or an absolute Atheist, that whatever may be the general conviction entertained on the subject, the evidence is not, and cannot be at all times equally present to the mind, that, even if it were we are not in the same humour to perceive it, a fit of gout, a shower of rain, shake our best established conclusions. The grossness of religion and its sticking for mere forms as its essence have given a handle, and a just one, to impugnors. At the Feast of Ramadan, says Voltaire, the Mussulmans wash and pray five times a day and then fall to cutting one another's throats again with the greatest deliberation and goodwill. The two things, I grant, are sufficiently at variance, but they are, I contend, equally sincere in both. Thus, though I think there is very little downright hypocrisy in the world, I do think there is a good deal of cant. Though few people have the face to set up for the very thing they in their hearts despise, we almost all want to be thought better than we are and affect a greater admiration or abhorrence of certain things than we really feel. Cant is the voluntary overcharging or prolongation of a real sentiment, hypocrisy is the setting up a pretension to a feeling you never had and have no wish for. There are people who are made up of cant but who have not sincerity enough to be hypocrites that is, have not hearty dislike or contempt enough of anything to give the lie to their puling profession of admiration and esteem for it."

Again: what could be truer in substance and more striking in treatment than this, from another essay On Vulgarity and Affectation?

"A thing is not vulgar merely because it is common. . . . Nothing is vulgar that is natural, spontaneous, unavoidable. Grossness is not vulgarity, ignorance is not vulgarity; awkwardness is not vulgarity, but all these become vulgar when they are affected and shown off on the authority of others, or to fall in with the fashion or the company we keep. Caliban is coarse enough, but surely he is not vulgar. We might as well spurn the clod under our feet and call it vulgar. Cobbett is coarse enough, but he is not vulgar. . . . Nothing original, nothing real can be vulgar. The upper are not wiser than the lower orders, because they resolve to differ from them. The fashionable have the advantage of the unfashionable in nothing but the fashion. The truly vulgar are the herd of pretenders to what they do not feel, and to what is not natural to them, whether in high or low life."

His habit of introducing personal matter into his essays gives frequently a pleasant intimate flavour to his writing, and your interest in the writer matter is none the less because of the interesting glimpses afforded of the writer's personality.

He will tell you with gleeful particularity of detail the exact circumstances in which he first made the acquaintance of certain books. He will recall how he sat up half the night to read Paul and Virginia, which he picked up at an inn at Bridge-water, after being drenched in the rain all day, he mentions how he sat down to read Rousseau at the inn at Llangollen, over a bottle of sherry and cold chicken. In a beautiful passage he describes the time when he walked between Wrexham and Llangollen, his imagination aglow with some lines of Coleridge, and says that ever after the beauty of the hill-girt valley was inseparably connected in his mind with the glamour of Coleridge's verse and his own tumultuous, revolutionary sympathies. This walk in North Wales seems to have been to him what that Cumbrian walk was to Wordsworth—a time of rapture and consecration.

In his essay On the Conversation of Authors, he takes a look out of a window first, tells us what he sees, and uses his comments as tags to moralise on, or as fresh illustrations for some theory he is elaborating. In another essay the sight of a spider crawling along the floor furnishes the preamble. In another a thunderstorm suggests an analogy with his own explosive moods. At another time he tells you he is looking forward to pastry for dinner. At another time he changes from one place to another whilst writing an essay. The new environment suggests a flow of fresh ideas, ideas that frankly bear little relation to the matter preceding. So we get a big digression, fascinating but discursive to a degree.

With all his love of philosophy and serious thought he hated the man who never relaxes. There is no starch in Hazlitt's writings. Says he.

"I hate to be always wise or aiming at wisdom. I do not desire to be always posing myself and others with the questions of fate, free-will, fore-knowledge, absolute, &c. I must occasionally be fallow. Give a man a tongue in his head, a thro' of pleasure in his heart, and he will be glad to share it with the first person he meets."

There was something of Mrs Gummidge about him. His friends were many, but he liked to feel he was unbefriended. It gave a relish to his solitary moods. Yet he was good and modest at heart, and when on one occasion the urbane Leigh Hunt gave him a piece of his own mind quite in the Hazlitt vein, all he said was "By Gad, there's a great deal in what you say!"

With all his infirmities of temperament, Hazlitt had a singularly open mind. The reader is never worried by those notice boards, dear to the hearts of some critics, warning off writers of a certain type, and obliging all wayfarers to comply with some æsthetic formula before they can be welcomed.

Hazlitt does not mind who you are, so long as you have something to express and know how to express it. He will delight equally in the vigorous, racy vernacular of Cobbett, and the splendid rhetoric of Burke, can appraise with fine discrimination the wit of Congreve, without losing any appreciation for the subtler aroma of Cervantes' humour. Admiration for Titian does not prevent him doing the amplest justice to the genre work of Hogarth, and he can appreciate the genius of Wordsworth without being blind to the merits of Pope. Naturally his waywardness of disposition shows itself in some of his estimates, he is not always a sure guide in matters of purely literary taste, as in his treatment of some of the Jacobean dramatists, and personal prejudices confound his judgment on occasion in dealing with his contemporaries. But, on the whole, there is no finer critic of all that pertains to "life and manners." He may miss the merits of a writer, never those of a man, and the inspiring enthusiasm with which he speaks, gives an incomparable gusto to his writings that is their endearing charm.

HIS PROSE

Coleridge has no substantial and connected body of prose to his credit as have Hazlitt, Lamb, and De Quincey. His prose is a collection of brilliantly discursive fragments, and thus, less on account of many-sided intellectual interests—though that was a factor—as because of the author's lack of concentration, and his constitutional tendency to fly off at a tangent. Yet allowing for this fragmentary character of his prose, it must be admitted the fragments were extremely valuable. For his critical faculty was second to none, and in purely literary subjects he is easily first in an age of great critics. In addition to a fine literary palate, he had a natural bent for metaphysics, that was fed and nourished by his German studies, and thus there was a vigorous intellectual groundwork for his literary preferences. His æsthetic judgments were regulated and clarified by his philosophical speculations, and he was the first to show, though Wordsworth realised it as well as he, that criticism in the highest sense is a creative fiat of the imagination. The difference between this view and that of the elder school of critics need scarcely be pressed. It is obviously fundamental; for to Coleridge, and those who followed him, criticism connotes interpretation, it is less a vehicle for finding faults than for discovering beauties.

There is much sound sense in many of the obiter dicta of the eighteenth-century critics, but it is accidental, and necessarily lacks illuminating power when we remember that men like Pope and Johnson made no attempt to understand the point of view of the writers criticised, or the standards of their time, but merely assayed them by eighteenth-century ideals. Thus we have Dr Johnson sentimentally disposing of Lycidas as "easy, vulgar, and therefore disgusting," and Pope taking Shakespeare to task for his "wrong choice of subjects."

Germany had led the way in this revolution of criticism, in the person of Lessing. Lessing was one of the early big influences in Coleridge's intellectual life, and the rediscovery of Shakespeare by Coleridge is the outcome.

In dealing with the general aspects of German romanticism, it was pointed out how that from the first it had a definite metaphysic of its own. This metaphysic prompts Lessing, and was further elaborated by Kant, Schiller, and Schelling, and these men in turn further influenced Coleridge.

In the view of these men, genius is organic, not mechanical as mere talent is, genius arrives therefore by instinct at that harmonious blend of things which we call Art. Genius, like Nature, is self-organising, and Art is the self-expression of the creative power of Nature.

Various subsidiary doctrines attach themselves to this central conception, such as the distinction between Imagination and Fancy, formulated by Richter and developed by Coleridge; while Schlegel, the great Shakespearean critic, held as the basic formula of romantic art—the blending of opposites, the union, for instance, of Passion and Humour.

While admitting that in both the great German critics and in Coleridge there is a tendency to over-elaborate exegesis, yet the main result is finely illuminating.

The imaginative greatness of Shakespeare was realised as it had never been realised before. The conditions under which he wrote, how far he was of his age, how far of the ages, the transcendent power of his characterisation, all these matters were brought before the attention and impressed on the imagination of the ordinary reader. In much the same way he deals with the poetry of Wordsworth, reveals its defects and exhibits its strength. Criticism, therefore, in the hands of Coleridge, ceases to be a merely arbitrary bundle of whims and prejudices, and in such papers as An Essay on Taste, on Beauty, and on Poetry or Art, the nature of artistic pleasure is analysed with clarity and subtlety.

Poetry is not the unaccountable fover in the blood, held by so many, but has a logic of its own no less than philosophy, which it is the critic's business to unfold.

In political thought he parted early with the creed of revolutionary radicalism, and became a philosophic Tory. From this standpoint he wrote vigorously and acutely. With Burke he emphasized expediency as the touchstone of legislation, distrusting "universal principles." The State for him was an organic body, with a definite life of its own, that must be materialised through its institutions. He would have endorsed Comte's aphorism that "Progress is the development of order", and his attempt to reconcile Progress and Permanence delighted John Stuart Mill. In fact, Coleridge anticipated the evolutionary idea of Progress that came into vogue with the writings of Spencer and Darwin; and replaced the utilitarianism of Bentham with its mechanical totting up of Pleasure and Pain in estimating the value of any particular measure. But his suggestions are more valuable as seminal ideas, than for any actual practicality; and we can appreciate the fascination with which the youthful minds of his age caught hold of the reconciliation "in a higher unity" of the contending forces of Progress and Order.

The most profound influence exerted by Coleridge upon his generation and the generation that succeeded, lay in the domain of religious thought. In his Aids to Reflection, Coleridge attempts to harmonise the reason with spiritual experience. He adopts and elaborates here the Kantian distinction between the reason and the understanding. The reason was defined as the inward vision, the spiritual intuition to be found in every man, whereas the understanding being merely sensuous, varied with the individual. Thus he parts absolutely with the prudential utilitarianism of the eighteenth-century divines. On the other hand, his religious philosophy is not pure mysticism. Religion to him, as to Erskine and Thomas Arnold, was a life, not a creed, and touching life it must be a rational, not an irrational thing. He rejects literal inspiration, and is averse from poetic extravagances. In short, the religious philosophy outlined in this little book proved a fount of refreshment to the impoverished Anglicans of the time that practical mystic Frederic Denison Maurice avowed his indebtedness to Coleridge, Thomas Arnold, a churchman of another type, sang his praises, while Cardinal Wiseman expressed his admiration for the spiritual philosophy he propounded.

He touched, therefore, both the High and Broad Church movements, the Broad by his attempt to reconcile faith and reason, the High, by his conception of the National Church—On the Constitution of Church and State—and by the way he blended historical feeling and spiritual experience.

Even apart from his specific contribution to religious, political, or literary thought, Coleridge is full of good things, sharp, pungent sayings, illuminating apophthegms.

As for instance, these stray examples from his Table Talk:

"A man of maxims only, is like a Cyclops with one eye, and that eye placed in the back of his head."

"A poem is that species of composition which is opposed to works of science, by proposing for its immediate object pleasure not truth. Good sense is the body of poetic genius, fancy its drapery, motion its life and imagination the soul that is everywhere and forms all into one graceful and intelligent whole."

"In the treatment of nervous cases, he is the best physician who is the most ingenuous inspirer of hope."

"Really the metre of some of the modern poems I have read bears about the same relation to metre properly understood, that dumb-bells do to music, both are for exercise and pretty severe too, I think."

Insufficient justice is often done to his fine sense of humour. One can imagine that it was one of the traits that endeared him most to Lamb.

When in the early days of his political enthusiasm he meditated bringing out a weekly journal called The Watchman, which was intended to register the political atmosphere of the time, he relates how, whilst canvassing for subscribers, he endeavoured to persuade a tallow chandler at Birmingham what a magnificent production his paper would be. He argued, he prophesied, and beginning with the captivity of nations he ended with the near approach of the Millennium. The man of tallow listened with noble patience and then said, after a pause:

"And what, sir, might the cost be?"

"Only fourpence."

Another pause

"That comes to a deal of money at the end of the year. How much did you say there would be for the money? Thirty-two pages." Bless me, why, except what I does in the family way on the Sabbath, that's more than I ever read, sir, all the year round. I am as great a man as any one for liberty and truth, and all them sort of things, but as to this, no offence, I hope, sir, I must beg to be excused."

Coleridge would relate this story with great relish.

While there can be no question as to the immense influence of Coleridge upon English thought, the extent of his originality as a thinker is debatable. That he learned much and borrowed much from Shakespearean critics like Schlegel, and philosophers such as Schelling and Kant, is admitted on all sides. But his plagiarisms are really less formidable than at first sight they appeared. His easy-going method of lifting whole passages from these writers without the faintest acknowledgment, has led some to look upon him as merely a purveyor of other men's thoughts. But if he stole from other men, he certainly paid handsome tribute for his thefts.

The greatness of Wordsworth lay in his work, not his personality. Coleridge, like Dante Gabriel Rossetti, seems to have been more remarkable as a personality than as a writer. His personal magnetism seems to have been extraordinary, and even Wordsworth, always chary in praise even of friends, has said that though "he had seen many men do wonderful things, Coleridge was the only wonderful man he had ever met." This power of personality in itself is allied to genius, for it implies a unique quality of imagination, and enables its fortunate possessor to influence other minds in an extraordinary manner. It is true that it perishes with the man, but the fertilising power goes on through other men, and so it is that his very limitations as a thinker, his immense discursiveness, his fragmentary brilliance, prove an advantage rather than a drawback. For the subtle suggestiveness of his versatile and wide-ranging mind stimulated others in a variety of directions that would have been impossible had he concentrated more and elaborated with fuller completeness. Like Bacon before him, he pointed the way he was constitutionally unable to travel, he opened up lines of thought he had neither the patience nor constructive power to pursue. But no man did more to give a philosophical background to creative art, and an æsthetic value to intellectual processes, such as made of literature a fresher and more vital power.

ON POESY OR ART

In every work of art there is a reconciliation of the external with the internal, the conscious is so impressed on the unconscious as to appear in it, as compare mere letters inscribed on a tomb with figures themselves constituting the tomb. He who combines the two is the man of genius, and for that reason he must partake of both. Hence there is in genius itself an unconscious activity; nay, that is the genius in the man of genius. And thus is the true exposition of the rule that the artist must first eloin himself from nature in order to return to her with full effect. Why this? Because if he were to begin by mere painful copying, he would produce masks only, not forms breathing life. He must out of his own mind create forms according to the severe laws of the intellect, in order to generate in himself that co-ordination of freedom and law, that involution of obedience in the prescript, and of the prescript in the impulse to obey, which assimilates him to nature, and enables him to understand her. He merely absents himself for a season from her, that his own spirit, which has the same ground with nature, may learn her unspoken language in its main radical, before he approaches to her endless compositions of them. Yes, not to acquire cold notions—lifeless technical rules—but living and life-producing ideas, which shall contain their own evidence, the certainty that they are essentially one with the germinal causes in nature—his consciousness being the focus and mirror of both—for this does the artist for a time abandon the external real in order to return to it with a complete sympathy with its internal and actual. For of all we see, hear, feel, and touch, the substance is and must be in ourselves, and therefore there is no alternative in reason between the dreary (and thank heaven! almost impossible) belief that everything around us is but a phantom, or that the life which is in us is in them likewise; and that to know is to resemble, when we speak of objects out of ourselves, even as within ourselves to learn is, according to Plato, only to recollect, the only effective answer to which, that I have been fortunate enough to meet with, is that which Pope has consecrated for future use in the line—

"And cockcombs vanquish Berkeley with a grin!"

The artist must imitate that which is within the thing, that which is active through form and figure, and disengage to us by symbols—the Natur-geist, or spirit of nature, as we unconsciously imitate those whom we love; for so only can he hope to produce any work truly natural in the object and truly human in the effect. The idea which puts the form together cannot itself be the form. It is above form, and in its essence, the universal in the individual, or the individuality itself—the glance and the exponent of the indwelling power.

THOMAS DE QUINCEY (1785-1859)

HIS LIFE

Thomas De Quincey was born at Greenhay, Manchester, in August 1785, his father was a well-to-do merchant, and Thomas was the fifth of a family of eight—a shy, sensitive lad greatly under the influence of an older brother—and from earliest days lived half his time in a dream world of his own.

Quick and responsive intellectually, he took a delight in his school work, first at the Bath Grammar School, where he excelled in Greek. "At thirteen I wrote Greek with ease," he says, "and at fifteen could converse in Greek fluently, and without embarrassment." One of his tutors, "a ripe and good one," once remarked to a friend that the boy "could harangue an Athenian mob better than you or I could address an English one."

An illness necessitated his removal from Bath, after which for about a year he was at Dr Spencer's school at Winkfield, Wiltshire; here, the pupil was found to be in advance of his master in classical knowledge, and the boy conceived a dislike for private schools in consequence. "I had no one to praise me, to spur me on, or to help me." A still later educational experiment at Manchester Grammar School was also an unhappy one. He had been sent there in 1800, with a view to getting a school exhibition that might help his expenses at Oxford; but the youth was anxious to proceed earlier to the University than his guardians had intended, and showed his displeasure by running away from the school to his mother's house at Chester. He was then given a weekly allowance of one guinea and began his wanderings among the hillsides of Wales, sleeping in rural inns when the money held out, but more often under a hedge or in a field, making friends with the labourers and writing love-letters for the girls.

De Quincey soon grew weary of this nomadic life, and the restricted library at his disposal, so ran away once more, this time to London; but he was soon to realise the loneliness of a great city, his slender means failed him, and he was reduced to the direst poverty.

At this juncture he made some strange acquaintances. A Jewish money-lender's agent, a disreputable attorney who kept a lodging-house in Greek Street, Soho, gave him a shelter, while here for a time his companion was a poor, forlorn, half-starved child of ten years old with whom he shared a "bundle of law papers for a pillow and a tattered horseman's cloak for a covering," where in the empty rooms the noise of the rats "made a prodigious echoing." "I loved this child," he says, "because she was my partner in wretchedness." The kind-hearted Ann, who spent her last sixpence in order to restore him when he had fainted on a doorstep from exhaustion, and his unavailing efforts to trace and reward her later, is well known to all his readers.

Inexperienced and unpractical, it had never occurred to him to utilise his classical knowledge in order to gain a livelihood, and seek relief from home he would not, for fear he should be forced to return to school. After a fruitless endeavour to see the young Lord Westport, with whom he had spent some time in Ireland, an unexpected reconciliation took place with his guardians, and he was sent to Worcester College, Oxford, in 1803.

In 1804, in order to fight the neuralgic pains from which he suffered, he had recourse to opium that not only lulled the pain, but unfortunately became a "minister of celestial happiness," and for a few coppers he found "portable ecstasies might be had corked up in a pint bottle, but," he added, "the reader will think I am laughing; and I can assure him, that no one will laugh long who deals much in opium."

At the examination for his degree, Dr Goodenough, one of the examiners, declared him to be "the cleverest man I ever met with"; and, "if his opus examination to-morrow corresponds with what he has done to-day, he will carry everything before him." For some reason De Quincey failed to appear the following day, and disappeared from Oxford forthwith.

An enthusiastic admirer of Coleridge and The Ancient Mariner, De Quincey, while on a visit to Bristol in 1807, made the acquaintance of the poet. The two soon became close friends, and later, when Coleridge went to London to lecture, De Quincey offered himself as escort to Mrs Coleridge and her three children on their journey North, the pleasure was doubly enhanced by the long-looked-for meeting with Wordsworth and his sister Dorothy. Shortly after his sudden disappearance from Oxford in 1808, he made his way to that little band of "Lakists," where he enjoyed the hospitality of the Wordsworths till February 1809, making several visits to London in order to keep terms with a view to being called to the Bar, seeing much of Lamb, whose acquaintance he had made in 1804. In the facetious conversation of Charles Lamb he took no interest at first, in fact he was greatly irritated by it, and it was some years before a real and close friendship existed between the two men.

In 1809 De Quincey acquired the lease of Dove Cottage, just vacated by the Wordsworths. The poet's sister, Dorothy, had undertaken to set the cottage in order, and showed the keenest interest in the choice of suitable furniture and drapings, for instance, knowing the tenant's restlessness, mahogany was chosen for the bookshelves as "should be loamy the country, and have a sale, no sort of wood sells so well at second-hand." Here, says De Quincey, in this "cottage immortal in my remembrance," the scene of many happy friendships, also bitter struggles and much dependency, we find him a migratory inmate for twenty-seven years, many days of which were "set and insulated in the gloom and cloudy melancholy of opium."

In 1816 De Quincey married Margaret Simpson, the young daughter of a Westmorland farmer. Delicate in health, she had a wonderful fascination of manner, and it was said by a much-travelled friend of the family, that "he had never seen a more gracious or a more beautiful lady" than Mrs De Quincey.

A decreasing patrimony and an increasing family made De Quincey look about him for ways and means to augment his income, brave efforts were also made to restrict his use of the opium that were partially successful. In 1819 he became editor of the Westmorland Gazette, and began writing for most of the important magazines and reviews. The Confessions of an English Opium-Eater were published in the London Magazine in 1821, and from this year until 1849, when The English Mail Coach and The Vision of Sudden Death appeared, was the most important period of his literary career.

In 1830 De Quincey removed with his wife and family to Edinburgh, constantly changing his place of abode there, in 1837 his wife died, and his children then found a permanent home at Lasswade, near Edinburgh, he living a solitary life in out-of-the-way lodgings, till his death in 1859.

Small, and insignificant in appearance, De Quincey's manner was peculiarly fascinating, his voice, said Harriet Martineau, "so clear, so soft, so sweet." He had a great love for children and music, loving the "silvery tinkle of sheep bells" no less than the beautiful strains of his favourite Beethoven. If solitary and simple in his habits he was not unsocial; visitors from all parts who came to see him were always made welcome, and wherever he went, people of all classes were happy in his society. His liberality was unbounded, even to the impoverishment of himself; loans made in large sums being sometimes repaid but more often ignored. A good man, a true gentleman, a cultivated scholar, and one of the most remarkable figures among our literary personalities, with but one real enemy—the Opium.

HIS WORK

De Quincey, like Wordsworth, was a voluminous writer, from whose litera scripta the fine ore of literature must be sifted with care. But whereas Wordsworth was voluminous from lack of self-criticism, De Quincey is voluminous because much that he wrote was written as journalism is written, under financial pressure. He was a writer of great versatility, capable of turning out an article on almost any subject; and the wonder is not that he turned out matter that was often quite ephemeral in character, but that despite this habit he wrote so much that is of permanent value.

His literary life started in 1821, with the first version of The Confessions of an Opium-Eater, in this work he utilises his early experiences and exhibits his fantastic imagination. In the Dialogue of Three Lemnars, he displays that passion for logical analysis which is as distinctive of his genius as his fantasy. This is the fruit of his study of Ricardo. Further, in the twenties he makes his first essay into German literature, and this gives him his earliest incursion into narrative writing.

These three notes, meditative, analytical, descriptive, are inseparable from his work, and in the development of his power, sometimes one is prominent, sometimes another, but no one is entirely dropped. The fantastic note is enriched and mellowed in the longer Opium-Eater and Reminiscences—and in such essays as On the Knocking at the Gate in Macbeth (1823) the analytical faculty marks his critical work, e.g. Style, Rhetoric, while the descriptive and visualising power of De Quincey does not reach its maturity save in the Suspiria de Profundis and other sketches of "unpassioned prose." Sometimes, as in articles like The Revolt of the Tartars, fancy, logic, and actuality are admirably blended, while in his purely critical work, logic and fancy give a piquant flavour to the dish. He is a brilliant but austere critic, with little of Hazlitt's catholicity of taste, and is really more trustworthy in detecting bad logic than for appreciating good literature. Given the fantastic vein he can be fair enough, as in his estimate of Richter, but with genius of another type to his own, Goethe for example, he is flagrantly unjust.

From early days, when as a boy he slept on the bare hillside in Wales, cheerfully trusting to some chance kindness for food and drink throughout his London struggles and his peregrinations in "stony-hearted Oxford Street," down to the days of his brilliant reputation in Edinburgh, he was the same fantastic dreamer, restless spirit, grotesque child. Yes, he was a vagabond child. He never grew up, he never gained experience, and was even less familiar with the ways of the world than Leigh Hunt. Fleeced of his money when he was a struggling journalist in London, and the easiest dupe possible for the unscrupulous, he never became cynical or lost faith in human nature. He was as generous and tender-hearted as Lamb. Fame and affluence came, but the vagabond child never changed. His friends at Edinburgh rarely knew where to find him, and when they chanced on him he was as meanly dressed as if he had scarcely a penny in the world. Wore he wanted for a dinner-party—and there was a fine wisdom in his conversation—it was the hardest thing in the world to persuade him to come, if he did come he presented the strangest appearance in his tattered attire. But that was a slight set-off to his companionship. Like Coleridge, however, when he had a fancy for his company he would stay on in the most unexpected way, at times sublimely oblivious to any inconvenience he might be occasioning—a stay of some weeks it might be—so that the difficulty of persuading him to come shrank into insignificance beside the task of suggesting to him to go. A story is told in the Life of Christopher North how that he dined with the Professor one night, was detained for the night by a heavy storm of rain, and prolonged his impromptu visit for a year.

Of the merit of his own work he had a just appreciation, but of its financial value not the slightest, and he made a strange figure seeking out editors and publishers when he was sixty, with a big reputation, as if he were the veriest tyro hawking articles—but he liked it. One feels sure he liked the shiftless, nomadic life. To have regarded his fame as a sound business asset would have annoyed him extremely. He loved uncertainties and per-adventures, so he made even the actualities of his life seem unreal and illusory. At one time, it has been said, he went into hiding to avoid arrest for debt, when all the time large sums of money were due to him and his debts were quite insignificant.

The first important event in De Quincey's life was the roaming life on the hillsides of North Wales; the second, the wanderings in "stony-hearted Oxford Street." Later on the spell of London faded away, and a longing for the country possessed him once more. But the spell of London was important in shaping his literary life, and must not be under-estimated. Lamb also felt the spell, but it was of another kind. But these men were not attracted in the same way. What drew De Quincey to London was its mystery; whereas it was the stir and colour of the crowded streets that stirred the imagination of "Elia." We scarcely realise, as we read of those harsh experiences, those bitter struggles with poverty and loneliness, that the man is writing of his life in London, is speaking of some well-known thoroughfare. It is like viewing a familiar scene in the moonlight, when all looks strange and weird. A faint but palpable veil of phantasy seemed to shut off De Quincey from the outside world. In his most poignant passages the voice has a ghostly ring, in his most realistic descriptions there is a dreamlike unreality. A tender and sensitive soul in his dealings with others, there are no tears in his writings. One has only to compare the early recorded struggles of Dickens with those of De Quincey to feel the difference between the two temperaments. The one passionately concrete, the other dispassionately abstract. De Quincey will take some heartfelt episode and deck it out in so elaborate a panoply of rhetoric that the human element seems to have vanished. Beautiful as are many of the passages describing the pathetic outcast Ann, the reader is too conscious of the stylist and the full-dress stylist.

That he feels what he is writing about, one does not doubt, but he does not suit his manner to his matter. For expressing subtle emotions, half shades of thought, no writer is more wonderfully adept than De Quincey, but when the episode demands simple and direct treatment, his elaborate cadences feel out of place.

When he pauses in his description to apostrophise, then the disparity affects one far less, as, for instance, in this apostrophe to "noble-minded" Ann after recalling how on one occasion she had saved his life:

"O youthful benefactress! how often in succeeding years, standing in solitary places, and thinking of thee with grief of heart and perfect love—how often have I wished that, as in ancient times the curse of a father was believed to have a supernatural power, and to pursue its object with a fatal necessity of self-fulfilment, even so the benediction of a heart oppressed with gratitude might have a like prerogative, might have power given it from above to chase, to haunt, to waylay, to pursue thee into the central darkness of a London brothel, or (if it were possible) even into the darkness of the grave, there to awaken thee with an authentic message of peace and forgiveness, and of final reconciliation!"

Perhaps the passage describing how he befriended the small servant girl in the half-deserted house in Greek Street is among the happiest, despite a note of artificiality towards the close:

"Towards nightfall I went down to Greek Street, and found, on taking possession of my new quarters, that the house already contained one single inmate—a poor, friendless child, apparently ten years old, but she seemed hunger-bitten, and sufferings of that sort often make children look older than they are. From this forlorn child I learned that she had slept and lived there alone for some time before I came, and great joy the poor creature expressed when she found that I was in future to be her companion through the hours of darkness. The house could hardly be called large—that is it was not large on each separate story, but, having four storeys in all, it was large enough to impress vividly the sense of its echoing loneliness, and, from the want of furniture, the noise of the rats made a prodigious uproar on the staircase and hall, so that, amidst the real fleshly ills of cold and hunger, the forsaken child had found leisure to suffer still more from the self-created one of ghosts. Against these enemies I could promise her protection, human companionship was in itself protection, but of other and more useful aid I had alas! little to offer. We lay upon the floor with a bundle of law papers for a pillow, but with no other covering than a large horseman's cloak; afterwards, however, we discovered in a garret an old sofa-cover, a small piece of rug, and some fragments of other articles, which added a little to our comfort. The poor child crept close to me for warmth, and for security against her ghostly enemies. Apart from her situation, she was not what would be called an interesting child. She was neither pretty, nor quick in understanding, nor remarkably pleasing in manners. But, thank God! even in those years I needed not the embellishments of elegant accessories to conciliate my affections. Plain human nature, in its humblest and most homely apparel, was enough for me, and I loved the child because she was my partner in wretchedness."

In the delineation of certain moods De Quincey is supremely excellent; but the style is not a plastic style; and its appeal to the ear rather than to the pictorial faculty limits its emotional effect upon the reader. Images pass before his eyes, and he tries to depict them by cunningly devised phrases, but the veil of phantasy through which he sees those images has blurred their outline and dimmed their colouring. The phrase arrests by its musical cadences, by its solemn, mournful music. Even some of his most admirable pieces—the dream fugues—leave the reader dissatisfied when they touch poignant realities like sorrow. Despite its many beauties, that dream fugue, Our Ladies of Sorrow, seems too misty, too ethereal in texture for the intense actuality of the subject.

Here is a passage from Levana and Our Ladies of Sorrow.

"The oldest of the three is named Mater Lachrymarum. Our Lady of Tears. She it is that night and day raves and moans, calling for vanished faces. She stood in Rama, where a voice was heard of lamentation—Rachel weeping for her children and refusing to be comforted. She it was that stood in Bethlehem on the night when Herod's sword swept its nurseries of Innocents, and the little feet were stiffened for ever which were heard at times as they trotted along floors overhead, woke pulses of love in household hearts that were not unmarked in heaven. Her eyes are sweet and subtle, wild and sleepy by turns, oftentimes rising to the clouds, oftentimes challenging the heavens. She wears a diadem round her head. And I knew by childish memories that she could go abroad upon the winds, when she heard the sobbing of litanes, or the thundering of organs, and when she beheld the mustering of summer clouds."

Of suffering and privation, of pain and anguish—bodily and mental—he had experiences more than the common lot. But when he tries to show this bleeding reality to us a mist invariably arises, and we see things as in a glass darkly.

There is a certain passage in his Autobiography which affords a key to this characteristic of his work.

When quite a boy he had constituted himself imaginary king of an imaginary kingdom of Gombroon. Speaking of this fancy he writes.

"O reader! do not laugh! I lived for ever under the terror of two separate wars and two secret worlds; one against the factory boys in a real world of flesh and blood, of stones and brickbats, of flight and pursuit, that were anything but figurative; the other in a world purely aerial, where all the combats and the sufferings were absolute moonshine. And yet the simple truth is that for anxiety and distress of mind the reality (which almost every morning's light brought round) was as nothing in comparison of that Dream Kingdom which rose like a vapour from my own brain, and which appar only by the fiat of my will could be for ever dissolved. Ah, but no! I had contracted obligations to Gombroon. I had submitted my conscience to a yoke, and in secret truth my will had no autocratic power. Long contemplation of a shadow, earnest study for the welfare of that shadow, sympathy with the wounded sensibilities of that shadow under accumulated wrongs; these bitter experiences, nursed by brooding thought, had gradually frozen that shadow into a region of reality far denser than the material realities of brass or granite."

This confession is a remarkable testimony to the reality of De Quincey's imaginative life. "I had contracted obligations to Gombroon." Yes, despite his practical experiences with the world, it was Gombroon, "the moonlight" side of things, that appealed to him. The boys might fling stones and brickbats, just as the world did later—but though he felt the onslaught, it moved him far less than did the phantasies of his imagination.

"The Dream Kingdom that rose like a vapour" from his brain, this it was—this Vagabond imagination of his—that was the one great reality in life. It is a mistake to assume, as some have done, that this faculty for day dreaming was a legacy of the opium-eating. The opium gave an added brilliance to the dream-life, but it did not create it. He was a dreamer from his birth—a far more thorough-going dreamer than was ever Coleridge. There was a strain of insanity about him undoubtedly, and it says much for his intellectual activity and moral power that the Dream Kingdom did not disturb his mental life more than it did. Had he never touched opium to relieve his gastric complaint, he would have been eccentric—that is, if he had lived. Without some narcotic it is doubtful whether his highly sensitive organisation would have survived the attacks of disease. As it was, the opium not only eased the pain, but lifted his imagination above the ugly realities of life, and afforded a solace in times of loneliness and misery.

Small and insignificant in appearance to the casual observer, there was something arresting, fascinating about the man that touched even the irascible Carlyle. Much of his work, one can well understand, seemed to this lover of facts "full of wire-drawn ingenuities." But with all his contempt for phantasy, there was a touch of the dreamer in Carlyle, and the imaginative beauty, apart from the fanciful prettiness in De Quincey's work, would have appealed to him. For there was power, intellectual grip, behind the shifting fancies, and both as a critic and historian he has left behind him memorable work. As critic, he has been taken seriously to task for his judgments on French writers and on many lights of eighteenth-century thought. Certainly De Quincey's was not the type of mind we should go to for an interpretative criticism of the eighteenth century. Yet we must not forget his admirable appreciation of Goldsmith. At his best, as in his criticism of Milton and Wordsworth, he shows a fine, delicate, analytical power, which it is hard to overpraise.

"Obligations to Gombroon" do not afford the best qualifications for the historian. One can imagine the hair rising in horror on the head of the late Professor Freeman at the idea of the opium-eater sitting down seriously to write history.

Yet he had, like Froide, the power of seizing upon the spectacular side of great movements which many a more accurate historian has lacked. Especially striking is his Revolt of the Tartars—the flight eastward of a Tartar nation across the vast steppes of Asia, from Russia to Chinese territory. Ideas impressed him rather than facts, and episodes rather than a continuous chain of events. But when he was interested, he had the power of describing with picturesque power certain dramatic episodes in a nation's history.

A prolific writer for the magazines, it is inevitable that there should be a measure that is ephemeral in De Quincey's voluminous writings. But it is impossible not to be struck by the wide range of his intellectual interests. A mind that is equally at home in the economics of Ricardo and the transcendentalism of Wordsworth, that can turn with undiminished zest from Malthus to Kant, that could deal lucidly with the Logic of Political Economy, despite the dream world that finds expression in the "impassioned prose", that could delight in such broadly farcical absurdities as Sortilege and Astrology, and such delicately suggestive studies as On the Knocking at the Gate in Marketh, a mind of this adventurous and varied type is assuredly a very remarkable one. That he should touch every subject with equal power was not to be expected, but the analytical brilliance that characterises even his mystical writings enabled him to treat such subjects as political economy with a sureness of touch and a logical grasp that has astonished those who had regarded him as merely an inconsequential dreamer of dreams.

What gives his works their especial attraction is not so much the analytic faculty, interesting as it is, or the mystical turn of mind, as in the piquant blend of the two. Thus, while he is poking fun at astrology or witchcraft, we are conscious all the time that he retains a sneaking fondness for the occult. He delights in dreams, omens, and coincidences. He reminds one at times of the lecturer on superstitions, who, in the midst of a brilliant analysis of its futility and absurdity, was interrupted by a black cat walking on to the platform and was so disturbed by this portent that he brought his lecture to an abrupt conclusion.

On the whole, the Mystic triumphed over the Logician. His poetic imagination unprocesses his work with a rich inventiveness, while the logical faculty, though subsidiary, is utilised for giving form and substance to the visions.

It is curious to contrast the stateliness of De Quincey's literary style, the elaborate full-dress manner, with the extreme simplicity of the man. One might be tempted to add, surely here the style is not the man. His friends have testified that he was a gentle, timid, shrinking little man, and abnormally sensitive to giving offence, and to those whom he cared for—his family, for instance—he was the incarnation of affection and tenderness.

Yet in the writings we see another side, a considerable sprinkle of sturdy prejudices, no little self-assertion and pugnacity. But there is no real disparity. The style is the man here as over. When roused by opposition he could even in converse show the claws beneath the velvet. Only the militant, the more aggressive side of the man is expressed more readily in his writings, and the gentle and amiable side more readily in personal intimacy. Both the life and the writings are wanted to supply a complete picture.

In one respect the records of his life efface a suspicion that haunts the reader of his works. More than once the reader is apt to speculate as to how far the arrogance that marks certain of his essays is a superficial quality, a literary trick, how far a moral trait. The record of his conversations tends to show that much of this was merely surface. Unlike Coleridge, unlike Carlyle, he was as willing to listen as to talk; and he said many of his best things with a delightful unconsciousness that they were especially good. He never seemed to have the least wish to impress people by his cleverness or aptness of speech.

De Quincey was an artist of moods, skilfully adapting his style to the theme chosen. He had a ready perception of the congruous atmosphere in which to deal with his various topics, e.g. the ironical opening of Murder considered as one of the Fine Arts, the satirical banter of Dr. Andrew Boll, the solemn rhythmic cadence of A Vision of Sudden Death. It is, however, in writing of the latter class that he excels. Subtle effects, delicate gradations of emotion, these things De Quincey could render with exquisite delicacy. Sometimes, however, Carlyle's sardonic reference to his "wire-drawn ingenuities" recurs to the reader's mind, and the ornamentation becomes wearisome. One remembers the dictum of the Scotch cook, "The body has an awfu' sight of words."

At its best, however, the elaborate poetical prose in which De Quincey couched his imaginative dreams has a fine and delicate beauty about it—a beauty which is quite distinctive and bears little resemblance to the beauty of other prose stylists.

Whether the matter of De Quincey was always worth the fastidious craftsmanship expended on it is another question—but looking at the manner merely, few of our writers possessed so rare a sense of the value of words.

A word may be said here about his well-known distinction between the literature of knowledge and the literature of power.

'The function of the first is to teach, the function of the second is to move. The first is a ruler, the second an oar or a sail. The first speaks to the mere discursive understanding, the second speaks ultimately, it may happen, to the higher understanding or reason, but always through affections of pleasure and sympathy. Remotely, it may travel towards an object seated in what Lord Bacon calls 'dry light', but approximately it does and must operate else it ceases to be a literature of power, and through that humid light which clothes itself in the mists and glittering iris of human passions, desires and genial emotions."

Now undoubtedly literature does appeal to us in two ways. It appeals to the intellect and it appeals to the imagination. It equips us with material for fashioning our lives wisely, it provides us with foresight. On the other hand, it furnishes us with inspiration, for fashioning our lives nobly, it provides us with insight. The pursuit in the one case is Truth, and in the other Beauty. But when Keats declared Truth and Beauty to be one, he said what is incontestable. The way of approach may be different, but the goal is the same.

The distinction between knowledge and power melts away upon examination. Knowledge that is of value necessarily makes for power, and there is no literature of power, no work of high imagination that does not move us intellectually as well as morally.

The real value of De Quincey's remarks seems to me to lie in the rebuke he administers to those who think that it is the main purpose of literature to provide information. He is right in calling this a mean or subordinate purpose, and those who approach literature merely with this view miss the great function of literature, which is to provide inspiration, not information.

This, however, implies not so much an exclusive concern with the literature of knowledge, as an imperfect appreciation of what knowledge is. Knowledge is something deeper than information; it is information which has fructified because it has become vital and reproductive, in other words, it possesses dynamic force.

Writers with subtle imagination like De Quincey and Lamb, possess an "electric aptitude" for seizing upon analogies. One thing invariably suggests another, and consequently a huge discursiveness of manner is the consequence. To suggest a thing to De Quincey was like bringing an object into a room covered by mirrors. The object assumed at once a myriad shapes; it could be seen from every possible angle. But there is a reason for this, and there is a reason for the apparent complexity of De Quincey's treatment.

We must not forget that the logical faculty in De Quincey is as manifest as his inventive imagination. His discursiveness often merely indicates the spaciousness of his ground plan. He is not really introducing other irrelevant objects, but reflecting the same object from many points of view.

De Quincey's imagination was fertile rather than deep; this again is of special value to the discursive writer. Then his retentive memory, his out-of-the-way knowledge, his instinct for parallels and apparently remote, give his manner a peculiar fascination and interest.

This discursiveness is of great value in his critical work, for it provides a leisurely elaboration of his subject, and a host of subtle touches which help to illuminate.

The two qualities which go to make criticism of the first order, are subtlety and acuteness—the first a faculty of the imagination—an instinct for detecting what is beneath the surface; the other an intellectual process which arrives by virtue of an alert logic at a certain conclusion. Some critics excel in one, some in another. Hazlitt is the more remarkable for acuteness—De Quincey for subtlety; sometimes, as in the essay on Macbeth, the subtlety rather overreaches itself, but often, as in the essays on Milton, on Coleridge, and Wordsworth, it is of great service.

The mysterious side of life, the night side of things, appealed irresistibly to De Quincey. Few writers have given a more vivid impression of the mystery of London, the sense of numinousity in its surging crowds, the tragic loneliness of its bustling thoroughfares. He discovers an arresting symbolism in ordinary sights and sounds (e.g. The Knocking at the Gate in Macbeth). He is attracted towards certain dramatic movements in history fraught with latent possibilities (e.g. The Revolt of the Tartars, Spanish Nun, and Joan of Arc). To have written that gruesome masterpiece, the footnote on the Williams murders, formerly appended to the Essay on Murder, is to have assured for himself a place among artists of the horrible, such as Edgar Allan Poe. Few realised more intensely, more subtly, the horror of the unexpressed, the brooding sense of some impending disaster, than did De Quincey. Whereas Horace Walpole and Mrs Radcliffe had been trying to make the flesh creep with moaning winds, and ancient battlements, with Byronic robbers, and spectral hands and hollow voices, De Quincey approaches with far finer artistry the potency of suggesting—of hinting. With Walpole, the supernatural was a useful stage property far too obvious to deceive any but the most credulous. With De Quincey it is a vague background. The banging of the street door and the dreadful silence which followed, when Williams gets in the house, has a ghostliness about it that surpasses the actual murder. The gruesome silence, then the faint creaking as the criminal moves about, the suspense, these are the things that freeze the blood.

Apart from the horrible, however, the dark, the shadowy side appealed to De Quincey, just as it appealed to Nathaniel Hawthorne. Hawthorne preferred, as we know, to take his walks after sunset, and when night was gathering over Edinburgh, then De Quincey walked forth with a zest which he never showed in daylight.

"It is strange," says Mr. Masson, "to think of the little figure in those weary wanderings of his, round and through the city evening after evening."

It was his custom, we are told, in these nocturnal rambles, and chiefly for his convenience in certain labyrinths of pathway about the Esk, with a foot-bridge or two in them, to carry a small lantern with a means of lighting it when he chose. What a trial to the senses of the hardest belated tramp or other night bird, with any dread of the supernatural, to have come upon De Quincey in such a spot, striking his match by a bush or advancing through the trees with his bull's eye. He himself was perfectly fearless of night bird or demon. Night was his natural element. What could it bring forth that it should alarm him?

As the man, so the writer. Along the byways of literature, he shuffled with a glimmering lantern turned in this direction or that, to light up with a radiance that decorated rather than illumined the darkness of some special tract. Surely it was no mere literary preference that led him to descend on Macbeth (where the chief events take place after sunset), or to quote, of all Lamb's essays, the one on Evening, "That we should lie down with the Lamb."

De Quincey himself though his avowedly autobiographic writings are well defined, is as a matter of fact almost always autobiographic. This does not mean that he is telling us explicitly always what has happened to him, but he reveals himself, his moods, his tastes, his peculiarities of temper, in all that he writes.

In one particular De Quincey's idiosyncratic writing differs from that of his contemporaries—Byron, Hazlitt, and Lamb. He makes use of his temperamental peculiarities as an artist rather than as a man. The consequence is he is less confidential than he seems. This is not so, say, with a writer like Lamb, Lamb is far more intimate and frank; he wants to open his mind to his readers, and although he hides from us many of his darkest moments by in extra flourish of witticisms, yet it is not difficult to see through this simple histrionic deception. De Quincey, on the other hand, looks upon the experiences of life as so much plastic material for his artistry. He manipulates his material primarily for artistic effect, and only secondarily because he wishes to be confidential. There is none of the impulsiveness about him—the yearning to take the world into his confidence—that there is in the case of Byron and Hazlitt. The history of the Confessions serves as a case in point. Pleased with their artistic as well as popular success, he elaborated a much lengthier later edition. There is more of the literary artist, less of the confidential opium-eater in the later version.

Thus deliberate detachment, so characteristic of the artist, reminds one more of Walter Pater than of Hazlitt and Lamb.

De Quincey's attitude towards life was essentially that of the artist to whom every experience may serve possibly some artistic end. Such men welcome the fight, not as Browning did from the ethical point of view, but from the æsthetic. One could not say of him what Arnold said of Emerson, "A voice oracular has pealed." Not on the bracing uplands of high imagination, but in the soft gracious woodlands of luxuriant fancy shall we find him.

Although our best friends in literature as in everyday life are always welcome, yet there are times and seasons when they make a special appeal to us. There is a literature of the noonday—and there is a literature of the half-lights. De Quincey's writings belong to the literature of the half-lights, and should for the most part, I think, be read in the "clear brown twilight," which Hawthorne desiderates for his delightful tales. Given the time and mood, the fantastic opium eater will rarely fail to hold us with persuasive charm, by virtue of his quaint, elusive personality, and his attractive garrulousness; above all, by reason of his exquisite and delicate art.

"So sweet, so ghostly, in its soft, golden smiles, silent as a dream, and quiet as the dying trance of a saint, faded through all its stages this departing day, along the whole length of which I bade farewell for many a year to Wales, and farewell to summer. In the very aspect and the sepulchral stillness of the motionless day, as solemnly it wore away through morning, noontide, afternoon to meet the darkness that was hurrying to swallow up its beauty, I had a fantastic feeling as though I read the very language of resignation when bending before some irresistible agency. And at intervals I heard—in how different a key!—the raving, the over-awing uproar of that dreadful metropolis, which at every step was coming nearer, and beckoning (as it seemed) to myself for purposes as dim, for issues as incalculable, as the path of cannon-shots fired at random and in darkness."

"For nearly two hours I had heard fierce winds arising, and the whole atmosphere had by this time become one vast laboratory of hostile movements in all directions. Such a chaos, such a distracting wilderness of dim sights and of those awful 'sounds that live in darkness,' never had I consciously witnessed. Rightly, and by a true instinct, had I made my farewell adieu to summer. All through the day, Wales and her grand mountain ranges—Penmaenmawr, Snowdon, Cader Idris—had divided my thoughts with London. But now rose London, sole, dark, infinite, brooding over the whole capacities of my heart. Other object, other thought, I could not admit. Long before midnight the whole household (with the exception of a solitary waiter) had retired to rest. Two hours, at least, were left to me, after twelve o'clock had struck, for heart-shaking reflections. . . . The unusual dimensions of the rooms, especially their towering height, brought up continually and obstinately, through natural links of associated feelings or images, the mighty vision of London waiting for me afar off. An altitude of nineteen or twenty feet showed itself unavoidably upon an exaggerated scale in some of the smaller side-rooms, meant probably for cards or refreshments. This single feature of the rooms, their unusual altitude, and the echoing hollowness which had become the exponent of that altitude, this one terrific feature (for terrific it was in the effect), together with crowding and evanescent images of the flying feet that so often had spread gladness through these halls on the wings of youth and hope at seasons when every room rang with music, all this, rising in tumultuous vision, whilst the dead hours of night were stealing along, all around me, household and town, sleeping, and whilst against the windows more and more the storm outside was raving, and to all appearances endlessly growing, threw me into the deadliest condition of nervous emotion under contradictory forces, high over which predominated horror recoiling from that unfathomed abyss in London into which I was now so wilfully precipitating myself!"¹

ESSAY ON RHETORIC

Charles Lloyd never returned to Brathay after he had once been removed from it. . . . But often and often, in years after all was gone I have passed old Brathay, or have gone over purposely after dark, about the time when, for many a year, I used to go over to spend the evening, and seating myself on a stone by the side of the mountain river Brathay, have staid for hours listening to the same sound to which so often Charles Lloyd and I used to hearken together with profound emotion and awe—the sound of piping anthems, as if streaming from the open portals of some illimitable cathedral, for such a sound does actually arise, in many states of the weather from the peculiar action of the river Brathay upon its rocky bed, and many times I have heard it, of a quiet night, when no stranger could have been persuaded to believe it other than the sound of choral chanting—distant, solemn, saintly. Since the ruin or dispersion of that house hold, after the smoke had ceased to ascend from their hearth, or the garden walk to echo their voices, oftentimes, when lying by the river side I have listened to the same aerial saintly sound whilst looking back to that night long hidden in the frost of receding years, when Charles and Sophia Lloyd, now lying in foreign graves, first dawned upon me, coming suddenly out of ruin and darkness, then young, rich, happy full of hope, belted with young children (of whom also most are long dead) and standing apparently on the verge of a labyrinth of golden hours.

JOAN OF ARC

At the farewell crisis, when the gates of death are opening, and flesh is resting from its struggles, oftentimes the tortured and torturer have the same truce from carnal torment, both sink together into sleep, together both sometimes kindle into dreams. When the mortal musts were gathering fast upon you two—bishop and shepherd girl—when the pavilions of life were closing up their shadowy curtains about you—let us try, through the gigantic glooms, to decipher the flying features of your separate visions.

The shepherd girl that had delivered Franco—she from her dungeon, she from her baiting at the stake, she from her duel with fire, as she entered her last dream—saw Domrémy, saw the fountain of Domrémy, saw the pomp of forests in which her childhood had wandered. That Easter festival which man had denied to her languishing heart—that resurrection of springtime, which the darkness of dungeons had intercepted from her, hungering after the glorious liberty of forests—were by God given back into her hands, as jewels that had been stolen from her by robbers. With those, perhaps (for the minutes of dreams can stretch into ages), was given back to her by God the bliss of childhood. By special privilege for her might be created, in this farewell dream, a second childhood, innocent as the first, but not, like that, sad with the gloom of a fearful mission in the rear. This mission had now been fulfilled. The storm was weathered, the skirts even of that mighty storm were drawing off. The blood that she was to reckon for had been exacted, the tears that she was to shed in secret had been paid to the last. The hatred to herself in all eyes had been faced steadily, had been suffered, had been survived. And in her last fight upon the scaffold she had triumphed gloriously; victoriously she had tasted the stings of death. For all, except this comfort from her farewell dream, she had died—died, amidst the toms of ten thousand enemies—died, amidst the drums and trumpets of armies—died, amidst peals redoubling upon peals, volleys upon volleys, from the saluting clarions of martyrs.

Bishop of Beauvais? because the guilt-hardened man is in dreams haunted and waylaid by the most faithful of his crimes, and because upon that fluctuating mirror—rising (like the mocking mirrors of mirage in Arabian deserts) from the fens of death—most of all are reflected the sweet countenances, which the man has laid in ruins. Therefore I know, bishop, that you also, entering your final dream saw Domrémy. That fountain, of which the witnesses spoke so much, showed itself in your eyes in pure morning dews, but neither dews, nor the holy dawn, could cleanse away the bright spots of innocent blood upon its surface. By the fountain bishop, you saw a woman seated, that hid her face. But, as you draw near, the woman raises her wasted features. Would Domrémy know them again for the features of her child? Ah, but you know them, bishop, well! Oh mercy! what a groan was that which the servants, waiting outside the bishop's dream at his bedside heard from his sighing heart, as at this moment he turned away from the fountain and the woman, seeking rest in the forests afar off. Yet not so to escape the woman whom once again he must behold before he dies. In the forests to which he prays for pity, will he find respite? What a tumult, what a gathering of feet is there! In glades where only wild deer should run, armies and nations are assembling, towering in the fluctuating crowd are phantoms that belong to departed hours. What holding is that which hands so rapid are raising? Is it a martyr's scaffold? Will they burn the child of Domrémy a second time? No, it is a tribunal that rises to the clouds, and two nations stand around it, waiting for a trial. Shall my Lord of Beauvais sit again upon the judgment seat and again number the hours for the innocent? Ah no! he is the prisoner at the bar. Already all is waiting, the mighty audience is gathered, the Court is hurrying to their seats the witnesses are arrayed, the trumpets are sounding, the judge is taking his place. Oh: but this is sudden! My lord, have you no counsel? "Counsel I have none in heaven above, or on earth beneath, counsellor there is none now that would take a brief from me, all are silent." Is it, indeed, come to this? Alas! the time is short, the tumult is wondrous, the crowd stretches away into infinity, but yet I will search in it for somebody to take your brief, I know of somebody that will be your counsel. Who is this that cometh from Domrémy? Who is she in bloody coronation robes from Rouen? Who is she that cometh with blackened flesh from walking the furnaces of Rouen? This is she, the shepherd girl, counsellor that had none for herself, whom I choose, bishop, for yours. She it is, I engage, that shall take my lord's brief. She it is, bishop, that would plead for you; yes, bishop, she,—when heaven and earth are silent.

LEIGH HUNT

The prose of Leigh Hunt synchronises with his verse. It began with his papers in the Examiner, and later on in the Indicator. His sojourn in Italy found expression in his Jar of Honey from Mount Hybla (1848), an agreeable volume warm with the colour and romance of the South. His discursive charin and varied knowledge of London life is exhibited in The Town, while in his Autobiography we have the fullest expression of the man himself, his innate sweetness and beauty of character and his little weaknesses and prejudices. What the Essays of Elia are to Lamb, the Autobiography is to Leigh Hunt.

In his literary methods as essayist, he is akin to Lamb, with something of the same sprightliness, intimate ease, and whimsical charm. What he lacks is the deep tenderness and the high flashes of imagination that mark Lamb's best work. Hunt works on a lower level. But there is great attractiveness about his prose, for his taste was fine, his interests many, and his frank enjoyment of things exhilarating and contagious.

In The Religion of the Heart he tries to express his general attitude towards life, and if as a philosophical credo it seems rather vague and superficial, it at any rate reveals a generous, kindly, and sunny personality. As a delightful trifler in the byways of letters, and as a fine and catholic taste of what is beautiful both in life and literature, he will always be remembered.

CITY TRELS

There is scarcely a street in the city of London, perhaps not one, nor many out of the pale of it, from some part of which the passenger may not discern a tree. Most persons to whom this has been mentioned have doubted the accuracy of our information, nor do we profess hitherto to have ascertained it, though since we heard the assertion we have made a point of endeavouring to do so whenever we could, and have not been disappointed. The mention of the circumstance generally creates a langling astonishment, and a cry of "impossible!" Two persons, who successively heard of it the other day, not only thought it incredible as a general fact, but doubted whether half a dozen streets could be found with a twig in them, and they triumphantly instanced "Cheapside" as a place in which it was "out of the question." Yet in Cheapside is an actual, visible, and even ostentatiously visible tree, to all who have eyes to look about them. It stands at the corner of Wood Street and occupies the space of a house. There was a solitary one the other day in St. Paul's Churchyard, which has now got a multitude of young companions. A little child was shown us a few years back, who was said never to have beheld a tree but that single one in St. Paul's Churchyard. Whenever a tree was mentioned, she thought it was that and no other. She had no conception even of the remote tree in Cheapside! This appears incredible, but there would seem to be no bounds, either to imagination or to the want of it. We were told the other day on good authority, of a man who had resided six and thirty years in the square of St. Peter's at Rome and then for the first time went into the Cathedral.

There is a little garden in Walling Street. It lies completely open to the eye, being divided from the footway by a railing only.

In the body of our work will be found notices of other trees and green spots, that surprise the observer in the thick of the noise and smoke. Many of them are in churchyards. Others have disappeared during the progress of building. Many courts and passages are named from trees that once stood in them, as Vine and Elm Court, Fig tree Court, Green-arbour Court &c. It is not surprising that garden-houses, as they were called, should have formerly abounded in Holborn, in Bunhill Row, and other (at that time) suburban places. We notice the fact, in order to observe how fond the poets were of occupying houses of this description. Milton seems to have made a point of having one. The only London residence of Chapman which is known, was in Old Street Road, doubtless at that time a rural suburb. Beaumont and Fletcher's house, on the Surrey side of the Thames (for they lived as well as wrote together), most probably had a garden, and Dryden's house in Gerard Street looked into the garden of the mansion built by the Earls of Leicester. A tree, or even a flower, put in the window in the streets of a great city (and the London citizens, to their credit, are fond of flowers), affects the eye something in the same way as the hand organs, which bring unexpected music to the ear. They refresh the commonplaces of life, shed a harmony through the busy discord, and appeal to those first sources of emotion, which are associated with the remembrance of all that is young and innocent. They seem also to present to us a portion of the tranquillity we think we are labouring for, and the desire of which is felt as an earnest that we shall realise it somewhere, either in this world or in the next. Above all, they render us more cheerful for the performance of present duties, and the smallest seed of this kind, dropt into the heart of man, is worth more, and may terminate in better fruits, than anybody but a great poet could tell us.

THE DEVELOPMENT OF JOURNALISM

In the domain of prose, the first thirty years of the nineteenth century are richer in essayists than in novelists. Beyond Scott and Jane Austen there are no names of the first importance in fiction, but the era abounds in notable critics and essayists, whether of the elder school represented by Jeffrey, or the new school heralded by Coleridge. We have seen that the Spectator and the Tatler fostered the essay and inaugurated its more intimate and familiar appeal; and while the essay was reared under the protecting wing of Journalism, it still retained its connection with the periodical during the next couple of decades. For a while, however, periodical literature, after the death of Addison and Steele, lost its high distinction. The pay was miserable, and only the hack writer could be relied on to write according to the editor's recipe. But the resuscitation of the Review was at hand, and took place with the launching of the Edinburgh Review.

The appearance of this famous organ, in its familiar livery of "saffron and of blue," was due to the efforts of Francis Jeffrey and of Sydney Smith. After the first number in 1802, Jeffrey became the sole editor. Sydney Smith, writing in 1839, thus describes the meeting of the friends that led to its inauguration:

"One day we happened to meet in the eighth or ninth story or flat in Buccleuch Place, the elevated residence of the then Mr. Jeffrey. I proposed that we should set up a Review, this was acceded to with acclamation. I was appointed Editor, and remained long enough in Edinburgh to edit the first number of the Edinburgh Review. The motto I proposed for the Review was

'Tenui musam meditatur avena.'
'We cultivate literature on a little oatmeal.'

But this was too near the truth to be admitted, and so we took our present grave motto from Publius Lyrus, of whom none of us had, I am sure, ever read a single line, and so began what has since turned out to be a very important and able journal. When I left Edinburgh, it fell into the stronger hands of Lord Jeffrey and Lord Brougham, and reached the highest point of popularity and success."

In this retrospect over the thirty-seven years of the Edinburgh's existence, Sydney Smith could recount many social evils that had been mitigated or entirely abolished, results that were, in part at any rate, achieved by the fearless honesty with which the cause of reform had been advocated by the promoters of the journal. The Emancipation of the Catholics—the repeal of the Test and Corporation Acts—the abolition of Slavery—the modification of the Game Laws and the harsh Penal Code—were a few of the reforms that had been accomplished in 1839.

The main purpose of the earlier reviews was politics. "The Review, in short," said Jeffrey to Scott, "has but two legs to stand upon. Literature no doubt is one of them, and its Right leg is Politics." The political power wielded by the successful Whig organ provoked the Tories to issue, in 1809, the Quarterly Review as a counterblast to the "pernicious" principles of the Edinburgh. For a considerable period the rivals exercised a kind of literary dictatorship which, despite its arrogance and narrowness, did most certainly confer very real benefits on literature. Jeffrey himself, notorious as some of his literary judgments have become, was a man of considerable knowledge and of genuine though narrow critical insight. In the early days of the Review, when the Whig policy was not insistent, Scott was a frequent contributor. If not very versatile or subtle he was a sound critic, and what was unusual in any Quarterly, an amiable one. He proved, moreover, an agreeable and lively writer.

Almost at the opposite pole as a writer was Lord Brougham, brilliant, superficial, and amazingly versatile. Very different to him is the humorist, Sydney Smith, a critic of high standing, and a jester who could play the fool, without being either spiteful or paltzy. After the triumph of the Whigs he became Canon of St. Paul's, and died in February 1845, at the age of seventy-four.

THE "EDINBURGH REVIEW" AND ITS CONTRIBUTORS

SYDNEY SMITH remained long enough in Edinburgh to edit the first number, to which he contributed five articles, one of which was a "slashing attack" on John Bowles, writer of political pamphlets, 1791-1807—thought by Jeffrey to be "too severe," but it was the "slashing" nature of the attacks on persons and abuses that brought the new journal into prominence and gave it a position apart from its milder contemporaries.

The editorship then passed into the hands of Francis Jeffrey, although Sydney Smith continued to write for the Review until 1827, and in the first four numbers no less than eighteen articles were written by him. Tucknor, an American writer, has left on record Sydney Smith's account of the business side of his relations with the Review:

"When I wrote an article I used to send it to Jeffrey, and waited till it came out, immediately after which I enclosed to him a bill in these words, or words like them—Francis Jeffrey, Esq., to Rev Sydney Smith. To a very wise and witty article on such a subject, so many sheets at forty-five guineas a sheet; and the money always came."

Some of the most famous of Sydney Smith's articles were collected and reprinted, Edgeworth on Bulls, Methodism, Indian Missions, Hannah More, Game Laws, Public Schools, Botany Bay. They afford excellent examples of his method of argument and unrivalled humour.

FRANCIS JEFFREY, the clever, versatile lawyer who controlled the destinies of the Review for so many years, was a typical journalist, ready to write about anything and everything at a moment's notice. In addition to performing his duties as editor, duties which in those days involved the revision and alteration of the articles if the views of the authors did not coincide with the principles and avowed policy of the paper, Jeffrey himself wrote two hundred articles, most of which are reviews of books. Jeffrey's name is usually associated with some of his unfortunate judgments in literature: that he disapproved of Wordsworth's poetry—characterised The Daffodils as "stuff," said of The Excursion "This will never do"—is well known, his positive achievements are frequently ignored. Jeffrey made reviewing an art—even if sometimes the art of the slaughter-house. He did more than cut the pages of a book—he read it, gave a clear summary of the contents, and delivered his verdict in accordance with his own honest if somewhat circumscribed convictions.

If Jeffrey did not approve of the Lake poets, or romantic poetry in general, he praises Keats for his real merits, although opposition to the Quarterly may have stimulated him in his search for them.

Jeffrey's literary judgments were vitiated by a constitutional pessimism that inclined him to despair of his own times. He considered "the age of original genius was over," and in a paragraph in which he speaks of the rich melodies of Keats and Shelley, "the tuneful quartets of Southey," "the fantastical emphasis of Wordsworth," the "plebeian pathos of Crabbe," and the "splendid strains of Moore," it is to regret that their work is passing into oblivion—while the two poets who show no signs of diminishing popularity are Rogers and Campbell!

A violent Whig in politics, Jeffrey was a conservative in literature, and considered the classical school of poetry, as represented by Pope, the ideal standard. In spite of these defects Jeffrey did much to spread a love of good literature, and to raise the level of public taste. Jeffrey had also a sure instinct for a brilliant passage—and is especially good in giving a general summary of a period.

Scott and Southey both wrote for the Edinburgh for a short time, but the extreme political views of Jeffrey alienated the sympathy of the more moderate.

Southey, writing to Scott in 1807, says he has scarcely one opinion in common with the Edinburgh. Two years later, Southey became a contributor to the newly established Quarterly.

FRANCIS HORNER, the great friend of Sydney Smith, and like Brougham, one of the founders of the Edinburgh, wrote on political economy. He preceded Sydney to London, and when the latter arrived he found Horner established very "high up in Garden Court," engaged "in thinking a good deal about mankind."

Horner's abilities and sincerities soon brought him success at the Bar, he entered Parliament, where he speedily became an authority on questions of currency. His early death was a loss both to literature and politics.

With Horner may be associated another writer for the Edinburgh, Sir JAMES MACKINTOSH, "a man of vast learning," whom Sydney Smith described as "having waded through immensities of international law where the steps of no living man could follow him." Mackintosh had, like Macaulay, a prodigious memory, and he was noted for his conversational powers. Rogers, the poet, lamented that he sacrificed everything to maintain his reputation in the art. Mackintosh wrote A History of England, a Life of Sir Thomas More, and a Dissertation on the Progress of Ethical Philosophy—that received strong criticism at the hands of James Mill—but nothing that he wrote has any permanent interest.

LORD BROUGHAM was one of the most voluminous contributors, and wrote no less than eighty articles in five years, on a variety of topics. Brougham was, however, essentially an orator and politician, and the whole of his writing, like that of Mackintosh, has perished. Indeed, Brougham's political influence waned some years before his death.

Brougham was the author of the attack on Byron's youthful poems Hours of Idleness, that provoked the poet to pour forth the vials of his wrath in English Rards and Scotch Reviewers. Byron thought the attack had been instigated by Lord Holland, "drank three bottles of claret," and sat down to write his reply.

"As to the Edinburgh Reviewers, it would indeed require a Hercules to crush the Hydra, but if the author succeeds in merely 'bruising one of the heads of the serpent' though his own hand should suffer in the encounter, he will be amply satisfied."

Macaulay made a reputation in the Edinburgh Review by his brilliant essays that began to appear about 1825. Macaulay's genius lay in his historical rather than in his critical powers. "I am nothing," he says, "if not historical." His bright, lucid, masterly presentation of facts in order to convey inferences that were acceptable to himself and his age, made him exceedingly popular.

Macaulay's contributions to the Edinburgh were reprinted and published under the title of Critical and Historical Essays. They were intended to be reviews of books—in reality the book afforded Macaulay an excuse for delivering his own views on the subject in question. He usually devoted a few lines to the book itself, and then wrote a dissertation on the subject.

THE "QUARTERLY" AND ITS CONTRIBUTORS

The first number of the Quarterly was issued in 1809 under the editorship of WILLIAM GIFFORD, who with Canning, Frère, and Ellis, had been associated in the production of the Anti-Jacobin. Gifford exercised a rigid censorship over the contributors to the Review that occasioned some annoyance to Lamb and Southey. Those were the days of the unsigned article and the editorial "we." Writers were expected to remain anonymous, although the veil was sometimes very transparent. Gifford objected to Southey's prose as being "too distinctive," and revised his articles.

Much of the bitterness and unfairness that is characteristic of journalistic writing at this period must be assigned to two reasons—the political bias of the early reviews, and the custom of unsigned articles united with editorial autocracy. Attacks that might safely be delivered under cover, and as the settled judgment of a panel of literary dictators could not be carried on in the open, and the advent of the signed article introduced more politeness and a more genial point of view. Up to the advent of Coleridge, it was well called the "hang—draw—and quarterly Review."

In 1824 S. T. COLERIDGE became editor for a short period, and then the reins passed into the hands of J. G. LOCKHART, who devoted the main energies of a lifetime to the task. Lockhart had been educated at Glasgow University, and thence had proceeded to Oxford by means of a scholarship. He was called to the Bar at Edinburgh just at the time the Edinburgh Magazine was started. Lockhart was an excellent classical scholar, and also possessed a knowledge of modern languages that was less common at this period. He translated some Spanish ballads, (1823), and was acquainted with German and Italian literature. Lockhart had visited Germany and seen Goethe, and this event laid the foundation of his friendship with Scott, whose son-in-law he became in 1820. In 1825 he came to London as editor of the Quarterly. Lockhart's chief title to fame rests upon his biographies of Scott and Burns, as a critic he earned for himself the title of "the scorpion," although he is not responsible for all the attacks that have been laid to his charge. It was indeed an unkind fate that made him for twenty-eight years a critic and reviewer in days when critics possessed a licence to abuse not only the work of an author, but even personal character. Lockhart grew older and wiser and did not repeat the sins of his youth—perpetrated in connection with Blackwood—but he never learnt to bring to his judgments in literature that "air of detachment" so necessary to forming unbiased estimates. His own personal predilections counted for much; he could not bear anything suggestive of Keats, and as a rule did not care for new poets.

JOHN WILSON CROKER, "a narrow-souled critic" or letters, whose connection with the Quarterly lasted forty-five years, wrote no less than two hundred and fifty-eight articles. He was a careful and painstaking investigator, and edited a noteworthy edition of Boswell's Life of Johnson—but in common with many other writers for the reviews, his work has not survived in literature.

SIR JOHN BARROW—a traveller, statesman, and Chinese savant—wrote accounts of his voyages and travels. HALLAM and SHARON TURNER wrote on history. Turner wrote a History of the Anglo-Saxons, giving extracts from their literature and accounts of laws that is still of value. Hallam's work as an historian is well known. MALTEUS and SENIOR wrote on political economy. SCOTT contributed about thirty articles (1809–32), on a variety of subjects.

SOUTHEY, also a prolific writer for the reviews, wrote a hundred articles. Of all this mass, few are worth reading to-day: Scott on Miss Austen, Ellis on The Lord of the Isles and The Corsair, others remain as curiosities of literary criticism, and amongst those may be mentioned the review that "snuffed out Keats."

"BLACKWOOD'S MAGAZINE"

The dissatisfaction of the Scottish Tories with the extreme Whig views of the Edinburgh led to the founding of Blackwood's Edinburgh Magazine in 1817. It succeeded the short-lived Edinburgh Monthly, and made its startling debut under the auspices of Wilson and Lockhart.

JOHN WILSON (1785–1854), had achieved a reputation at Oxford for his intellectual abilities, also for his athletic powers. Leaving the University he settled at Elloray, near Windermere, and devoted himself to authorship, and became intimate with the "Lake Poets." The Isle of Palms (1812), his first volume of poems, was succeeded by The City of the Plague (1816). The loss of his fortune drew Wilson to Edinburgh, then the literary hub of the country. Wilson found himself unable to agree with Jeffrey and threw in his lot with Blackwood's Magazine—"Maga," as it came to be called.

The new Edinburgh attained considerable notoriety during the first year of existence for its "rabid performances," the chief and foremost of which was the famous Chaldee MS., that ridiculed in daring and witty fashion the previous editors, Pringle and Cleghorn, besides other writers of greater eminence. Attacks were made on Playfair, Coleridge's Biographia Literaria (Wilson), The Cockney School of Poetry (Lockhart)—Keats. On the other hand, the new journal was much more favourable to the work of the Lake poets, and the first really enthusiastic criticism of Wordsworth appeared in its pages from the pen of Wilson.

Wilson possessed a geniality of temperament entirely foreign to Lockhart, and praised and blamed with equal extravagance. His wealth of expression, abundant ideas, humour and happy irresponsibility, found felicitous outflow in the Noctes Ambrosianae, at first the joint production of Lockhart, Hogg, Maginn, and others, but which eventually became exclusively identified with "Christopher North."

The Noctes were a mixed medley of prose, verse, criticism, description, and their quality varies in like manner. Passages of singular beauty and power are mingled with others that are commonplace and highflown. The character of the "Ettrick Shepherd" has been praised by Fernier, who edited a reprint of the Notes, as "one of the finest and most finished creations which dramatic genius has ever called into existence."

The Recreations of Christopher North (1842) is of the same genus as the Notes. The Trials of Margaret Lindsay (1823) and Lights and Shadows of Scottish Life (1822) are earlier works that do not reach the level of the Notes.

As a critic, Wilson belongs to an intermediate school, his early association with the Lake poets led him to give them sympathetic appreciation. He proclaimed Wordsworth, Scott, and Byron as the three great master-spirits in our day in the poetical world.

But Wilson, unlike Jeffrey, had no system in his criticism, and frequently awarded praise or censure according to the mood of the moment, hence his criticisms are often contradictory.

THE MAGAZINES

A good deal of rivalry existed between Blackwood's Edinburgh and the London Magazine, established in the South by the more moderate Liberals. The reviews were serious performances, the "heavy cannon" of literature—whereas the magazines may be compared to the "light artillery." Fiction and creative literature, even humour was welcomed by the magazines; the writers were drawn from a younger generation and numbered men who were neutral in politics, and non-partisan methods became more general. A brilliant and versatile band of writers gathered round the new periodicals.

Lamb wrote his Essays of Elia for the London Magazine; De Quincey his Confessions of an Opium-Eater; Hood and Hazlitt and Miss Mitford some of their best prose.

Blackwood's in its earlier years had the services of the extraordinary and erratic Irishman, MAGINN. For some years a schoolmaster in Cork, Maginn drifted from Edinburgh to London, where he accomplished the most notable achievement of his life in helping to found, with the assistance of HUGH FRASER, a London Blackwood known as Fraser's Magazine (1830). Maginn attracted to the new periodical men of the most varied talent and genius, amongst whom were "Father Prout" (Francis Mahony), Carlyle, whose Sartor Resartus threatened to bring financial ruin on the paper, Southey, Coleridge, "Barry Cornwall," Ainsworth, Hoag, and Thackeray. In the hands of such men it is not surprising that literature became the Right leg of the Magazines.

ON BURNS

One other remark is of a more limited application, and is addressed chiefly to the followers and patrons of that new school of poetry against which we have thought it our duty to neglect no opportunity of testifying. Those gentlemen are outrageous for simplicity, and we beg leave to recommend to them the simplicity of Burns. He has copied the spoken language of passion and affection with infinitely more fidelity than they have ever done, on all occasions which properly admitted of such adaptation. But he has not rejected the helps of elevated language and habitual associations, nor debased his composition by an affectation of babyish interjections and all the pining expletives of an old nursery maid's vocabulary. They may look long enough among his nervous and manly lines, before they find any 'Good lacks! Dear hearts!'—or, 'As a body may say,' in them; or any stuff about dancing daffodils and sister Emmelines. Let them think with what infinite contempt the powerful mind of Burns would have perused the story of Alice Fell and her duffle cloak of Andrew Jones and the half-crown, or of Little Dan without breeches, and his thievish grandfather. Let them contrast their own fantastical personages of hysterical schoolmasters and sententious leechgatherers, with the authentic rustics of Burns' Cottar's Saturday Night, and his inimitable songs, and reflect on the different reception which those personifications have met with from the public. Though they will not be reclaimed from their puny affectations by the example of their learned predecessors, they may, perhaps, submit to be admonished by a self-taught and illiterate poet, who drew from Nature far more correctly than they can do, and produced something so much liker the admired copies of the masters whom they have abjured.

ON SWIFT

Of his style, it has been usual to speak with great, and, we think, exaggerated praise. It is less mellow than Dryden's, less elegant than Pope's or Addison's, less noble than Lord Bolingbroke's, and utterly without the glow and loftiness which belonged to our earlier masters. It is radically a low and homely style, without grace and without affectation, and chiefly remarkable for a great choice and profusion of common words and expressions. Other writers who have used a plain and direct style have been for the most part jejune and limited in their diction, and generally give us an impression of the poverty as well as the tameness of their language; but Swift, without ever trespassing into figured or poetical expressions, or ever employing a word that can be called fine or pedantic, has a prodigious variety of good set phrases always at his command, and displays a sort of homely richness, like the plenty of an old English dinner, or the wardrobe of a wealthy burgher. This taste for the plain and substantial was fatal to his poetry, which subsists not on such elements; but was in the highest degree favourable to the effect of his humour, very much of which depends on the imposing gravity with which it is delivered, and on the various turns and heightenings it may receive from a rapidly shifting and always appropriate expression. Almost all his works after the Tale of a Tub seem to have been written very fast, and with very little minute care of the diction. For his own ease, therefore, it is probable they were all pitched on a low key, and set about on the ordinary tone of a familiar letter or conversation, as that from which there was little hazard from falling, even in moments of negligence, and from which any rise that could be effected must always be easy and conspicuous. . . . Half of the affectation and offensive pretension we meet with in authors, arises from a want of matter, and the other half from a paltry ambition of being eloquent and ingenious out of place. Swift had complete confidence in himself, and had too much real business on his hands, to be at leisure to intrigue for the fame of a fine writer, in consequence of which, his writings are more admired by the judicious than if he had bestowed all his attention on their style. He was so much a man of business indeed, and so much accustomed to consider his writings merely as means for the attainment of a practical end—whether that end was the strengthening of a party, or the wounding a foe—that he not only disclaimed the reputation of a composer of pretty sentences, but seems to have been thoroughly indifferent to all sorts of literary fame. He enjoyed the notoriety and influence which he had procured by his writings, but it was the glory of having carried his point, and not of having written well, that he valued. As soon as his publications had served their turn, they seem to have been entirely forgotten by their author,—and, dearous as he was of being richer, he appears to have thought as little of making money as immortality by means of them.¹

NOODLE'S ORATION

I ask the honourable gentleman if this is the time for carrying the measure into execution—whether, in fact, a more unfortunate period could have been selected than that which he has chosen? If this were an ordinary measure, I should not oppose it with so much vehemence, but, sir, it calls in question the wisdom of an irrevocable law—of a law passed at the memorable period of the Revolution. What right have we, sir, to break down this firm column on which the great men of that age stamped a character of eternity? Are not all authorities against this measure—Pitt, Fox, Cicero, and the Attorney and Solicitor General? The proposition is new, sir; it is the first time it was ever heard in this house. I am not prepared, sir—this house is not prepared—to receive it. The measure implies a distrust of his Majesty's Government; their disapproval is sufficient to warrant opposition. Precaution only is requisite where danger is apprehended. Here the high character of the individuals in question is a sufficient guarantee against any ground of alarm. Give not, then, your sanction to this measure, for, whatever be its character, if you do give your sanction to it, the same man by whom this is proposed, will propose to you others to which it will be impossible to give your consent. I care very little, sir, for the ostensible measure; but what is there behind? What are the honourable gentleman's future schemes? If we pass this bill, what fresh concessions may he not require? What further degradation is he planning for our country? Talk of evil and inconvenience, sir! look to other countries—study other aggregations and societies of men, and then see whether the laws of this country demand a remedy or deserve a panegyric. Was the honourable gentleman (let me ask him) always of this way of thinking? Do I not remember when he was the advocate in this house of very opposite opinions? I not only quarrel with his present sentiments, sir, but I declare very frankly I do not like the party with which he acts. If his own motives were as pure as possible, they cannot but suffer contamination from those with whom he is politically associated. This measure may be a boon to the constitution, but I will accept no favour to the constitution from such hands. (Loud cries of "Hear, hear!") I profess myself, sir, an honest and upright member of the British Parliament, and I am not afraid to profess myself an enemy to all change and innovation. I am satisfied with things as they are, and it will be my pride and pleasure to hand down this country to my children as I received it from those who preceded me. The honourable gentleman pretends to justify the severity with which he has attacked the noble lord who presides over the Court of Chancery. But I say such attacks are pregnant with mischief to government itself. Oppose ministers, you oppose government, disgrace ministers, you disgrace government, bring ministers into contempt, you bring government into contempt; and anarchy and civil war are the consequences. Besides, sir, the measure is unnecessary. Nobody complains of disorder in that shape in which it is the aim of your measure to propose a remedy to it. The business is one of the greatest importance, there is need of the greatest caution and circumspection. Do not let us be precipitate, sir, it is impossible to foresee all consequences. Everything should be gradual, the example of a neighbouring nation should fill us with alarm? The honourable gentleman has taxed me with illiberality, sir. I deny the charge. I hate innovation, but I love improvement. I am an enemy to the corruption of government, but I defend its influence. I dread reform, but I dread it only when it is intemperate. I consider the liberty of the press as the great palladium of the constitution; but at the same time I hold the licentiousness of the press in the greatest abhorrence. Nobody is more conscious than I am of the splendid abilities of the honourable mover, but I tell him at once, his scheme is too good to be practicable. It savours of Utopia.¹

A VILLAGE EPISODE

There is a village (no matter where) in which the inhabitants, on one day in the year, sit down to a dinner prepared at the common expense; by an extraordinary piece of tyranny (which Lord Hawkesbury would call the wisdom of village ancestors), the inhabitants of three of the streets, about a hundred years ago, seized upon the inhabitants of the fourth street, bound them hand and foot, laid them upon their backs, and compelled them to look on while the rest were stuffing themselves with beef and beer, the next year the inhabitants of the persecuted street (though they contributed an equal quota of the expense) were treated precisely in the same manner. This tyranny grew into a custom, and (as the manner of nature is) it was considered as the most sacred of all duties to keep those poor fellows without their annual dinner, the village was so tenacious of this practice, that nothing could induce them to renounce it, every enemy to it was looked upon as a disbeliever in Divine Providence, and any nefarious churchwarden who wished to succeed in his election had nothing to do but to represent his antagonist as an abolitionist, in order to frustrate his ambition, endanger his life, and throw the village into a state of the most dreadful commotion. By degrees, however, the obnoxious street grew to be so well peopled, and its inhabitants so firmly united, that their oppressors, more afraid of injustice, were more disposed to be just. At the next dinner, they are unbound, the year after allowed to sit upright, then a bit of bread and a glass of water, till at last, after a long series of concessions, they were emboldened to ask, in pretty plain terms, that they may be allowed to sit down at the bottom of the table, and to fill their bellies as well as the rest. Forthwith a general cry of shame and scandal. "Ten years ago, were you not laid upon your backs? Don't you remember what a great thing you thought it to get a piece of bread? How thankful you were for cheese-parings? Have you forgotten that memorable era, when the lord of the manor interfered to obtain for you a slice of the public pudding? And now, with an audacity only equalled by your ingratitude, you have the impudence to ask for knives and forks, and to request, in terms too plain to be mistaken, that you may sit down to table with the rest, and be indulged even with beef and beer, there are not more than half-a-dozen dishes, which we have reserved for ourselves, the rest has been thrown upon you in the utmost profusion, you have potatoes, and carrots, suet dumplings, sops in the pan, and delicious toast and water, in incredible quantities. Beef, mutton, lamb, pork, and veal, are ours, and if you were not the most restless and dissatisfied of human beings, you would never think of aspiring to enjoy them."²

THE CHARACTER OF WALTER SCOTT

No man was a firmer or more indefatigable friend I know not he ever lost one—and a few with whom, during the energetic middle stage of life, from political differences or other accidental circumstances, he lived less familiarly, had all gathered round him, and renewed the full warmth of early affection in his later days. There was enough to dignify the connection in their eyes; but nothing to chill it on either side. The imagination that so completely mastered him when he chose to give her the rein, was kept under most determined control when any of the positive obligations of active life came into question. A high and pure sense of duty presided over whatever he had to do as a citizen and a magistrate and as a landlord, he considered his estate as an extension of his hearth.

Of his political creed, the many who hold a different one will of course say that it was the natural fruit of his poetical devotion to the mere prejudice of antiquity; and I am quite willing to allow that this must have had a great share in the matter—and that he himself would have been as little ashamed of the word prejudice as of the word antiquity. Whenever Scotland could be considered as standing separate on any question from the rest of the empire, he was not only apt, but eager to embrace the opportunity of again rehoisting, as it were, the old signal of national independence, and I sincerely believe that no circumstance in his literary career gave him so much personal satisfaction as the success of Malachi Malagrowther's Epistles. He confesses, however, in his diary, that he was aware how much it became him to summon calm reason to battle imaginative prepossessions on this score; and I am not aware that they ever led him into any serious political error. He delighted in letting his fancy run wild about ghosts and witches and horoscopes—but I venture to say, had he sat on the judicial bench a hundred years before he was born, no man would have been more certain to give juries sound direction in estimating the pretended evidence of supernatural occurrences of any sort, and I believe, in like manner, that had any anti-English faction, civil or religious, sprung up in his own time in Scotland, he would have done more than any other living man could have hoped to do, for putting it down. He was on all practical points a steady, conscientious Tory of the school of William Pitt; who, though an anti-revolutionist, was certainly anything but an anti-reformer. He rejected the innovations, in the midst of which he died, as a revival, under alarmingly authoritative auspices, of the doctrines which had endangered Britain in his youth, and desolated Europe throughout his prime of manhood. May the gloomy anticipations which hung over his closing years be unfulfilled! But should they be so, let posterity remember the warnings and the resistance of his and other powerful intellects, were probably in that event the appointed means for averting a catastrophe in which had England fallen, the whole civilised world must have been involved.

Sir Walter received a strictly religious education under the eye of parents, whose virtuous conduct was in unison with the principles they desired to instil into their children. From the great doctrines thus recommended he appears never to have swerved, but he must be numbered among the many who have incurred considerable risk in doing so, in consequence of the rigidity with which Presbyterian heads of families, in Scotland, were used to enforce compliance with various relics of the puritanical observance. He took up, early in life, a repugnance to the mode in which public worship is conducted in the Scottish Establishment; and adhered to the ester Church, whose system of government and discipline he believed to be the fairest copy of the primitive polity, and whose litanies and collects he revered as having been transmitted to us from the age immediately succeeding that of the Apostles. The few passages in his diaries, in which he alludes to his own religious feelings and practices, show clearly the sober, serene, and elevated frame of mind in which he habitually contemplated man's relations with his Maker the modesty with which he shrank from indulging either the presumption of reason, or the extravagance of imagination, in the province of Faith; his humble reliance on the wisdom and mercy of God; and his firm belief that we are placed in this state of existence, not to speculate about another, but to prepare ourselves for it by active exertion of our intellectual faculties, and the constant cultivation of kindness and benevolence towards our fellow-men.¹

A FAIRY'S FUNERAL

There it was, on a little river island, that once, whether sleeping or waking we know not, we saw celebrated a

Fairy's Funeral. First we heard small pipes playing as if no bigger than hollow rushes that whisper in the night winds; and more piteous than aught that trills from earthly instrument was the scarce audible dirge! It seemed to float over the stream, every foam-bell emitting a plaintive note, till the airy anthem came floating over our couch, and then alighted without footsteps among the heather. The pattering of little feet was then heard, as if living creatures were arranging themselves in order, and then there was nothing but a more ordered hymn. The harmony was like the melting of musical dewdrops, and sang, without words, of sorrow and death. We opened our eyes, or rather sight came to them when closed, and dream was vision! Hundreds of creatures, no taller than the crest of a lapwing, and all hanging down their veiled heads, stood in a circle on a green plot among the rocks, and in the midst was a bier, framed as it seemed of flowers unknown to the Highland hills; and on the bier a Fairy, lying with uncovered face, pale as the hly and motionless as the snow. The dirge grew fainter and fainter, and then died quite away; when two of the creatures came from the circle, and took their station, one at the head and the other at the foot of the bier. They sang alternate measures, not louder than the twittering of the awakened wood-lark before it goes up the dewy air, but dolorous and full of the desolation of death. The flower-bier stirred, for the spot on which it lay sank slowly down, and in a few moments the greensward was smooth as ever—the very dews glittering above the buried Fairy. A cloud passed over the moon, and, with a choral lament, the funeral troop sailed dusky away, heard afar off, so still was the midnight solitude of the glen. Then the disenthralled Orchy began to rejoice as before through all the streams and falls, and at the sudden leaping of the waters and outbursting of the moon, we awoke.

Age is the season of imagination; youth of passion; and having been long young, shall we repune that we are now old? They alone are rich who are full of years—the Lords of Time's Treasury are all on the staff of Wisdom, their commissions are enclosed in furrows on their foreheads, and secured to them for life. Fearless of fate, and far above fortune, they hold their heritage by the great charter of nature for behoof of all her children, who have not like impatient heirs, to wait for their decrease, for every hour dispenses their wealth, and their bounty is not a late bequest but a perpetual benefaction. Death but sanctifies their gifts to gratitude, and their worth is more clearly seen and profoundly felt within the solemn gloom of the grave.

And said we truly that Age is the season of Imagination? that Youth is the season of Passion your own beating and bounding hearts now tell you—your own boiling blood. Intensity is its characteristic; and it burns like a flame of fire, too often but to consume. Expansion of the soul is ours, with all its feelings and all its "thoughts, that wander through eternity", nor needeth then the spirit to have wings, for power is given her, beyond the dove's or the eagle's, and no weariness can touch her on that heavenward flight.

Yet we are all of 'the earth earthly,' and young and old alike, must we love and honour our home. Your eyes are bright—ours are dim, but 'it is the soul that sees,' and "this diurnal sphere" is visible through the mist of tears. In that light how more than beautiful—how holy—appears even this world! All sadness, save of sin, is then most sacred; and sin itself loses its terrors in repentance, which alas! is seldom perfect but in the near prospect of dissolution. For temptation may intercept her within a few feet of her expected rest, nay dash the dust from her hand that she has gathered from the burial-place to strew on her head, but Youth sees flowery fields and shining rivers far stretching before her path, and cannot imagine for a moment that among life's golden mountains there is many a Place of Tombs!²

II PROSE (d) HISTORY AND SOCIAL POLITICS. History: Mitford—Coxe—Roscoe—Lingard—Hallam—Napier—Milman. Social Politics: Godwin—Mary Wollstonecraft—Paine—Cobbett—Bentham—Adam Smith—Ricardo—Malthus.

INTRODUCTORY

AN age of romanticism seems at first sight to favour such a study of the past, as would stimulate historical research, and in the long run it certainly does so. Scott did more than actualise and visualise folklore, he popularised history. He had the true historical spirit that seeks to harmonise the present and the past by showing that they are organically connected. Shelley and Landor brought before the modern reader the life and spirit of ancient Greece and Rome, Keats and Coleridge did as much as Scott, though in a different way, to make men understand the Catholic Middle Ages.

Yet the epoch is an arid one in historical literature; the promise of Gibbon's age had not been redeemed; and historical research makes no great move till we come to Macaulay and Carlyle.

How are we to reconcile these comparatively tenuous results, with the historical stimulus, so clearly given by the great romantic writers? The reply is that the best historical work of the time is not to be found in its formal histories but in its romances, its poems, its books of travel. In the African Travels of Mungo Park, and the Arctic Explorations of Parry, the historical novels of Scott and his many followers, the Eastern romances of Maturn, the Spanish verse of Southey, we shall best see the new interest imparted to history by romanticism. Spain, Germany, Italy, Greece, Persia, are no longer merely geographical names to the ordinary reader, they are centres of life, thought, and inspiration. Yet, if compared with other departments of literature, the roll of names in direct historical research is not an imposing one, it is none the less a useful and influential one, if we have no names to compare with Michelet in France and Niebuhr in Germany, yet such men as William Coxe, William Roscoe, John Lingard, and Henry Hallam did useful spade work, along sounder lines than did the generation preceding.

Some of these men, therefore, claim consideration here, inasmuch as they prepared the soil for the generation that followed.

In Social Politics, there is more to be said. The age is peculiarly rich in speculative thought bearing upon political problems. Godwin and Paine try to impress upon English life the democratic theories of the French Revolution, Cobbett gives articulate expression to the cause of the agricultural poor; Bentham clarifies the confused medley of our jurisprudence; while Ricardo, and his rival Malthus, view economic conditions from a fresh and vigorous standpoint. Incidentally, also, the scholarship of Sir James Mackintosh, and the critical genius of Samuel Taylor Coleridge, add materially to the political theorising of the time, from a more conservative point of view.

HISTORY

WILLIAM MITFORD (1744–1827) has been hailed as a pioneer of Greek studies. He was an uncompromising Tory of the unphilosophic type, and as a narrative writer has some merit. Perhaps his chief claim to remembrance lies in the fact that he provoked Grote to write his big work.

Mitford, the friend of Gibbon, was a Tory Member of Parliament, and a colonel of Hampshire Militia. A certain liveliness of style gives interest of a kind to his work, which served to bridge the span between the great historians of the type of Gibbon, and the Victorian school of history that starts with Macaulay.

WILLIAM COXE (1747–1828) helped, by his ungrudging industry among the archives of Vienna, to provide us with the history of the Hapsburgs. His History of the House of Austria and Memoirs of the Kings of Spain and the House of Bourbon is still serviceable as a reference book, though largely superseded as a constructive history.

A more interesting figure is WILLIAM ROSCOE (1753–1831), a wealthy banker in the North of England, a man of artistic tastes and humanitarian sympathies. He made good use of the Italian archives in his Life of Lorenzo de Medici, and in so far as he deals with art rather than the social and religious life of the time, he proves a good guide.

JOHN LINGARD (1771–1851) was a devout Catholic, and it says much for his judicial manner that, despite a natural tendency to be one-sided, he succeeded in writing a History of England that could only annoy the extremists. It is really an admirable piece of work, not merely fair and generous in temper, but vivid and interesting. He revised his work in three successive editions, and though much of it—the mediæval and Stuart portion especially—gave a point of view that has long since fallen into decrepitude, his Reformation chapters have still a freshness and vitality even to-day. His style is clear and easy, his scholarship careful and judicious, and if he is frankly a man with a special point of view, yet these views are stated with breadth and moderation, and with a real attempt to get at original sources.

HENRY HALLAM (1777–1859) was judicial by nature, as Lingard was by design, and his scholarship was greater than that of the contemporaries of whom we have been speaking. He was a keen student of the politics of his time, though never a politician; and in his clear and cool presentment of history exhibited all the virtues as well as the accompanying defects of the trained lawyer. His View of the State of Europe during the Middle Ages (1818) is an admirable piece of historical erudition and sobriety; while his Constitutional History of England (1827) still remains as a valuable storehouse for the modern historical student. In tone and temper he reminds one more of the age of "common sense"; but in his study of original documents he shows that curiosity about the past which is one of the characteristics of romanticism.

No record of Hallam's work, however brief, can ignore his Introduction to the Literature of Europe in the 15th, 16th, and 17th Centuries (1837-39); a scholarly digest of the thought and culture of the West. The soberness of style and the coolness of manner that offend some full-blooded readers, incline one to do less than justice to a work that has many solid merits. The chief defect of the book lies in its arbitrary arrangement of subject matter, and in a certain dryness of treatment. It lacks perspective, and this in an introduction is a weighty drawback. But it is fair and scholarly and in the treatment of more purely intellectual matter, valuable and interesting. He is broad and generous too, in many of his estimates, and can admire, genuinely and warmly, writers so diverse as Spenser and Rabelais.

THE LITERATURE OF EUROPE

Spenser is naturally compared with Ariosto. "Fierce wars and faithful loves did moralise the song" of both poets. But in the constitution of their minds in the character of their poetry they were almost the reverse of each other. The Italian is gay, rapid, ardent; his pictures shift like the hues of heaven; even while diffuse, he seems to leave in an instant what he touches, and is prolix by the number, not the duration of his images. Spenser is habitually serious, his slow stanza seems to suit the temper of his genius; he loves to dwell on the sweetness and beauty which his fancy portrays. The ideal of chivalry, rather derived from its didactic theory than from the precedents of romance, is always before him; his morality is pure and even stern, with nothing of the libertine tone of Ariosto. He worked with far worse tools than the bard of Ferrara, with a language not quite formed, and into which he rather injudiciously poured an unnecessary archaism, while the style of his contemporaries was undergoing a rapid change in the opposite direction. His stanza of nine lines is particularly inconvenient and languid in narrowness, where the Italian octave is sprightly and vigorous, though even this becomes ultimately monotonous by its regularity, a fault from which only the ancient hexameter and our blank verse are exempt.

Spenser may be justly said to excel Ariosto in originality of invention, in force and variety of character, in strength and vividness of conception, in depth of reflection, in fertility of imagination, and above all, in that exclusively poetical cast of feeling which discerns in everything what common minds do not perceive. In the construction and arrangement of their fable neither deserves much praise; but the siege of Paris gives the Orlando Furioso, spite of its perpetual shiftings of the scene, rather more unity in the reader's apprehension than belongs to the Faerie Queene. Spenser is, no doubt, decidedly inferior in ease and liveliness of narration as well as in clearness and felicity of language. But upon thus comparing the two poets, we have little reason to blush for our countryman. Yet the fame of Ariosto is spread through Europe, while Spenser is almost unknown out of England, and even in this age, when much of our literature is so widely diffused, I have not observed proofs of much acquaintance with him on the Continent.

The language of Spenser like that of Shakespeare, is an instrument manufactured for the sake of the work it was to perform. No other poet had written like either, though both have had their imitators. It is rather apparently obsolete by his partiality to certain disused forms, such as the y before the participle, than from any close resemblance to the diction of Chaucer or Lydgate. The enfolding expletives do and did, though certainly very common in our early writers, had never been employed with such an unfortunate predilection as by Spenser. Their everlasting recurrence is among the great blemishes of his style. His versification is in many passages beautifully harmonious, but he has frequently permitted himself, whether for the sake of variety or from some other cause, to baulk the ear in the conclusion of a stanza.

THE STATE OF EUROPE

So long as the three great nations of Europe were unable to put forth their natural strength through internal separation or foreign war, the Italian had so little to dread for their independence that their policy was altogether directed to regulating the domestic balance of power among themselves. In the latter part of the fifteenth century a more enlarged view of Europe would have manifested the necessity of reconciling petty animosities and sacrificing petty ambition in order to preserve the nationality of their governments, not by attempting to melt down Lombards and Neapolitans, principalities and republics, into a single monarchy, but by the more just and rational scheme of a common federation. The politicians of Italy were abundantly competent, as far as coolness and understanding could render them, to perceive the interests of their country. But it is the will of Providence that the highest and surest wisdom, even in matters of policy, should never be unconnected with virtue. In relieving himself from an immediate danger, Ludovico Sforza overlooked the consideration that the presumptive heir of the king of France claimed by an ancient title that principality of Milan which he was compassing by usurpation and murder. But neither Milan nor Naples was free from other claimants than France, nor was she reserved to enjoy unmolested the spoil of Italy. A louder and louder strain of warlike dissonance will be heard from the banks of the Danube and from the Mediterranean gulf. The dark and wily Ferdinand, the rash and lively Maximilian, are preparing to hasten into the lists, the schemes of ambition are assuming a more comprehensive aspect and the controversy of Neapolitan succession is to expand into the long rivalry between the houses of France and Austria. But here, while Italy is still untouched, and before as yet the first lances of France gleam along the dingles of the Alps, we close the history of the Middle Ages.

SIR WILLIAM NAPIER was born in 1785 and died in 1860. His History of the Peninsular War (1828-40) is a brilliant and memorable piece of work.

BATTLE OF FUENTES ONORO

It was Massena's intention to commence the attack at daybreak on the 5th but a delay of two hours occurred, and all his movements were detected. The eighth corps, withdrawn from Alameda, and supported by all the French cavalry, was seen marching above the village of Pego Velho, which with its swampy wood, was occupied by Houston's left, his right being thrown back in the plain towards Nava d'Ayer. The sixth corps and Drouot's division took ground to their own left, still keeping a division in front of Fuentes Onoro; meaning that point, at this sight the light division and the English horse hastened to the support of Houston while the first and third divisions made a movement parallel to that of the sixth corps. The latter, however, drove the left wing of the seventh division from the village of Pego Velho, and it was fast gaining ground in the wood also when the riflemen of the light division arrived, there restored the fight. The French cavalry then passed Pego Velho and commenced forming in order of battle on the plain, between the wood and hill of Nava d'Ayer where Julian Sanchez was posted. He immediately retired across the Turones, partly in fear, but more in anger, because his lieutenant having foolishly ridden close up to the enemy making many violent gestures, was mistaken for a French officer and shot by a soldier of the guards before the action commenced.

Montbrun occupied himself with this weak party for an hour, and when the guerrilla chief was gone, turned the right of the seventh division, and charged the British cavalry, which had moved up to its support; the combat was unequal, for by an abuse too common, so many men had been drawn from the ranks as orderlies to general officers, and for other purposes, that not more than a thousand English troopers were in the field. The French therefore drove in all the cavalry outguards at the first shock, out off Ramsay's battery of horse artillery, and came sweeping in upon the reserves of cavalry and upon the seventh division. Their leading squadrons, approaching in a disorderly manner, were partially checked by fire, but a great commotion was observed in their main body; men and horses were seen to close with confusion and tumult towards one point, where a thick dust and loud cries, and the sparkling of blades, and flashing of pistols, indicated some extraordinary occurrence. Suddenly the multitude became violently agitated, an English shout pealed high and clear, the mass was rent asunder, and Norman Ramsay burst forth, sword in hand, at the head of his battery. His horses, breathing fire, stretched like greyhounds along the plain, the guns bounded behind them like things of no weight, and the mounted gunners followed close, with heads bent low and pointed weapons in desperate career. Captain Brotherton of the Fourteenth Dragoons, seeing this, instantly rode forth and with his squadron shook the head of the pursuing troops, and General Charles Stewart, joining in the charge, took the French Colonel Lamotte, fighting hand to hand, but then the main body of the French came on strongly and the British cavalry retired behind the light division, which was immediately thrown into squares. The seventh division, which was more advanced, did the same, but the horsemen wore upon them first and some were cut down. The mass however stood firm, and the Chasseurs Britanniques, ranged behind a loose stone wall, poured such a fire that their foes recoiled and seemed bewildered.¹

HENRY HART MILMAN (1791-1868) in his History of Latin Christianity made a notable pioneer attempt to apply historical methods to a subject hitherto ruled overmuch by religious prepossessions.

HISTORY OF LATIN CHRISTIANITY

The history of Christianity cannot be understood without pausing at stated periods to survey the progress and development of Christian mythology, which, gradually growing up and springing as it did from natural and universal instincts, took a more perfect and systematic form, and at length, at the height of the Middle Ages, was as much a part of Latin Christianity as the primal truths of the Gospel. This growth, which had long before begun, had reached a kind of adolescence in the age of Gregory, to expand into full maturity during succeeding ages. Already the creeds of the Church formed but a small portion of Christian belief. The highest and most speculative questions of theology, especially in Alexandria and Constantinople, had become watchwords of strife and faction, had stirred the passions of the lowest orders; the two Natures, or the single or double Will in Christ, had agitated the workshop of the artisan and the seats in the Circus. But when these great questions had sunk into quiescence, or, as in Latin Christianity, had never so fully occupied the general mind, when either the triumph of one party, or the general weariness, had worn out their absorbing interest, the religious mind subsided into its more ordinary occupations, and these bore but remote relation to the sublime truths of the Divine Unity and the revelation of God in Christ. As God the Father had receded, as it were, from the sight of man into a vague and unapproachable sanctity, as the human soul had been entirely centred on the more immediate divine presence in the Saviour, so the Saviour himself might seem to withdraw from the actual, at least the exclusive, devotion of the human heart, which was busied with intermediate objects of worship. Christ assumed gradually more and more of the awfulness, the immateriality, the incomprehensibility, of the Deity and men sought out beings more akin to themselves, more open, it might seem, to human sympathies. The Eucharist, in which the Redeemer's spiritual presence, yet undefined and untransubstantiated, was directly and immediately in communion with the soul, had become more and more wrapped in mystery; though the great crowning act of faith, the interdict of which was almost tantamount to a sentence of spiritual death, was more rarely approached, except by the clergy. Believers delighted in those ceremonies to which they might have recourse with less timidity, the shrines and the relics of martyrs might deign to receive the homage of those who were too profane to tread the holier ground. Already the worship of these lower objects of homage begins to intercept that of the higher; the popular mind is filling with images either not suggested at all, or suggested but very dimly, by the sacred writings; legends of saints are supplanting, or rivalling at least, in their general respect and attention, the narratives of the Bible.

SOCIAL POLITICS

WILLIAM GODWIN, the friend and inspirer of Shelley, was born in 1756, and for a few years did work as a Nonconformist minister. His religious interests soon waned, and he turned to literature, where he achieved no insignificant position among the writers of the day as a novelist, and a very high one as a political thinker.

His first important book is the Enquiry concerning Political Justice, directly inspired by the French Revolution. Anarchistic in theory, it yet deprecates violence. No revolutionary axiom to do away with existing laws, ever relied more on sweet reasonableness than did Godwin. In his remarkable novel Caleb Williams (1794), Godwin pursues his favourite ideas, the tyranny of government and the beneficence of reason, but his story interests far less for its crude philosophy than for the undoubted power he showed in conducting a tale and arresting the reader's imagination by its picturesque appeal and happy inventiveness. The character of Falkland is no lay figure, he is unmistakably alive, despite the author's painstaking attempts to kill him by argument.

Two years later a volume of Essays on Education, Manners, and Literature added to his political notoriety if not to his literary reputation. In 1797 he married Mary Wollstonecraft, the legal ceremony being complied with because "of Mary's being in a state of pregnancy." His second novel, St. Leon, appeared in 1799, and deals with ordinary human passions in extraordinary situations. A painstaking and, in some ways, useful Life of Chaucer followed in 1803, and his third novel, Fleetwood, in 1804, of philosophy there is little here, but the story is not so well told as in the case of its predecessors, despite its good scientific touches, and suggestions—never absent from Godwin's fiction—of real psychological insight.

His second experiment in matrimony occurred in 1801, and was led up to by a tactful exhibition of hero-worship when the gushing lady (a next-door neighbour) addressed the widowed philosopher from her balcony thus: "Is it possible that I behold the immortal Godwin?" The "immortal Godwin" responded handsomely by making her the mother of his second child.

In 1805 he started a bookseller's shop under the name of Edward Baldwin, both Charles Lamb and Hazlitt interested themselves in this venture, but nothing that Godwin undertook ever shaped as a commercial success.

None of his later writings, many and diverse as they are, approach the earlier in intellectual vigour or artistic skill. His experiments in the drama were dismal failures, his ambitiously planned History of the Commonwealth (1824-28) proved greatly beyond his powers, though the subject interested him intensely, and he spared no trouble over the work. But he lost himself in details, and the work has no perspective.

Cloudesley (1830) is the weakest and poorest of his novels.

Up to the last he interested himself in metaphysics, but his powers were failing, though he produced indefatigably up to the end.

Godwin's personality reminds us of an intellectual Micawber, with much of Micawber's imperturbability and happy-go-luckiness, certainly more brain power and as certainly less geniality.

The impression Godwin's philosophy made upon the youthful student of the age, may be gathered not merely from Shelley's ecstatic letters, but from Hazlitt's racy and vital sketch in The Spirit of the Age.

"Tom Paine," exclaims Hazlitt, "was considered for the time a Tom fool to him, Paley an old woman, Edmund Burke a flashy sophist. Truth, moral truth, it was supposed had here taken up its abode, and these are the oracles of thought."

This glorifier of "abstract reason" for the rule of conduct had certainly many temperamental qualities for his post. The passionate emotions, of which he disapproved as philosopher, were remote from his tranquil jog-trotting disposition. If he was willing to dispense with all the props of social and political convention, he showed not the faintest desire to pursue any course that failed to commend itself to his logical judgment. For the erratic soul he had one unfailing recipe. Reason with him, don't punish him. Show him that he is wrong and he will go right, since right-doing is so much more advantageous than wrong-doing. The crucial question in any line of conduct is, what brings about the happiness of the majority? That is the only duty worth considering. Morality therefore is a mere estimate of consequences. You cannot bring about happiness by coercion, for coercion is unreasonable, and since Government can only exist by coercion, Government is unreasonable. So trustful is he in the sweet reasonableness of the most perverse, that he contended you have only to prove to a man that his vices are unreasonable, and he will straightway abandon them.

Godwin's dialectics may seem absurd to us to-day, who have no belief in the manufacture of saints out of syllogisms, but the Idealisation of Reason, the glorification of individual freedom, involved in Godwinism, had its attractive and suggestive side. That it should have appealed to Shelley as strongly as it did is not remarkable, when we recollect the abstract, metaphysical trend of the poet's mind. In Shelley's brain the unpassioned theories of his friend took fire, and fed by an ardent humanitarian sentiment, and glorified by an exquisite sensitiveness to beauty, the philosophy lost in process of time much of its crudeness. For at bottom it was Love and not Reason that Shelley relied upon as the final test of worth, and as the great uniting bond that is to take the place of external compulsion.

Although Godwin's insistence on the quality of external persuasion was pursued to farcical limits, it was an element that up to a point needed emphasis. There is value also in his substitution of logical persuasion for dictatorial commands in education. In fact, dispassionately considered there are many wholesome truths in Godwin's writings, if we can only disengage them from the really comic extravagances by which he sought to develop them.

Godwin's influence upon his age is undoubtedly a powerful one, and even Wordsworth's later work shows traces of it. To the general reader he will appeal more on account of his fiction; the influence of his doctrinaire romances affected the next generation of story-tellers, notably Bulwer Lytton.

POLITICAL JUSTICE

Justice is a rule of conduct originating in the connection of one perceptive being with another. A comprehensive maxim which has been laid down upon the subject is, "That we should love our neighbour as ourselves." But this maxim, though possessing considerable merit as a popular principle, is not modelled with the strictness of philosophical accuracy.

In a loose and general view I and my neighbour are both of us men, and of consequence entitled to equal attention. But in reality it is probable that one of us is a being of more worth and importance than the other. A man is of more worth than a beast because, being possessed of higher faculties, he is capable of a more refined and genuine happiness. In the same manner the illustrious archbishop of Cambray was of more worth than his valet, and there are few of us who would hesitate to pronounce, if his palace were in flames, and the life of only one of them could be preserved, which of the two ought to be preferred.

But there is another ground of preference, besides the private consideration of one of them being farther removed from the state of a mere animal. We are not connected with one or two perceptive beings, but with a society, a nation, and in some sense with the whole family of mankind. Of consequence that life ought to be preferred which will be most conducive to the general good. In saving the life of Fenelon, suppose at the moment he conceived the project of his immortal Telemachus, I should have been promoting the benefit of thousands, who have been cured by the perusal of that work of some error, vice and consequent unhappiness. Nay, my benefit would extend farther than this for every individual, thus cured, has become a better member of society and has contributed in his turn to the happiness and information of others.

Suppose I had been myself the valet, I ought to have chosen to die, rather than Fenelon should have died. The life of Fenelon was really preferable to that of the valet. But understanding is the faculty that perceives the truth of this and similar propositions, and justice is the principle that regulates my conduct accordingly. It would have been just in the valet to have preferred the archbishop to himself. To have done otherwise would have been a breach of justice.

Suppose the valet had been my brother, my father or my benefactor. This would not alter the truth of the proposition. The life of Fenelon would still be more valuable than that of the valet, and justice, pure, unadulterated justice, would still have preferred that which is most valuable. Justice would have taught me to save the life of Fenelon at the expense of the other. What magic is there in the pronoun "my" to overturn the decisions of impartial truth? My brother or my father may be a fool, or a profligate, malicious, lying or dishonest. If they be, of what consequence is it that they are mine?

"But to my father I am indebted for existence; he supported me in the helplessness of infancy." When he first subjected himself to the necessity of these cares, he was probably influenced by no particular motives of benevolence to his future offspring. Every voluntary benefit, however, entitles the bestower to some kindness and retribution. Why so? Because a voluntary benefit is an evidence of benevolent intention, that is, in a certain degree, of virtue. It is the disposition of the mind, not the external action separately taken, that entitles to respect. But the merit of this disposition is equal, whether the benefit were conferred upon me or upon another. I and another man cannot both be right in preferring our individual benefactor, for no man can be at the same time both better and worse than his neighbour. My benefactor ought to be esteemed, not because he bestowed it upon a human being. His desert will be in exact proportion to the degree, in which that human being was worthy of the distinction conferred.

Thus every view of the subject brings us back to the consideration of my neighbour's moral worth and his importance to the general weal, as the only standard to determine the treatment to which he is entitled. Gratitude therefore, if by gratitude we understand a sentiment of preference which I entertain towards another, upon the ground of my having been the subject of his benefits, is no part either of justice or virtue.

MARY WOLLSTONECRAFT was fully as vigorous and influential a thinker in her way as Godwin, and was certainly a more striking personality. Born in London, in April 1759, Mary's earliest years were spent in the neighbourhood of Epping Forest. Her father was a spendthrift and a drunkard who alternately bullied and neglected his children, and the girls were left to their own devices to grow up as best they might. Happily for them they were sturdy in physique and lived much in the open air. Later on, Mary picked up a fragmentary education at some day school near Boverley in Yorkshire, where the family migrated in 1768—for restlessness was always driving her parent to seek better luck elsewhere.

Mary read eagerly any book that came in her way and at the age of fifteen met with a cultured and attractive girl, who for several years was an important factor in her life.

She was a girl of ardent temperament, and Frances Blood became the object of enthusiastic admiration and affection. Through Frances Blood Mary learnt to write and spell, and mastered the elements of self-expression. Her strength of character was soon put to the test when the weak-minded mother turned to the neglected daughter for shelter from the violence of her drunken husband. The story of these years has been written in the Wrongs of Women, and we can judge from that passionate screed that the worthless father was not the only contemptible male that it was Mary's lot to encounter. The failure of her sister Eliza's marriage, the tragic desolation of her friend Fanny's love episode, and of her own domestic life, made repeated calls on Mary's courage and sympathy.

Later on she started a school, and if her intellectual qualities were not great, what is more important, her power of sympathetic discernment and intelligent guidance was considerable.

An introduction to the gruff golden-hearted Johnson might have been productive had it not taken place during the last few months of his life. As it was, his kindness and friendly interest served to provide Mary with one of her few gracious memories of our sex. Another Johnson, a publisher, then came into her life. He had been struck by her mental powers, and remarkable personality, and offered her work. Under his auspices she learned French and German, made translations, read and reported on them, and wrote several original works, including her famous Rights of Women. Practically all her money was absorbed by her needy relations; had it not been for this constant drain upon her earnings, she would have at least been able to live in comfort. Fuseli, the celebrated Swiss painter, took a great interest in her at one time, and she felt more than a passing interest for him. However, he was already married, so to put him out of her mind she went across to Paris. Here she met Gilbert Imlay, a quondam American captain, and a man of letters in a small way. With him she fell deeper in love, and at the outset the affection seems to have been a mutual one. But Imlay was of the type of man who loves and rides away, he was not only a thoroughly bad lot, but he was a weak and contemptible creature, and nothing but tragedy could have resulted from a woman of Mary's temperament putting all her happiness into this man's hands. She had no belief in marriage as a legal institution, and was content to live with him, though it was quite clear she considered the bond between them as sacred as the marriage bond. After he had left her, as she soon discovered, for another mistress, her agony of spirit was for a time overwhelming. But force of character and her innate vitality carried her through the ordeal, while the story of her courtship and marriage by Godwin, despite its lack of romance, had its agreeable and comforting side. The marriage was somewhat like the marriage of Charlotte Brontë; it brought her into a haven, though not the haven of her dreams, and just as it seemed to assume some measure of happiness, was cut short by death. She died at the age of thirty-eight, after giving birth to a girl, afterwards Mary Shelley; cut off in the maturity of her powers.

Mary's early literary ventures were inspired by Johnsonian tradition, an unhappy one for a woman of her ardent temperament and sensitive feelings; so we need not trouble greatly about The Education of Daughters, Mary, or the Stories for Children. They are burdened with a sententiousness which is assumed, because it is felt to be a proper vehicle for prose. All that is really original in Mary is repressed; and what remains is a residuum of stale commonplace that Harriet More herself could not have worsened.

Mary's real contribution to literature is the Vindication of the Rights of Women, and its originality can best be understood when it is read in the light of that time and not in the light of to-day. There is little charm in the writing, but the force and cogency of much of the reasoning is undeniable ; and its courage amazing

The Letters to Gilbert Imlay show the passionate intensity of her nature, and are vastly preferable to the carefully prepared Letters from Sweden, Norway and Denmark

Her two experiments in fiction, Mary and The Wrongs of Women, show clearly that she had not the making of a novelist. To say she lacked imagination would be untrue, but it was like a tongue of flame with no subtleties of shade, she had no plasticity of mind, no play of fancy, and her ideal of womanhood, though sound and sensible in substance, would have gained in attraction had it been leavened with some sense of humour and tenderness. It may seem curious to accuse her of this, but, good at heart and kind and unselfish as she was, there exists a certain hard quality in her temperament that makes itself felt in her writings.

THE RIGHTS OF WOMEN

I may be told that great as this enormity is, it only affects a devoted part of the sex—devoted for the salvation of the rest. But, false as every assertion might easily be proved, that recommends the sanctioning a small evil to produce a greater good—the mischief does not stop here, for the moral character, and peace of mind of the chaster part of the sex is undermined by the conduct of the very women to whom they allow no refuge from guilt—whom they inexorably consign to the exercise of arts that lure their husbands from them, debauch their sons, and force them, let not modest women start, to assume, in some degree, the same character themselves. For I will venture to assert, that all the causes of female weakness, as well as depravity, which I have already enlarged on, branch out of one grand cause—want of chastity in men.

I have before observed, that men ought to maintain the women whom they have seduced—this would be one means of reforming female manners, and stopping an abuse that has an equally fatal effect on population and morals. Another, no less obvious would be to turn the attention of woman to the real virtue of chastity, for to little respect has that woman a claim, on the score of modesty, though her reputation may be white as the driven snow—who smiles on the libertine whilst she spurns the victims of his lawless appetites and their own folly.

The two sexes mutually corrupt and improve each other. Thus I believe to be an indisputable truth, extending it to every virtue. Chastity, modesty, public spirit, and all the noble train of virtues on which social virtue and happiness are built, should be understood and cultivated by all mankind—or they will be cultivated to little effect. And, instead of furnishing the vicious or idle with a pretext for violating some sacred duty, by terming it a sexual one, it would be wiser to show that nature has not made any difference, for that the unchaste man doubly defeats the purpose of nature, by rendering women barren and destroying his own constitution, though he avoids the shame that pursues the crime in the other sex. These are the physical consequences, the moral are still more alarming, for virtue is only a nominal distinction when the duties of citizens—husbands, wives, fathers, mothers, and directors of families, become merely the selfish ties of convenience.

EXTRACT FROM LETTER TO GILBERT IMLAY

The melancholy presentiment has for some time hung on my spirits, that we were parted for ever, and the letters I received this day, by Mr ——— convince me that it was not without foundation. You allude to some other letters, which I suppose have miscarried, for most of those I have got, were only a few hasty lines, calculated to wound the tenderness the sight of the superscriptions excited.

I mean not however to complain, yet so many feelings are struggling for utterance, and agitating a heart almost bursting with anguish, that I find it very difficult to write with any degree of coherence.

You left me indisposed, though you have taken no notice of it, and the most fatiguing journey I ever had, contributed to continue it. However, I recovered my health, but a neglected cold, and continual inactivity during the last two months, have reduced me to a state of weakness I never before experienced. Those who did not know that the canker-worm was at work at the core, cautioned me about sucking my child too long—God preserve the poor child, and render her happier than her mother!

But I am wandering from my subject. Indeed my head turns giddy, when I think that all the confidence I have had in the affection of others is come to this—I did not expect this blow from you. I have done my duty to you and my child, and if I am not to have any return of affection to reward me, I have the sad consolation of knowing that I deserved a better fate. My soul is weary—I am sick at heart—and but for this little darling, I would cease to care about a life, which is now stripped of every charm.

THOMAS PAINE, born in 1737, was the son of a Quaker staymaker in Norfolk. This Radical fire-brand was by turns staymaker, sailor, schoolmaster, exciseman, and tobacconist. It was as exciseman that he first appeared in print, pleading for an increase of wages (1772). In 1774 he went to America, and in his pamphlet, Common Sense, published two years later, argues powerfully for absolute independence. He took active part in the revolution, and was rewarded by Congress with the post of Secretary to the Committee of Foreign Affairs. During this strenuous time he did a good deal of pamphlet-writing with the object of inspiring the rebels, and subsequently went on a mission to France, obtaining, in 1781, a public salary for his political services. In 1787 he came back to England, and a few years later published a spirited reply to Burke's famous Reflections upon the French Revolution. This book, The Rights of Man, of which a million and a half copies were sold, became one of the most popular works of the day, appealing to the average man much as Political Justice appealed to the thinker of the day. It brought trouble among many concerned in its dissemination. Paine himself avoided difficulties by running off to Paris, where he was elected as Deputy of Pas-de-Calais to the National Convention. He angered the Robespierro party, however, by offering "an asylum in America" to King Louis XVI. Paine was thrown into prison, where he remained for nearly a year, being liberated on the request of the American Minister.

Part of Paine's Age of Reason, a vigorous plea for Deism as against Christianity, was written at this time, and alienated a good many of his friends. After his release he attacked Washington as a man of affairs, and showed general bitterness towards America for its acquiescence, as he deemed it, in his lengthy imprisonments. On his return to America in 1802, he was welcomed by a few but shunned and execrated by the many. His combative spirit, sharpened with age and opposition, was constantly involving him in some political or religious wrangle. Recklessness of living led to financial impoverishment, and in 1809 he died at New York.

He had the merits and failings of the sincere demagogue: courage, passion, vanity, a mixture of shrewd insight and amazing ignorance.

RIGHTS OF MAN

To understand the nature and quantity of government proper for man, it is necessary to attend to the character. As nature created him for social life, she fitted him for the station she intended. In all cases she made his natural wants greater than his individual powers. No one man is capable, without the aid of society, of supplying his own wants, and those wants acting upon every individual, impel the whole of them into society, as naturally as gravitation acts on the centre.

But she has gone further. She has not only forced man into society by a diversity of wants which the reciprocal aid of each other can supply, but she has implanted in him a system of social affections, which, though not necessary to his existence, are essential to his happiness. There is no period in life when this love for society ceases to act. It begins and ends with our being.

If we examine with attention into the composition and constitution of man, the diversity of his wants, and diversity of talents in different men for reciprocally accommodation of the wants of each other, his propensity to society, and consequently to preserve the advantages resulting from it, we shall easily discover that a great part of what is called government is mere imposition.

Government is no farther necessary than to supply the few cases to which society and civilisation are not conveniently competent, and instances are not wanting to show that everything which government can usefully add thereto has been performed by the common consent of society, without government.

For upwards of two years from the commencement of the American war, and to a longer period in several of the American states, there were no established forms of government. The old governments had been abolished, and the country was too much occupied in defence to employ its attention to establishing new governments, yet during this interval order and harmony were preserved as inviolate as in any country in Europe. There is a natural aptness in man, and more so in society, because it embraces a greater variety of abilities and resource, to accommodate itself to whatever situation it is in. The instant formal government is abolished, society begins to act. A general association takes place, and common interest produces common security.

WILLIAM COBBETT, born at Farnham in 1762, was the son of a farmer and the grandson of a farm labourer. He had a simple, rustic upbringing that left vivid and deep impressions upon his eager and impressionable mind. Here is a little passage of autobiography to show this.

"When I was a little boy I was, in the barley sowing season, going along by the side of a field near Waverley Abbey, the primroses and bluebells bespangling the banks on both sides of me, a thousand linnets singing in a spreading oak over my head, while the jingle of the traces and the whistling of the ploughboys saluted my ear from over the hedge, and, as it were to snatch me from the enchantment, the hounds at that instant having started a hare in the hangar on the other side of the field, came up scampering over it in full cry, taking me after them many a mile. I was not more than eight years old, but this particular scene has prevented itself to my mind many times every year from that day to this. I always enjoy it over again."

He grew up a sturdy, honest Saxon yeoman with a passion for adventure that found numerous outlets. As a boy he had run away to Kew with sixpence-halfpenny in his pocket, and been rescued by a Scotchman. It is characteristic of him that half of this capital should have been spent on Swift's

Tale of a Tub. He tried the Navy, then the lawyer's office, enlisting as a soldier at twenty-three. In this capacity he showed his natural combativeness by attacking the abuses of army administration; then exhibited his thirst for change by going to America, where he married a girl he met in New Brunswick. He was better able there to express his strong Radical views without interference, and thus he did for the next eight years, in fine racy English, under the nom-de-plume of Peter Porcupine. This name had been flung at him for obvious reasons, and he accepted it without demur. He taught English to French emigrants, and upheld as against the Republican, English political institutions—Kings, Lords, and Commons.

At last, finding himself involved in libel suits, he crossed the water again, and was eagerly sought after by the Tories, who saw in his partisanship and powerful pen a possible source of strength. But he was not to be bought, and when offered the proprietorship of a paper by a Government official said, quoting the fable of the Wolf and Mastiff. "No, if I cannot be fat I will at least be free. No one loves chains, though they be made of gold."

The famous weekly journal, The Political Register, was in its inception a Government organ (1802), but Cobbett's independent spirit soon asserted itself. He was free and impressionable, but that did not stay his pen, and after the war he came to the help of the Radicals in his plea for Constitutional Reform. He was now a great political force and a popular personality, especially in the Midlands and North of England.

The Government at this time were taking strong and arbitrary measures to suppress political meetings, and to escape imprisonment without trial he went across to America again, continuing to write from there. On his return to England in 1819, three months after the Peterloo Massacre, he was received with great enthusiasm. Among the measures he advocated were—a free press, right of public meeting, abolition of the game laws, and parliamentary reform. He was returned for Oldham in 1832. To the last he retained his love of the country and country life, and never lost sight of the lot of the agricultural labourer, whose cause he espoused with the same pertinacity as Francis Place did that of the town artisan. In 1835 he fell ill, but despite diminishing strength he wrote and worked to the very last.

A rugged, honest, and upright figure, William Cobbett achieved a splendid work in helping to break down privilege and oppression. Of peasant stock, he understood his people thoroughly, and by his manliness and independence helped to free them from the servility, ignorance, and apathy in which, as a class he found them.

Cobbett was an extraordinarily voluminous writer, his writings occupying about fifty volumes; and a very versatile one, for he touched on history, politics, economics, religion, grammar, cooking, gardening, and art. Dogmatic and egotistical and insular he may be, but the remarkable thing about his work is not that it is sometimes wrong-headed, that must needs be so considering the variety of subjects he tackled, but that he is so often suggestive and illuminating. For he had a strong and keen intellect, passionate humanitarian sympathy, and a rarely excellent command of fine, racy English.

His writings include thirty volumes of The Weekly Register, twelve volumes of "Peter Porcupine's" lucubrations, and two volumes of Rural Rides—delightful pictures of rustic life.

In all of his work he is frankly the partisan with grievances to air and wrongs to redress. Many of his papers are nothing more than vigorous tracts with titles that certainly strike the eye—e.g. A Bone to Gnaw for the Democrats, A Kick for a Bite. His prejudices, if occasionally leading him to such absurd statements as "Lincolnshire alone contains more fine churches than the whole continent of Europe," are most entertaining.

Among his "imperfect sympathies," to borrow Lamb's phrase, are Poverty, Potatoes, Scotchmen, and Tea. He sturdily upheld a purely agricultural society, and preached the gospel of work with as much energy as Carlyle. The Utopia he fashions is a homely, domestic one: an early marriage, plenty of beer, good, warm clothes, and a well-furnished house. Add to these advantages an established church that looked after the poor, a militia to defend the country, and uniformity of taxation, and you have Cobbett's ideal of what English life might be.

Here are one or two characteristic flashes.

On the Turnip "If they really did come from Scotland, there is something good that is Scotch."

"Any beer is hotter than water. It should have some strength, and some weeks of age, at any rate."

The saviour has departed necessarily from much of his political pamphleteering, though it remains to show us how doughtily he could fight. But Cobbett does not depend on these for his posthumous fame, and in his Rural Rides and his Advice to a Young Man, there are many passages of striking sense and genuine poetic feeling, that may be read with pleasure and profit to-day. Moreover, in these books you have a summing up of Cobbett's philosophy of life—the philosophy of a sound, coarse-fibred, warm-blooded man of the people. The youth, the lover, the husband, the father, the citizen are admonished in turn, and extravagant and absurd as may be the manner in which at times he tenders his advice, it is always the advice of an upright, good-hearted man. Coldness and timidity move him to impatience; the money-making spirit to anger. His attitude towards women is typical of Cobbett. Treat her well, don't run off to clubs, look after baby, at the same time see that she is dutiful, "control if necessary" her tongue, and if she plays you false, bundle her out of the house. His ideal man may strike many as somewhat noisy and overbearing, and too much of a big animal, but if lacking in the graces, and over fond of beer and bacon, he is at any rate a straight, affectionate fellow, redolent of the earth and the open air; frank, open-hearted and courageous, and with a rough native sense of what is beautiful in Nature and in Art.

The man who wrote Rural Rides had a clean, sweet imagination, and the author of the Advice to Young Men and Women good common-sense and integrity of purpose.

RURAL RIDES

At Bower I got instructions to go to Hawkey, but accompanied with most earnest advice not to go that way, for that it was impossible to get along. The roads were represented as so bad, the floods so much out, the hills and bogs so dangerous, that really I began to doubt, and if I had not been brought up amongst the clays of the Holt Forest and the bogs of the neighbouring heaths I should certainly have turned off to my right, to go over Hindhead, great as was my objection to going that way. "Well, then," said my friend at Bower, "if you will go that way, by G—, you must go down 'Hawkey Hanger', of which he then gave me such a description. But even this I found to fall short of the reality. I inquired simply whether people were in the habit of going down it, and the answer being in the affirmative on I went through green lanes and bridle-ways till I came to the turnpike road from Petersfield to Winchester, which I crossed, going into a narrow and almost untrodden green lane on the side of which I found a cottage. Upon my asking the way to Hawkey, the woman at the cottage said, "Right up the lane, sir, you'll come to a hanger presently; you must take care, or you can't ride down will your horses go alone?"

On we trotted in this pretty green lane, and, indeed, we had been coming gently and gradually uphill for a good while. The lane was between high-banks and pretty high stuff growing on the banks, so that we could see no distance from us, and could receive not the smallest hint of what was so near at hand. The lane had a little turn towards the end, so that out we came, all in a moment, at the very edge of the hanger. And never in all my life was I so surprised and so delighted. I pulled up my horse, and sat and looked, and it was like looking from the top of a castle down into the sea, except that the valley was land and not water. I looked at my servant, to see what effect this unexpected sight had upon him. His surprise was as great as mine, though he had been bred amongst the North Hampshire hills. Those who had so strenuously dwelt in the dirt and dangers of this route had said not a word about beauties, the matchless beauties of the scenery. These hangers are woods on the sides of very steep hills. The trees and underwood hang, in some sort, to the ground, instead of standing on it. Hence these places are called Hangers. From the summit of that which I had now to descend, I looked down upon the villages of Hawkey, Greatham, Selborne and some others.

When I returned to England in 1780, after an absence from the country parts of it, of sixteen years, the trees, the hedges, even the parks and woods seemed so small. It made me laugh to hear little gutters that I could jump over called rivers. The Thames was but a "creek." But when in about a month after my arrival in London, I went to Farnham, the place of my birth, what was my surprise. Everything was become so pitifully small. I had to cross, in my post-chaise, the long and dreary heath to Bagshot, then, at the end of it, to mount a hill called Hungry Hill, and from that hill I knew that I should look down into the beautiful and fertile vale of Farnham. My heart fluttered with impatience mixed with a sort of fear, to see all the scenes of my childhood. For I had learned before of the death of my father and mother. There is a hill not far from the town called Crooksbury Hill, which rises up out of a flat in the form of a cone, and is planted with Scotch fir-trees. Here I used to take the eggs and young ones of crows and magpies. This hill was a famous object in the neighbourhood. It served as the superlative degree of height. "As high as Crooksbury Hill" meant, with us, the utmost degree of height. Therefore the first object that my eyes sought was this hill. I could not believe my eyes. Laterally speaking, I for a moment thought the famous hill removed, and a little heap put in its stead, for I had seen in New Brunswick a single rock, or hill of solid rock, ten times as big, and four or five times as high! The post-boy going downhill, and not a bad road, whisked me in a few minutes to the Bush Inn, from the garden of which I could see the prodigious sandhill where I had begun my gardening work. What a nothing! But now came rushing into my mind all at once my pretty little garden, my little blue smock-frock, my little nailed shoes, my pretty pigeons that I used to feed out of my hands, the last kind words and tears of my gentle and tender-hearted and affectionate mother! I hastened back into the room. If I had looked a moment longer I should have dropped. When I came to reflect, what a change! I looked down at my dress! What scenes I had gone through! How altered my state! I had dined the day before at a secretary of state's in company with Mr Pitt, and had been waited upon by men in gaudy liveries! I had had nobody to assist me in the world. No teachers of any sort. Nobody to shelter me from the consequences of bad and no one to counsel me in good behaviour. I felt proud. The distinctions of rank, birth, and wealth all became nothing in my eyes, and from that moment—less than a month after my arrival in England—I resolved never to bend before them.

JEREMY BENTHAM (1747-8 (?)—1832)

His Life

"Pushing," counselled Bentham senior, "is the one thing needful." "If you mean to rise," said another inspiring mentor to the youthful Jeremy, "catch hold of the skirts of those above you, and care nothing for those beneath you." The advice has the merit of engaging frankness; there is nothing equivocal about it. Neither gentleman wraps up self-seeking in pious ambiguities. Jeremy Bentham himself never stated a case with greater clarity and consciousness, and thus the young philosopher was able to join issue at the very outset with his advisers. Nothing could have been better for a nervous, delicate, and sympathetic lad than to hear the case for success in life formulated with such brutal directness.

Jeremy Bentham was born in February 1747 (or 1748?), in Red Lion Square, Houndsditch, and when we realise that the great grandfather was a successful pawnbroker and both grandfather and father rich attorneys, we shall be at no loss to understand the rule of life that was early drilled into him. As a boy, he was quick at learning, and at the age of six we find him wrestling precociously with Latin, Greek, and French. Much of his time was spent at Bowring Hill, near Reading, and in possible anticipation of future fights with the old House of Commons, he took great delight in brandishing "against the rats an historic and sacred sword used at Oxford against the parliamentary forces."

His parents did their best to keep all amusing books from the boy, and his youthful imagination had to gather what fun and fancy it could from Burnet's History of the Earth, Cave's Lives of the Apostles, and Stow's Chronicle. After this solid fare, no doubt he found Gil Blas, Rapsin's History of England, Mandoville's Fable of the Bees, and Plutarch's Lives, light and frolicsome by comparison.

Gil Blas, with its picturesque humour, must have proved a godsend, even Clarissa Harlowe, a copy of which came his way, would have stimulated the sentimental side of his nature. His Oxford days were not noteworthy, and the most exciting event that happened to him seems to have been escaping from a window on one occasion to avoid the importunities of a talkative lady, who had designs for her daughter. From Oxford he went to Lincoln's Inn, but he never took kindly to law, and was horrified at the exorbitant charges to suitors. It was characteristic of him that in his first case he should have advised his client to "put an end to the suit and save the money which would be wasted over it." This is not the stuff of which successful lawyers are made, and it is scarcely necessary to add that he made no mark in his profession.

His first publication was his Fragment on Government in 1776, this was followed up in 1783 by a translation of Bergman's Essay on the Utility of Chemistry, and in 1787 by his characteristic Defence of Usury.

Especially important years were those between 1789 and 1800. During this time he met James Mill and Francis Place, both of whom he inspired with his individualistic views; he published his great work, Principles of Morals and Legislation, which made its mark at once on the Continent, and in 1792 was made a French citizen. Most of the famous men of the day became acquainted with him during this period, and his ambition to codify the laws of his country met with many sympathisers.

On the whole, however, he was most honoured as a prophet outside his own country. As illustrations of his varied intellectual activity, we may recall that he planned a building—Panopticon—for the control and inspection of convicts, suggested schemes for cutting through the Isthmus of Suez and the Isthmus of Panama, established the Westminster Review, and strenuously advocated humanitarian legislation and Parliamentary Reform. Among his friends may be mentioned James Mill, Lord Brougham, Daniel O'Connell, Sir Samuel Romilly, Francis Place, and Lord Stirling. An opportune windfall from the Government in 1813 in compensation for their abandonment of his Panopticon scheme, enabled him to take a spacious country house, Ford Abbey, with a deer park in Dorsetshire, but he returned in 1818 to his old house in Queen Square Place, where he lived till the day of his death, June 6, 1832.

The popular idea that Bentham was a surly-tempered, matter-of-fact doctrinaire, is far removed from the truth. He was a genial, good humoured, kindly man, with an unfulfilling flow of spirits. "A boy to the last," said John Stuart Mill. His industry was enormous and in order to fit in his various labours he would plan out his time with almost comical precision. Thus 8-12, work, 12-2, music and battledore and shuttlecock, 2-6, work, 6, dinner (no beer or wine); a walk—that consisted of a dignified trot round his garden for a certain number of times; then tea, light reading, and "so to bed."

Of music he was fond, especially Handel's music, and at one time would play the violin to ladies' accompaniments on the harpsichord. He disliked poetry, calling it quaintly "misrepresentation"; was impatient of society people and small talk, but relished a good conversation with a few chosen friends. His London house was called the Hermitage, and shrouded by trees and ablaze with flowers, presented quite a romantic appearance. He was devoted to animals, loving, as he expressed it, "everything that has four legs." At one time he kept both cats and mice, but found these pets, unfortunately, incompatible. He was an excellent host, and a good, though not a great talker, simple, unaffected, and direct—unlike the tortuous literary style of his later years. As a boy he had been weak and stunted, but he grew into a strong and robust man. A pen portrait of Bentham in his old age thus describes him:

"His apparel hung loosely about him, and consisted chiefly of grey coat, light breeches, white woollen stockings hanging loosely about his legs, whilst his venerable locks were surmounted by a straw hat of most grotesque and indescribable shape, a strong contrast to the quietude and sobriety of his general aspect."

His limitations of temperament were obvious. But if neither deeply emotional, nor highly imaginative; if over fond of what was cut and dried and too devoted to reducing everything in life to tabular form, there was considerable charm and gentleness about his personality, and a shrewd wisdom in his outlook. "A moralist," he would say, "like a surgeon, should never wound but to heal." His life and doctrine harmonise in a way that is often far from the case with philosophers.

His Work

To the student of philosophy the name of Bentham is associated with utilitarian ethics; to the student of social politics he is, above other things, a great legal reformer. Nor need we separate the two aspects of the man, for his legal reforms gave us his utilitarian philosophy expressed in concrete terms.

Brougham's weighty tribute to him in 1838 is worth recalling, for it sums up the man's work so compendiously:

"No one before him had ever seriously thought of exposing the defects in our English system of Jurisprudence. All former students had confined themselves to learn its principles, to make themselves masters of its eminently technical and artificial rule, and all former writers had but expounded the doctrines handed down from age to age. It was he who first made the mighty step of trying the whole provisions of our Jurisprudence by the test of expediency, and fearlessly examining how far each part was connected with the rest, and with a yet more undaunted courage, inquiring how far its most consistent and symbolical arrangements were framed according to the principles which should pervade a code of laws; their adaptation to the circumstances of society, to the wants of men, and to the promotion of happiness. Not only was he thus eminently original among the lawyers of his own country, he might be said to be the first legal philosopher that had appeared in the world."

Bentham was essentially a middle-class type, not merely in upbringing but in outlook, and his conception of the greatest happiness was the conception of a strenuous, active, benevolent mind that saw in a reasonable, genial standard of material comfort a suitable reward of individual exertion. How did he propose to bring this about?

Looking at the body of existing laws, Bentham realised its heterogeneous character. It had grown up out of temporary emergencies, was the outcome of widely differing and often conflicting interests, and presented a confused illogical appearance, that irritated his orderly mind as much as it troubled his sense of justice. He sought, therefore, in the first place for some principle, some generalisation, that should characterise lawmaking as a whole and be its sole justification. This is found in Priestley's formula of the "greatest happiness of the greatest number."¹

Bentham proclaimed this doctrine of utility. He knew well enough that no law could make a man happy, but he saw clearly that it was quite possible to encourage the existence of conditions favourable to material happiness.

Unlike the French doctrinaires, he did not talk about laws of Nature, and make declamations about Equality, Liberty, and Fraternity. His practical and concrete mind looked at once to the consequences of any proposed enactment, and if the consequences seemed promising, to the simplest and most effective means of bringing them about.

What more precisely did Bentham counsel by material happiness? Legal protection against violence and fraud, and freedom to develop such individual propensities as were compatible with a like development by our neighbours, these are the main things.

As regards the methods Bentham adopted for carrying out his ideal, there are two special characteristics to be noted. (1) The extension of individual liberty; (2) the equalisation of political power. With the first of these went the doctrine of "Laissez-Faire," of which so much was made by Bentham's followers. With Bentham himself perhaps it meant merely resistance to manifest oppression; his disciple, John Stuart Mill, turned it into a militant battle-cry. He denounced not merely legal restriction on the liberty of the individual, but the restriction imposed by (as he esteemed) foolish social conventions.

In Bentham's view many unnecessary restraints were imposed on individuals that did not benefit the community. He objected to the usury laws, and favoured a policy involving freedom of trade in money, goods, and labour.

In the anxiety of Bentham not to fetter the individual he failed to see how that individualism, if pushed to an extreme, militates against the very liberty of those on whose behalf he is so zealous.

The force of this difficulty is seen in the problem of trade combination, and in the right of association. This was not foreseen by Bentham. His dislike, again, of State interference led to the Benthamite reluctance to support factory legislation. Yet if ever there was a case of one man's liberty making another man's shiver, it was here. But if the defects of Bentham's thought are to be found here, it must not be forgotten that, broadly speaking, the whole trend of Bentham's reforms were humanitarian. The mitigation of the cruelties in the criminal law were due to his initiation, the abolition of the pillory, of hanging in chains, the curtailing of capital punishment, the better protection of animals. Cruelty he opposed, not merely because it was morally reprehensible, but because it was, he urged, useless. He saw clearly enough that what was required from the law was certainty in its effects, not savagery in its methods, and that cruelty is at bottom a sign of weakness.

The second point mentioned that every man was to count for one, and no man for more than one, gave Benthamism its democratic leaven, and placed him among those advocating Parliamentary reform, since it was quite obvious that Parliament as it then existed, teeming with vested interests, would not prove advantageous to such codification of the laws as he demanded. It was felt on all hands at the time, that reform of the political fabric of society was needed, but the violence of the French Revolution offended Englishmen, and they were instinctively opposed, with their passion for expediency and concrete things, to the broad generalities that deemed Liberty and Equality to be natural rights; but as Bentham said: "It is little use affirming a right if you haven't the proper machinery for enforcing it." In place, therefore, of declaring every man has right to unfettered action, he set about to abolish every shackle that served to fetter unnecessarily men's actions, paving the way for freedom of discussion, and freedom of religious and even non-religious belief, without State interference.

Bentham's habit of mind suited his generation; he was averse to rhetoric and not given to generalities, and his contemporaries liked his prescription for the "rottenness" in the State—the endeavouring to secure the rights of property and safeguarding individual liberty. On its philosophic side, therefore, Bentham's work was intensely individualistic, with all the drawbacks as well as the advantages of this "systematised individualism," as Professor Dacey calls it.

"Let us seek only what is attainable; it presents a career sufficiently vast for genius," said Bentham. This saying lies at the root of his concrete genius; and clearly foreshadows the political programme of the Liberals for the next fifty years. Indeed, only the other day one of the measures for which he pleaded—payment of members—was carried into effect. So, contrasting him with Godwin and Paine, we see in them stimulating theorists, and in Bentham the practical man who tries above all things to put his ideas into practice. He is far less satisfactory as a philosopher than as a jurist, for his utilitarian test, effective enough in a rough and general way in the realm of politics, is open to grave psychological criticism. His most important work is An Introduction to the Principles of Morals and Legislation, published in 1789, where the kernel of his thought is contained. After defining good as a balance struck between pain and pleasure, on "two sovereign matters," he identifies the good of each man with the "greatest happiness of the greatest number." Having applied this to morals he passes to legislation, and the practical value of his theory is better seen there. Indeed, his conception of punishment harmonises with that of the modern reformers. He would have it not vindictive but preventive. The old idea of "an eye for an eye" is to be abolished.

In the form of his writings Bentham is unattractive. Occasionally he can be plain and direct, but more often he is technical in phraseology, and devoid of any literary grace. His passion for classification, though it led occasionally to desirable simplicities, involves the writer in an excessive terminology, and if the French theorists were too ready to generalise, Bentham is too ready to reduce everything to tabular form, as, for instance, in his Table of the Springs of Human Action. Yet he is rarely unsuggestive, and where jurisprudence rather than ethics is concerned, highly illuminating. But he seldom did himself justice as a writer, and was too content to leave his manuscripts chaotic in form, in order to provide work for his friends. Yet he is well acquainted with the requirements of the literary craftsman, and could, when he wished, be as plain, terse, and clear in writing as he was in speech.

Many of his phrases have become incorporated into our language, as for instance, "international," "utilitarian," "codification." He was uninterested in history, and had little respect for the past, chiefly looking upon it as an object-lesson for the legislator in what to avoid. To use his own dictum, "It is from the folly not the wisdom of our ancestors that we have so much to learn." In fact, he is above all a logician, and used his logical power to re-shape the entire administrative machinery of Government. Indeed, we may regard him as the pioneer of the great legal revolution that even to-day is only partially accomplished.

His Life

The scene of Adam Smith's birth and boyhood was laid at Kirkcaldy, "the lang toon," in Fifeshire. His father, who had formerly belonged to the legal profession, never lived to see the delicate child born in the June of 1723, and Smith's upbringing was accomplished by a devoted, if perhaps over-indulgent mother. Saved at the age of four from some gipsies, the boy in course of time was sent to the University of Glasgow. Here he came under the influence of the "never-to-be-forgotten Dr. Hutcheson," whose optimistic philosophy insisted upon goodness and wisdom displayed in nature. Three years later Smith became an inmate of Balliol College, Oxford, where apparently he was not allowed to forget the disadvantages attaching to his nationality. On the very first occasion of his dining in Hall the student was informed that "he had never seen such a piece of beef in Scotland as the piece then before him." But though his country may possibly have denied him this remarkable experience, it had certainly taught him how to live economically, and perhaps the laugh was on Smith's side when his first quarter's expenses came to no more than £7, 5s. 0d. Having contrived to make good use of his time so far as the study of general literature was concerned, he quitted the university in 1746.

For a while the prospects of the future Economist were not particularly encouraging, but in 1751 he gained the Chair of Logic at Glasgow, which was afterwards exchanged for the Professorship of Moral Philosophy. His undoubted success in this post was facilitated, so it seems, by the "plain but expressive countenance" of a particular student which, according to Smith, registered the feelings of his class. The ethical branch of his subject was the first to emerge in book form. In 1759 he published the Theory of Moral Sentiments, a work little studied to-day, but which at the time created considerable attention, and led to his obtaining the tutorship of the Duke of Buccleuch. Resigning his professorial duties, Smith departed with his pupil to France early in 1764. At first the Continental visit did not promise much interest to the philosopher, and he informs his friend and correspondent, Hume, that he has "begun to write a book in order to pass away the time." One can hazard a good guess as to what this book was! Subsequently, however, the tour proved of great value to Smith, for whilst in Paris he was brought into contact with the shining lights of the Physiocratic School. Returning from abroad, Smith devoted all his energies to the preparation of his great work which, under the title of An Inquiry into the Nature and Cause of the Wealth of Nations, appeared in 1776, of its reception all notice may be deferred until dealing with the work itself. The closing years of Adam Smith's life were spent in Edinburgh. A conspicuous figure he must have been perambulating to and from the Custom House, where he had been given an official post, for not only did he walk with a peculiar swaying motion of the body, but he held a bunch of flowers in his left hand whilst his cane was carried in a military fashion over his shoulder. "Often, moreover, his lips would be moving all the while and smiling in rapt conversation with invisible friends." Of his absent-mindedness more than one amusing account has been given, but a single instance must suffice.

The scholar had received an invitation to Dalkeith Palace to meet a distinguished political personage; becoming, however, oblivious of his surroundings, Smith began to indulge in remarks about the individual in question which were more candid than complimentary. Nor were matters greatly improved when, on being recalled from his reverie, he murmured, "Deil care, deil care, it's all true." He died in 1790, having just completed his sixty-seventh year.

His Work

The term "epoch-making" is sometimes rather loosely applied, but if any book ever deserved this distinction it is the Wealth of Nations. In England during the seventeenth century, writers on economic subjects were inclined to believe that the advantages of trade were one-sided rather than mutual, and that State interference was desirable for securing the benefits to this country. Towards the close of this period the germs of a new economic philosophy are discernible, but they had to await development until about the middle of the eighteenth century, when there appeared in France a group of thinkers who became known as the "Physiocrates." This school, of which Quesnay was the founder, maintained the principles of economic liberty and endeavoured to emancipate industry from governmental control, just as some of their distinguished countrymen were striving to emancipate thought.

In our own island, too, Hume and Dean Tucker were sounding a progressive note. "Not only as a man," says the former writer, "but as a British subject, I pray for the flourishing commerce of Germany, Spain, Italy, and even France itself."

Adam Smith's work came at an auspicious moment, and succeeded in arousing an almost immediate interest. Within fifteen years of its publication the Wealth of Nations passed through six editions, five of which were called for during the author's lifetime—no light testimony considering the character of the book. The impression which it made on William Pitt is well known, and Smith is said to have declared that the statesman's comprehension of its arguments equalled his own.

What is the basic idea of Adam Smith's philosophy?

It may be fairly said to be a confidence in the beneficence of nature. The author of the Wealth of Nations believed in a natural order of things which works for the happiness of mankind. To secure the advantages of this arrangement, liberty is an essential condition. Artificial devices restricting the play of certain natural instincts are consequently to be regarded as harmful, they hinder the increase of wealth. The true method of promoting material welfare is to leave "every man free so long as he does not violate the laws of justice, to pursue his own interest in his own way." This implies that the interest of the individual harmonises with that of the community, the coincidence is not, it would seem, invariable. Trade, he affirms, when rightly understood is "a bond of union and friendship," its benefits are reciprocal. "The modern maxims of foreign commerce, by aiming at the impoverishment of all our neighbours," tend to defeat their own ends. For "as a rich man is likely to be a better customer to the industrious people in his neighbourhood than a poor, so is likewise a rich nation." In the light of past history, it is interesting to note Smith's opinion concerning the possibilities of Free Trade in this country. To anticipate its entire restoration, he says "is as absurd as to expect that an Oceania or Utopia should ever be established in it. Not only the prejudice of the public, but that which is much more unconquerable, the private interests of many individuals irresistibly oppose it." His own work was to prove a great factor in falsifying this prophecy.

Though Smith was not original in advocating commercial freedom, he does seem to have been unique in the extensive and detailed knowledge that he brought to the discussion of the subject. This fact no doubt affords some explanation of his influence. "Men," it has been remarked, "who were indifferent to general demonstrations of the futility of commercial restrictions were forced to listen respectfully to a man who had all the available statistics at his fingers' ends and was able to show them in black and white the mode in which the English commercial system had generated certain definite and assignable evils." Few writers have received more extravagant eulogies than Adam Smith. Buckle, in his enthusiasm, declared that "this solitary Scotchman . . . contributed more towards the happiness of man than has been effected by the united abilities of all the statesmen and legislators of whom history has presented an authentic account." After such excessive admiration all other appreciations must of necessity appear lukewarm, even the belief that in the history of Political Economy the importance of Adam Smith is second to none.

The economic world of Smith's day was, as it has been observed, "a comparatively narrow one," but even whilst he lived the way was being prepared for a vast expansion of its boundaries. Indeed the Wealth of Nations had not yet made its appearance when there started that remarkable series of inmechanical discoveries which was to revolutionise the methods of production. Within a quarter of a century of its publication the darker side of the industrial revolution was already becoming apparent. Social reform was in the air; Godwin had propounded the theory that communism would bring happiness. His optimistic predictions were challenged by an anonymous writer in an Essay on the Principle of Population, the author was a clergyman of the Church of England, ROBERT MALTHUS (1766-1834). Five years later the polemical effort of 1798 was succeeded by an elaborate treatise on the same question. The proposition around which the arguments of Malthus centre is that "population has a tendency to increase faster than food." Now what is to hinder this tendency from producing disastrous results? He points out that there are various counteracting agencies. These checks are differentiated as positive and preventive; and amongst those enumerated are famine, war, disease, &c. But there is one check which does something to relieve the gloom of this depressing catalogue: this he terms the "moral restraint." By moral restraint Malthus did not imply the idea with which we are familiar, namely, that of post-nuptial prudence, he meant rather an abstinence from marriage which was dictated by foresight and accompanied by moral behaviour. In other words, one should consider the means of providing for children before having them. For every child after the sixth he suggests an allowance from the public funds. Thus all Malthus' teaching may be said to converge upon this practical point. "Add to the ten commandments the new law, 'Thou shalt not marry until there is a fair prospect of supporting six children.' " The welfare, then, of the working classes, according to his view, rests mainly in their own hands; it is to the cultivation of moral restraint that we must look for the means of permanently improving their condition.

The work of Malthus was certainly of great value in drawing attention to an important and hitherto insufficiently studied question; apart from this merit, moreover, the Essay deserves our gratitude for its stimulating effect upon the thought of both Darwin and Alfred Russel Wallace.

During the early part of the nineteenth century the social problem was becoming increasingly prominent. The price of wheat was high, wages were low and there was in addition a heavy taxation owing to the war. Under such conditions the question of distribution of wealth could scarcely be devoid of interest. The writer who attacked this difficult problem was a man of Jewish parentage and business experience—DAVID RICARDO (1772-1823), the friend of James Mill. From the latter's illustrious son he received the high tribute of being compared favourably with Adam Smith, and amongst others who waxed enthusiastic over his abilities were to be numbered Thomas de Quincy and Lord Brougham. The book upon which his fame rested was the Principles of Political Economy and Taxation, published in 1817.

To give any connected account of this work would of course carry us too far afield. All that need concern us here is the fact that his theories point to a clash of economic interests. In the first place, the interest of the landowners is opposed to the rest of the community. He gains by the difficulties in the way of increasing the food supply. It is to his advantage that men should be obliged to bring inferior soils under cultivation—for this raises the rent of the more fertile land—than that trade should be liberated and corn obtained in greater quantity from other countries. Again, capital and labour, it would seem, are also in opposition, for he says "it has been my constant endeavour to show throughout this work that the ratio of profits can never be increased but by a fall of wages."

Political Economy was becoming an influential science. "Up to the year 1818," it has been said, "the science was scarcely known or talked of beyond a small circle of philosophers." To its rapid emergence from this obscurity John Stuart Mill has testified, and it is evident that in no small degree he attributed the change to the writings and "noble exertions" of David Ricardo.

PART VI

THE VICTORIAN ERA

(1830-1890)

INTRODUCTION

"It is not by the monk in his cell or the saint in his closet, but by the valiant worker in humble sphere and in dangerous days, that the landmarks of liberty are pushed forward." These words by that vigorous social critic, William Rathbone Greg, apply with special force to the first half of the nineteenth century.

Two names especially stand out in those years of social unrest and political fermentation. William Cobbett, the champion of the agricultural poor, and Francis Place, tailor and democrat, who did an equally valiant work for the industrial population of the city. Cobbett's work synchronises with the period of the Romantic Revival, and has already been noted. Place, born in 1771, lived until 1851, his activities covering the most urgent period of the industrial revolution, and the scarcely less momentous political revolution initiated in 1832.

The era of the Renaissance of English Song had been also an era of reform. John Howard had inaugurated the work of prison reform, Bentham and Romilly had purified the criminal laws, Cobbett and Place had fought in the cause of political readjustment, while men like the Woseleys had done much to stir the moral susceptibilities of Englishmen.

But the two great revolutions that had come in with the new century proved to be reactionary forces in English life, from the reformer's point of view. The industrial revolution, while aggravating the symptoms of distress, had appealed strongly to the baser instincts of the commercial classes. The French Revolution had created a distrust for progressive measures in the minds of timid statesmen.

At the close of the Napoleonic wars in 1815, what was the condition of social England?

The middle-class citizen groaned under the burden of heavy taxation, but, after all, it was he who had already begun to reap some of the advantages of the industrial revolution. To the wage-earning classes the now wealth accruing from the vast increase of manufactures meant little. On the whole, the one best off at the close of the war was the country gentleman; for every manufacturing improvement had tended to raise rents.

The cessation of the war brought little alleviation, and the industrial population was in a worse position even than before. Why was this? Because the war had drawn upon the labour market, and although the demand for soldiers and sailors makes for unproductive labour, yet the onus of this would affect only immediately the more prosperous citizens. At the close of the war these men got thrown back on the labour market at a time when capital was very scarce. The result of this is obvious.

The years from 1815 to 1832 were very bleak years in the annals of the London poor. During this time Francis Place, by his extraordinary capacity for work and self-improvement, had amassed not only a fair fortune but qualified himself for the task of educating his fellow-workers and giving practical assistance to the reforming zeal of Jeremy Bentham and James Mill. And if we look round London during this time, we shall note how many progressive agencies are at work.

At Charing Cross Francis Place had his famous library—a library of pamphlets, journals, books, Parliamentary reports, memoranda on every kind of political and social subject—all tucked away at the back of his shop. It is hard to overestimate the influence of this library in the political life of the time. "My library," says Place, "was a sort of gossiping shop for such persons as were in any way engaged in public matters having the benefit of the people for their object. No one who knew me would hesitate to consult with me on any subject on which I could either give or procure information." To this shop came the leading politicians of the time, ready to avail themselves of Place's industry and method, and not merely to consult his books but to confer with the man, for Place knew better than any other the character and spirit of the men for whom the Radical politicians of the time wished to legislate. The shop and library was a centre for gossip and consultation much as the coffee house of Queen Anne's reign had been for the politicians of that time.

The cause of Prison Reform had been taken up by Mrs. Fry, and much of her work was done during these years. She had first visited a prisoner in Newgate in 1813, and found all the general prisoners, young and old, experienced criminals and first offenders, crowded together indiscriminately. She found the place an inferno—tenanted by a mob of howling, swearing, fighting creatures. To tame such savages, to educate any order out of the chaos, seemed hopeless. She did a little to alleviate their wants, but it was not till three years later that she started resolutely the work of cleansing these Augean stables. "Within a month," it is said, "the place was transformed . . . the wild beasts were tamed." Finally, Robert Owen brought to London, about 1813, the end of the "New View of Society," which we may regard as the starting-point of modern Socialism. He and Place were great friends.

While Place, Cobbett, Owen, and Elizabeth Fry were working in their various ways, Dickens, born in one of the stormiest of years (1812), was spending his unhappy boyhood in London (1822-24), and passing through experiences which were to inspire him throughout his life, in the cause of suffering and privation wherever he might find it.

Charles Kingsley, a schoolboy at Bristol, had his first taste of the social unrest of the time when he witnessed the fierce riots in that city (1831-32) at the time of the Reform Bill.

There is no need to retell here the familiar old story of the Reform Bill and of the uncompromising attitude of the House of Lords. The Lords realised reluctantly the temper of the nation. The Duke of Wellington and his friends retired sullenly, and the Bill became the law of the land on January 7, 1832. Viewed from the standpoint of to-day it seems to us a very mildly progressive measure. Certainly the Radical democrats of the day were frankly disappointed with it. But it was progressive—that was the great thing. The middle classes at last were fairly represented, those less fortunately placed had yet to wait for recognition.

None saw this more clearly than Francis Place. He was not enamoured of Parliamentary legislation at any time, and had the strong, individualistic dislike of Government interference peculiar to the Benthamite school of politicians. He continually urged upon his comrades the primary necessity for educating themselves for political work. He wished the poor to contribute to the education of their children as best they could. Above all, he desired to see them self-respecting. To help to effect this he established a London Mechanics' Institute in 1823, which at a later time came under the superintendence of Dr. Birkbeck, and is to-day a flourishing educational agency.

There was nothing of the demagogue Hunt about Place. Claptrap and rhetorical generalities he abominated. He feared his neighbours not "too clamorous," he says, but "too tame and quiescent. Fear, the child of ignorance, creates bugbears, our business should be to dispel fear and put reason in its place."

Francis Place and other Benthamite Radicals joined hands with working men democrats in protesting against the insufficiency of the Reform Act, and demanding universal suffrage, vote by ballot, and other points which formed the staple of the Chartist's cry in the forties. Yet it was clearly seen by all but the dullest, that unsatisfactory as Russell's measure might seem, yet it signalled the turn of the tide. The House of Commons was no longer an oligarchy.

More important even than his share in the Reform movement and in educational matters, were the valiant and successful efforts of Place in 1824 to secure the repeal of the iniquitous Combination Laws. A series of measures had been enacted between 1761 and 1799, with the object of regulating wages, which forbade combination in any trade whatever. These laws, by the exertions of Place, aided by Hume, Burdett, and Hobhouse, were swept away despite the rigorous opposition of Huskisson and Peel.

After the Reform Act, Place parted company with the Whigs, and devoted his energies mainly to the working-class movement, which led to the Chartist movement, and along with Lovett and others he formulated the People's Charter.

When Charles Dickens began to write, the humanitarian reforms urged by Bentham and his friends had done something to mitigate the savagery of the late century. In 1832, shop-stealing and forgery were no longer visited with the death penalty. Hanging in chains was abolished in 1834, the pillory, the stocks, the ducking-stool, symbols of a brutal age, vanished shortly afterwards. And in 1841 capital punishment was reserved for murder only. The new Gaol Acts of 1844, largely inspired by John Howard and Elizabeth Fry, transformed the condition of the prisons. But there was a great deal yet to be accomplished, and much of what remained is faithfully mirrored in the stories of Dickens—the deplorable state of the Debtors' Prison, the Fleet, and the Marshalsea; the dismal abysses of elementary education, the sorry type of nurses available in sickness, the oppression of little children; the prevalence of religious hypocrisy—these, and many other dark corners in the life of London, were illuminated by the searchlight of his genius.

"He who aspires to be a hero," says Johnson, "must drink brandy."

"Sots are excluded from the best company," wrote Sir Walter Scott, in 1826.

These dicta sufficiently indicate public sentiment in the late eighteenth and early nineteenth century.

Despite the fact that there is so much hard drinking mentioned in Dickens, public opinion had veered round considerably in his day from what it had been under the Georges. Then the legislators of the country would often end the day in inglorious carousals, and in the best clubs, scenes of intoxication were not only common, but thought nothing of.

Fielding's Squire Western had his City counterpart, who considered no day well rounded off unless he and his guests finished their festivities on the floor. Dickens did not live in the "three-bottle days," and although there was undoubtedly a good deal of drinking in his day as in ours, I suspect that some of his fictional "alarums and excursions" were merely literary exuberances on the part of the genial chronicler, who knew so well his Fielding and Smollett.

Assuredly public opinion was different. The condition of the clubs is a case in point, the drunkard there was the exception, not the rule, and if tolerated for social qualities, was certainly not taken for granted by his fellow-clubmen.

The reader of Dickens will have noted how that the jovial, humorous treatment of intemperance, so marked in his earlier books, suffers a change in course of years. Not only does it figure less frequently in the novels, but its appearance is less frequently accompanied by the stage direction—laughter. The earlier hypocrites are chronic drunkards—Stiggins and Pecksniff, for instance—but Mr Chadband grows notoriously didactic over tea, and Mr Pumblechook, if not a pattern of sobriety, is certainly not especially intemperate. And in his last book, the scene, where the two young rivals meet and the limits of temperance are passed, is conceived in quite a serious vein.

Indeed, there is no better guide to early Victorian London than Charles Dickens. Clubland and the upper stratum of London society are more faithfully pictured by Thackeray, by reason of his better knowledge. But for the motley multitude that pour through the streets, for the hole-and-corner places of the City, for London as an incomprehensible, terrifying, fascinating, delightful personality—every brick and stone alive with tragic humour—Dickens remains unrivalled.

With the change of manners that was becoming appreciable, it was to be expected that duelling, so long recognised as the legitimate end of a quarrel, should be discouraged. It had already become ridiculous in Dickens' day, and is tantamount to a breach of the peace. But the Mr Nupkinses of the eighteenth century would not have concerned themselves in the matter. Then, the most ridiculous quarrels ended tragically. Colonel Montgomery fell by the bullet of a friend with whom he had squabbled about the respective merits of their pet dogs. Finally, after being discouraged for many years among civilians, the War Office set its seal upon public sentiment by declaring that it was suitable to the character of honourable men to offer and accept explanations and apologies for wrong committed.

The closer approximation of literature to social life is very marked in the Victorian era. Kingsley writes passionate social tracts in the guise of a story, cheap bread inspires the muse of Ebenezer Elliott, Elizabeth Barrett voices The Cry of the Children, and Thomas Hood immortalises the weary sempstress and the despairing unfortunate. Carlyle, after excursions into German literature and European history, plunges into the political problems of the day. Ruskin starting as critic of the art of painting turns in the new century to the more complex art of life, and no man of letters has tackled industrial problems with greater insight and more brilliant suggestiveness.

Meanwhile the cry of the Chartists—"Give us not protection but political rights"—had in part been realised. The agitation which had died down since the passing of the first Reform Act, had increased in volume and urgency, and it was clear that the claim of the working classes could no longer be neglected. In the summer of 1847 the working men in the towns of England for the first time had a voice in the management of national affairs.

A great power was now in their hands, the next important step was the securing that the power should be rightly used, and in 1870 we have the famous Education Act—that system of National Education of which Arnold so warmly approved.

In 1859 a new influence came into the literary and social life of the day. Social politics had impressed themselves on early Victorian literature. Natural science was to influence the literature of the mid-century.

The publication of The Origin of Species started a new era. Poetry and fiction are infected by the new spirit—the spirit of scientific observation and philosophic analysis. We move in the atmosphere of George Eliot, Matthew Arnold, Clough, Huxley, Browning.

In so far as this new departure affected social life, it may be noted in the systematising of popular education, the increasing desire for culture. The literary and scientific institute takes a more prominent place in the life of the day, and science, once a sealed book save to an elect few, has become democratised. The man of science is no longer an academic recluse—he is, in the person of Huxley, a man of rare influence as a social and educational force.

Amidst the multifarious activities of the mid-century, what is it that impresses us the most strongly? It is this. The old militant individualism which animated France entirely, and Dickens very largely, is disappearing. The earlier years saw the awakening of democratic London, in later years the people are learning to make use of the powers they have acquired. And in doing this, even in Dickens' day, a change in the political atmosphere is noticeable. This individualism was the mainspring of the older Radicalism and the earlier democratic movements, but even so staunch an Individualist as John Stuart Mill soon grew conscious of the limitations of the Benthamite creed. When intolerance of interference with the individual went to the point of resisting the Factory Acts, it was clear that "something was rotten" in the state of Radicalism.

The Benthamites had done a great and good work with their doctrine of utility, for they purged the English Constitution of anomalies and absurdities, and reshaped on sound and orderly lines our jurisprudence. But they underrated the anarchic tendencies of untrammelled competition, and in their distaste for State interference they rendered largely nugatory the very freedom whose banner they were ever waving. John Stuart Mill illustrates the two streams of thought—Collectivism and Individualism—crossing and recrossing one another in his writings. Kingsley and the Christian Social movement break with the older Individualistic Radicalism; and the Collectivist Ideal, after the death of Dickens, claims more and more adherents.

Thus far we have sketched in its rough outlines the social history of the Victorian era, especially as it is reflected in the literature of the time. From this chronicle two factors stand out prominently: (1) The steady advance of democratic ideals, (2) The progress of scientific thought. Both of these powerfully affected and were affected in their turn by the literature of the age. The democratic movement involved not only the extension of political privileges, but a levelling up of educational advantages. Together with the Reform Acts and factory legislation, we had the rapid development of journalism and periodical literature. The year that saw the passing of the Reform Act witnessed also the establishment of the Penny Magazine by Charles Knight, and Chambers's Edinburgh Journal by the brothers

William and Robert Chambers, and the former, before many months had passed, reached a circulation of 200,000. The condition of our schools, so deplorable at the beginning of the era, improved steadily, until the urgency of a sound popular education, long before insisted upon by Carlyle and Matthew Arnold, was recognised in Forster's Act of 1870. Literature therefore, appealing to a much vaster audience than heretofore, has become a more active power, both for good and evil. The change in the audience, from a more leisured and better cultured one, to one that is more strenuous in its activities and has comparatively less culture and less money, has had its effect upon our poets, novelists, and essayists.

But if the advance of democratic ideals has not been inimical to literature—for so far from chilling its vitality it has given it a greater energy and driving power, and prevented it from becoming merely the special product of a clique—yet it has often proved inimical to men of letters. This, obviously, must be conceded. Material rewards fall to the lot more often than not of the less worthy, while the more worthy, if without financial resources of their own, languish in poverty. In any case, it is unhappily found that genius must fight harder for its bread and butter than mediocrity has need to. But is this to be laid at the door only of the reading democracy of to-day? Has it not unhappily been always the case? In the older days of "patronage," when no large plebeian existed, did not genius, unless willing to prostitute itself, often go down before the more opportunist? The grim and tragic history of Grub Street will assure us on this point. We have always stoned our prophets, and starved our saints, and the posthumous halo and tawdry crown of laurel do nothing to mitigate the material neglect accorded while living.

Perhaps some day we shall recognise, as a community, that great power of mind and imagination need more material recognition than we have accorded them. Man does not live by bread alone; but being mortal, he cannot do without it.

No less marked than the democratic note of the Victorian age is the scientific note. The effect of the development of physical sciences upon social life does not fall within the scope of our inquiry. We are concerned here with its effect upon the literature of the age, while taking for granted that it has revolutionised the physical environment. The advance of science has transformed man's outlook upon life and has affected every channel of intellectual activity. And it has done this in two ways. First, it has fostered a spirit of restlessness, for by increasing man's material resources, it has commercialised modern life. Wordsworth lamented its tendencies at the outset when he cried out:

"The world is too much with us late and soon;
Getting and spending we lay waste our powers";

while Ruskin at a later date flung out his sarcastic dictum that the compelling desire of the day was, "Wherever we are, to go somewhere else, whatever we have, to get something more." But both Wordsworth and Ruskin looked too exclusively upon what was incidental to, rather than essential in, the scientific movement. Every fresh accession of human knowledge has a destructive as well as a constructive side. The new tributary, surging up into the main stream, obliterates the old landmarks, and agitates the placid waters; the immediate effect is disturbing, but after a while fresh landmarks emerge, the river resumes its normal rate, and its vivifying and dynamic power is greatly augmented. The effects of geological and biological discovery shook to its depths the old cosmogony; and the genial spiritual unrest is reflected most remarkably in Mid-Victorian poetry.

The questioning note in Clough, the pessimism of James Thomson, the wistful melancholy of Matthew Arnold, the fatalism of Fitzgerald, all testify to the sceptical tendencies evoked by scientific research. It did not kill poetry, but it stifled for a while the lyric impulse and overweighted verse with speculative thought.

On the other hand, if scientific discoveries intruded themselves too insistently upon the poetical imagination, they exerted an influence upon poets like Tennyson and Browning, that if occasionally inimical to art, on the whole evoked very markedly some of the most remarkable qualities in these great Victorians.

In Memoriam and Christmas Eve and Easter Day, published about the same time, are something much more than expressions of the troubled thought of the tune. They give us, the one in a setting of exquisite and delicate workmanship, the other with dramatic vigour and imaginative insight, a point of view of eternal freshness and interest.

More important even than the matter of science is the scientific method that invades the art of the age.

In accuracy of detail it would be impossible to rival the scenic descriptions of Tennyson, whose Nature poetry is like the work of an inspired scientist, and if we pass from poetry to history and fiction, we can see the dominance of the scientific method more clearly.

The principle of induction, involving as a primary process the patient accumulation of facts, may be seen in the work of Carlyle, bitterly opposed as he was in many ways to the scientific attitude of mind, the same principle is at once the strength and weakness of the modern school of history. The modern historian, like the scientist, loves to trace things to a beginning, to mark the gradual development of an institution, he is also beginning to generalise from the data collected, and like Buckle, to try and understand the psychology of race, to give unity to the mass of data before him.

In fiction, the scientific spirit is no less discernible: the problems of heredity and environment pre-occupying the attention of the novelist. The social problem of the earlier Victorians, of Charlotte Brontë, Dickens, Kingsley, and Reade, give place to points in biology, psychology, pathology. The influence of Herbert Spencer and of Comte meets us in the pages of George Eliot, while the analytical methods of science are even more subtly followed in the fiction of George Eliot, the early writings of Mrs. Humphry Ward, and the intimate Wessex studies of Mr. Thomas Hardy.

The Pre-Raphaelite movement seems at first sight something apart from the main stream in Victorian literature. It is concerned primarily with neither democratic ideals, nor with scientific and philosophic problems; its chief concern is with art, and it emphasizes especially the connection between poetry, painting, and the plastic arts. As soon as we consider this movement in its broader aspects, we find in it the logical development of the Romantic Revival. The great outbreak of romanticism that ushered in the century was marked, as we have said, by the study of mediævalism, and by Hellenic sympathies. The torch lit by poetry was passed on to theology, and the Tractarian movement is in reality romanticism seen through a stained glass window. Mediæval art, that had fascinated Walpole and Scott, inspires the ecclesiastical revival; Rossetti delves in the folklore and dabble of the Middle Ages; Morris busies himself in its legends and sagas, while both men revere the old religious painters and the beauty of Gothic. Holman Hunt and Burne-Jones are on one side the direct successors to Newman and Keble, on the poetical side the Pro-Raphaelites derive from Keats even more than from Scott, in their idealism and devotion to beauty. But Swinburne approximates rather to the Hellenic and Shelley, while his art is nearer akin to music than painting.

Pre-Raphaelitism owes something of its emphasis also to the fact that it is a recoil from the philosophic and scientific preoccupation of many Victorian poets. The polemical note that had threatened to drown the art of poetry and had already marred some of Tennyson's later work and much of Browning's rhythmic analysis, was hateful to passionate worshippers of beauty like Rossetti and Morris. Poetry for them was not concerned with dialectics but with æsthetics. Yet Pre-Raphaelitism, for all its fastidious beauty, cannot compare on its literary side with the art of such great Victorians as Tennyson and Browning. Victorian literature at its greatest is intensely humanistic and vital.

The most representative Victorian makers of verse, Tennyson, Robert Browning, Elizabeth Barrett Browning, and George Meredith, while lacking the fire and air of the Romantics, and less careful than they not to overstep the borderline between rhythmic beauty and rhythmic argument, excel them in breadth of outlook and variety of method. If in keeping close to the earth, then Muses occasionally soil their wings, they do not at any rate lose themselves in the sky, while in prose, the Victorian age is second to none in its rich complexity and "veined humanity."

I POETRY: ALFRED, LORD TENNYSON

ALFRED, LORD TENNYSON (1809-1892)

HIS LIFE

A GUEST arriving at a certain house in London, was awaiting his host in an apparently empty drawing-room, when a big, swarthy man in evening dress rose suddenly from the rug in front of the fire and growled out in a melancholy voice, "I must introduce myself. I am Septimus, the most morbid of the Tennysons."

Such was the amusing tale that Dante Gabriel Rossetti—lover of legends, past and present—used to relate with great enjoyment. Yet for all its absurdity it goes to the very root of Tennyson's personality, for the morbid strain of melancholy in the Tennyson family must be thoroughly reckoned with before we can understand the man. It lies at the heart of his strength and weakness as a poet. It explains the strange querulousness that marks many of his poems dealing with religious subjects, explains the constant harping on theological difficulties, the pessimistic note that, the first Locksley Hall notwithstanding, rings through most of his social utterances, it explains also the very large proportion of poems expressing yet varying shades of wistful meditation and regret. Along with this strain of melancholy was a strain of elemental vigour, inherent also in the rural stock from which he sprang. This characteristic, though familiar enough to Tennyson's friends, is less discernible in his writings, since, for reasons that will appear later, he was chary of giving it expression. But unless we remember it we shall not find it easy to understand how the man who wrote the sentimental Idylls, and chiselled with such laborious cunning and severe restraint the verse of In Memoriam, wrote also The Northern Farmer, The Cobbler, and Rizpah.

No better all-round picture of Tennyson has ever been drawn than by Carlyle, whose genius for literary portrait-painting, despite humorous exaggerations, was unsurpassed.

"A man solitary and sad, as certain men are, dwelling in an element of gloom, carrying a bit of Chaos about him, in short, which he is manufacturing into Cosmos. . . . One of the finest-looking men in the world—a great shock of rough dusky dark hair, bright, laughing, hazel eyes, massive aquiline face, most massive yet most delicate, of pallid, brown complexion, almost Indian-looking, clothes cynically loose, free-and-easy, smokes infinite tobacco. His voice is musical, metallic, fit for loud laughter and piercing wail and all that may lie between. Speech and speculation free and plentiful, I do not meet in these late decades such company over a pipe. We shall see what he shall grow to."

Again to his brother John, Carlyle sent the following.

"A fine, large-featured, dim-eyed, bronze-coloured, shaggy-headed man is Alfred, dusky, smoky, free-and-easy, who swims outwardly and inwardly with great composure, in an articulate element as of tranquil chaos and tobacco-smoke, great now and then when he does emerge, a most restful, brotherly, solid-hearted man."

Born August 6, 1809, at Somersby Rectory, Lincolnshire, Alfred Tennyson was cradled in the heart of the Fen Country, and the spirit of the landscape invaded some of his happiest scenic descriptions. Rolling pastures, low sand dunes, broad sea marshes, mile upon mile of flat level country, broken here and there by undulating hills—such were the physical features of Tennyson's native soil. It was an open-air life that the youth led, the life of a meditative observer rather than that of an active athletic youth. From early days he loved to play with the magic of words, striving to record his impressions of Nature with that exactitude of detail in which he afterwards excelled, delighting especially in the waterscape so abundantly diversified from the dark stagnant water pools and purling streams, to the swell and thunder of the sea upon the sandy coast.

From the first also, a gift for melody seemed to be his, and ambitious dreams filled his mind.

In 1828 he went up, with Charles, to Trinity College, Cambridge, where his brother Frederick had preceded him. His physical appearance impressed everyone, and a charm of personality attracted to him a host of friends. Shy, humorous, with fits of despondency, he displayed a certain vigour and common sense that pleased his seniors. Although a member of a vigorous debating society called "The Apostles," he took no very active part in the proceedings, but seemed to have impressed his friends more by his oracular silences, and occasional flashes of speech, than if he had been a glib and ready speaker.

In 1829 he won the Chancellor's English medal, with his poem, Tunburton, and in 1831 left Cambridge, which he never regarded with any special affection, to resume his quiet family life. His father had just died, but the family still lived on at Somersby, and Tennyson shared his literary enthusiasm with his gentle mother, to whom he had been always devoted. Meanwhile he had published his first volume of verse, but showed no desire to take up any profession, and was content to live the life of a somewhat reclusive country gentleman. His friendship with Arthur Hallam was one of the most precious things to him during these years. With Hallam he had gone to Spain in 1832, to show his sympathies with some Spanish revolutionaries; Hallam had become engaged to his sister Emily, and was now reading for the Bar. Tennyson's occasional visits to London were made to see his friend, who lived in the "long, unlovely street"—Wimpole Street, Cavendish Square, no less unlovely to-day.

But the sedentary life, combined with indiscretions of diet and excessive devotion to tobacco, played havoc with his health, and while still in a state of dyspeptic hypochondria, the news of his friend's death came to him in September 1833.

Tennyson seemed stunned by the shock for a while, then, as an outlet for his grief, he began writing In Memoriam. Starting as an elegy for his friend, the work soon became a long philosophic poem dealing with universal questions of life, death, and the hereafter.

Tennyson had always been interested in these problems, and had written of them in some of his early poems; but the treatment had been more or less academic. Now, shaken to his depths by grief, the poet writes with an intensity and glow hitherto scarcely suspected. One of his most interesting friendships during these years was with Edward Fitzgerald, to whom Tennyson read many of his poems out of a "little red book." Fitzgerald's admiration for the early work of the poet is well known; another friendship was with Carlyle, who liked the man, but had no patience with his versifying.

Meanwhile Tennyson continued to write a great deal, and to live a Bohemian existence that suited his temperament better than it did his constitution. With the publication of the two volumes of 1842, where much of his earlier work was revised, he established his reputation with a tolerably large circle of readers.

He had moved from Lincolnshire to Tunbridge Wells, which did not suit him; thence to Bexley near Maidstone. About this time he lost most of his money in an unfortunate investment, and was glad to accept a Civil List pension of £200 a year, in 1845.

Carlyle had originated the idea of the pension and pressed it upon Richard Milnes. Milnes objected first of all, asking, "What will my constituents say?"

"Richard Milnes," ment, when the Lord pension for Alfred Ten blame on your constituents, it is you that will be damned."

Tennyson's health was still indifferent, and for some years between 1846 and 1850 he lived with his family at Cheltenham, where he met one of his fervent admirers, F. W. Robertson of Brighton. 1850 proved a memorable year; in this year he made his happy marriage, published In Memoriam, and on Wordsworth's death accepted the Laureateship offered to him. His wife was Emily Sarah Sellwood, whose sister had already been married to his brother Charles. His own comment on his marriage was, "The peace of God came into my life before the Altar when I married her." From this time his life ran smoothly and tranquilly to the end.

Everything that Tennyson now wrote commanded an audience growing in numbers; worldly honours poured in steadily upon him, starting with an honorary D.C.L. from Oxford in 1855, culminating in the peerage offered by Gladstone, 1883. The only serious grief of his later years was the death of his gifted son, Lionel, in 1886.

His friendships, many and memorable, included Gladstone, Tyndall, Huxley, F. D. Maurice, Jowett, Max Müller, Henry Irving, and Theodore Watts-Dunton.

He lived during later life in Surrey and the Isle of Wight. His tastes had always been rural, and he was never better than when living a simple, healthy, country life. At the same time it put him out of touch with many of the problems of the hour, and his later work suffers from this withdrawal from the life of his day. Especially did it hamper him in his playwriting, for which he thought he had a special vocation. But his meditative and reflective cast of mind, exaggerated by the existence he led, ill-fitted him for the urgent and immediate appeal of the drama. The most ineffective of these, The Promise of May, was produced at the Globe Theatre and gave rise to the saying that the Laureate, "after filling the world with his verse, was now emptying the Globe with his prose."

Tennyson's commanding appearance, and great intellectual powers, made him easily dominate his company; although he was at heart a simple and modest and affectionate man, yet little infirmities of temperament made him seem not unfrequently self-opinionated and ungracious. His natural reserve and abnormal sensitiveness made him inaccessible to certain people who were themselves sensitive, and his manner was unnecessarily boorish at times. But he had a genuine horror of gush, and it was a characteristic of him to have delighted in the story of Wellington, whom a sentimental admirer had piloted across a crowded way. Wellington wished to reward the kindly stranger, who exclaimed the only reward he desired was "to be allowed to shake the hand of the great conqueror." To which the Duke replied, "Don't be a d—d fool!"

Some of his mots are excellent in their directness. Once after talking to the historian, John Richard Green, the poet said, "You're a jolly, vivid man—and I'm glad to have known you, you're as vivid as lightning."

Of the famous metaphysical society to which he belonged (a society numbering nearly all the great men of the day), that had perished after ten years' existence, he said it died because "after ten years of strenuous effort no one had succeeded in even defining the term—Metaphysics."

A typical example of his humour is afforded by the comment he made at Lyme Regis (the scene of Jane Austen's Persuasion). Some lady, anxious to air her erudition, referred to the Duke of Monmouth. "Don't talk to me of Monmouth," broke in the poet sternly, "but show me the exact spot where Louisa Musgrove fell."

His old age was a singularly even and tranquil one, and his vitality was only surpassed by his contemporary, James Martineau, of whose physical feats in the late 'seventies Tennyson was no little jealous.

Tennyson's picturesque and impressive death in 1892, and burial in Westminster Abbey, is too well known to demand repetition here. It rounds off admirably a picturesque and impressive life.

It is significant that the first characteristic to strike the personal friends of Tennyson should have been his scientific perception rather than his poetic imagination. Browning often wrote like a poet with strong scientific predilections, Tennyson like a scientist with a marked aptitude for poetry. There is no poet who was more jealous of the form of a poem than he. Just as he would stop a story if there was the least inaccuracy of detail, so he would revise and revise a stanza, to rectify the least ambiguity of statement. This scientific perception is indeed the source alike of his strength and weakness as a poet. It gave exquisite accuracy to his scenic pictures; form and balance to his craftsmanship; clarity to his utterance. On the other hand, its insistent presence clashed often with the poet's intuition and troubled his muse. Especially is this true of some of his later work. The scientist in him vexed the seer and visionary, the poet in him broke away with fierce impatience from the obstinate questioning of the mind.

HIS WORK

Bearing in mind this psychological characteristic of the writer, let us examine his work, first as a literary artist, then as a thinker in verse.

The Development of his Art

The poetry of the Romantic Revival, with one exception, had little influence on the poetic development of Tennyson. Byron's influence may be traced in the volume of Poems by Two Brothers, but it is only a trace. Of Shelley, there is nothing, with Wordsworth he had a certain spiritual affinity, but as artists they have scarcely anything in common. No doubt he owed a technical debt to the supreme skill of Coleridge as a metrist, but save in the imitative period of the early volume just referred to, Coleridge did nothing to shape Tennyson's art. Keats alone, whom the poet admired and revered above all his immediate predecessors, affected his poetic development. The sensuousness of Keats, the delicate sensitiveness to external impressions, the atmosphere of pensive beauty that hung over his scenic pictures, these matters appealed intensely to young Tennyson.

Yet we must not exaggerate this influence. The visual clarity and love of detail, present even in the Juvenilia, owe nothing to Keats. The minuteness of observation probably owed something to Crabbe, with whose natural descriptions Tennyson's pictures of the fen country are curiously alike in their love of microscopic effects. The merits of Tennyson's first volume, Poems, chiefly Lyrical, lie in their grace and melody. Many of them were revised by the poet later almost out of recognition, but The Revolt of the Arabian Nights, Mariana in the Moated Grange, and the pretty vignettes of girlhood, remain to testify to the delicate artistry of the new writer.

The chief defect of this early work is a thinness of inspiration. There is too much sugar, and too little flour in these literary confections. The volume of 1833 strikes at once a stronger and more varied note: Fatima has a fire about it that is lacking not merely in his earlier efforts, but in a good deal of his later verse; we have The Lady of Shalott, not so lovely a piece of mediæval magic as she appeared after his final revision, but beautiful none the less; above all there is The Lotus-Eaters, a tone picture of exceeding charm, that was to shape as one of Tennyson's most enchanting poems. The popular note of sentiment is struck successfully in The Miller's Daughter and The May Queen, though their poetical merit is on a distinctly lower level.

The volumes were freely, frankly, and even brutally attacked. Much of the criticism was salutary, and for the next ten years Tennyson, though he wrote plentifully, published nothing and revised with great care what he had written.

In 1842 he published two slight volumes largely consisting of winnowings from the earlier volumes, made with scrupulous care, and some new English Idylls. The nature of the revision showed how keen a self-critic the poet was, and how wisely he had taken to heart the bitter wisdom of his reviewers. Of the twenty-four pieces selected from the first volumes, not one is appreciably revised; of the sixteen pieces taken from the volume of 1833, seven were materially altered. This does not imply that the second volume was in the poet's opinion inferior to the first, but that he is more ambitious there and tried to soar above his range. Undoubtedly there is stronger work in the second volume, but it taxed more severely the power of the young literary artist. In the opinion of some critics, Edward Fitzgerald for instance, Tennyson never reached so high a standard again as was achieved in this volume of 1842. Certainly a volume that gave us the revised Lotos-Eaters and Lady of Shalott, the exquisite Day Dream, such perfect essays in classic art as Ulysses and Morte D'Arthur, such lovely songs as Break, Break, Break, and Come not, when I am Dead, is one that exhibits some of the best representative work of Tennyson. In some respects he never bettered it. Not even in the nature pictures of In Memoriam and Maud did he excel the scenic beauty and atmospheric charm of The Lotos-Eaters. Of its kind he never equalled the haunting music of The Lady of Shalott; while for strength and dignity and noble phrasing, Enone (revised), Ulysses and Tithonus, were never excelled later, though Lucretius (included in the Enoch Arden volume) well deserves a place alongside of them. But rich as this volume is in those characteristics that individualise his best work, clarity, melody, dignity, one cannot accept it as representing the high-water mark of the poet's genius. His lyric note is ampler and more varied in the lovely songs that decorate The Princess; and more passionate and more ecstatic in Maud. Conceding that none of the Idylls of the King rival the earlier Morte D'Arthur, we have to reckon with In Memoriam, and however little we may care for its philosophy, its technical workmanship can well hold its own with the very choicest of his earlier work. If not in the highest flight as poems, the Dramatic Monologues exhibit so fresh and delightful an aspect of the poet's gifts, that we cannot think of his poetry as complete without them.

It is an arguable point whether he ever did anything better than the work contained in the volume of 1842, but he certainly did some things as well, and as certainly increased the variety and plasticity of his art.

Thus far, Tennyson's work has been touched only slightly by the thought of his day. Much of it reflected the artistic ideals of Keats, and led the reader into an enchanted land of beauty, off the dusty highway of human existence. But in Locksley Hall were indications that social problems had begun to stir him, and in 1847 he published his first long poem, The Princess, which deals frankly with a problem of the day, the Woman's Question. This "Medley" showed a fine command of blank verse, and contains passages of great beauty. Yet the most attractive part of the poem lay in Tennyson's afterthought, of inserting "short swallow flights of song" between the various parts.

Regarded as a whole, the poems suffer from lack of organic unity, and from the somewhat uneasy wavering between jest and earnest in the matter of treatment, but it is significant of the trend of the poet's mind in the direction of current thought.

Meanwhile Tennyson had been working at what one of his friends called "the Memorial poems, carefully revising and elaborating them; though few realised that the monumental elegy, In Memoriam, published in 1850, was the outcome of nearly twenty years' thought and craftsmanship. As an elegy, its length militates against its effectiveness; but after all it is much more than an elegy; it is a deliberate statement of Tennyson's religious philosophy, and incidentally presents those vexed questions inter-relating religion and science that were beginning to trouble the poet's generation. It exhibits more fully than any poem of his hitherto had done, his knowledge of science and his power to actualise in exquisite phrase the latest discoveries of science, it illustrates afresh his visualising gift of pictorial description, and the vignettes of typical English scenery in this poem can rank with his best descriptive work. As a work of art, indeed, it is worthy of the highest praise. Not only is it a metrical masterpiece, for the movement of the verse suits to perfection the breeding and contemplative manner; but it is rich to overflowing in rhythmic felicities, and many of its lines have passed into our language and become common property. Perhaps, here and there, the highly-wrought craftsmanship obtrudes a shade too much and passes the borderline between art and artificiality, but the lapses are few, and the inevitable expressions many.

The quatrain stanza had been used by Lord Herbert of Chesham and by Ben Jonson, and Tennyson's consummate skill in manipulating it is best realised by comparing their treatment of it with his own.

Here is Ben Jonson:

"Though beauty be the mark of praise
And yours of whom I sing be such
As not the world can praise too much,
Yet 'tis your virtue now I raise."

Here is Tennyson:

"I sing to him that rests below
And, since the grasses round me wave
I take the grasses of the grave,
And make them pipes whereon to blow"

In the same year as saw the publication of In Memoriam, the poet wrote his great Ode on the Death of the Duke of Wellington. As a poet of domestic politics he was never inspiring, but as a writer of patriotic verse, he is among the most distinguished of our poets, and this poem is among the best of its kind. Then a few years later, in 1855, came Maud. Regarding it as an organic whole, Maud is even less satisfactory than The Princess, and is decidedly inferior to In Memoriam. The neurotic hero is so morbid and hysterical from the outset that his final lapse into madness fails to affect the reader with the dramatic intensity that was needed. A noble mind overthrown, is matter for the greatest poetry; but it is impossible to feel any thrill from the disaster to so poor a creature as Tennyson has given us.

Looked at not as the study of a diseased soul, but as a collection of fragmentary lyrics, our feelings are very different. In lyric splendour, Tennyson had never done and never did finer work. As a love poem, Maud is a triumph, not merely for the satisfying beauty of its phrasing, but as a glorious expression of the sheer ecstasy and rapture of passion. When reading such lyrics as the garden invocation, or the even lovelier "O that 'twere possible, after long grief and pain," we are ready to forget the confused and patchy treatment of the psychological connecting links, and the hysterical eulogy of war with which the monodrama starts.

Following Maud, came the Idylls of the King (1859). Here he treated of the Arthurian Legend, in four episodes,—the Welsh story of Geraint and Enid, the tale of Merlin and Vivion, one of Lancelot's adventures, and the parting of Arthur and Guinevere. Gradually the other stories were added until the Arthurian story had grown into matter for twelve books. Tennyson's interest in the old mediæval cycle dated from the thirties. The Lady of Shalott testifies to that, while in The Passing of Arthur he struck a stronger and more vibrant note than he succeeds in doing with any of the subsequent Idylls. Tennyson's re-shaping and modernising (for so it was in essence) of the legends were started in 1859 and concluded in 1885. Technically, the Idylls are a great achievement. Tennyson's blank verse is inexpressibly finer in quality than any attempted by the poets of the Romantic Revival; and to rival it one must go back to Milton. Previous to these Arthurian stories he made various essays into blank verse with notable results—e.g. Ulysses, Lucretius, Aylmer's Field—but he had never tried on so large a scale as in the Idylls, and if he cannot match the majestic organ notes of Milton, his verse has a grace, a flexibility, a noble cadence, and what is peculiarly Tennyson's, a delicate and caressing tenderness.

The fresh developments we have to note in Tennyson's later years are in the direction of drama. Hitherto his work has no dramatic tendency, it had been for the most part descriptive and panoramic in quality. It had shown a great power of observing things, and an active interest in the simple, general attributes of men and women, but with rare exceptions it had shown little interest in concrete individuals. He was a great student of character, not of characters, and his poetic method, with its detailed elaboration, did not seem suited to the swift, decisive way of the dramatist. Yet in the dialect poems which he began to write after the earlier Idylls, he exhibited an imaginative power of painting individuals, and a rich vein of humour utterly alien to his poetry as a whole. We know that there was a rough elemental side to Tennyson's nature and it comes out in these poems, where he identifies himself with such dramatic gusto with his Farmers and Cobblers and Grandmothers. What Edwin Waugh did for Lancashire, and Baines for Dorset, Tennyson did for Lincolnshire. Perhaps indeed the dialect vein of Waugh and Baines had turned our poet's mind to that direction. However that may be, his success was unmistakable. The vitality of these studies is triumphant. How admirably he differentiates the Northern Farmer (old style) with his colossal vanity, yet not unattractive nature, with the smaller, harder, money-making Northern Farmer (new style). What grim humour there is in the Northern Cobbler, what crisp satire in The Church warden and the Curate.

"But Parson 'e will speak out, saw, now 'e be sixty-seven,

He'll niver swap Owlby an' Scrathy fur owt but the Kingdom o' Heaven,

An' thou'll be 'is Curate 'ere, but, if iver tha means to git 'igher,

Tha mun tackle the sins o' the Wo'ld, an' not the faults o' the Squire

Nasy, but tha mun speak hout to the Baptuses here i' the town,

Fur moast on 'em talks agcain titho, an' I'd like tha to preach 'em down,

Fur they've bin a-preachin' mea down, they have, and I haates 'em now,

Fur they leaved their nasty sins i' my pond, an' it poison'd the cow."

Behind the roughness and eccentricities of the old Farmer, the poet detects a piece of sturdy human nature, there is a primal strength about the man that attracts us, and in this primal strength there is, as there is in all the elemental things in life, that savour of the brown earth, the stuff of real poetry.

"Git me my aale I tell tha', an' if I mun doy, I mun doy."

Scarcely less inferior to these studies in humour and shrewd observation, is The Village Wife on the Entail.

'Sit thyssen down fur a bit, hov a glass o' cowship wine I liked the owd Squire an' 'is gells as thaw they was gells o' mine,

Fur then we was all es one, the Squire an' 'is darters an' me

Hall but Miss Annio, the holdest, I niver not took to she

But Nelly the last o' the clutch, I liked 'er the fust on 'em all,

Fur hoffsens we talkt o' my darter es died o' the fever at fall

An' I thowt 'twas the will o' the Lord, but Miss Annio she said it wuz dreams,

Fur sho hedn't naw comfort in 'er, an' arn'd naw thanks fur 'er pains

Eh! twabbe all wi' the Lord my chulder, I han't gotten none!

So new Squire's coom'd wi' 'is taul in 'is 'aud, an' owd Squire's gone."

Most of these drawings are from life and are based on some fragment of speech attributed to the particular character from the bone, the poet like Professor Owen, re-constructs the animal. The dramatic power shown in these poems is further displayed when the poet drops dialect as in Rizpah, Sir John Oldcastle, and Romney & Remond, they are truly individualised as the earlier poems are not, and exhibit the passionate underside to Tennyson's nature. But when Tennyson turned as he did during the seventies, to the domain of conventional poetic drama we realise that it takes more than flashes of dramatic power to make a dramatist. Of his three best plays, Queen Mary (1875), Harold (1876), and Becket (1884), none of them show that instinct for presenting character in action that lies at the root of drama. Nor can he vitalise the more complex types of character as he can his rough, simple folk. His brooding, reflective mind can focus a single character, until he has visualised it clearly and distinctly, but a crowded stage confuses him, he cannot paint in a few, vivid strokes, and loses grip of his material. There is good literary work in his plays, especially in Harold and Becket, and in the latter play, which in its subject matter suited his cast of mind best of all, passages of fine poetic beauty and situations of genuine power are displayed. But on the whole the dramatic form proved alien to his genius; he grows curiously stiff and formal when writing them, and carefully and thoughtfully as they are written, they lack life. Perhaps the secret of his failure as a dramatist lies in the fact that he started too late in life, his powers were set and fixed when he essayed them. He found himself wrestling with an unfamiliar technique. That he did not succeed is scarcely surprising, that he achieved even so moderate success as he did in Becket (thanks chiefly to Henry Irving's genius), is a testimony to his perseverance, and to his general gifts as a literary artist.

In Tennyson's later work there is naturally some decline of power, due to advancing age. Neither the Death of Ænion, or Demeter, did the poet's powers real justice; and Locksley Hall Sixty Years After, though not without a certain rugged force, has a querulous and senile flavour that leaves us criticising the man when we ought to be thinking of the poet.

Yet there is no serious decay of artistry, for even in the later work, at times in certain passages of The Foresters, and in Crossing the Bar, the craftsman's ancient cunning asserts itself.

In reviewing the whole body of Tennyson's work we cannot but feel that he is at his happiest and best when actualising for us the beauty of the visible world. It is here that his dominant characteristics—clarity, melody, and dignity—are exhibited in their amplest power. None could excel him in lines of limpid lucidity such as these:

"The league of grass wash'd by a slow, broad stream"

" . . . Many a rose carnation food
With Summer spice the humming air "

"The little speedwell's darling blue "

"A light blue lane of early dawn "

"Now rings the woodland loud and long,
The distance takes a lovelier hue,
And drown'd in yonder living blue
The lark becomes a sightless song "

Or in haunting music:

"The moan of doves in immemorial elms,
And murmuring of innumerable bees "

"Night slid down one long stream of sighing wind
And in her bosom bore the baby Sleep "

"O hark! O hear! How thin and clear
And thinner, clearer, farther going;
O sweet and far from cliff and scar,
The horns of Elfinand faintly blowing!
Blow, let us hear the purple glen rippling,
Blow bugle; answer, echoes, dying, dying, dying."

"None like her, none.
Just now the dry-tongued laurels' pattering talk
Seem'd her light foot along the garden walk,
And shook my heart to think she comes once more;
But even then I heard her close the door,
The gates of Heaven are closed, and she is gone.

There is none like her, none,
Nor will be when our summers have deceased
O, art thou sighing for Lebanon
In the long breeze that streams to thy delicious East,
Sighing for Lebanon,
Dark cedar, tho' thy limbs have here increased,
Upon a pastoral slope as fair,
And looking to the South, and fed
With honey'd rain and delicate air,
And haunted by the starry head
Of her whose gentle will has changed my fate,
And made my life a perfumed altar-flame."

Or for noble dignity:

"The long day wanes, the slow moon climbs, the deep Moans with many voices "

"It may be that the gulf will wash us down,
It may be we shall touch the happy Isles
And see the great Achilles whom we know "

"Poor little life that toddles for an hour Crown'd with a flower or two, and there an end."

"The old order changeth, yielding place to new,
And God fulfils Himself in many ways."

His Attitude towards Nature

In considering the body of his work, some estimate of his treatment of Nature should precede that dealing with his outlook on men and women.

Nowhere is the scientific perception to which I have alluded, more clearly shown than here. No poet has ever been more sensitive to the varied loveliness of Nature, to the conscious glory of things. Nature's more august moods are better interpreted by Wordsworth, her ecstasies more subtly felt by Shelley, but the varying and complex spell of her multitudinous moods as a whole has found no finer artistic expression than is given us in the verse of Tennyson. Accurate observation and delicate poetic feeling are happily blended. He can give us large effects, as in this epitome of an autumn storm:

"The last red leaf is whirled away,
The rocks are blown about the sky ";

and the superb image of

"Such a tide as moving seems asleep, Too full for sound and foam ";

or this, expressive of desolation:

"He is not here, but far away
The noise of life begins again,
And ghostly thro' the drizzling rain,
On the bald street breaks the blank day."

And he can impress us also with microscopic effects. Indeed, excepting Crabbe, no poet ever dealt with the minutiae of Nature so well as Tennyson. Could anything be more apt for combined accuracy of perception and beauty of delineation than touches such as these:

Of the dragon fly:

"A living flash of light he flew";

of the sunflower, that

"Rays round with flames her disc of seed";

of the blasts

"That blow the poplars white",

of dark hair

"More black than ash buds in the front of March";

He reminds with delicate emphasis, how that with the coming of spring, "rosy plumelets tuft the larch", how autumn lays "a fiery finger on the leaves", speaks of the dandelion as "the flower, that blows a globe of after arrowlofts", and notes with the eye of a naturalist, "the primrose of the later year".

Never does the fancy of the poet carry him into a realm of unreal imagery. The beautiful little touch bearing on the clouds of pollen that float from the staminal flower of the yew, exhibits yet again the exactitude of the botanist, as well as the vision of the poet.

"Beneath a world-old yew, darkening half
The cloisters, on a gustful April morn,
That puff'd the swaying branches into smoke," a touch that reminds us of one not dissimilar in Enoch Arden, where he likens Philip to

"The working bee in blossom-dust
Blanch'd with his mill."

Everywhere indeed the observation of the scientist is glorified by the sensibility of the artist, the stark fact is clad in lovely imagery. Thus, Tennyson's landscapes are never vague, they are visualised with an almost preternatural clarity. And if the objective scientific touch is one feature of his Nature poetry, another feature lies in its atmospheric subjectivity. Tennyson never paints Nature with Wordsworth, or even Byron, as something outside of Man, with a life-spirit purpose of its own. Nature for him is always a background for reflecting some human emotion; it carries no message or benison of its own, but harmonises with delicate adaptability to the mood of man.

Thus in depicting moods of indolence, of sorrow, of love, he chooses such scenic accessories as may best accentuate these moods.

In The Lotus-Eaters, the narcotised companions of Ulysses read their own feelings into the surroundings; while the poet suggests by many subtle touches how well the dreamy, languid atmosphere of the place chimes in with their feelings.

They have eaten of the indolence-giving fruit, and break into song:

"There is sweet music here that softer falls,
Than petals from blown roses on the grass,
Or night dew on still waters between walls
Of shadowy granite, in a gleaming pass.

Music that gentler on the spirit lies,
Than tired eyelids upon tired eyes
Music that brings sweet sleep down from the blissful skies

Here are cool mosses deep,
And through the moss the ivies creep,
And in the stream the long-leaved flowers weep,
And from the craggy ledge the poppy hangs in sleep."

Why should they trouble themselves, think the singers, with the distresses of life? Why not be as the flower that ripens in its place, ripens and fades, and falls:

"What pleasure can we have,
To war with evil? Is there any peace
In ever climbing up the climbing wave?
All things have rest and ripen towards the grave
In silence, ripen, fall and cease,
Give us long rest or death, dark death or dreamful ease."

"Tis hard to settle order once again,
There is confusion worse than death.
Trouble on trouble, pain on pain.
Long labour unto aged breath.
Sore task to hearts worn out by many wars,
And eyes grown dim with gazing on the pilot stars."

No less effective is the vignette expressing the sleepy grace of the little cathedral town:

"... between it and the garden lies
A league of grass, wash'd by a slow broad stream,
That, stirr'd with languid pulses of the oar,
Waves all its lazy lilies, and creeps on,
Barge-laden, to three arches of a bridge
Crown'd with the minster towers."

Mark again how admirably the desolate background of Mariana suits the mood of despondent isolation, the melancholy autumnal touch in Tithonus, the tranquil charm of the sea-coast village in Enoch Arden. Sorrow in varying degrees of poignancy serves the poet as the inspiration of some of the loveliest pictures in In Memoriam. Here is the mood of the mourner after the first sharp agonies have passed away, and calm resignation has stolen over his senses:

"Calm is the morn without a sound,
Calm as to suit a calmer grief,
And only thro' the faded leaf
The chestnut pattering to the ground -
Calm and deep peace on this high wold,
And on these dews that drench the furze,
And all the silvery gossamors
That twinkle into green and gold."

Summer days, summer nights harmonise with this mood of wistful regret:

"By night we lingered on the lawn,
For under foot the herb was dry,
And genial warmth, and o'er the sky
The silvery haze of summer drawn;

Till now the doubtful dusk reveal'd
The knolls once more where, couch'd at ease
The white knee glimmer'd, and the trees
Laid their dark arms about the field,

And suck'd from out the distant gloom,
A breeze began to tremble o'er
The large leaves of the eucalyptus
And fluctuate all the still perfume.

And gathering fresher overhead
Rock'd the full-folaged elms and swung
The heavy-folded rose, and flung
The lilies to and fro, and said:

'The dawn, the dawn,' and died away ;
And east and west, without a breath,
Mixed their dim lights, like life and death,
To broaden into boundless day."

A more poignant mood is reflected in Tears, Idle Tears :

"Ah, sad and strange as in dark summer dawns,
The earliest pipe of half-awaken'd birds
To dying ears, when unto dying eyes
The casement slowly grows a glimmering square ;
So sad, so strange, the Days that are no more "

To Wordsworth, the coming of spring meant fresh joy and hope. It cheers Tennyson only when his spirit is attuned to its dawn of new life, and when his assertive vitality responds to the beauty of the visible world.

"Now rings the woodland loud and long,
The distance takes a lovelier hue,
And drown'd in yonder living blue
The lark becomes a sightless song

Now dance the lights on lawn and lee,
The flocks are whiter down the dale,
And milkier every milky sail,
On winding stream or distant sea.

Where now the sea mew pipes or dives
In yonder greening gleam, and fly
The happy birds that change their sky
To build and brood, that live their lives

From land to land, and in my breast
Spring wakens too, and my regret
Becomes an April violet,
And buds and blossoms like the rest "

His Attitude towards Human Life

Tennyson's attitude towards men and women is that of a quiet, deliberate, steady, self-restrained nature; one keenly alive to the slightest fluctuations of mood, yet averse from tidal impulses, and the insurgent aspects of human life. He presents here a striking contrast with his great contemporary, Browning, who was always stirred to his depths by the high impossible things of life—and who thrilled to passions from which Tennyson shrunk away in alarm.

With whom does Tennyson chiefly treat? With princes, princesses, men and women of intellectual power and delicate refinement. He has no flunkey regard for rank as rank, but like Thackeray he is drawn to an environment of culture and good lineage. King Arthur is obviously his ideal of manhood, strong, calm, and self-contained, while the women he loves best are gentle, patient, enduring souls. When he touches the lives of the poor there is just a suspicion of the average well-meaning district visitor about his tone. He is gracious and kindly, and gently patronising.

His rich sense of humour (would that he had exercised it more) enables him to laugh with discerning sympathy over the Northern Farmer, and the Cobbler and the old Grandmother, but the characters must be quaint and well-versed with age before they attract him. Eccentric age he can tolerate, eccentric youth moves him only to impatience. If he treats of the youthful idealist as in Locksley Hall, he makes him a prig. The visionary, the hot-blood revolutionary, attract him in no degree, as a poet. Yet it would be a mistake to regard Tennyson as temperamentally blind to, or as too superfine to understand, the elemental emotions. He was by nature intensely virile, with a rough, primal side in his nature that came uppermost at times in the presence of his friends. But in his general outlook on life, he grew to distrust more and more, passion as an elemental force, and strove to idealise and spiritualise it, whether as a force in political society or in sexual relationships. This again is quite alien to Browning's method and outlook, and the effect upon his poetry of this fear of excess, horror of extravagance, is not altogether happy.

His Treatment of Passion

But the prudential note in Tennyson is assuredly not due, as some critics have thought, to any flabbiness of texture or insensibility to passion; and at times, passion leaps out despite the poet's precautions. Among the pretty, yet artificial sentimentality of his youthful work there is a little poem called Patina, which is frankly and warmly passionate:

"O Love, Love, Love! O withering might!
O sun, that from thy noonday height
Shudderest when I strain my sight,
Throbbing thro' all thy heat and light,
Lo, falling from my constant mind,
Lo, parch'd and wither'd, deaf and blind,
I whirl like leaves in roaring wind.

Last night I wasted hateful hours
Below the city's eastern towers
I thirsted for the brooks, the showers:
I roll'd among the tender flowers.
I crush'd them on my breast, my mouth.
I look'd athwart the burning drouth
Of that long desert to the south

Last night, when some one spoke his name,
From my swift blood that went and came
A thousand little shafts of flame
Were shiver'd in my narrow frame.
O Love, O fire! once he drew
With one long kiss my whole soul thro'
My lips, as sunlight drinketh dew

My whole soul waiting silently,
All naked in a sultry sky,
Droops blinded with his shining eye:
I will possess him or will die
I will grow round him in his place,
Grow, live, die looking on his face,
Die, dying clasp'd in his embrace "

The sheer ecstasy of passion, despite an occasional brilliancy of the note, has never been expressed better in our poetry than in Maud, and although the Idylls refine almost to vanishing point the hot tumult of passion that surges through Malory's story, there is one passage where the poet shows how finely he could have painted this, had he so wished:

"Passion pale they met
And greeted. Hands in hands and eye to eye,
Low on the border of her couch they sat,
Stammering and staring. It was their last hour,
A madness of farewells "

But we must take our poets as we find them, and Tennyson elected to treat of love, not as with Byron an elemental force, or with Shelley and Browning as a transcendental passion, or with Rossetti as a mystic mingling of sense and spirit, but as a domestic sentiment. And to the majority of English people, this is clearly the favourite point of view. To them Love is essentially a domestic sentiment. It suggests primarily courting, Mendelssohn's Wedding March, and the cheerful preoccupation of family life. For this reason, Tennyson's love poetry, however much it may chill or vex certain temperaments, carries with it a wider appeal than the love poetry of more impulsive poets. There are no great heights or depths about it, but it has a tender reserve, a graciousness, a homeliness that explains its popularity.

Nor can we deny to it a persuasive charm and grace peculiarly its own, for instance, as in The Day Dream, an exquisite little love poem, delicate and fanciful as befits its setting, but with the warm pulsation of happy youth glowing through the lines

" 'I'd sleep another hundred years,
O love, for such another kiss,'
'O wake for ever, love,' she hears,
'O love, 'twas such as this and thus.'
And o'er them many a sliding star,
And many a merry wind was borne,
And, stream'd thro' many a golden bar,
The twilight melted into morn

'O eyes long laid in happy sleep !'
'O happy sleep, that lightly fled !'
'O happy kiss, that woke thy sleep !'
'O love, thy kiss would wake the dead !'
And o'er them many a flowing range
Of vapour buoy'd the crescent-bark,
And, rapt thro' many a rosy change,
The twilight died into the dark

'A hundred summers' can it be ?
And whither goest thou tell me where ?'
'O seek my father's court with me,
For there are greater wonders there.'
And o'er the hills and far away
Beyond their utmost purple rim,
Beyond the night across the day,
Thro' all the world she follow'd him."

His Character Drawing

Turning from his treatment of passion to his method of drawing men and women, it will be seen that, as a rule, Tennyson deals with types rather than with individuals, with the characteristics of average humanity rather than with the idiosyncrasies of particular personalities. Thus, again, explains the popularity of his appeal. His Miller's daughter, and Gardener's daughter, are like hundreds of charming girls, his May Queen is no individual child, merely a personification of the graces of childhood. Thus many a young man can refer to his sweetheart the attractions of these rustic maidens, and many a mother sees in her own offspring the juvenile sweetness of the May Queen. So also may the more thoughtful mind identify himself with the common, idealising self in Ulysses, Tithonus, or Lucretius, while the appeal of the Idylls to so wide a circle is largely accounted for by the fact that the characters are not living individuals, but incarnate qualities. Merlin stands for wisdom, Vivien for the deceitful wanton, Sir Galahad for chastity, Arthur for the ideal of manly virtue. Thus the very feature that weakens the poem dramatically, intensifies its appeal to the general reader.

Thus, I say, is the favourite method of Tennyson as a poet, but there are notable exceptions to the general rule, and these may be found in his dialect poems, and the rich humour and splendid vitality of these poems show that Tennyson's preference for dealing with types, as a rule, was due to no lack of insight into character, or any inability to individualise, but a deliberate act on his part just as his abstention from painting the passionate aspects of life was deliberate.

An interesting parallel of the artistic difference in dealing with a similar problem may be seen in comparing a passage from Ulysses with The Northern Farmer (old style). In both cases the character is confronted with Death, but whereas Ulysses generalises, as a certain type of man might do, the old Farmer comments on the situation in a manner peculiarly individualistic and idiosyncratic.

Says Ulysses .

"How dull it is to pause, to make an end,
To rust unhurried, not to shine in use !
As tho' to breathe were life. Life piled on life
Were all too little, and of one to me
Little remains."

Here is the old Farmer :

"Do Godamoughty know what a's doing a-taakin' o' mea ?
I beant wonn as saws 'ere a bean an' yonder a pea
An' Squire 'ull be sa mad an' all—a' dear a' dear'
An' I 'a monaged for Squire come Michaelmas thirty year."

These dramatic monologues are no tour de force on Tennyson's part. They are as natural to him, as much part of him as his polished classical musings or his cultured sentimentalities. He was, as we have seen, by no means the drawing-room exquisite that some of his verse might lead us to expect, and the rugged strain in the man's nature is well exhibited in these rural studies.

Nor are these dialect poems any real exception to the psychological method he elected to use, the form is different, and the characters are vividly individualised, but there is no subtlety, no curious, out-of-the-way points of human nature. Here as elsewhere he deals with broad simple issues; treats of primal joys and sorrows, and the everyday aspects of ordinary men and women.

His Political and Social Outlook

Tennyson's development coincided with the expansion of the democratic ideal and the growth and diffusion of modern scientific ideas, and both of these matters impressed his work, though in some what different degrees. His political sympathies had a tinge of revolutionary enthusiasm when he was quite a youth and still to an extent under the influence of the great romantic poets. But his poem on Poland is his one solitary poem on liberty, while his own political faith is well expressed in the following familiar lines

BRITAIN

You ask me, why tho' ill at ease,
Within this region I subside
Whose spirits falter in the mist
And languish for the purple seas.

It is the land that freemen till,
That sober-suited Freedom chose,
The land, where girt with friends or foes
A man may speak the thing he will;

A land of settled government,
A land of just and old renown,
Where Freedom slowly broadens down
From precedent to precedent.

Where faction seldom gathers head,
But by degrees to fullness wrought,
The strength of some diffusive thought
Hath time and space to work and spread.

This is typically English, and a better expression of the old Whig ideal it would be hard to find. He understood excellently well the calibre of the English spirit, and the methods especially suited to our insular genius. He understood it as well as Bentham did, and there is no slight similarity between the outlook of the two men on the problem of social politics. To Tennyson as to Bentham, the democratic ideal was a middle-class ideal; it was, moreover, a strongly individualistic ideal. Orderly development was dear to both men; and the notion of "a land of settled government" and of "freedom slowly broadening down" was conceived in the true Benthamite spirit. The radical democratic passion of Shelley, that sought to obliterate class divisions in the main, found no response in Tennyson's breast. He was an aristocrat in feeling, and though quick enough to resent the abuse of class privileges, had no more confidence in the voice of the people than Carlyle himself. Tennyson believed in the Great Man theory, though he never confounded Might with Right to the same extent as did the author of the Later-Day Pamphlets. On the other hand, he lacked Carlyle's flashes of insight into the crucial problems of social democracy.

What Tennyson did try to do as a poet was to draw people of all ranks together into a kindlier sympathy and to link them together by the masonic bond of a common humanity, but, unhappily, he did not see that to bring about this state of things radical changes must be wrought in the artificial hierarchy of our social system, and points of view that could only see in the fierce Revolutionary spirit "the blind hysterics of the Celt," showed a grave narrowness of vision and limitation of sympathy.

Yet if Tennyson showed the defects of the English temperament, he showed also its greatness. Putting aside the cheap swagger that pervades such things as the Forester's song in the Robin Hood play

"There is no land like England
Where'er the light of day be;
There are no hearts like English hearts,
Such hearts of oak as they be.
There is no land like England
Where'er the light of day be,
There are no men like Englishmen,
So tall and bold as they be,"

or such youthful absurdities like -

"Shout for England!
Ho for England!"

there is a fine and noble substratum to the patriotic spirit of Tennyson, and few of our poets have embodied that spirit in more dignified verse. A good example of this is his stirring Ode on the Death of the Duke of Wellington:

"O Statesmen, guard us, guard the eye, the soul
Of Europe, keep our noble England whole,
And save the one true seed of freedom sown
Betwixt a people and their ancient throne,
That sober freedom out of which there springs
Our loyal passion for our temperate kings,
For, saving that, ye help to save mankind
Till public wrong be crumbled into dust,
And drill the raw world for the march of mind,
Till crowds at length be sane and crowns be just.
But wink no more in slothful overtrust.
Remember him who led your hosts,
He bade you guard the sacred coasts;
Your cannons moulder on the seaward wall!"

Which in its sane Imperialistic teaching is worth a dozen Locksley Halls and such rhetorical generalities as:

"Forward, forward let us range.
Let the great world spin for ever down the ringing grooves of change
Thro' the shadow of the globe we sweep into the younger day.
Better fifty years of Europe than a cycle of Cathay.

Mother-Age (for mine I knew not) help me as when life begun;
Rift the hills, and roll the waters, flash the lightnings, weigh the Sun."

Now the sentiment of patriotism flourishes best in minds charged with historical associations, and imbued strongly with the continuity of the present with the past, especially if we add to this the passion for locality. The exigencies of verse that demand a picturesque background, are responsible probably for the predominating militant note, e.g. The Charge of the Light Brigade, A Ballad of the Fleet, The Defence of Lucknow, The Revenge; though it is a pity that patriotism, as a literary motif, should subserve so exclusively the trumpet and battle-axe and neglect the triumphs won outside of the battlefield. Yet, taking the War poetry on its own merits, it exhibits a genuine love of the bulldog qualities of our race.

In this patriotic verse dealing with the glories of the "storied past," we always see Tennyson as "Leather of the lawless crown,

As of the lawless crowd."

declaiming fiercely against "the falsehood of extremes," and extolling, with unwearying zeal, law and order.

Tennyson's ideal statesman may be gathered from his verses To the Duke of Argyll:

"O Patriot Statesman, be thou wise to know
The limits of resistance, and the bounds
Determining concession, still be bold
Not only to slight praise but suffer scorn;
And be thy heart the moment, and the year
Against the day, thy voice, a music heard
Thro' all the yells and counter-yells of feud
And faction, and thy will, a power to make
Thus ever-changing world of circumstance,
In changing, chime with never-changing Law"

In the first Locksley Hall, he reflects the current enthusiasm of the era of the Great Exhibition of 1851, when dreams of a universal brotherhood were in the air, and a kind of commercial Millennium occupied men's minds. On the whole, Tennyson's influence in national politics was a wholesome and tonic one. He helped to foster that love of country that should animate a people, by dwelling on the finer qualities of national character, and insisting on the value of ancient forms and traditions. A proper reverence for the past is a vital condition of a sane aspiration for the future.

It would have been the better and the sweeter, if Tennyson had understood other nationalities as well as he did his own race, since cosmopolitan sympathies strengthen, in place of weakening—as some imagine—the spirit of patriotism. But, despite this limitation, Tennyson's influence in the main is a valuable and salutary one.

When we turn to Tennyson's views on domestic politics, we find the trumpet sounding a far less certain note. He saw, as indeed he could not help seeing, a vast amount of social misery, and there is a good deal in his poetry about the sorrows and hardships of the poor.

But genuine as his sympathies may have been, there is an air of unreality about their expression. This is due partly to the fact that they are put usually into the mouths of his weaker characters; the dismal young prig in Locksley Hall, or the neurotic hero of Maud. They do not seem to spring direct and spontaneous from the poet's heart. The unreality of these tirades is partly due also to the fact that they are couched in vague rhetorical generalities, and exhibit no realisation on Tennyson's part that anything is wrong with our present social organism. The one remedy that he harps upon for the evils of commercialism, is war. Could any more hopeless panacea for social distress be formulated than this?

Tennyson's exclusion from the world during the later years of his life, put him more and more out of touch with concrete realities. This, added to the natural conservatism of age, make his utterances on social subjects practically negligible.

In one direction alone did Tennyson really contribute suggestive ideas, and that was when dealing with the Woman's Movement. In The Princess he was for the first and last time really in advance of his age. There is a healthy progressive note in this poem, and reactionary as it may seem to many modern minds, it seems to me on the whole a just and sympathetic presentment in poetic form of the problem connected with woman's place in society.

The line, "Woman is not undeveloped man but diverse," goes to the root of the Sex question, and might well be pondered over by certain extremists to-day. The Emancipation of Woman has passed through many phases since Tennyson's day; yet can we better Tennyson's general estimate.

"The Woman's cause is Man's;
They rise and sink together"?

Tennyson sees in marriage and home life the best outlet for woman's energies, but he certainly does not restrict her to these:

"And so these twain upon the skirts of Time,
Sit side by side, full sunned in all their powers."

It is true Tennyson does not dwell upon the outlets for women who are not mothers and who have no homes to look after, but these scarcely come within the range of the poem, and at any rate are implied in the educational training laid down by Ida. A poem is not a handbook, but the prescriptions laid down by Tennyson, if we allow a certain latitude for the pontifical air of the poet at times, are both clearly stated and reasonably put.

His Religious Outlook

So far we have been considering Tennyson's views on political and social matters, we may turn now to watch the trend of his thought on religious, and in so doing shall see how the scientific ideas of the age affected him. How far science influenced him as a poet of Nature we have seen. But the accuracy and precision that it gave to his scenic pieces, did not extend to his general outlook on life. We expect to find a logician, an argumentative disputant, who will take up definitely one side, perhaps to the disadvantage of his art—for dialectics and poetry make a mechanical not a chemical mixture—but certainly without equivocation. And this, of course, was not the case. No poet was more exercised by religious problems than he; and no poet was more sensitive to scientific thought than he. But his attitude is an attitude of compromise; he propounds a via media between the materialistic science of his day and dogmatic Christianity. His solution for the heart-searching and uncertainties of the time was an undogmatic religion, that was at bottom intuitionist. Historic Christianity scarcely weighed with him at all. "There's something that watches over us, and our individuality endures, that's my faith, and that's all my faith," he is reported to have said on one occasion to a friend. And this is the sum and substance of his faith as expressed in his poetry.

Tennyson has been called a mystic; it would be more correct to say he was mystical. He was not a mystic in the sense that Vaughan and George Herbert were mystics, or that Coleridge and Blake were mystics; may one not call him a rationalist with a tenacious strain of mysticism in his nature? No thorough-going mystic would have dealt at such length, and with such significant emphasis, upon the difficulties of religious faith; no thorough-going rationalist would have tried to solve the difficulties by claiming for the intuition of the heart, a way out of the morass of scepticism. The philosophy of In Memoriam sums up Tennyson's religious position. It is not a philosophy of faith so much as a philosophy of hope, after all he can only trust that "somehow good will be the final goal of ill." Yet the faint-hearted certitude of the poet, though it has repelled some and disgusted others, assuredly made for its immense popularity, and there are many to-day, to whom Tennyson's solution seems the only satisfactory one.

His concession to science, and his careful and concise statement of the purely scientific position, interested and attracted the scientist, his sympathetic presentment of the doubter's position, especially his line, "There lives more faith in honest doubt, believe me, than in half the creeds," captivated the religious waverer; while the theologian was delighted by the triumph of faith at the close of the poem.

Tennyson's ethical thought inspires him more happily as a poet than does his metaphysics; for it takes him into a clearer and saner atmosphere, and his insistence on self control, formulated in his beautiful poem Ænon, recurs again and again in his serious poetry. The categorical imperative in the soul of man, meant for him precisely what natural laws meant for phenomena in the world of Nature. Law and order are for him rules of conduct. Disorder is the antithesis of rational existence. He saw it disturbing the life around him, and loathed it. And so, he also held fast to those elements in life that made for stability. A quiet, dignified, orderly existence—such was Tennyson's ideal, and he used all the resources of his gracious art to impress its value on men's minds.

He is the poet of discipline, not the poet of freedom. This fact impresses us in all his work, whether dealing with religion or with politics. It inspires his classical poems, and animates the Idylls and Dramas. Arthur is a great man because he stands for law, and Harold is great because he strove to make "jarring carldoms" move "to music and order", while in Locksley Hall Sixty Years After he becomes almost hysterical in his horror of lawlessness and licence. Tennyson's point of view is certainly valuable as a corrective to the anarchic tendencies in life and literature; but it is not productive of the great poetry. Compromise may be an excellent mode of conduct, but it does not thrill the imagination. It is a pleasant thing to sail in peaceful waters near the sheltering coast; but life after all is an adventure, and little would be accomplished there no intrepid idealists, willing to take their chance on a forlorn hope, or a wild peradventure. If we are to cry out for more reverence, it is better to cry for simpler progress. Temporary harm, momentary disorder must be incurred by the social order, if we who would renovate society. The very source of the vigour of life depend on the men who dare the seemingly impossible things, for as Browning said, "man's reach should exceed his grasp—or what heaven for?"

Yet, it is ungracious to leave Tennyson on the note of criticism. If his philosophy of life is not a great and inspiring one, yet it has its place in the scheme of things, and we may supplement its message by the more tonic teaching of Browning and Meredith; while of Tennyson's work as a literary artist, and as a painter of English life, no lover of beautiful verse could speak too highly. As a word painter of typical English scenery, as the exponent of the simple emotions of everyday life, he holds a treasured and honourable place. His delicacy and crystalline charm, his dignified and melodious utterance, will always endear him to English men and women.

THE MINOR POETS OF THE EARLIER VICTORIAN ERA

In the group of minor poets considered dealing with the early years of the century, the influence of the Elizabethan writers was strongly marked, while we noted in certain directions a revival of the classical spirit in reaction to the prevalent romanticism of the age. As regards the group now under consideration, we shall find the influence of romanticism much weaker than before, the classical spirit more marked, but especially notable is the strong humanitarianism of many of the ablest writers.

The first to concern us is JOHN CLARE (1793–1864), a writer of considerable power and charm, too little appreciated. The son of a broken-down labourer, he was compelled from very early years to work in the fields for a living. Yet despite the physical exertions of his work he saved enough to pay for the privileges of an evening school in order to gain some kind of education. Happening to chance upon a verse-loving old woman, who could quote poetry for hours together, he got some introduction to literature; though his own observations of rural life and his genuine love of rustic scenes, served as his main inspiration.

Little encouragement came from his ignorant companions, but at last, through the instrumentality of some people of culture, he managed to get his first volume, Poems Descriptive of Rural Life, published in 1820. The book attracted notice. Southey spoke kindly of it in the Quarterly Review, and the youth was brought to London.

Sufficient money was raised to keep him from want, and when he returned to the country which he loved, this sum, together with what he might have saved, should have proved sufficient to enable him to develop his powers. Unhappily, the quality of brain that gave this unusual sensibility to verse, fostered also grave mental instability. Drink, that hastened the tragic end of Burns, hurried Clare to a disastrous breakdown, yet, as in Burns' case, it did not kill his power of verse. Indeed, when in the County Asylum of Northamptonshire, where he lived for over twenty years, he did some of his best work.

His early work was written in dialect; his later in classical English: and in each class he did excellently well. He had the lyric faculty, and the temper of his mind is more nearly allied to Blake's than to any other contemporary. But he was a disciple in no school; his imagination if circumscribed was fresh and original, and his limited reading had only served to elicit his innate powers

'I am! yet what I am who cares or knows?
My friends forsake me like a memory lost,
I am the self-consumer of my woes,
They rise and vanish, an oblivious host,
Like shades in love and death's oblivion lost—
And yet I am! and live with shadows tost.
Into the nothingness of scorn and noise,
Into the living sea of waking dreams,
Where there is neither sense of life nor joys,
But the vast shipwreck of my life's esteems,
And e'en the dearest—that I loved the best—
Are strange—nay, rather stranger than the rest.
I long for scenes where man has never trod
For scenes where woman never smil'd or wept;
There to abide with my creator, God,
And sleep as I in childhood sweetly slept.
(Troubling and untroubled where I lie;
The grass below—above, the vaulted sky."

In addition to the earlier volume he published The Village Minstrel (1821) and The Shepherd's Calendar (1827)

Another uncultured poet was EBENEZER ELLIOTT (1781-1849), the "Corn Law Rhymer" His life was spent in the neighbourhood of Sheffield and his verse reflects alike the grinding lives of the industrial poor and the rich beauty of the moorland. He had a warm appreciation of scenic beauty, and a sympathy no less warm for the lot of the toiler. Thomson's Seasons impressed him much as they had impressed Clare, but like Clare, the merit of his work is independent of any strong literary inspiration. In the same year as saw the Lyrical Ballads, Elliott wrote his first piece, A Vernal Walk. Then came silence for twenty years while Elliott strove with the workers in the town, and when next he wrote, having attained some worldly competence, the human predominates in his writing. Poems come now in quick succession: Love (1823), The Ranter (1827), Corn Law Rhymes (1828), The Village Patriarch (1829). The factory victims found their champion in view, though his name is more generally associated with the demand for "bread for the worker," in the Corn Law Rhymes.

Elliott's long struggle with poverty, his intimate acquaintance with the pitiful tragedies of starved and stunted lives, his own natural sensitiveness and warmth of heart, inspired him with fierce anger against the "rich who take from plunder'd labour's store" and this feeling finds a concrete expression in his furious attacks on the "bread tax." It fired him to write his splendid battle-cry.

'Day, hke our souls, is fiercely dark,
What then? 'Tis day!
We sleep no more; the cock crows—hark!
To arms! away!
They come! they come! the knoll is rung
Of us or them—
Wide o'er their march the pomp is flung
Of gold and gem.
What collar'd hound of lawless sway,
To famine dear—
What pension'd slave of Attala
Leads in the rear?

Come they from Scythian wilds afar,
Our blood to spill?
Wear they the livery of the Czar?
They do his will.
Nor tassell'd silk, nor epaulet,
Nor plume, nor torse—
No splendour gilds, all sternly met,
Our foot and horse
But, dark and still, we only glow,
Condens'd in iron!
Strike, fawdry slaves, and ye shall know
Our gloom is fire
In vain your pomp, ye evil powers,
Insults the land
Wrong, vengeance, and the cause are ours,
And God's right hand!
Madmen! they trample into snakes
The woiny clod!
Like fox, beneath their feet awakes
The sword of God!
Behind before, above, below,
They rouse the brave,
Where'er they go they make a foe,
Or find a grave."

For Elliott it was not capitalism but landlordism, that was the bane of modern life. He did not see—being a kindly hearted and sympathetic capitalist himself—that capitalism would need its revolutionary singers, even more than the cause which he had espoused with such fine abandon. But we must not look to Elliott for a prophetic vision that was denied to all but our greatest, and the very narrowness of his outlook gave force and intensity to his song.

Elliott's art, if rough and unequal was unquestionably genuine, and served its propagandist purpose more effectively than a finer and more fastidious art would have done. Comparing him with Clare, we see greater passion and a somewhat blunter imagination. His love of the country is indeed more akin to that of Cobbett than of Clare. A tramp over the hills would clear his brain and put him to rights, when weary at heart, and there is the freshness and keenness of the moorland in his verse. In his rustic scenes and his rural characters, he reminds us often of Wordsworth. Lacking his spiritual intensity and supreme poetic grandeur, he has in no small measure his power, as in Enoch Wray, of depicting grand and simple characters. He is a poet of the people, and Carlyle, who never missed a genuine man, likened his work to "hues of joy and harmony, painted out of troublous tears."

'Flowers peep, trees bud, boughs tremble, rivers run;
The red-wing says it is a glorious morn
Blue are the Heavens, thou Highest, and the Sun Shines without cloud, all fire. How sweetly borne O'er wings of morning, o'er the leafless thorn."

There are a few verse writers who, though of less account than Ebenezer Elliott, belong to his school, and derived their inspiration from the industrial unrest of the day. Of these the best were CAPEL LOFT (1806-1873), the social reformer, whose father had been a friend of Godwin's, and EBENEZER JONES (1820-1860), another of the toilers, who devoted his scanty leisure to the cause he held so dear—Chartism. Loft's rural epic, Ernest, or Political Regeneration (1839), is a frank bid for direct democratic government and for the nationalisation of the land, with just enough compensation to keep the landlords from starvation

Jones wrote some stirring songs, such as the Song of the Kings of Gold, the Song of the Gold Getters, and their crude violence may be condoned by reason of his youthful years when they were written. Their indifferent reception led Jones to turn his attention to journalistic prose, by means of which he sought to further political schemes more effectively.

"I never wholly feel that summer is high,
However green the trees or loud tho birds,
However movelessly eye-winking herds
Stand in field ponds, or under large trees lie,
Till I do climb all cultured pastures by,
That, hedged by hedgerows studiously trim,
Smile like a lady's face with lace laced prim,
And on some moor or hill that soaks the sky
Lonely and nakedly,—utterly lie down,
And feel the sunshine throbbing on body and limb,
My drowsy brain in pleasant drunkenness swim,
Each rising thought sink back and dreamily drown,
Smiles creep o'er my face, and smother my lips,
and cloy,
Each muscle sink to itself, and separately enjoy "

The name of HARTLEY COLERIDGE (1796-1849) links us again with the great poets of the early century. Brought up in an atmosphere of noble verse, and with the protecting kindness and sympathy of Wordsworth about him, the boy suffered from the desultory education he received from his father, who accounted it the best thing for him "to wander like a breeze by lakes and sandy shores." Lack of discipline and a fatherly encouragement to "mouch about" generally might not have harmed some natures, but Hartley had too much of his father's mental infirmities in him. He was, as a youth, richly endowed with intellectual and artistic gifts, with something of his father's fine ghostly imagination and a very large measure of his metaphysical powers, but intemperance spouted a brilliant prospect at Oxford, and he became a genial and irresponsible wanderer in the Lake District. Tennyson called him "a sun-faced little man"; certainly he had a sunny friendliness of manner and a touch of the Coleridge charm, that endeared him to the simple country folk. Indeed they loved him more than they did his great neighbour; for his erratic habits seemed to them more in harmony with what a poet should be, than the sobriety and steadiness of the less accessible William Wordsworth.

Hartley Coleridge is at his best in sonnet writing. This is rather curious, as one would have expected him to excel rather in lyric verse. But the conventions of the sonnet form, and the concentration necessary, seemed to have stimulated his best powers, and his delicate sense of beauty, and his friendly nature, are admirably expressed in these.

A few of his songs are excellent, notably She is not fair to outward view, but the sonnets are nearly all admirable, and a few really great. The following exemplify Hartley Coleridge at his best:

NOT IN VAIN

Let me not deem that I was made in vain,
Or that my being was an accident
Which Fate, in working its sublime intent,
Not wished to be, to hinder would not deign.

Each drop uncounted in a storm of rain
Hath its own mission, and is duly sent
To its own leaf or blade, not idly spent
'Mid myriad dimples on the shipless main
The very shadow of an insect's wing,
For which the violet cared not while it stave
Yet felt the lighter for its vanishing,
Proved that the sun was shining by its shade
Then can a drop of the eternal spring,
Shadow of living lights, in vain be made?

NOVEMBER

The mellow year is hastening to its close;
The little birds have almost sung their last.
Their small notes twitter in the dreary blast—
That shrill-piped harpinger of early snows;
The patient beauty of the scentless rose,
Oft with the moon's hoar crystal quaintly glassed,
Hangs, a pale mourner for the summer past,
And makes a little summer where it grows
In the chill sunbeam of the faint brief day
The dusky waters shudder as they shine
The russet leaves obstruct the straggling way
Of oozy brooks, which no deep banks define,
And the gaunt woods, in ragged scant array,
Wrap their old limbs with sombre ivy-twine

Along with Hartley may be mentioned his gifted sister, Sara. She married another brilliant member of the family, a cousin, Henry Nelson, who was preparing his father's literary remains for publication. His early death threw upon his wife the labours of an editress and distracted her from original work on her own account. Despite this, her fairy story Phantasmion (1837), with its delightful songs, serves to show what imaginative power she possessed. Given ampler opportunity, she might have accomplished much.

Phantasmion's Quest of Iarrie gives us a taste of her gifts:

"Yon changeful cloud will soon thy aspect wear,
So bright it grew— and now, by light winds shaken,—
O'er seen y't ne'er to be o'er taken—
Those waving branches seem thy billowy hair.
The cypress glades recall thy pensive air,
Slow rills that wind like snakes amid the grass,
Thine eyes mild sparkle fling me as they pass
Yet murmuring cry, This fruitless Quest forbear!
Nay, e'en amid the cataract's loud storm,
Where foamy torrents from the crags are leaping,
Notlunk I catch swift glimpses of thy form,
Thy robe's light folds in airy tumult sweeping,
Then silent are the falls. 'mid colours warm
Gleams the bright maze beneath their splendour sweeping "

THOMAS HOOD (1799-1845) is one of the most considerable and original influences among the minor poets of the age. A delicate and ailing boy, he was brought up as an engraver, but the work told severely upon his inherited delicacy, and we find him at twenty-one sub-editor of the famous London Magazine. His earlier literary work included Lycus the Centaur (1822), a striking piece of imaginative writing, the Plea of the Midsummer Fairies, a graceful and charming work, and the grimly powerful Dream of Eugene Aram. Hood is at bottom a serious writer, with a vivid sense of the seamy side of life and the power to present this with simple and homely power. Such poems as The Song of the Shirt and The Bridge of Sighs exhibit a gift of dealing with human problems in a popular manner, shorn of that facile sentimentality, too often associated with popular verse of this type The Haunted House shows, moreover, that Hood had a really high order of imagination and it is a pity that the necessities of bread and butter compelled him to work too diligently in his lighter vein. He was a genuine humorist, with a pleasant fancy and an amiable weakness for puns, but much of his triflings as a jester could well have been spared to afford better opportunity for the deeper springs in his nature. Sometimes, as in Miss Kilmansegg, he could jest with an underlying yet easily discernible vein of serious purpose; but as a rule his whims and oddities are merely cracklings of the pot. We may regret this, but cannot blame the man who realised that clever puns are better marketable commodities than good poetry. Hood's was a fine nature, sweet and wholesome, devoid of bitterness and cynicism. Happily for us, his struggle with adverse fortunes met with success before he died, thus enabling the writer to work for a while in his serious vein. Some of his strongest work belongs to his later years. Starting as a poet in the classical vein, popular at the time, his verse soon catches the humanitarian fire that marks the poetry of the earlier Victorian era. He is a poet of the new democracy.

SONG OF THE SHIRT

With fingers weary and worn,
With eyelids heavy and red,
A woman sat, in unwomanly rags,
Plying her needle and thread—
Stitch! stitch! stitch!
In poverty, hunger, and dirt,
And still with a voice of dolorous pitch
She sang the "Song of the Shirt!"

"Work! work! work!
While the cock is crowing aloof!
And work—work—work,
Till the stars shine through the roof!
It's O! I! to be a slave
Along with the barbarous Turk,
Where woman has never a soul to save,
If this is Christian work!"

"Work—work—work
Till the brain begins to swim,
Work—work—work
Till the eyes are heavy and dim!
Seam, and gusset, and band,
Band, and gusset, and seam,
Till over the buttons I fall asleep,
And sew them on in a dream!"

"Oh, Men, with Sisters dear!
Oh, Men, with Mothers and Wives!
It is not linen you're wearing out,
But human creatures' lives!"
Stitch—stitch—stitch,
In poverty, hunger, and dirt,
Sewing at once, with a double thread,
A shroud as well as a shirt

"But why do I talk of Death?
That phantom of grisly bone,
I hardly fear its terrible shape,—
It seems so like my own—
It seems so like my own,
Because of the fasts I keep,
Oh, God! that bread should be so dear,
And flesh and blood so cheap!"

"Work—work—work!
My labour never flags;
And what are its wages? A bed of straw,
A crust of bread—and rags

That shatter'd roof—and this naked floor—
A table—a broken chair—
And a wall so blank my shadow I thank
For sometimes falling there!

"Work—work—work!
From weary chime to chime,
Work—work—work—
As prisoners work for crime!
Band, and gusset, and seam,
Seam, and gusset, and band,
Till the heart is sick, and the brain benumb'd,
As well as the weary hand

"Work—work—work,
In the dull December light,
And work, work, work,
When the weather is warm and bright—
While underneath the eaves
The brooding swallow cings,
As if to show me their sunny backs,
And twit me with the spring

"Oh! but to breathe the breath
Of the cowslip and primrose sweet—
With the sky above my head,
And the grass beneath my feet;
For only one short hour
To feel as I used to feel,
Before I knew the woes of want
And the walk that costs a meal!"

"Oh! but for one short hour!
A respite however brief!
No blessed leisure for Love or Hope,
But only time for Grief!
A little weeping would ease my heart,
But in their briny bed
My tears must stop, for every drop
Hinders needle and thread!"

With fingers weary and worn,
With eyelids heavy and red,
A woman sat, in unwomanly rags,
Plying her needle and thread—
Stitch! stitch! stitch!
In poverty, hunger, and dirt,
And still with a voice of dolorous pitch,—
Would that its tone could reach the Rich!—
She sang this "Song of the Shirt!"

THE BRIDAL OF SIGHTS

One more Unfortunate,
Weary of breath,
Rashly importunate,
Gone to her death!

Take her up tenderly,
Lift her with care,
Fashion'd so slenderly,
Young, and so fair!

Look at her garments
Clinging like cerements,
Whilst the wave constantly
Drips from her clothing
Take her up instantly,
Loving, not loathing

Touch her not scornfully
Think of her mournfully,
Gentle and humanly,
Not of the stains of her,
All that remains of her
Now is pure womanly.

Make no deep scrutiny
Into her mutiny
Rash and undutiful;
Past all dishonour,
Death has left on her
Only the beautiful.

Still for all slips of hers,
One of Eve's family—
Wipe those poor lips of hers
Oozing so clammyly.

Loop up her tresses
Escaped from the comb,
Her fair auburn tresses,
Whilst wonderment guesses
Where was her home?

Who was her father?
Who was her mother?
Had she a sister?
Had she a brother?
Or was there a dearer one
Still, and a nearer one
Yet, than all other?

Alas! for the rarity
Of Christian charity
Under the sun!
Oh! it was pitiful!
Near a whole city full,
Home she had none.

Sisterly, brotherly,
Fatherly, motherly
Feelings had changed—
I've, by harsh evidence,
Thrown from its eminence;
Even God's providence
Seeming estranged

Where the lamps quiver
So far in the river,
With many a light
From window and casement,
From garret to basement,
She stood, with amazement,
Houseless by night.

The bleak wind of March
Made her tremble and shiver;
But not the dark arch,
Or the black, flowing river.
Mad from life's history,
Glad to death's mystery
Swift to be hurled—
Anywhere, anywhere
Out of the world!

In she plung'd boldly,
No matter how coldly
The rough river ran,—
Over the brink of it,
Picture it, think of it,
Disolute Man!
Lave in it, drink of it,
Then, if you can!

Take her up tenderly,
Lift her with care.
Fashion'd so slenderly,
Young, and so fair!
Ere her limbs frigidly
Stiffen too rigidly,
Decently,—kindly,— Smooth, and compose them,
And her eyes, close them
Staring so blindly!

Dreadfully staring
Tho' muddied impunity,
As when with the daring
Last look of despairing
Fix'd on futurity.

Perishing gloomily,
Spurr'd by contumely,
Cold inhumanity,
Burning insanity,
Into her rest—
Cross her hands humbly,
As if praying dumbly,
Over her breast!

Owning her weakness,
Her evil behaviour,
And leaving, with meekness,
Her sins to her Saviour!

THE HAUNTED HOUSE

O'er all there hung a shadow and a fear—
A sense of mystery the spirit haunted,
And said, as plain as whisper in the ear,
The place is haunted!

Unhinged the iron gates half open hung,
Jarr'd by the rusty gales of many winters,
That from its crumpled pedestal had flung
One marble globe in splinters

No dog was at the threshold great or small
No pigeon on the roof—no household creature—
No cat demurely dozing on the wall—
Not one domestic feature

No human figure stirred, to go or come,
No face looked forth from shut or open casement;
No chimney smoked—there was no sign of Home
From parapet to basement

With shatter'd panes the grassy court was starr'd;
The time-worn coping-stone had tumbled after!
And through the rugged roof the sky shone, barr'd
With naked beam and rafter."

Thus far, the poets mentioned have been essentially poets of the people, even more than Coleridge they dealt with the simple joys and beauties of the country, and primal things, while the majority reflected the problems of the poor, and not a few wrote out of the bitter wisdom of personal experience.

There is a little group of writers, consisting of men of culture and refinement, whose work is comparatively untouched by this democratic note. Chief of these were, Sir Henry Taylor, Philip James Bailey, Richard Hengist Home and the brothers of Tennyson, Charles and Frederick.

HENRY TAYLOR (1800-1886) was an accomplished man of letters who led a quiet and easy life, that revolved agreeably around a comfortable Government appointment at the Colonial Office. By temperament alien to the fervour and rapture of the romantic school, by circumstances outside the range of those forces that made for democratic enthusiasm, he illustrates in his work the recoil from the Romantic Revival, and the attraction towards classicism that was taking a hold upon a few writers in Early Victorian times. The greater men, either with Tennyson sought for a middle way between romanticism and classicism, or with Browning developed romanticism in fresh, unexplored directions. Taylor strove for lucidity and restraint and for a greater body of thought than he found in the current verse of his day. His views are formulated in his best piece of work—his drama, Philip Van Artevelde (1834). He wrote a number of other dramas and a prose volume, The Statesman (1836), but never reached the level of excellence attained in Philip.

As a protest against the facile sentimentality, the formless tendencies of romanticism, Taylor's work was useful. He is a cultured and thoughtful writer, and the instant success of Philip showed clearly that there was a demand for restrained and intellectual verse. His limitations are obvious. Lacking the imaginative power and beauty of the classical Lancelotti, on the one side, and the splendid vitality and melodious charm of the great romantics on the other, his verse too often reminds one of the taunt flung by her lover at Maud : it is " faultily faultless, richly regular, splendidly null."

ELENA'S SONG

Quoth tongue of neither maid nor wife
To heart of neither wife nor maid—
Lead we not here a jolly life
Betwixt the shine and shade ?

Quoth heart of neither maid nor wife
To tongue of neither wife nor maid—
Thou wagge'st, but I am woin with stife,
And feel like flowers that lade

PHILIP JAMES BAILEY (1816-1902) is another poet to prefer the claims of the intellect in verse, without clearly realising that in all great poetry intellectual matters must be expressed in terms of rhythmic beauty, and that a poet may exhibit a philosophy without explicitly philosophising. Bailey's work, Festus, was a lifelong labour and proved extremely popular in its day. Portentous in length, too often entirely lacking in poetic inspiration, it attracted probably because it attempted to deal in a vigorous and direct way with all the big problems of philosophy, without making too great a strain on the reader's power of thought. Profound it certainly is not, any more than it is beautiful, but Bailey stands to philosophic poetry what Eliza Cook did to the poetry of sentiment, and of the two, we would rather be in the company of the unpretentious Eliza.

Yet Festus is not utterly negligible. Around the dreary tracts of barren verse there are flashes of beauty, and many places where one more sensitive to self criticism could easily have wrought some fine reflections into noble and impressive poetry.

If only Bailey had possessed the critical faculty and a sense of style, Festus might have been an important philosophical poem. Great it could never have been, for there is no freshness and depth in Bailey's thought, but the writer trembles often enough on the verge of poetic distinction, to make us regret the faulty artistry that never carried him over.

FESTUS (BOOK X)

My gipsy maid ! my gipsy maid !
I bless and curse the day
I lost the light of life, and caught
The grief which maketh grey
Would that the light which blinded me
Had saved me on my way !

My night-haired love ! so sweet she was,
So fair and blithe was she,
Her smile was brighter than the moon's,
Her eyes the stars might see

I met her by her lano-spread tent,
Beside a moss green stone
And bade her make, not mock, my fate,
My fortune was her own
Thou art but yet a boy, she said,
And I a woman grown.

I am a man in love, I cried .
My heart was early manned .
She smiled, and only dropped her eyes
And then let go my hand
We stood a minute, neither spake
What each must understand.

I told her, so she would be mine,
And follow where I went,
She straight should have a bridal hower
Instead of gipsy tent

Or would she have me wond with her,
The world between should fall,
For her I would fling up faith and friends,
And name, and fame, and all

Her smile so bright froze while I spake
And ice was in her eye,
So near, it seemed ere touch her heart
I might have kissed the sky

I said that if she loved to rule,
Or if she longed to reign,
I would make her Queen of every race
Which tearlike trod the world's sad face,
Or bleed at every vein

She laid her finger on her lip,
And pointed to the sky .
There is no God to come, she said
Dost thou not fear to die ?

And what is God, I said, to thee ?
Thy people worship not
The good, the happy, and the free,
She said, they need no God

I looked until I lost mine eyes,
I felt as though I were
In a dark cave, with one weak light—
The light of life—with her,
And that was wasting fast away
I watched, but would not stir

Again she took my hand in hers,
And read it o'er and o'er,
Ah ! eyes so young, so sweet, I said,
Make as they read love's lore

She held my hand—I trembled whilst—
For sorely soon I felt
She made the love-cross she foretold,
And all the woe she dealt

Unhappy I should be, she said,
And young to death be given
I told her I believed in her
Not in the stars of heaven

Hush ! we breathe heaven, she said and bowed
And the stars speak through me
Let heaven, I cried, take care of heaven !
I only care for thee.

She shrank ! I looked, and begged a kiss
I knew she had one for me,
She would deny me not, she said,
But give me none would she

My gipsy maid ! my gipsy maid !
'Tis three long years like this,
Since there I gave and got from thee
That meeting, parting kiss

I saw the tears start in her eye,
And trickle down her cheek,
Like falling stars across the sky,
Escaping from their Maker's eye :
I saw, but spared to speak.

Go, and forget ! she said, and hid
Below her lowly tent,
I will not, cannot,—hear me, girl !
She heard not, and I went

At eve, by sunset, I was there,
The tent was there no more,
The fire which warmed her flickered still—
The fire she sat before

I stood by it, till through the dark
I saw not where it lay,
And then like that my heart went out
In ashy grief and grey

My gipsy maid ' my gipsy maid !
 Oh ! let me bless this day ;
 This day it was, I met thee first,
 And yet it shall be and is cursed,
 For thou hast gonc away

Certainly more interesting in his work than Bailey, is RICHARD HENGIST HORNE (1803-1884) His life was a varied one. He had passed through vicissitudes in America, seen something of the battle-field, and tasted adventure in the Australian bush, before he settled down to a life of letters. His early tragic dramas Cosmo de Medici and the Death of Marlowe were published in 1837, but he is best known for his epic Orion, "intended . . . to work out a special design" (the contrast between the intellect and the senses) "by means of antique or classical imagery and associations."

Horne's thought is fresh and vigorous, and his discipleship to Keats as a model served him in good stead. Undoubtedly he is at his best in epic verse, for though there is power and feeling in his drama, he had little visualising faculty. A big canvas, where thought rather than action is to be expressed, suited him best.

Among his other writings perhaps the most interesting is The New Spirit of the Age (1844), where he collaborated with Elizabeth Barrett.

THE PLOUGH

Above yon sombre swell of land
 Thou see'st the dawn's grave orange hue,
 With one pale streak like yellow sand,
 And over that a vein of blue
 The air is cold above the woods ;
 All silent is the earth and sky,
 Except with his own lonely moods
 The blackbird holds a colloquy.
 Over the broad hill creeps a beam,
 Like hope that gilds a good man's brow ;
 And now ascends the nostril-steam
 Of stalwart horses come to plough
 Ye rigid Ploughmen, bear in mind
 Your labour is for future hours,
 Advance—spare not—nor look behind—
 Plough deep and straight with all your powers !

Unlike Horne and other literary dramatists of the day, JAMES SHERIDAN KNOWLES (1784-1862) had considerable knowledge of stage technique, and if he had only been blessed with Horne's intellect and vigour, or even with the polished culture of Taylor, his dramas might have had a high place. But his imagination is poor, and excepting some scenes in Virginius (1820), he is woefully deficient in passion. The inspiration of the Elizabethan drama that gave power and beauty to the work of men like Wells, passed him by. In method and intention he belonged to the eighteenth-century school, and it is scarcely surprising that he should have done better in comedy than in tragedy. But it was not until his career was half-way accomplished that he essayed comedy. His most successful experiment in this direction was The Hunchback (1832), there is merit also in The Love Chase (1837) and Old Muds (1841). None of his plays read well, despite their acting qualities; and Knowles, therefore, though he occupies a respectable if not high place in the history of the drama, has little vitality to interest the student of letters.

JAMES ROBINSON PLANCHÉ (1796-1880), with more modest ambition than Knowles, deserves a passing tribute, not for his amusing extravaganzas, quite devoid of literary flavour, nor for his imitations of Aristophanes, but for an important stage reform that he was instrumental in bringing about. Planché was an archaeologist, and in 1823, when King John was revived, he designed the costumes with a view to historical accuracy, and thus led to the abolition of those grotesque anachronisms that marked the Shakespearean revivals of the eighteenth century.

CHARLES TENNYSON TURNER ((1808-1870), the elder brother of Alfred Tennyson, was not only a man of ripe culture but a fine literary artist. He excelled as a writer of sonnets, notable for delicacy of perception and refinement of feeling rather than for strength or passion. Limited in his range, the form of the sonnet suited admirably well his artistic power, and he is at his best when dealing with the homely and tranquil aspects of those rural scenes where he spent the greater portion of his life, as Vicar of Grasby, Lincolnshire.

LETTY'S GLOBE

When Letty had scarce pass'd her third glad year,
 And her young artless words began to flow,
 One day we gave the child a colour'd sphere
 Of the wide earth, that she might mark and know,
 By tint and outline, all its sea and land
 She patted all the world, old empires peep'd
 Between her baby fingers, her soft hand
 Was welcome at all frontiers. How she leap'd,
 And laugh'd and prattled in her world-wide bliss ;
 But when we turn'd her sweet unlearned eye
 On our own isle, she raised a joyous cry—
 "Oh ! yes, I see it, Letty's home is there !"
 And while she hid all England with a kiss,
 Bright over Europe fell her golden hair.

The work of FREDERICK TENNYSON (1807-1898) belongs strictly to the later years of the Victorian era, for his first volume was not published until 1854. Yet we have learned lately that he had a share in the Poems by Two Brothers, where Alfred found expression, and in its content and inspiration Frederick's work is of the early Victorian age. Probably the fame of his brother, and the fact that his own gifts as a poet were akin, account for the delay in publication. Much of the work certainly was written during the earlier period. It exhibits less force and originality than that of Charles, with something of the same gentleness and delicacy. It is unlikely, however, that even without the obscuring shadow of Alfred, Frederick would ever have made much of a name as a poet. He is too ready and facile, too diffuse; and when we have called his verse accomplished and graceful, we have said practically all that can be said for it.

THE HOLY TIDE

The days are sad, it is the Holy tide.
 The Winter morn is short, the Night is long ;
 So let the lifeless Hours be glorified
 With deathless thoughts and echo'd in sweet song
 And through the sunset of this purple cup
 They will resume the roses of their prime,
 And the old Dead will hear us and wake up,
 Pass with dim smiles and make our hearts sublime

The days are sad, it is the Holy tide •

Be dusky mistletoes and hollies strown,
Sharp as the spear that pierced His sacred side,
Red as the drops upon His thorny crown,
No haggard Passion and no lawless Murth
Fright off the solemn Muse,—tell sweet old tales,
Sing songs as we sit brooding o'er the hearth,
Till the lamp flickers, and the memory fails

BULWER, Lord LYTTON (1803-1873) achieved more distinction as a novelist than as a poet or dramatist. But his earliest literary efforts were in the direction of verse, Ismael and other Poems (1820), where he showed some skill as a lyric poet, while his dramas, belonging to a later period, are certainly clever, and showed marked aptitude in stage effects. The Lady of Lyons, fustian though much of it is, has shown extraordinary vitality, so also has Richelieu (1838) and Money (1840). These plays have been revived repeatedly, sometimes with remarkable success. Lytton's reputation as a dramatist is not therefore like that of Knowles, a passing whim of the moment. The literary critic finds little to admire in his work, he finds him inferior to Wells in dramatic intensity, to Beddoes in poetic beauty. Indeed it is easy work noting the defects of Lytton, his high-flown absurdities, his crude melodramatic tricks, his inability to create a strong character. Yet there is life about his work—life under cartloads of false sentiment, and dismal banalities. He has the power of actualising his characters, and if they are never profound and often ridiculous, they are certainly not puppets. They are real people truly observed, and high-coloured for stage purposes. So in his verse, much of it is poor enough, much of it is fully as over-accentuated, but there is sufficient genuine sensibility and imagination, to give the author of The First Violet and Absent yet Present, a niche among the minor poets of the era.

Two other poets in the domain of dramatic verse deserve mention. Sir AUBREY DE VERE (1788-1841) started his literary career with Julian the Apostate (1822) and The Duke of Mercia (1823).

After these plays he practically ceased writing until the very close of his life, when he composed Mary Tudor, intended as part of a trilogy—The Daughters of Tudor. This drama is remarkable for its force and passion, and compares favourably with Tennyson's play on the same subject. The character of Mary is finely delineated; she is shown as a woman of splendid instinct and with great possibilities of good at the outset, but gradually degenerating under the influence of religious fanaticism, and of unrequited love for her husband Philip.

HENRY HART MILMAN (1791-1868) is better known as an historian than as a poet; but his prize poem Apollo Belvedere (1812) is greatly above the level of official productions, so often tedious and unprofitable, while he was an excellent hymn writer. Among his plays were his first very successful Fazio (1815) and The Fall of Jerusalem (1820), rich in effective verse, though weak in dramatic power. In his later plays, the dramatic weakness is even more conspicuous, but there is good rhetorical matter even in these, notably Belshazzar (1822) and Anne Boleyn (1826).

RELIGIOUS VERSE

Milman's verse has been mentioned in connection with the dramatic writers of the age, but in his sympathetic outlook he belongs to a little group of religious poets that played no small part in the awakening of the English Church during the earlier years of the century. Of these, the most notable were Milman, John Keble, John Henry Newman, John Mason Neale, and Robert Stephen Hawker.

The earlier impulse to religious verse had come from the leaders of the Evangelical Movement, and the individualistic note that characterises Protestant theology penetrated the work, as we have seen, of the Presbyterian Pollok, and the Moravian James Montgomery. The Evangelical note dies down with them, and in Heber's somewhat flamboyant muse, there is certainly a change in the religious atmosphere. The "Church" is more insistent than personal experiences, and the way is thus prepared for the poetry of the Oxford Movement and the Catholic Revival. There is no better representative of the delicate piety of the Oxford Movement than Keble. We miss the passionate intensity that thrills us in Charles Wesley, and the simple poignancy of Cowper. But there are compensations. The graciousness and sweetness of the poet's nature permeate The Christian Year, and despite a monotony largely inherent in the very design of the volume, there is much artistic sensibility and imaginative beauty about the verse.

Keble was not merely a hymn writer, he was also a poet. History reminds us the terms are not synonymous. Newman assures us it was The Christian Year that first convinced him of "the sacramental character of natural phenomena."

THE NIGHTINGALE

Lessons sweet of spring returning,
Welcome to the thoughtful heart!
May I call ye sense or learning,
Instinct pure, or Heaven-taught art?
Be your title what it may,
Sweet the lengthening April day,
While with you the soul is free,
Ranging wild o'er hill and lea

Soft as Memnon's harp at morning,
To the inward ear devout,
Touched by light with heavenly warning
Your transporting chords ring out.
Every leaf in every nook,
Every wave in every brook,
Chanting with a solemn voice,
Minds us of our better choice

Needs no show of mountain hoary,
Winding shore or deepening glen,
Where the landscape in its glory
Teaches truth to wandering men:
Give true hearts but earth and sky,
And some flowers to bloom a id die,—
Homely scenes and simple views
Lowly thoughts may best infuse

See the soft green willow springing
Where the waters gently pass,
Every way her free arms flinging
O'er the moist and ready grass.
Long ere winter blasts are fled,
See her tipped with vernal red,
And her kindly flower displayed,
Ere her leaf can cast a shade.

Though the rudest hand assail her,
 Patiently she droops awhile,
 But when showers and breezes hail her,
 Wears again her willing smile
 Thus I learn Contentment's power
 From the slighted willow bower,
 Ready to give thanks and live
 On the least that Heaven may give.

If, the quiet brooklet leaving,
 Up the stony vale I wind,
 Haply half in fancy grieving
 For the shades I leave behind,
 By the dusky wayside drear,
 Nightingales with joyous cheer
 Sing, my sadness to reproach,
 Gladher than in cultured grove

Where the thickest boughs are twining
 Of the greenest, darkest tree,
 There they plunge, the light declining—
 All may hear, but none may see
 Fearless of the passing hoof,
 Hardly will they fleet aloof,
 So they live in modest ways,
 Trust entire, and ceaseless praise

Greater in imaginative endowment than Keble, JOHN HENRY NEWMAN (1801–1890) might, had he elected, taken Keble's place as the poet of Neo-Catholicism. But he had other interests and indeed thought little of poetry as an art, saying contemptuously that poetry was "the refuge of those who have not the Catholic Church to flee to and repose upon."

Newman's poetical output consequently is slight and belongs chiefly to his earlier years. But the quality is high, and there is distinction and power in all that he wrote. His most considerable poem, The Dream of Gerontius, was written many years before its publication in 1865, but was thrown aside for a while and forgotten. The blank verse is forceful and impressive, and the entire poem exhibits a mysticism as sensitive as Keble's, with a bolder range of imagination.

SOUL OF GERONTIUS

I went to sleep; and now I am refreshed.
 A strange refreshment for I feel in me
 An inexpressive lightness, and a sense
 Of freedom, as I were at length myself,
 And ne'er had been before. How still it is!
 I hear no more the busy beat of time,
 No, nor my fluttering breath, nor struggling pulse,
 Nor does one moment differ from the next.
 I had a dream, you—someone softly said
 "He's gone"; and then a sigh went round the room.

And then I surely heard a priestly voice
 Cry "Subvenite", and they knelt in prayer
 I seem to hear him still, but thin and low,
 And fainter and more faint the accents come,
 As at an over-widening interval
 Ah! whence is this? What is this severance?
 This silence pours a solitariness
 Into the very essence of my soul,
 And the deep rest, so soothing and so sweet,
 Hath something too of sternness and of pain,
 For it drives back my thoughts upon their spring
 By a strange introversion, and perforce
 I now begin to feed upon myself,
 Because I have nought else to feed upon

Am I alive or dead? I am not dead,
 But in the body still; for I possess
 A sort of confidence which clings to me,
 That each particular organ holds its place

As heretofore, combining with the rest
 Into one symmetry, that wraps me round,
 And makes me man, and surely I could move,
 Did I but will it, every part of me
 And yet I cannot to my sense bring home,
 By very trial, that I have the power
 'Tis strange, I cannot stir a hand or foot,
 I cannot make my fingers or my lips
 By mutual pressure witness each to each,
 Nor by the eyelid's instantaneous stroke
 Assure myself I have a body still
 Nor do I know my very attitude,
 Nor if I stand, or lie, or sit, or kneel.
 So much I know, not knowing how I know,
 That the vast universe, where I have dwelt,
 Is quitting me, or I am quitting it
 Or I or it is rushing on the wings
 Of light or lightning on an onward course,
 And we are now a million miles apart
 Yet . . . is this peremptory severance
 Wrought out in lengthening measurements of space
 Which grow and multiply by speed and me?
 Or am I traversing infinity
 By endless subdivision, hurrying back
 From finite towards infinitesimal,
 Thus dying out of the expansive world?
 Another marvel someone has me fast
 Within his ample palm, 'tis not a grasp
 Such as they use on earth, but all around
 Over the surface of my subtle being,
 As though I were a sphere, and capable
 To be accosted thus, a uniform
 And gentle pressure tells me I am not
 Self-moving, but borne forward on my way.
 And hark! I hear a singing, yet in sooth
 I cannot of that music rightly say
 Whether I hear or touch or taste the tones,
 Oh! what a heart-subduing melody!

FREDERICK WILLIAM FABER (1814–1863) is greatly inferior, as a religious poet, to his great contemporary, though some of his hymns are extremely popular. He lacks the restraint of Newman and the simplicity of Keble, and his gushing propensities certainly do not make for good poetry.

JOHN MASON NEALE (1818–1866), a tolerable historian and a good though variable writer of hymns, has greater claim upon our attention. He achieved some excellent translations, and occasionally, as in Art thou weary, art thou languid, sounded a really high note of devotional beauty.

REGINALD HEBER (1783–1826), a devoted Churchman, was also a scholar and wit, while Bishop of Calcutta he wrote the well-known From Greenland's icy mountains, and is also the author of a Life of Jeremy Taylor and an Eastern romance based on the story of Bluebeard.

Last of this band is the ballad writer, ROBERT STEPHEN HAWKER (1804–1875). For forty years he lived and worked in a lonely Cornish parish, and his humanising influence bore valuable fruit. His ballad poetry bears the impress of the rugged scenery of the west, and is infused with old Celtic legends and superstitions. In The Quest of the Sangraal (1863), his brooding mind found congenial material, and the mystical side of legendary lore attracted him irresistibly. He was a remarkable man and a poet of considerable vigour and originality.

SONNET

Our bark is on the waters! wide around
 The wandering wave, above, the lonely sky
 Hush! a young sea-bird floats, and that quick cry
 Shrieks to the levelled weapon's echoing sound:

Grasp its lank wing, and on, with reckless bound !
 Yet, creatures of the surf, a sheltering breast
 To-night shall haunt in vain thy far-off nest,
 A call unanswered search the rocky ground
 Lord of Leviathan when Ocean heard
 Thy gathering voice, and sought his native breeze,
 When whales first plunged with life, and the proud deep
 Felt unborn tempests heave in troubled sleep,
 Thou didst provide, even for this nameless bird;
 Home and a natural love amid the surging seas.

MINISTERING SPIRITS

We see them not—we cannot hear
 The music of their wing—
 Yet know we that they sojourn near,
 The Angels of the spring !
 They glide along this lovely ground
 When the first violet grows,
 Their graceful hands have just unbound
 The zone of yonder rose.
 I gather it for thy dear breast,
 From stain and shadow free :
 That which an Angel's touch hath blest
 Is meet, my love, for thee !

Ireland, hitherto represented in our verse by the facile melodies of Moore, and the passion of George Darley, finds expression during this era in the romantic fervour of JAMES CLARENCE MANGAN (1803-1849)

Mangan was one of those highly sensitive and imaginative temperaments that seem predetermined for tragedy. His life was a constant struggle against poverty, and to blunt the scourings of circumstance he had recourse to opium and alcohol. His early death therefore was not to be wondered at. He was a man with great charm of personality, and a fine instinct for rhythm. He translated and freely adapted Erse poetry, one of his best known pieces being My Dark Rosaleen; while he wrote patriotic songs for the Young Ireland Party. If he is associated more especially with Celtic verse, Celtic song serves by no means as his only inspiration, for he was fully alive to the romantic treasures of German literature, and to the glamour of the East. In short, romance, wherever it might be found, gained a response from his mobile and fevered imagination.

It is interesting to note that one of Mangan's Oriental songs, The Karamanian Exile, suggested to the American writer, J. R. Randall, the better known lyric Maryland, my Maryland. This is Mangan

"I see thee ever in my dreams,
 Karaman !
 Thy hundred hills, thy thousand streams,
 Karaman, O Karaman !
 As when the gold-bright morning gleams,
 As when the deepening sunset gleams
 With lines of light thy hills and streams,
 Karaman ! . . ."

BALLAD VERSE

This account of earlier Victorian verse may fittingly conclude with mention of three volumes of ballad verse by writers who will be dealt with at greater length in other sections—Macaulay's Lays of Ancient Rome (1842) and English Ballads, and Aytoun's Lays of the Scottish Cavaliers (1848). These volumes are in direct descent from Scott and from Percy's Reliques, and while they lack the poignancy and warmth of imagination that fire the best of these, are of their kind admirable. The historical spirit, expressed in clear, vigorous, spiced verse, may serve as a summing up of Macaulay's work, whether as a singer of English glory or of Roman renown. Aytoun's verses lack, perhaps, the sparkle of Macaulay, but are rich in national sentiment, and are worthy contributions to the poetry of clivalry.

I. POETRY. ROBERT BROWNING. His Life—His Work—The Development of his Art: (a) His earlier Poems, (b) His Dramas; (c) His later Poems. The Singer of Love—The Psychologist

ROBERT BROWNING (1812-1889)

HIS LIFE

BORN at Camberwell on May 7, 1812, Robert Browning was the son of a clerk in the Bank of England, a highly gifted, intellectual man of fine character, his mother, "a divine woman," as he called her, was of mixed German and Scotch descent, from whom the poet inherited his musical and artistic tastes.

Unlike most boys of his class, he was nurtured on the classics. His cradle had been rocked to the rhythm of Greek poetry, at five years old "he piled up chairs and tables for a town" and sat "a-top as Priam"—even the domestic animals were identified by classical names. Keen, precocious, and highly imaginative, the child was "a wonder at drawing," and showed promise at three years old when he began to work with a brush and black-current juice, while it is said that he was "studying the grammar of music when most children are learning the multiplication table."

His knowledge of and love for music remained with him throughout life. He was an admirable musician, and numbered among his friends many distinguished members of the profession.

After a brief and not very satisfactory experience of private schools, he continued his education at home, tutorial supervision being supplemented by lectures at University College. Meanwhile he became proficient in many physical accomplishments, and could ride, fence, box, and dance.

Destined for the medical profession, he entered Guy's Hospital, but this was not his vocation: at one time he had a passion for the stage and wanted to be an actor, finally he decided on following his long-cherished idea of becoming a poet. Before he was twelve he had written a small volume of verse, but failing to find a publisher he threw it on the fire in disgust.

The first literary influence was Byron. "I would at any time have gone to Finchley," he wrote in the forties, "to see a curl of his hair or one of his gloves . . . While heaven knows that I could not get up enthusiasm enough to cross the room if at the other end Wordsworth, Coleridge, and Southey were condensed into the little china bottle youker."

From Byron he turned to Shelley. He had purchased a second-hand copy of Queen Mab, and was so much moved by the poem that at sixteen he boldly declared himself an atheist and vegetarian; but this form of discipleship did not last long.

Kraits proved almost as great an influence as Shelley, and in his earliest work, Pauline, it is not hard to discern the strong influence of these poets and after them of Byron.

After publishing Pauline, written when he was twenty, Browning went to Russia (1834), riding some fifteen hundred miles during his tour, an experience that germinated later on into that breathless lyric How they brought the Good News. In Russia he met a Frenchman who interested him in the philosopher and scientist destined to become the subject of his next poem, Paracelsus. Shortly after its publication his parents removed from Camberwell to Hatching, and the young poet made many new friends, including John Forster, whom he afterwards assisted to complete his Life of Strafford, and Macready the actor, for whose little son Browning wrote The Pied Piper to while away a weary convalescence.

His first experience of Italy came in 1838, and the spell of Venice then felt never left him. Indeed, much of his best work was done under Italian skies. On his return from Italy he became very interested in the poems of Elizabeth Barrett, and on May 21, 1845, made the acquaintance of the author, the friendship ripening into one of the most romantic of literary love stories. An unreasonable and selfish father refused his permission to their marriage. She was an invalid, it is true—but Mr. Barrett proved just as obdurate when the doctor suggested a winter abroad, having made up his mind that his daughter was fated to be an invalid recluse all her days. Browning was thirty-four, Miss Barrett three years older; so they did what many a younger couple have done in the same circumstances—decided to dispense with the parental consent.

On September 12, 1846, they were quietly married at Marylebone Church—the marriage being thus recorded with amusing brevity in Robert Browning's diary: "An appointment between 10.45 and 11.15." A week later she left her father's house never to return, and the determined runaways started at once for Italy, where their home was to be for many years. With happiness and Italian sunshine came renewed health. Two years later we find her riding five miles on what she calls "an inaccessible volcanic ground not far from the stars."

Joy at the birth of a son in 1849 was saddened by the news of the sudden death of his mother, to whom Browning was devotedly attached, and he dreaded the return to England.

During the following years Browning published much of his poetry, but the lack of appreciation in England affected him greatly. "Nobody there," wrote his wife, "except a small knot of pre-Raphaelite men, pretend to do him justice while in America he is a power—he is read—he lives in the hearts of the people."

Mrs. Browning, whose health began to fail in 1860, died the following year. "God took her to himself," said her husband, "as you would lift a sleeping child from a dark uneasy bed into your arms and the light." With a manly sense of responsibility but with a sore heart, Browning returned to London with his son and devoted himself to the boy's education, his only sister, who had been the stay of her parents till their death, now came to live with him and make the home less lonely.

In 1860 not a single copy of the poems was sold by Browning's publisher in six months; in 1871, fourteen hundred copies of Prince Hohenstiel-Schwangau were sold on the first five days of publication.

Time had somewhat softened the bitterness of grief at the loss of his wife, and with increasing reputation as a poet, the shrewd, kindly face became ubiquitous in London society, so much, indeed, that Tennyson laughingly remarked, "Browning will die in a white tie."

Since the death of his wife Browning had not seen Italy, now that his son had married and settled there as an artist, he made the first of a series of annual visits, and with them the old charm of Venice returned. In 1880, after an unsuccessful negotiation for the purchase of the old Manzoni Palace, he went on a visit to his son in November, caught cold and developed bronchitis, and the aged poet passed away as the clock of San Marco was striking ten on December 12—the day of the publication of Asolando.

A wish to be buried beside his wife at Florence was found to be impracticable, so Westminster Abbey claimed him for the Poets' Corner.

HIS WORK

Browning's development as a writer may be divided into four periods.

(1) From 1832-1846. This is the experimental period, when he is seeking for his true medium as an artist. He essays various forms, then finds in the dramatic lyric his most satisfying expression. He had tried the monologue and the narrative drama, and the lyric pure and simple, but in the dramatic lyric he merges some characteristics from those other forms and welds them into an artistic whole.

(2) From 1846-1869. This is the period of his best and most varied work. Yet the dramatic note runs throughout the multifarious expressions. Sometimes the intellectual side predominates, sometimes the emotional. He is at his happiest when they blend, and at the close of the period we have the noblest blend in The Ring and the Book.

(3) From 1869-1876. After The Ring and the Book, the intellectual side of Browning gets the upper hand. This period is rich in caustic and dialectic verse, but is lacking in imaginative beauty. We admire Browning the thinker; but lament the decline of the artist. Much, indeed, during this period might have been written with greater advantage in prose.

(4) From 1876-1889. Once again the artist in Browning awakens; not perhaps with the same force and fresh beauty of earlier years, but sufficiently to delight us with some measure of the old magic; sufficiently to soften and mellow the untrusting intellectual vagaries of the thinker. Finally we have the swan song of Asolando.

THE DEVELOPMENT OF HIS ART

(a) His Earlier Poems

Pauline (1833) was written when the poet was twenty. It is essentially a young man's poem; young in its susceptibility to the influences of other poets, young in its unclouded idealism, young in its egotism. As a work of art it compares with Browning's later work, much as Sketches by Boz compares with David Copperfield. It interests us mainly as a human document, from the light it throws on Browning himself. Many of the familiar traits are traits that were to develop later into fine maturity: the religious idealism, "I saw God everywhere", the individualistic note, "I am made up of intensest life"; the lifelong enthusiasm for Shelley hero called "the Sun-treader". But if Browning, the man and the thinker, is here veiled in embryo, Browning the artist is but faintly suggested. The poem is an agreeable one to read, but the influence of Shelley and of Keats broods over its form and texture.

In Paracelsus (1835) the poet begins to find his own speech. The subject is one dear to Browning's heart, the development of a soul thirsting for knowledge. Paracelsus fails in his search because he ignores love. How often was that to be the burden of Browning's verse.

To win knowledge the alchemist has flung away the joys of youth, the joy of social service, the consolation of love. Then when the girl who loved him dies, he realizes all he has lost. He has been seeking an abstraction and thrown away the substance. It is an inspiring theme, and in handling it Browning's vital delight in the energy of Nature finds noble expression.

"Earth is a wintry clod,
But spring-wind, like a dancing peadrestress, passes
Over its breast to waken it, rare verdure
Huds tenderly upon rough banks, between
The withered tree-roots and the cracks of frost,
Like a smile striving with a wrinkled face,
 the lark
Soars up and up, eluvvering for very joy;
 and God renews
His ancient rapture."

The writing is not quite free of imitativences as yet—the pretty songs are obviously reminiscent of Keats—but there is much that is individual, especially the passage just quoted

Sordello (1840) makes no advance from the artistic point of view, in fact it is as a work of art distinctly inferior to Paracelsus—"A derelict in the ocean of poetry" it has been, not unhappily, called. But the derelict is certainly worth a visit if you can get near her. There is an immense amount of fundamental brain-work in the poem, indeed it has become a derelict because overweighted with ballast. The theme is much the same as in Paracelsus; and the Italian background has given the poet the opportunity for some of the most striking pen pictures he has yet given us.

“The woods were long austere with snow, at last
Pink leaflets huddled on the beech, and fast
Larches, scattered through pine-tree solitudes,
Brightened, as in the slumbrous heart of the woods
Our buried year, a witch, grew young again
To placid incantations, and that staid

About were from her cauldron, green smoke blent
With those black pines "

"Day by day,
New pollen on the lily petal grows,
And still more labyrinthine buds the rose."

The poem bristles with archæological and historic scholarship, but a fraction of it would have sufficed for the poet's purpose. As it is, we are dazzled by the wealth of learning. Small wonder that Tennyson said about the poem that he only understood two lines—the first line:

"Who will, may hear Sordello's story told,"

and the last line :

"Who would, has heard Sordello's story told."

and that neither was true

Yet the theme of all these early poems is a fascinating one, symbolising as it does the spirit of the Renaissance, with its restless quest for knowledge and power; and the literary student will find an interesting analogy between these poems and Marlowe's Faustus. When the lover in Pauline cries, "I will make every Joy my own," we think of Faustus, while the line in Tambraine, "still climbing after knowledge infinite," might well have come from Paracelsus or Sordello.

But in his next venture Browning finds himself completely heretofore the thinker and the moralist have outpaced the artist. Now the artist takes his triumph. The Dramatic Lyrics, covering a period of ten years (1836-1846), exhibit every side of Browning's genius—tenderness in Evelyn Hope, passion in In a Gondola, subtlety in Porphyria's Lover, intellectual brilliancy in My Last Duchess, quaint kindness in Waring, genial extravagance in The Pied Piper, humour, satire, keen observation, joy in life, joy in thought, joy in passion. Here is the Browning we know and love. And, above all, the volume contains those two perfect little pieces of poetic impressionism, Meeting at Night and Parting at Morning, where, with a few superb touches, Browning flushes upon our imagination a picture of love and life that for comprehensive sympathy and imaginative beauty are among the choicest and truest things he ever wrote.

MEETING AT NIGHT

I

The grey sea and the long black land,
And the yellow half-moon large and low,
And the startled little waves that leap
In fiery ringlets from their sleep
As I gain the cove with pushing prow
And quench its speed 't' the slushy sand.

IV

Then a mile of warm sea-scented beach,
Three fields to cross till a farm appears;
A tap at the pane, the quick sharp scratch
And blue spurt of a lighted match,
And a voice less loud, thro' its joys and fears,
Than the two hearts beating each to each!

PARTING AT MORNING

Round the cape of a sudden came the sea,
And the sun looked over the mountain's rim—
And straight was a path of gold for him,
And the need of a world of men for me

And the method is as fresh and attractive as are the themes. There is a note of realism new to English verse and destined to play an important part in the poetry of the late Victorian era and in the verse of to-day. The explosive violence of The Soliloquy in a Spanish Cloister, and the rough vigour of Count Guenond, serve as a prelude to the colloquial realism of Mr Rudyard Kipling and Mr John Masefield.

Good as are the Dramatic Lyrics, the Dramatic Romances (1848) are, on the whole, even better. The method is similar, the material is much the same; but the scope is wider and the treatment exhibits an added ease as well as a deeper power.

In lyrical sweetness and fire the volume holds its own with its predecessor—in quality if not in quantity. Have we not The Lost Leader and How they brought the Good News?—but the superiority is shown especially in the psychological insight and dramatic strength of such pieces as that masterly study of the decadent Renaissance, The Bishop orders his Tomb at St Praxed's. Ruskin praised it for its historical accuracy, its vital accuracy is even more remarkable. Add to this The Flight of the Duchess, Meredithian in its romantic realism, The Boy and the Angel, with its simple humanity; and the power and beauty of Saul.

THE BISHOP ORDERS HIS TOMB AT ST. PRADEX'S CHURCH

Vanity, saith the preacher, vanity!
Draw round my bed is Anselm keeping back?
Nephew—son's mine ah God, I know not! Well—
She, men would have to be your mother once
Old Gandolf envied me, so fair she was!
What's done is done, and she is dead beside,
Dead long ago, and I am bishop since,
And as she died so must we die ourselves,
And thence ye may perceive the world's a dream
Life, how and what is it? As here I lie
In this state chamber, dying by degrees,
Hours and long hours in the dead night, I ask
"Do I live, am I dead?" Peace, peace seems all
St Praxed's ever was the church for peace!
And so, about this tomb of mine, I fought
With tooth and nail to save my niche, ye know —Old Gandolf oozed me despite my care,
Shrewd was that snatch from out the corner South
He graced his carrion with, God curse the snare!
Yet still my niche is not so cramped but thence
One sees the pulpit o' the epistle-side,
And somewhat of the chow, these silent seats,
And up into the very dome where live
The angels, and a sunbeam's sure to lurk;
And I shall fill my slab of basalt there,
And 'neath my tabernacle take my rest,
With those nine columns round me two and two
The odd one at my feet where Anselm stands
Pomph-blossom marble all, the race, the ripe,
As fresh poured red wine of a mighty pulve
—Old Gandolf with his paltry onion-stone,
Put me where I may look at him! True peach,
Rosaline and flawless how I earned the prize!
Draw close that conflagration of my church
—What then? So much was saved if aught were missed!
My sons, ye would not be my death! Go dig
The white-grape vineyard where the oil-press stood,
Drop water gently till the surface sink,
And if ye find . . . Ah God, I know not, I! . . .
Bedded in store of rotten fig-leaves soft,
And corded up in a tight olive frail,
Some lump, ah God, of lapis lazuli,
Big as a Jew's head cut off at the nape,
Blue as a vein o'er the Madonna's breast . . .

Sons, all have I bequeathed you, villas, all,
That bravo Frascati villa with its bath,
So, let the blue lump poise between my knees,
Like God the Father's globe on both his hands
Ye worship in the Jesu Church so gay,
For Gandolf shall not choose but see and burst!
Swift as a weaver's shuttle fleet our years!
Man goeth to the grave, and where is he?
Did I say basalt for my slab, sons? Black—
'Twas ever antiquo-black I meant! How else
Shall ye contrast my froze to come beneath?
The bas-relief in bronze ye pronounced mo,
Those Pans and Nymphs ye wot of, and perchance
Some tripod, thyrsus, with a vase or so,
The Saviour at his sermon on the mount,
Saint Praxed in a glory, and one Pan
Ready to twitch the Nymph's last garment off,
And Moses with the table . . . but I know
Ye mark me not! What do they whisper thee,
Child of my bowels, Anselm? Ah, ye hope
To rovel down my villas while I gasp
Brickd o'er with beggar's mouldy travertine
Which Gandolf from his tomb tap chuckles at!
Nay, boys, ye love me— all of jasper then!
'Tis jasper ye stand pledged to, lest I grieve
My bath must needs be left behind, alas!
One block, pure green as a pistachio nut,
There's plenty jasper somewhere in the world—
And have I not Saint Praxed's ear to pray
Horses for ye, and brown Greek manuscripts,
And mistresses with great smooth marbly limbs?
—That's if ye carve my epitaph aught,
Choice Latin, picked phrase Tully's every word,
No gaudy ware like Gandolf's second line—
Tully, my masters! I lipian serves his need!
And then how I shall be through centuries,
And hear the blessed mutter of the mass,
And see God made and eaten all day long,
And feel the steady candle-flame, and taste
Good strong thick stupefying incense-smoke!
For as I lie here, hours of the dead night,
Dying in state and by such slow degrees,
I fold my arms as if they clapped a crook,
And stretch my feet forth straight as stone can point,
And let the bedclothes for a morteloth, drop
Into great laps and folds of sculptor's-work
And as you tap is dandle, and strange thoughts
Grow, with a certain humming in my ears,
About the life before I lived this life,
And this life too, popes, cardinals and priests,
Saint Praxed at his sermon on the mount,
Your tall pale mother with her talking eyes,
And new-found agate urns as fresh as day,
And marble's language, Latin pure, discreet,
—Alas, lucres ear (poth our friend?)
No Tully, said I, Ulpian at the best!
Evil and brief hath been my pilgrimage,
All lapis, all, sons! Else I giv' the Pope
My villas! Will ye ever eat my heart?
Ever your eyes were as a lizard's quick,
They glitter like your mother's for my soul,
Or ye would heighten my impoverished froze,
Piece out its starved design, and fill my vase
With grapes, and add a vizer and a Torm,
And to the tripod ye would tie a lynx
That in his struggle throws the thyrsus down,
To comfort me on my entablature
Whereon I am to lie till I must ask
"Do I live, am I dead?" There, leave me there!
For ye have stabbed me with ingratitude.
To death—ye wish it—God, ye wish it! Stone—
Grinstone, a crumble! Clammy squares which sweat
As if the corpse they keep were oozing through—
And no more lapis to delight the world!
Well, go! I bless ye. Fewer tapers there,
But in a row and, going, turn your backs
—Ay, like departing altar-ministrants,
And leave me in my church, the church for peace,
That I may watch at leisure if he leers—
Old Gandolf, at me, from his onion-stone,
As still he envied me, so fair she was!

Following this volume came Christmas Eve and Easter Day (1850), where, if we mark no fresh advance, we see the poet applying his previously developed faculties to the problem of Religion.

Of wider interest and more varied charm is the volume entitled Men and Women (1855), on the same lines as the Dramatic Lyrics and Romances. The volume is a worthy pendant to these earlier volumes: some may prefer the reader music, the simpler themes that we find there, to others the greater unconventionality, the subtler flavour that characterises this volume as a whole may prove more attractive, for here we have those memorable poems on Art, Fra Lippo Lippi and Andrea del Sarto, the satiric apologia of Bishop Blougram, and the delicately passionate One Word More; to mention a few out of a score of well-known poems.

There is more emphasis in this volume than in its predecessors on the ironies of life. The splendour of passion, the benison of sympathy, the stimulus of a courageous front in life, these have been illustrated fully as well before, but now for the first time we see Browning dealing with the obverse side, with vacillating wills, with flabby sympathies, with the shallows and shoals of human nature. These are exemplified in such poems as Popularity, A Pretty Woman, Respectability, and The Statue and the Bust.

FRA LIppo LIppi

How! what's here?

Quite from the mark of painting, bless us all!
 Faces, arms, legs and bodies like the true
 As much as pea and pea! it's devil's game!
 Your business is not to catch men with show,
 With homage to the perishable clay,
 But lift them over it, ignore it all,
 Make them forget there's such a thing as flesh.
 Your business is to paint the souls of men—
 Man's soul, and it's a fire, smoke no it's not . . .
 It's vapour done up like a new-born babe—
 (In that shape when you die it leaves your mouth)
 It's well, what matters talking it's the soul!
 Give us no more of body than shows soul
 Here's Quotto, with his Saint a praising God!
 That sets you praising,—why not stop with him?
 Why put all thoughts of praise out of our heads
 With wonder at lines, colours, and what not?
 Paint the soul, never mind the legs and arms!
 Rub all out try at it a second time
 Oh that white smallish female with the breasts
 She's just my niece . . . Herodias, I would say,—
 Who went and danced and got men's heads cut off—
 Have it all out!

Now, is this sense, I ask?

A fine way to paint soul by painting body
 So ill, the eye can't stop there, must go further
 And can't fare worse! Thus, yellow does for white
 When what you put for yellow's simply black,
 And any sort of meaning looks intense
 When all beside itself means and looks nought
 Why can't a painter lift each foot in turn,
 Left foot and right foot, go a double step,
 Make his flesh liker and his soul more like,
 Both in their order? Take the prettiest face.
 The Prior's niece patron-saint—is it so pretty
 You can't discover if it means hope, fear,
 Sorrow or joy? won't beauty go with these?
 Suppose I've made her eyes all right and blue,
 Can't I take breath and try to add life's flash,
 And then add soul and heighten them threefold?
 Or say there's beauty with no soul at all—
 (I never saw it—put the case the same—)

If you get simple beauty and nought else,
 You got about the best thing God invents,— That's somewhat And you'll find the soul you have missed,

Within yourself when you return him thanks!
 "Rub all out!" well, well, there's my life, in short,
 And so the thing has gone on ever since.

(b) His Dramas

So far I have dealt with his development as a poet, passing on one side the dramas. These are, in order Strafford (1837), Pippa Passes (1841), King Victor and King Charles (1842), The Return of the Druses (1843), A Blot in the 'Scutcheon (1843), Colombe's Birthday (1844), A Soul's Tragedy (1846), Luria (1846), In a Balcony (1853).

The extraordinary insight into character, the power of actualising the fleeting moods, is so marked in Browning, that it may be wondered how it is that he has not fared better as a dramatist. But an effective dramatist he assuredly is not, and thus one may feel without seeing the plays acted, it is borne in upon us as we read them. Why?

Drama may be defined as an articulate story presented in action. The story we have, it is articulate also, but it is not given—or given only spasmodically—in action. Browning is far too interested in the effect of the drama on the character. In his lyrics and romances he begins after the event. He is retrospective, reminiscent, analytical. Psychologically all this is interesting enough. In a poem it is of little moment, though even there a greater simplicity might have been welcomed. But in a play which is to be seen and where the doing has to affect us not the thinking, it is a serious drawback. Browning is not a dramatist but a dramatic philosopher. Accept this standpoint and his plays are interesting enough—some intensely interesting, but it is at its best the interest of the study rather than of the theatre.

Directly he throws away his plot he is far more at ease, the conflict within, the complexities of a Strafford, the shrewdness of a Guendolen, the ingenuous sweetness of a Pippa, such things he can realise for us, and can do with true art and conviction. But this is drama in samples, the force is intermittent, it is not continuous and cumulative.

The best test of such criticism lies in the superior excellence of Pippa Passes, that none would dispute, and which is the most unattractive of Browning's plays. Yet it would be hard to find a play more charming for its lyric beauty, insight, and passion.

It is New Year's Day at Asolo, and Pippa, the little factory girl from the silk mills, is full of the possibilities of holiday-making. What shall she do with her holiday and herself? She will be gloriously happy. She thinks of all the folk in Asolo and wonders whom she shall be sure to love. It would be fine to be loved by a gallant man. She will be Ottima. No, that love is disturbing and base, it has brought misery to others. Ah! why not be charming Phené married to the brilliant young sculptor? But is she happy? Is she sure of his love? Why not be the mother of Luigi or, better still, why not be a Bishop? Yet, after all, why change places at all!—God loves her as she is.

The song of Pippa permeates the play; it runs through the drama like a rift of sunshine through a storm-cloud; across the hot and turbid passion of Ottima and Sebald, across the idle chatter of the market-place, across the musings of Luigi, reft between love and patriotism, across the meditation and temptation of the ecclesiastic. Every life is touched by the song; thrilled by the singer. And the crowning charm of the play is, that the little factory girl never knows her influence, nor how she has shaped their lives.

Certainly Pippa Passes is one of the freshest, sweetest things the dramatic poet has given us.

I do not think that Strafford or its successor King Victor and King Charles are among the happiest, they are clever and scholarly, yet the historical background is not alive. Browning can write spirited Cavalier songs. He can give us a mood—not a character. Browning's introspective nature is not congenial to the seventeenth century, and the absence of strong emotional interest weakens Strafford.

The Return of the Druses suits the poet's taste for the by-ways of history much more. The idea is a striking one, and its Eastern atmosphere, with its mysticism and tense feeling, is thoroughly attuned to Browning's nature. Djabal the impostor, who is only half insincere and who is deeply attached to his nation, wishing to snatch it back from bondage, is well conceived. It is a fine piece of imaginative work, slightly marred by a somewhat too diffusive treatment. The Druse's belief in divine incarnation is historical, but the rest is an ingenuous figment of Browning's opulent imagination.

A Blot in the 'Scutcheon is a simpler affair, and lends itself more easily to modern acting conditions. In fact it is on the whole the best, theatrically, of his plays. The scene is English and the period the eighteenth century, it is a tragedy of love in essence, and the motif of family honour is one of general appeal. The irony of fate is suggested here as in Romeo and Juliet, and the characterisation is mostly clear, distinct, and impressive. The women are better drawn than the men, but that is usual with Browning, particularly good is the hapless girl Mildred Tresham, a study that greatly affected Dickens. "I know nothing," he wrote, "that is so affecting, nothing in any book I have ever read, as Mildred's recurrence to that 'I was so young, I had no mother'—I know no love like it, no passion like it."

Colombe's Birthday is in quite another vein than those preceding. The swift action and passion of A Blot in the 'Scutcheon is absent here, and the play is deficient, on the whole, in dramatic interest, though the study of Colombe, Duchess of Juliers and Cleves (seventeenth century) is of considerable interest from a character point of view. Her lover, Valence, a poverty-stricken lawyer, the "pale grey man," is etched admirably, and his final scene with Colombe is the one really gripping dramatic situation of the play.

It is clear, however, that Browning's real interest is in the development of character. Plot and intrigue he can deal with, but rarely does justice to.

Admirable in conception, he leaves them too much to themselves, and in Colombe's Birthday we feel he is interested in the spiritual action alone. This is especially so in his two later plays, A Soul's Tragedy and Luria. Chiappino, like Djabal, is a deceiver, but more deliberately so, and on a much lower moral level. He poses as the revolutionary, and is hailed as saviour of the people, but finds it to his interest to disown, and in reward for his docility is made Provost of the City. There is some good talk and much excellent satire; but it is ineffective as a play.

Luria is the last of his dramas. One other dramatic poem there is in one scene: In a Balcony (1853). The action of this takes place within a few hours, on a balcony at night. The lunelight is thrown around two lovers, Constance and Norbert, but the real interest lies in the presentation of the thwarted maternal instinct given in the character of the Queen, who mistakes Norbert's protestation of love for Constance as a declaration to herself. Here is the real tragic figure of the scene. The lovers are far less interesting, and the picture of Constance, willing to surrender her lover to please the Queen, is neither very pleasing nor convincing.

(c) His Later Poems

In the Dramatic Personæ (1864) Browning continues those studies of men and women that he had first started in the Dramatic Lyrics. The volume came nine years after Men and Women, and his dramatic experiments are reflected here. Having surrendered the drama, he throws much of his dramatic material into monologue form. It may be conceded, I think, that the charm, the strong human appeal of the earlier volume is less conspicuous. The lyric sweetness which he could, and he would, give us so generously, has less place than we could wish. Against these drawbacks we may put a finer subtlety, an even wider outlook upon life, and a stronger intellectual power. Italy is the background no longer, the elemental side of love proves less attractive. More curious by-paths are investigated; yet love dominates when love is the theme. Otherwise the intellectual side is more apparent.

It would be hard to overpraise the ironic pathos of that masterly poem Confessions. It is one of the finest Browning ever wrote. There is satiric strength in Caliban upon Setebos, and the humour and dialectical skill of Bishop Blougram is undeniable. The lyric part of the volume is, as I have said, rather deficient in the beauty and tenderness of some of his previous work; but there is a haunting minor in such pieces as Gold Hair; and all are arresting.

But side by side with the observer is the critic of life devoid of conceits, and along with these little "human documents" come Abt Vogler and Rabbi Ben Ezra. To those eager for Browning's message, Rabbi Ben Ezra is a storehouse of wise and tender sayings, and when coupled with the swifter force and intensity of Prospice, gives us, along with Ferishtah's Fancies, the most intelligible expression of Browning's moral outlook on life that we possess.

With this volume the first period of Browning's work as a poet may be said to close. We know the quality of his genius, but have not yet gauged its depth.

The Ring and the Book (1869) shows Browning at once as an observer and a critic of life, in his earlier work he had alternately given us the observer and the critic, had presented himself primarily as a thinker, or primarily as a singer. Here, the thinker and the poet join hands in a work of lengthy and sustained importance. It is psychological, pictorial, analytical, dramatic, satiric, tragic, and the only side of Browning that finds no expression is the purely lyrical side. But to compensate for this there is the superb apostrophe to "Lyric Love, half angel and half bird, and all a wonder and a wild desire", a passionate recollection of the wife he had lost.

The story—a Roman murder case—is told in twelve books and from nine points of view. It was found on one stormy night in Florence (1865) in "a square old yellow book," and was picked up for eightpence from a bookstall. And from this rough one he wrought a ring of pure gold.

In its externals this powerful dramatic study is as unlike Pippa Passes, with its lyrical graces, as is a rose from a bluebell, but its central motive has remarkable points of similarity. In each case youth and innocence are the mainspring of the action. The very goodness of Pompilia incenses Guido and drives him to the murder. Her goodness transforms Caponsacchi, shaming the weaker side and bringing uppermost his essential nobility; it gained the sympathy of the populace, and wins over at last the genial onlooker. Pompilia, like Pippa, by her very helplessness and transparent candour, puts to rout the evil forces brought to bear upon her. As with Pippa also, it is an unconscious influence, it symbolises triumphant purity against base passion. The hideousness of Guido's conduct is finely suggested by the Pope in his analysis of the crime:

'For the main criminal I have no hope
Except in such a suddenness of fate
I stood at Naples once, a night so dark,
I could have scarce conjectured there was earth
Anywhere, sky or sea or world at all
But the night's black was burst through by a blaze—
Thunder struck blow on blow, earth groaned and bore,
Through her whole length of mountain visible
There lay the city thick and plain with spires,
And, like a ghost disshrouded, white the sea
So may the truth be flashed out by one blow,
And Guido see, one instant, and be saved."

In Browning's next work, Balaustion's Adventure (1871), there is less dramatic interest and passion, less fine poetry also. None the less it is memorable for its vital and appealing figure of the Greek girl with her quick prehensile intelligence and strength of character.

Prince Hohenstuel-Schwangau (1871), on the other hand, has little claim to be ranked as poetry at all. It is a picture of Napoleon III, whom Browning did not admire, from the standpoint of the special pleader. If worth doing at all, which is debatable, it had been better done in prose.

Fine art the Fair (1872) is a very different piece of work, despite the fact that here too there is over-much special pleading. But there is fantasy and pathos in it, as well as satiric and ingenious quibbling. It is by no means easy to construe, and as it has proved a stumbling-block to many Browning lovers, some detailed consideration of it may prove interesting. It has been called by many able critics a defence of inconstancy, and such a description can be defended on plausible grounds. But is this really the crux of the poem? Let us see.

The man in the story presented is unquestionably attached to his wife Elvire, and has no wish to surrender her for any other woman. But he is attracted by other women, and is frankly unwilling to have only one feminine influence in his life. He is quite willing for his wife to be the chief influence. She may reign as queen, yet he sees no reason why, quite openly and without underhand scheming, he may not smile at and wile away an hour or so amusingly with other women.

Strolling through the Fair he has noticed a handsome, vivacious rope-dancer, Ffine. He admires her, though he is by no means swept off his feet. He can criticise her acutely enough, but wishes to talk to her. His wife, not unnaturally, is jealous. Only five minutes, pleads the man, so "thirteen no fairwell." Five minutes does not exhaust the interest, so husband and wife drift apart.

The motto from Don Juan used by the poet is misleading. The husband is not a Don Juan, he is merely a man of no deep-rooted feelings who loves change. The poem therefore is a plea for variety rather than inconstancy, for amorous dalliance rather than for deliberate unfaithfulness. He is not a bad man, but a weak man, and despite his clever defence, somewhat of a trifler. Yet the arguments he uses are in themselves not only ingenious but of some challenging significance. To put it brutally, he is a more satisfactory amorist than husband. Is it not wise to extend our emotional experience of life? May not love and admiration for one woman be intensified by a circle of lesser and inferior likings? Is a man to have no other feminine influences in his life save that of his wife? His wife sees the weak spot in his armoury of logic. Would you be talking like this, she says in effect, if Ffine had not been a pretty girl? And we know that he would not.

Red Cotton Night-Cap Country, or, Turf and Towers (1873), is a story thrown into monologue with Normandy as a background. The tale, founded on fact, is in essence a study in sensuality, and though related with power and psychological insight, has little poetic beauty to relieve its fundamental squalor.

In Aristophanes' Apology (1875), Browning returns to Balaustion after her marriage and incidentally gives us a spirited and vigorous (though not flattering) picture of Aristophanes.

The poem illustrates the poet's scholarship rather than his power as a literary artist. Indeed for a while he seems to have deliberately neglected the standpoint of the artist.

The Inn Album (1875) is little more than a realistic study of the uglier aspects of life, abundantly clever, but roughly and grotesquely handled.

In Pacchiarotto (1876) he defends his method.

Fidelity to life he pleads. The human note above everything. The human note counts for a great deal certainly, but if beauty of treatment be excluded we travel outside the range of art, and poetry loses its justification.

"Mine be Man's thoughts, loves, hates."

Thus does he fling down his challenge. Certainly virility and sincerity are to be heartily desired, and much Victorian literature suffers from its absence. But does this debar the touch of beauty and transfiguring passion? His best work shows that it does not. Sweetness and light are not mutually antagonistic. It is quite possible to deal frankly and fearlessly with life's actualities as an artist without descending to the methods of the stump orator or the pamphleteer.

This aspect of Browning's work, then, is negligible, says the impatient student. Not so. Nothing with force, originality, and thought in it is negligible. It is good to read for its searching analysis—only read it as you read prose, not poetry; it is good to read for its light on the strength and weakness of Browning's genius; it is good to read as showing the pitfalls of the poetic observer. Finally, it is good to read because, by force of contrast, you enjoy the greater moments of Browning the more intensely.

In this very volume, Pacchiarotto, there are a handful of lyrics, not of the best, but with something of the old magic, and certainly delightful.

La Sainuz: The Two Poets of Croisic (1878), is a bright and amusing piece of work in the Byronic vein, but without Byron's ease and clarity—and details a hoax played on Voltaire by an unsuccessful poet. Perhaps the best stanza in the poem is the one on Sorrow:

"So, force is sorrow, and each sorrow, force"

In the Dramatic Idyls (1879-80) there is once again the lack of beauty that spoils so much of Browning's later work. The most interesting of these is Mulékch, an Arabian tale.

In Jocoseria (1883) there are reminders once again of the author of the Dramatic Lyrics and Romances, notably the lovely song, "Never the tune and the place," which is redolent of the old magic.

Browning's turbid period is now practically at an end.

In Ferishtah's Fancies (1884) we pass with relief into the clear sunshine, and although the allegories of Ferishtah the Dervish are over dialectical for verse, they are interesting contributions to his religious philosophy, and are agreeably lightened by the graceful and melodious snatches of song.

Parleyings with Certain People (1887) has a forbidding title, but, if less poetical than Ferishtah, has a certain freshness and rhythmic swing that give it a greater attractiveness than such things as The Inn Album and its contemporaries.

There are no such times as when

"Morning's laugh sets all the crags alight
Above the baffled tempest . . ."

Then with Asolando (1889) the youth and age of Browning meet. The philosopher is forgotten, the dialectics put aside; we have once again, and to the last time, the passionate singer and the poet of human hopes, fears, loves, and sorrows. It would be idle to pretend that there is all the old charm about it, but it is a fine volume with which to round off the poet's life, with a note of confident courage that gives us the dominant note of Browning at his best.

Browning's Threefold Appeal

There are three Brownings: Browning the passionate singer of love and youth and the world of sense; Browning the curious investigator of the devious by-ways of human experience; Browning the intrepid fighter and valiant beholder in the imperishable greatness of the soul of man.

Each has attracted its little coterie of admirers—and, in his own day at any rate, the last aspect of Browning proved arresting.

I cannot help feeling that Browning has suffered by the over-insistence of many critics on the ethical and religious aspects of his work. Not that it is negligible, nor that he does not give us that side of a poet's nature, but it has not the tremendous importance arrogated to it by a number of his admirers. We have hurried the poor man into canonicals, and regarded his work as a series of texts for reverent exegesis, thereby losing sight of the undubitably greater side of Browning's genius, the rich concrete humanity. Of the three Brownings, as revealed in his poetry, the first seems to me not merely of the greatest artistic value but of the greatest human value; the other sides of him are interesting in a subsidiary sense, as giving body and subtlety to his superior gift of dramatic song, and informing his lyric passion with virile courage and sunny radiance. But when he leans exclusively on his psychological power it often leads him into subtleties and complexities that mar his poetic art, and into subjects that are better treated in prose than in verse.

Similarly, when he is drawn into religious dialectics, he may prove suggestive as a theologian and philosopher, but not with the imaginative suggestion of the poet. And, while fully alive to the vigour and acuteness of his thought on the fundamental problems of life, I do not find in them that illuminating power which so many admirers of Browning as a teacher discover in them. But on this point something more will be said later.

Let me emphasize here once again (as it appears to me) the most vital and compelling side of Browning's genius—Browning the dramatic singer of Love and Life.

The Singer of Love

We shall find a more delicate grace in Tennyson, a more voluptuous intensity in Rossetti, an easier sweep in Byron, a more ideal beauty in Shelley, but in no one poet is there a more complete fusion of all these qualities than in Browning. The mystic side of passion is suggested tenderly and wistfully in Evelyn Hope, more fully in Two in the Campagna. In both, love is an ideal as well as a present actuality, and being an ideal its satisfaction is ever incomplete—"infinite passion and the pain of finite hearts that yearn"—hence the divine restlessness of the human heart. The elusiveness of love is more fancifully dealt with in Love in a Life and Life in a Love.

'Escape me ?
Never—
Beloved !
While I am I, and you are you,
So long as the world contains us both,
Me the loving and you the luth,
While the one eludes, must the other pursue."

LOVE IN A LIFE

I

Room after room,
I hunt the house through
We inhabit together,
Heart, fear nothing, for, heart, thou shalt find her—
Next time, herself !—not the trouble behind her
Left in the curtain, the couch's perfume !
As she brushed it, the cornice-wreath blossomed anew—
You looking-glass gleamed at the wave of her feather.

II

Yet the day wears,
And door succeeds door
I try the fresh fortune—
Range the wide house from the wing to the centre
Still the same chance ! she goes out as I enter
Spent my whole day in the quest,—who cares ?
But 'tis twilight, you say— with such suites to explore,
Such closets to search, such alcoves to importune !

The lover is always seeking for the loved one throughout the rooms of the house, never finding, yet the pursuit itself gives a meaning and purpose to life.

Again, in Rudel to the Lady of Tripoli the troubadour never sees the lady. Is she not a beautiful dream of his own making ? But the dream encompasses his life and art none the less. Love for love's sake.

Love is so compelling, so transforming that no quarrel can withstand it ! That is the burden of A Lover's Quarrel. A chance word, an idle exclamation, has caused a separation.

"Woman, and will you cast
For a word, quite off at last
Me, your own, your You,—
Since, as truth is true,
I was You all the happy past—
Me do you leave aglaze
With the memories we amassed "

But it will come right. She must return. Of that he is confident.

"So, she'd efface the score,
And forgive me as before
Just at twelve o'clock
I shall hear her knock
In the worst of a storm's uproar,
I shall pull her through the door,
I shall have her for evermore "

For, as he tells us in Natural Magic, Love is the great magician, clothing the bareness of earth with the glory of summer.

"All I can sing is—I feel it !
'This life was as blank as that room :
I let you pass in here ! Precaution, indeed ?
Walls, ceiling and floor—not a chance for a weed !

Wide opens the entrance. where's cold now, where's gloom ?

No May to sow seed here, no June to reveal it,
Behold you enshrined in these blooms of your bringing,
These fruits of your bearing—nay, birds of your winging !
A fairy tale. Only—I feel it ! "

In a Gondola and The Last Ride have the same tragic note, the same complete surrender to love that we find in Romeo and Juliet. So in Too Late and kindred poems we are made to feel the loss that comes of spurned and neglected love.

'But, dead ! All's done with wait who may,
Watch and wear and wonder who will
Oh, my whole life that ends to day !
Oh, my soul's sentence, sounding still
'The woman is dead that was none of me,
And the man that was none of her—may go !'
There's only the past left—worry that !
Wreak like a bull, on the empty coat,
Rage, its late wearer is laughing at !
'Tear the collar to rags, having unseal his throat,
Strike stupidly on—'This, this and this,
What I would that a bosom received the blow !'

If it would only come over again !
—Tune to be patient with me, and probe
This heart till you punctured the proper vein,
Just to learn what blood is—itch the robe
From that blank lay-figure your fancy draped
Prick the leathern heart till the—verses—part !
And late it was easy, late, you walked
Where a friend might meet you, Edith's name
Arose to one's lip if one laughed or talked,
If I heard good news, you heard the same
When I woke I knew that your breath escaped,
I could hide my time, keep alive, alert "

This is the subject not only of lyric treatment, as in My Star, but is painted strongly and brilliantly in The Inn Album. Rhapsodical love is expressed in The Flower's Name and Women and Roses, though Tennyson's greater melodic beauty gives more charm to this particular phase of love. There is a certain virile impatience about Browning's love making that ill accords with those elemental embroideries of speech with which Tennyson was so adept. His lovers do not invest with adorning sensibilities the flowers in the garden, as did Maud's lover. To Browning's lovers the flowers are just pretty things to catch the approving eye of the mistress, while he is musing over them he remarks.

"Here's the garden she walked across,
Arm in my arm, such a short while since "

To Browning's lover the lady is not desirable because she is the incarnation of feminine loveliness, as in The Day Dream or The Miller's Daughter, she is desirable because she is the woman—her very imperfections only endear her the more.

"And your mouth—there was never, to my mind,
Such a funny mouth, for it woul' not shut
And she dented chin too—what a chin !
There were certain ways when you spoke, some words
That you know you never could pronounce "

How few poets have written thus ?—so superficially unromantic, so deeply tender and vital !

In James Lee's Wife we have a study in the caprices of love. This is really a novel in verse. He is handsome and stolid, she is plain and imaginative. She calls them ideals, he would call them whims. She wants to convert him to her view of life, he is satisfied to be as he is. So in disappointment she leaves him. She still loves him, but feels that life together as things stand would be intolerable. He is quite willing to be left. With the ethics of the case Browning does not deal. He is merely the poet, the psychologist. It would have been interesting to have heard the husband's point of view also.

Some have been surprised that one whose own love story was so complete and satisfying should dwell in his poetry so often on thwarted and imperfect love. Why? Surely it was the consciousness of the dynamic splendour of love on life and character that gave him that keen perception of what is lost by debasing or trifling with love. And a motto for his love poetry might be found in the beautiful stanza from By the Fire-side—one of the noblest and truest he ever wrote:

"Oh, the little more and how much it is!
And the little less, and what worlds away!
How a sound shall quicken content to bliss,
Or a breath suspend the blood's best play,
And life be a proof of this!"

Sometimes it is the man who fails, as in Dis Alliter Visum.

" . . . You fool, for all
Your lore! Who made things plain in vain?
What was the sea for? What, the grey
Sad church, that solitary day,
Crosses and graves and swallows' call?"

Sometimes the woman, as in The Worst of It, where the tender tolerance and forgiveness of outraged love is brought out with fine clarity:

"Would it were I had been false, not you!
I that am nothing, not you that are all
I, never the worse for a touch or two
On my speckled ludo, not you, the pride
Of the day, my swan, that a first fleck's fall
On her wonder of white must unswan, undo!"

So we return to our early postulate.

Certain aspects of love have been more finely rendered by other poets, but in range of matter Browning has no superior. There are abysses of tragic horror, agonies of sense and spirit, at which he took no more than a glimpse. It was not in his nature to dwell on them. His splendid vitality and buoyant hopefulness recoiled from them. His art as a poet of love suffers limitations to that extent, but the underlying inspiration is the greater. For his outlook on love is the outlook of a man who puts it in front of any other thing in life, as a force for sanctifying and strengthening the soul.

The Psychologist

As the psychological critic of the complexities of experience, let it frankly be conceded that here he has not always chosen the best means of expression, that the verse hampers the exposition and obscures the criticism; yet the matter is strong and stimulating enough—if we care to get at it.

Sometimes, as in a Blougram or St Praxed's, the art is not neglected. Putting these aside as presenting little difficulty to the ordinary intellectual reader, we may note Caliban, a peculiarly interesting poem, for it shows the affinity between Browning and the great Elizabethans. Shakespeare gave us the problem in his own direct, vivid way. Browning lets his modern analytic mind play over it, and we have the "inside" of the subject. The thoughts of primitive man about the universe—compare with Shudge—primitive man in another aspect. Browning is scarcely fair to Spiritualism, but he certainly exposes with fine acumen a good deal of the trickery and confusion of thought that is accepted as gospel by credulous natures, and shows how little is the care for veracity of which Huxley made so much.

It is impossible in this brief retrospect to deal adequately with the great wealth of Browning's pictures of human nature; but in the four poems just alluded to his powers are employed to the fullest extent, and the key to all may be found in How it Strikes a Contemporary, where the poet—the only poet the speaker ever knew—"took such cognizance of men and things"—"scenting the world looking it full in face." This is the secret of the poet's insight; he does not merely glance at the life about him, he "takes cognizance." The psychologist is at work in the early poems, not with complete success, in the dramas with finer insight and mastery, in The Ring and the Book his power as psychologist is supreme. What gives him this insight? Observation—patient, critical, thoughtful observation. To a great extent yes, not entirely. Once again, it is his belief in love that gives the touch of greatness to these studies. When passion is absent, or is put aside, the insight into character is less profound, less illuminating. Thus may be seen by glancing at his poems on art. Their importance does not lie in the poet's sensibility to beauty. Response as to what is beautiful in life is the ground of every poet worth his salt. Some, like Spenser and Keats and Rossetti, made it their creed, their religion.

Browning ignored the senses no more than did Keats. He gloried in the form of things, he revelled in the delights of sound, sight, and touch—but he went further.

We approach the truth of things by way of enjoyment, and having gained insight by sheer enjoyment of the outward show we intensify our vision by relating enjoyment to character, by relating the beautiful thing with the soul of the man who made it a beautiful thing. It is no slight testimony to the range of Browning's powers that the man who so often ignored beauty of form himself should know so much about it, but we shall cease to be surprised when we remember that the analyst of modern ethical and religious problems is also the poet of the Renaissance and its glories, and the critical interpreter of Greek life and thought.

I say the critical interpreter, because Browning's sympathies with Greek art are limited. The Greek succeeded, he thought, up to a point splendidly. But the success was limited because it was so perfect. What is perfect dies. The painters of the Renaissance aspired beyond painting man as he is; and though in their technique they lacked the perfection and harmony of Greek art, they were greater because of their very imperfection and crudeness

I do not defend this view. I think it arguable: but this is not the place to discuss it. It is Browning's view, and presented with great charm in Andrea del Sarto. Art is no abstraction—thin, arid, and theoretic. It must be warmed by life, that is the burden of Fra Lippo Lippi. Clearly, there is no art for art's sake with Browning but art for life's sake, and in art as elsewhere, love and self-surrender are essentials for success, there alone can the individual find the highest expression of love, can make even the Grammarian's specialised task something other than a mere by-way of scholarship, make of it a great adventure.

In each of the full length studies of artists he has made he hints at something lacking. Pictor Ignotus needed human affection, Lippo needed life and experience to give fulness to his work, Andrea, some great impulse of generous emotion. In art as elsewhere Browning is jealous of the individual, and the art is judged for its reaction on the character of the artist as well as for its expression of his nature. Honourable failure Browning treats lightly. Life is meant for venture. We must dare the open seas, not hug the land. The great thing is aspiration. Aspiration is fed by love. In Youth and Art you have the link that binds the lyricist of passion with the critic of art in the story of the sculptor and the singer, who, caring more for their art than for love, injured both.

Especially interesting in a personal way are the poems where Browning defends his own methods as an artist;—in the later portion of Packard's, where he gently replies to critics of his "harsh analytics," and declines to cut down poetry to the quality of a "Banjo Byron", however, if they merely want a tune—give it them! Elsewhere, in the Epilogue, he warns readers his brew is still strong rather than sweet, but if strong it grows mellow with age. Anyhow he gives of his best, his vineyard is "Man's thoughts, loves, hates!"

No consideration of Browning's psychology of art can neglect the poems relating to music. They are not so obviously attractive as those on painting, but in several cases are subtler and more convincing. Browning was a musician, and had therefore the advantage of thoroughly understanding the technique of the art, as well as valuing its emotional content. Music more than painting appeals to the emotions. It is the most potent, direct, and popular of all the arts.

To take two of the most important. Master Hughes of Saxe Gotha and Abt Vogler. In the first, dealing with a fugue, life itself is criticised from the standpoint of the fugue. Now the fugue is a form of music constructed on logical lines, the various parts are elaborated from a simple theme, where they answer one another, pursue one another, contrast with one another. Arabesques in sound in place of patterns. A seeming confusion of sounds with a definite theme running through.

Such a type of music is music on its least emotional side. It is the only side where intellectual content seems to dominate purely emotional values. It is the mathematics of the art, rather than its poetry. What relation has the great fugue to life? What does it answer? Well, take it as a symbol of life.

The simple, elemental start, the growing variations, the clashing implications, the bewildering convolutions, and the line—death. It suggests life has no meaning. Give us then less technical cleverness, more passion, says the poet, read some meaning into life. Life is no mere game of calisthenics. Take it as a poet's mood rather than a serious criticism of the fugue. Yet it has its value, and there are touches of grotesque humour in the poem that are highly amusing.

Abt Vogler is a greater work. It is Browning's fullest exposition of music in its relation to life, and it has a musical cadence lacking in its fellow. The Alexandrines, with their rich swell, suggest the organ.

Vogler was born at Wurzburg about 1750. He was a brilliant musician and a thinker also, becoming a priest in 1775, he travelled widely, did much to improve the organ, and was a splendid executant—especially as extemporiser. Weber and Meyerbeer were his pupils.

In the poem he is extemporising and is carried away by his ecstasy. Can he not bring down heaven to earth, and suffuse the soul with the glow of high ideals. In the spell of music the spirit ceases to be bound to a particular environment, to be "cribbled, cabined, and confined," to earthly conditions, it is lost in the universal.

Yet how simple are the elements of music. This he shows us by taking the simple chord, adding certain notes, and you get, what—a harmony, that is in itself a mystery. . . . "a star of the eternal sky."

But the music dies away, so too its momentary thrill. Everything is for a moment, then fades—but does it fade? No, nothing good really passes away, it leaves behind it the message of what might and will be. The music made by our lives is never wasted. The thinker despairs, but the musician knows that even discords are wanted to make full harmony. So let us get back from the heights of emotion to sober common-sense, and experience blended with warm confidence in the future—with "the C major of this life."

I have dwelt purposely on the matter rather than the manner of Browning, as singer and psychologist, because it is always the matter that he puts first and foremost. But it will be found on examination that although he is a poetic artist only by accident—because he could not help himself—he is at his best when he is faithful to the art of poetry, at his best when he is the singer of love and life. At his worst when he is concerned with the intellectual and ethical aspects of his subject, and roughly neglects the artistic shaping.

In his great poems, Browning the singer, the thinker and the fighter join hands. We touch each side of him, each three personalities. As a fighter and a moralist then we may leave him, that is his last word as a poet. And he is best appreciated here, when we do not divorce the teacher from the singer and the psychologist. His message is part of his song; the burden of his night. He has no formal message—"no church, no philosophy"—in the technical sense, how far the religious trend of his work conforms to the theology of any particular church or sect, may well be left outside this brief discussion. It is a more complicated question than many think, especially with a dramatic poet like Browning, who revels in putting all conceivable positions, and as a proof of the debatable character of this problem it may be said that even among his friends there was great difference on this subject. Whatever view we take here, there is no question as to the fundamental attitude of his mind. Making all allowances for his dramatic exposition of other people's points of view, there can be little question, from what we know of the man, that in Rabbi Ben Ezra we have the most explicit statement of Browning's philosophy of life.

Rabbi Ben Ezra is an epitome of many poems: it is life from the standpoint of age. In youth we gain experience, in age we use it to control our nature. What use has youth been—with its heats, its mistakes, its strivings? It has helped us to forgo our spiritual weapons. It has shown us that not accomplishment but intention, not the outward result but the inward aim is the real test of worth. The pitcher is now shaped on the wheel—and is ready for what? For a future—that is beyond this life. For can death waste all our experience? This leads to a discussion of immortality, beyond our scope here.

Briefly, his position is this. Nature offers no solution, she is both good and bad. She is unmoral. Destiny gives no help, for goodness suffers neglect and the evil are often rewarded. Look outside and see only the great enigmas. There is no certainty anywhere. Revelation provides no passport—for religions are various, and there are more discords than harmonies in the Church.

No, for a reading of life go to your own soul. Your faith, if it is to be worth anything, must be your own intuition, it must be the voice of your own soul speaking. Distrust your own soul—and you are on a rudderless boat, drifting out to sea. Trust, if it does not tell you where you are going, it will at any rate tell you how. It may not give the meaning of life, but it affords a meaning to life. For the test of life is spiritual development. Whatever enriches the experience, favours aspiration, gives strength to the heart and mind is good and to be used by us whether conventionally sanctioned or no. That which enervates, paralyses, deadens, is bad—and must be put aside.

For all his writings are experimental studies in spiritual experience: whether he deals with love, or patriotism, or intellectual ambition, or artistic passion, or religious aspiration, it is all brought to one common denominator—its effect upon character, its value in the making of the soul. This is his aim, as the method and form which he adopted to formulate his aim. He deals with spiritual experience in two ways: as a dramatic apologist, and as a dramatic singer. He will flame out in a single mood, and throw all his imaginative power and beauty into that mood; or he will disentangle for you half a dozen moods, and put them before you, for your intellectual appreciation. But whatever method he adopts, he supplies the key, lest you, deafened by the babel of tongues

Confusing as life may be, bewildering in its mingling of good and evil, the lovely and the ugly of despair and hopefulness, it must be fought through; we must not pick and choose, nor elect more the sunny side of the road, but take every thing. Work . . . yes, and work means work out. Only by testing and using errors can you realise they are errors. If they are errors, they will crumble of themselves. Only by experience can we wring knowledge from ignorance.

A sound workaday criterion, and assuredly a buoyant and virile one:

"Man—creeps over on from fancies to the fact,
And in this striving . . .
Finds progress . . .
Man's distinctive mark alone."

Browning's philosophy of life is essentially what we should call to-day pragmatic. Is your view a sound one? Act as if it were. Put it to the test of practical experience—that is the only reliable criterion. This roughly is what he says in effect. For the rest, Browning's sanguine temperament led him naturally to look at the brighter side of things, while his splendid vitality made of him a spiritual knight-errant, delighting in the possibilities of conflict, and never so happy as when engaged in some moral or intellectual 'scrap'. This is the secret of his optimism: a remarkably good blood supply and a natural taste for essaying the high impossible things of life. Unlike some spiritual voyagers in our literature, he never hugged the shore, but sailed for the open, loving the salt sting of the buffeting waves. A courageous soul, and a vigorous and vital comrade for those suffering from spiritual anæmia.

CONFESSIONS

What is he buzzing in my ears?

"Now that I come to die
Do I view the world as a vale of tears?"
Ah, reverend sir, not I!

What I viewed there once, what I view again
Where the physic bottles stand
On the table's edge,—is a suburb lane,
With a wall to my bedside hand

That lane sloped, much as the bottles do,
From a house you could descry
O'er the garden-wall is the curtain blue
Or green to a healthy eye?

To mine, it serves for the old June weather
Blue above lane and wall,
And that farthest bottle labelled 'Ether'
Is the house o'topping all

At a terrace, somewhere near the stopper,
There watched for me, one June,
A girl I know, sir, it's improper,
My poor mind's out of tune

Only, there was a way . . . you crept
Close by the side, to dodge
Eyes in the house, two eyes except:
They styled their house 'The Lodge.'

What right had a lounge up their lane?

But, by creeping very close,
With the good wall's help,—their eyes might strain
And stretch themselves to Oes,

Yet never catch her and me together,
As she left the attic, there,
By the rim of the bottle labelled "Ether,"
And stole from stair to stair,

And stood by the rose-wreathed gate. Alas,
We loved, sir—used to meet
How sad and bad and mad it was—
But then, how it was sweet !

THE CONFESSORIAL

It is a lie—their Priests, their Pope,
Their Saints, their all they fear or hope
Are lies, and lies—there ! through my door
And ceiling, there ! and walls and floor,
There, lies, they lie—shall still be hurled
Till spite of them I reach the world !

You think Priests just and holy men !
Before they put me in this den
I was a human creature too,
With flesh and blood like one of you,
A girl that laughed in beauty's pride
Like lies in your world outside

I had a lover—shame avoant !
Thus poor wrenched body, grim and gaunt,
Was kissed all over till it burned,
By lips the truest, love e'er turned
His heart's own tint — one night they kissed
My soul out in a burning mist

So next day when the accustomed train
Of things grew round my sense again,
"That is a sin," I said — and slow
With downcast eyes to church I go,
And pass to the confession-chair,
And tell the old mild father there.

But when I falter Beltran's name,
"Ha !" quoth the father, "much I blame
The sin, yet wherefore idly grieve ?
Despair not—stronously retrieve !
Nay, I will turn this love of thine
To lawful love, almost divine,

For he is young, and led astray,
This Beltran and he schemes, men say,
To change the laws of church and state,
So thine shall be an angel's fate
Who ere the thunder breaks, should roll
Its cloud away and save his soul

"For, when he lies upon thy breast,
Thou mayst demand and be possessed
Of all his plans, and next day steal
To me, and all those plans reveal,
That I and every priest, to purge
His soul, may fast and use the scourge "

That father's beard was long and white,
With love and truth his brow seemed bright,
I went back, all on fire with joy
And, that same evening bade the boy
Tell me, as lovers should, heart-free,
Something to prove his love of me

He told me what he would not tell
For hope of heaven or fear of hell,
And I lay listening in such pride
And, soon as he had left my side,
Tripped to the church by morning-light
To save his soul in his despite.

I told the father all his schemes,
Who were his comrades, what their dreams ;
"And now make haste," I said, "to pray
The one spot from his soul away ;
To-night he comes, but not the same
Will look ! " At night he never came.

Nor next night : on the after-morn,
I went forth with a strength new-born.
The church was empty, something drew
My steps into the street, I knew
It led me to the market-place
Where, lo, on high, the father's face !

That horrible scaffold dressed,
That stapled block . . . God sink the rest !
That hood strapped back, that blinding vest,
Those knotted hands and naked breast,
Till near one busy hangman pressed,
And, on the neck these arms caressed . . .

No part in aught they hope or fear !
No heaven with them, no hell —and here,
No earth, not so much space as pens
My body in their worst of den,
But shall bear God and man my ory,
Lies—lies, again—and still, thy lie !

A GRAMMARIAN'S FUNERAL

Let us begin and carry up this corpse,
Singing together
Leave we the common crofts, the vulgar thorpes
Each to its tether
Sleeping safe on the bosom of the plain,
Cared-for till cock-crow
Look out if wonder be not day again
Running the rock-row !
That's the appropriate country, there, man's thought,
Rarer, intenser
Self gathered for an outbreak, as it ought,
Chafes in the censor
Leave we the unlettered plain its herd and crop,
Sack we sepulture
On a tall mountain, cited to the top,
Crowded with culture !
All the peaks soar, but one the rest exerts,
Clouds overcome it,
No ! yonder sparkle is the citadel's
Circling its summit
Thither our path lies, wind we up the heights
Wait ye the warning ?
Our low life was the level's and the night's,
It's for the morning
Step to a tume square chests erect the head,
Wave the beholders !
This is our master, famous calm and dead,
Borne on our shoulders

Sleep, crop and herd ! sleep, darkling thorpe and croft,
Safe from the weather !
He whom we convey to his grave aloft,
Singing together
He was a man born with thy face and throat,
Lyric Apollo !
Long he lived nameless, how should spring take note
Winter would follow !
Till lo, the little touch and youth was gone !
Cramped and diminished
Moaned he, "New measures, other feet anon !
My dance is finished !"
No, that's the world's way (keep the mountain-side
Make for the city !)
He knew the signal and stepped on with pride
Over men's pity,
Left play for work, and grappled with the world
Bent on escaping

"What's in the scroll " quoth he "thou keepest furled"
Show me their shaping.
Theirs who most studied man, the bard and sage,— Give ! "—So, he gowned him,
Straight got by heart that book to its last page .
Learned, we found him

Yea, but we found him bald too, eyes like lead,
 Accents uncertain :
 " Time to taste life," another would have said,
 " Up with the curtain !"
 This man said rather, " Actual life comes next !
 Patience a moment !"
 Grant I have mastered learning's crabbed text,
 Still there's the comment
 Let me know all ! Prate not of most or least,
 Painful or easy !
 Even to the crumbs I'd fain eat up the feast,
 Ay, nor feel queasy "
 Oh, such a life as he resolved to live,
 When he had learned it,
 When he had gathered all books had to give ;
 Sooner, he spurned it
 Image the whole, then excoüte the parts—
 Fancy the fabric
 Quite, ere you build, ere steel strike fire from quartz,
 Ere mortar dab brick !

(Here's the town gate reached there's the market-place
 (aping before us)
 Yea, this in him was the peculiar grace
 (Hearten our chorus !)
 Still before living he'd learn how to live—
 No end to learning
 Earn the means first—God surely will contrive
 Use for our earning
 Others mistrust and say, " But time escapes, Live now or never !"
 He said, " What's time ? Leave Now for dogs and apes !
 Man has Forever "
 Back to his book then deeper dropped his head :
Calculus racked him
 Leaden before, his eyes grew dross of lead
Tuana attacked him.
 " Now, master, take a little rest !"—not he !
 (Caution redoubled,
 Step two abreast, the way winds narrowly !)
 Not a whit troubled
 Back to his studies, frother than at first,
 Fierce as a dragon
 He (soul hydroptic with a sacred thirst)
 Sucked at the flagon
 Oh, if we draw a circle premature,
 He'd lose of far gain,
 Greedy for quick returns of profit, sure
 Bad is our bargain !
 Was it not great ? did not he throw on God,
 (He loves the burthen)—
 God's task to make the heavenly period
 Perfect the earthly ?
 Did not he magnify the mind, show clear
 Just what it all meant ?
 He would not discount life, as fools do here,
 Paid by instalment
 He ventured neck or nothing—heaven's success
 Found, or earth's failure
 " Wilt thou trust death or not ? " He answered " Yes :
 Hence with life's pain lure ! "

That low man seeks a little thing to do,
 Sees it and does it
 This high man, with a great thing to pursue,
 Dies ere he knows it
 That low man goes on adding one to one,
 His hundred's soon hit
 This high man, aiming at a million,
 Misses an unit.
 That, has the world hero—should he need the next,
 Let the world mind him !
 This, throws himself on God, and unperplexed
 Seeking shall find Him
 So, with the throttling hands of death at strife,
 Ground he at grammar,
 Still, thro' the rattle, parts of speech were rife :
 While he could stagger
 He settled Hos's business—let it be !—
 Properly based Oun—
 Gave us the doctrine of the enclitic De,
 Dead from the waist down
 Well, here's the platform, here's the proper place :
 Hail to your purious,
 All ye lighflutters of the feathered race,
 Swallows and curlews !
 Hero's the top-peak, the multitude below
 Live, for they can, there
 This man decided not to Live but Know—
 Bury this man there ?
 Here—here's his place, where meteors shoot, clouds form,
 Lightnings are loosened,
 Stars come and go ! Let joy break with the storm,
 Peace let the dew send !
 Lofty designs must close in like effects
 Loftily lying,
 Leave him—still loftier than the world suspects,
 Living and dying

A FACE

If one could have that little head of hers
 Painted upon a background of pale gold,
 Such as the Tuscan's early art prefers !
 No shade encroaching on the matchless mould
 Of those two lips, which should be opening soft
 In the pure profile, not as when she laughs,
 For that spoils all but rather as if aloft
 Yon hyacinth, she loves so, leaned its staff's
 Burthen of honey-coloured buds to kiss
 And capture 'twixt the lips apart for this,
 Then her litho neck, three fingers might surround,
 How it should waver on the pale gold ground
 Up to the fruit-shaped, perfect chin it lifts !
 I know, Correggio loves to mass, in rifts
 Of heaven, his angel faces orb on orb
 Breaking its outline, burning shades absorb
 But these are only massed there I should think,
 Waiting to see some wonder momentarily
 Grow out, stand full, fade slow against the sky
 (That's the pale ground you'd see this sweet face by),
 All heaven, meanwhile, condensed into one eye
 Which fears to lose the wonder, should it wink

I POETRY. DANTE GABRIEL ROSSETTI. His Life—His Work.

DANTE GABRIEL ROSSETTI (1828–1882)

HIS LIFE

GABRIEL CHARLES DANTE ROSSETTI was born in Portland Place, London, on May 12, 1828. Gabriele was his father's name, Charles his godfather's (Charles Lyell, father of the great geologist, Sir Charles Lyell). Dante was given him after Gabriele Rossetti's favourite poet. To avoid confusion with his father's name, Rossetti transposed his Christian names, dropping the appellation of Charles. Dante Gabriel was three quarters Italian, his father coming from the Adriatic coasts, his mother from Tuscany. The father was a sensitive, amiable, and richly cultured man, and "a high-principled patriot," who was proscribed by the Bourbon king, Ferdinand I, in 1821, escaped to England, and obtained an appointment as Professor of Italian in King's College, London, 1831. The mother was fond of literature, deeply religious, and a gentle and devoted wife and mother. Many years later she would say that her wish had been for an intellectual husband and family. The wish had been granted, "and I now wish there was a little less intellect in the family, so as to allow for a little more common sense."

The son at no time shared his father's political enthusiasm, indeed, he showed a marked distaste for political problems. "He heard so much in his youth of . . . Luigi Filippo that he seems to have registered a vow to leave Luigi Filippo and the other potentates of Europe and their ministers to take care of themselves." But when about fifteen he yielded to the fascination of Dante, and read eagerly all he found of the great Florentine.

In 1836 he went to a day school in Portland Place, and to King's College from 1837 till 1842.

The first distinct picture of Rossetti that presents itself is that of an affectionate, generous lad, with a partiality for rough simple folk and a dreamy, somewhat indolent nature, but at no period in his life was there anything effeminate about him. Nothing is further from the truth than the old popular notion of Rossetti and Keats, as men given up to the sensuous impressions of life. Both poets suffered from ill health, and disease sapped their powers of volition, but each had virility, grit, and splendid capacity for work. The vapid emotionalism of the æsthetic school received no encouragement from their master Rossetti, who always insisted on the necessity for fundamental craftsmanship in poetry.

Before childhood had shadowed his life, Rossetti was a breezy, genial, and delightful companion, as simple and unaffected as William Morris, and with a strain of rich humour in his nature that Morris never possessed. No man was more generous in his appreciation of others, the main question he asked of a man being, "Is he interesting?" If so, his scholarly attainments influenced Rossetti scarcely at all, and his social position not in the least.

Bent on becoming an artist, he was sent in 1842 to a drawing academy in Bloomsbury; afterwards to the Antique School of the Royal Academy, in 1846.

The second picture that detaches itself from Rossetti's biography is that of the earnest young art student with masses of brown hair, a fine forehead, deep-set blue flashing eyes, and an imperious chin. This is the young enthusiast who wrote in 1848 to that queer-tempered man of genius, Ford Madox Brown, begging to be a pupil. Brown accepted him with a few laconic words, but damped his ardour by setting him to paint pickle jars. It was characteristic of Rossetti that he should have worked hard during three years, but was impatient of instruction, following out his own methods.

Open-hearted and genial as a rule, he was subject, as men of his temperament are, to fits of abstraction and social aloofness. The one constant quality in those years is the insatiable love of romantic literature. He was always a great, not a wide, reader. Science, history, philosophy attracted him little, but legendary romance, whether in prose or verse, appealed to him profoundly, and thus mediæval literature generally held him in thrall.

He loved Shelley and Keats, especially Keats, and in 1847 took to his heart the Browning of Pauline, Paracelsus, and Bells and Pomegranates.

The "pickle jar" episode had damped slightly Rossetti's artistic ardour, and it was doubtful for a time whether he should definitely take up art or literature. During the year 1848, however, he became acquainted with two academy students, Holman Hunt and John Everett Millais, and this acquaintanceship proved the starting-point of the famous Pre-Raphaelite Brotherhood.

In 1848 an association was established by three young painters—Dante Gabriel Rossetti, John Everett Millais, and William Holman Hunt—called the "Pre-Raphaelite Brotherhood." As the name suggests, this brotherhood identified themselves artistically with the painters before Raphael, the early Florentines—e.g. Giotto, Bellini, Fra Angelico—for they found in the work of these artists an individuality and sincerity alien to the art of Raphael's successors. Even the faults of this earlier school had for the brotherhood a special charm, and the crude drawing and faulty perspective enchanted them just as the naïveté and roughness of the old ballads enchant the scholar.

But it must not be thought that the school aimed entirely at reproducing all the characteristics of their work. It was the spirit rather than the letter at which they were aiming, although undoubtedly in some there was a tendency to reproduce the defects as well as the merits.

The occasion of the founding of the brotherhood was a book of engravings which Hunt and Rossetti saw at Millais' house, of certain Italian frescoes—the same frescoes as had impressed Keats and Leigh Hunt.

About this time Ruskin in his Modern Painters had protested against the academic traditions which kept young artists making school copies of Raphael. Pre-Raphaelism put this protest into a practical form. Madox Brown, who was not in the movement, none the less was of it, and worked according to its principles.

The art side of the movement has no immediate concern for us, since it belongs to the history of painting, not of literature, but one or two characteristics common to both the pictorial and literary side of their work may be commented upon. The first is the extreme attention to realistic detail.

The Pre-Raphaelites painted their pictures as in frescoes or mosaic work, finishing each portion with elaborate care. "Every Pre-Raphaelite landscape background," declared Ruskin "is painted to the last touch in the open air from the thing itself. Every Pre-Raphaelite figure, however studied in expression is a true portrait of some living person. Every minute accessory is painted in the same manner." This unflinching realism characterises the earlier work of Rossetti, but later on he gave fuller scope to his imagination.

Millais soon broke away from Pre-Raphaelite orthodoxy. Though inferior to Hunt in elaboration of detail, and to Rossetti in imaginative power, he became the most popular of them all through sheer cleverness.

Another characteristic of the movement was its love of symbolism. This is a mediæval note, and Rossetti learnt its secret from Dante. In Dante's Dream the strown poppies are emblematic of sleep and death, an expiring lamp symbolises the extinction of life, while a white cloud borne away by angels—the departing soul of Beatrice.

While, however, Rossetti, the master and mind of the movement, was challenging public criticism by his novel methods, he was at the same time writing a good deal of his best poetry, notably The Brude's Prelude, Sister Helen, A Last Confession, Jenny, and The Burden of Nineveh. This divided interest, however interesting artistically, has serious practical drawbacks, for it encumbered Rossetti in his professional work as a painter, and in 1852 we find him declaring that he had abandoned poetry. Some of his verse was published in the Magazine of the Brotherhood—another of Rossetti's ideas. This was called The Germ, it was published monthly, contained contributions from Coventry Patmore, Christina Rossetti, and others, and in its columns Rossetti's Blessed Damozel first saw the light.

In 1854 Ruskin's warm encouragement of the Pre-Raphaelites had led to a friendship between him and the founder, but both men were too strongly individualistic for any considerable companionship. Ruskin was Rossetti's senior by ten years, and the young man resented the authoritative manner of the art critic. As he preferred to follow his own lines, Ruskin called him "a con-coated monkey," and told him he did whatever he liked, "just as puppies and tom-tits did." Rossetti took these railings good-humouredly, but went his own way.

At this moment, when the obscure artist was becoming a well-known personality, the figure of Elizabeth Siddall struck across his path. Few famous attachments are better known than that of the tall, beautiful shop-girl, with pale blue eyes and coppery golden hair, and the ardent young painter.

She was barely seventeen when a mutual friend, Deverell, was captivated by her beauty, seen by chance in a bonnet shop in London. He arranged, through her mother, for the girl to have sittings for a picture he was painting, "The Duke with Viola." In that picture Rossetti appears as the Jester, the girl herself as Viola.

Quiet, even reserved in manner, dignified in bearing, and singularly sweet in disposition, she attracted young Rossetti, who had hitherto owned no mistress but his art. In 1851 they became engaged, and the importance of this attachment upon his work, both as a painter and poet, cannot well be over-estimated.

Herself no mean artist, she displayed a remarkable measure of poetical invention in her drawings; and it is said that her methods even affected Rossetti's own work. Unhappily she was frail in constitution, and in 1853 a consumptive tendency showed itself. Her lover thus wrote to her in 1854: "It seems hard to me when I look at her sometimes, working, or too ill to work, and think how many without one tithe of her genius or greatness of spirit have granted to them abundant health and opportunity to labour through the little they can do or will do."

Rossetti was in no position to marry her at the time, and the engagement dragged on in a somewhat unsatisfactory way. In 1860, his circumstances unimproving, he married her at Hastings, but she steadily declined in health, and her death, owing to an overdose of laudanum, probably only anticipated by a few months what must have happened.

Deeply affected by his wife's tragic death, the burial of his manuscript poems in his wife's grave was an act sufficiently significant of Rossetti's state of mind. The poems, he told his friends, had often been written when she was suffering and when he might have been attending to her, and he felt, what was certainly true, that his artistic preoccupation had taken him away from his home far more than was right or necessary. As a matter of fact, Rossetti was never framed for domesticity, and the union was fated to be a failure from the first. Men of his type make satisfying lovers but poor husbands. There was something peculiarly fitting in this passionate act of self-abnegation, when he placed the work of his imagination between the cheek and the hair of his dead wife.

Love had come and gone; sorrow had entered Rossetti's soul and clouded his naturally happy disposition. But the vitality of the man was so great that its shadow soon faded to a mere speck, and the years that followed saw Rossetti at the height of his power as an artist and of his attractive magnetism as a man.

Between 1860 and 1870 he was at his prime. He took 16 Cheyne Walk, Chelsea, and had first for his tenants—for the house was a large, old-fashioned one—Swinburne, George Meredith, and Mr. William Rossetti. This remarkable partnership soon came to an end, for, however delightful as a companion, Rossetti's Bohemian habits were trying as a housemate. Among his friends were Burne-Jones, who regarded him with affection and awe, and William Morris, whose strong personality was for a time almost obsessed by Rossetti. There could be no better tribute to his personal charm and influence than the attitude of a vigorous, independent soul such as that of Morris.

Rossetti popularised at this period the collecting of china and bric-à-brac and old furniture. Another taste, too eclectic to become popular, was his passion for curious animals. A wombat slept over the dinner-table, a zebu in the garden proved too exciting an acquisition and was sent away, but visitors could cheer themselves with watching the respective habits of a kangaroo, a deer, and a chameleon. Among his amusing letters at this time the wombat occupies an important place. For instance, after casually referring to Troy Town as his "best thing," he refers to the wombat as "a joy, a triumph, a delight, a madness." On one occasion Rossetti told Browning that he wanted an elephant. "What on earth would you do with it?" inquired Browning. "Teach him to clean the windows," retorted Rossetti blithely, "and people will say, 'Who lives there?'" "Oh! a painter, Rossetti!"—then they will come in and buy my pictures."

In 1870 the famous painter becomes the famous poet. To many his poems had been familiar for many years, and men like Swinburne and Morris had been impressed by their distinctive individuality. During the late 'sixties the poetic impulse came strongly upon him, and although his health was beginning to fail at this time, his imagination had never been more active. He wrote The Stream's Secret a haunting piece of melody, re-wrote from memory some of his earlier poems, and, at the urgent request of his friends, gave permission for the MS poems to be exhumed, since much of his verse was forgotten beyond recall. The temptation to yield to solertations, in these circumstances, was great, but one would have respected the man more had he left alone the grave and its secrets.

Be that as it may, the poems were transcribed and published, and received with a chorus of enthusiastic praise, led by his friends Swinburne and Morris.

The second and grimmer shadow that fell across his life at this time is the more to be deplored, inasmuch as few men of letters had reached so high a position, in the opinion of those best qualified to judge, as had Rossetti. Both as a poet and painter he had claim upon the affectionate admiration of his contemporaries. Then came ill-health and the curse of the chloral habit, and the kindly, humorous, and brilliant companion becomes gradually a moody neurotic. Harassed by sleeplessness, he had taken chloral, quite ignorant of the seductive and baneful character of the drug indiscriminately used, and his intolerance of advice made it quite clear that from the outset this experiment would prove disastrous, especially to a man of his nervous organisation. Yet, though his vitality was impaired and his mental and physical sufferings considerable, his imagination as a creative artist remained practically undisturbed to the very last. The very tenacity of the man's constitution merely increased his sufferings, and in 1882 he died in the presence of his mother, sister, and two friends, one of them being his intimate companion, Watts-Dunton, whose tender care and unflinching sympathy had proved the one real gleam of light for Rossetti during his last few years. He was buried at Birchington on April 14, where a cross has been erected over his grave.

No one knew Rossetti more intimately than did Watts-Dunton, his tribute, therefore, to the man's genius and personality carries especial significance. Let it be given in the author's own words:

"As to his personal fascination, among all the poets of England we have no record of anything equal to it. It asserted itself not only in relation to the Pre-Raphaelite group, but in relation to all other members of society with whom he was brought into contact. To describe the magnetism of such a man is, of course, impossible. Much has been written upon what is called the demonic power in certain individuals—the power of casting one's own influence over all others. Napoleon's case is generally instanced as a typical one. But Napoleon's demonic power was of a self-conscious kind. It would seem, however, that there is another kind of demonic power—the power of shedding quite unconsciously one's personality upon all brought into contact with it. The demonic power of Rossetti, like that of D'Arcy in this story, was quite unconscious. In Rossetti's presence as in D'Arcy's it was impossible not to yield to this strange, mysterious power. At the time when he was not so entirely reclusive as he afterwards became, when he used to meet all sorts of people, the author had many opportunities of noticing its effect upon others. He has seen them try to resist it, and in vain. On a certain occasion a very eminent man, much used to society, and much used to the brilliant literary clubs of London, was quite cowed and silenced before Rossetti. It is necessary to dwell upon these subtle distinctions, because this is the D'Arcy who, as a critic has remarked, 'is the real protagonist of Aylmer—although the reader does not discover it until the very end of the story, where D'Arcy is the character who unravels and explains all.' Without D'Arcy, indeed, and the demonic power possessed by him, the story would have no existence."

Perhaps there is only one other figure in modern English letters with whom Rossetti may be compared as a compelling personal influence. That man is Samuel Taylor Coleridge.

HIS WORK

Milton's postulate that poetry should be simple, sensuous, and passionate has never been bettered. All the greatest poetry is simple, because the elemental things of life are simple, it is sensuous, because its appeal must needs be made through the senses, how else can rhythmic beauty be realised? It is passionate, because it deals with the primal instincts.

In two of these requisites Rossetti's verse is assuredly not lacking. He is both sensuous and passionate, indeed superbly so, though the elaborate craftsmanship somewhat distracts us at times and obscures the real emotional quality that lies behind. In the exquisite intensity of his sense-impressions he reminds us of Keats, and like Keats, he is carried away at times by this into an ultra opulence of illustration that weakens his work as an artist. Not that much of this opulent colouring is not effective, as for instance such lines as these:

"Gloom girt 'mid Spring-flushed apple growths she stands"

"Deep in the sun-searched growths, the dragon fly
Hang like a blue thread loosened from the sky"

Yet how much more compelling in its simple strength are these lines, from which luxuriant fancies have been ruthlessly pruned:

"Her eyes were deeper than the depth
Of waters stilled at oven."

"Thy soul I know not from thy body, nor Thine from myself, neither our love from God"

Although not a painter himself, the pictorial suggestiveness of Keats' poetry proved a fruitful inspiration to the Pre-Raphaelite group of which Rossetti was the most distinguished representative. The extreme fondness for elaboration of detail, and the outlook upon nature, not as a rhythmic pageant of colour, but as a study in still life, is especially noticeable in the paintings of this school. It has been well said that the Pre-Raphaelites arranged "images and impressions as the Japanese arrange flowers, so that each may keep its perfect independence and colour "

That the pictorial element is more insistent in Rossetti than in Keats is obviously due to the fact that Rossetti's outlook on the world is essentially that of the painter. He thinks and feels in pigments. Who but a painter would have given us lines like these

"The blessed damozel leaned out
From the gold bar of heaven
.
She had three lilies in her hand
And the stars in her hair were seven "

"And the souls mounting up to God
Went by her like thin flames "

"Where the long cloud the long wood's counterpart Sheds doubled darkness up the labouring hill "

"Thine eyes gray lit in shadowing hair above "

This is not merely the verse of a pictorial artist, but of a Pre-Raphaelite artist. In the words italicised above the familiar symbolism of the mediæval colourist is clearly discerned. Even in so modern a poem as Jenny the poet cannot resist recalling a picture by the Florentine painters. Indeed Rossetti's verse, when not written for pictures, almost invariably suggests pictures.

In that splendid poem, A Last Confession, perhaps the only one that shows the direct influence of a contemporary, the painter-poet is unmistakable. Browning's method may have suggested the general scheme of the poem, but Rossetti has stamped his own genius upon the tale. It is the story of a murder, and the colour red gleams through the verse from the very opening, where the man finds the child on the hills and she tells him her parents had left her and walked into "the great red light," down to the catastrophe when "sea and sky were blood and fire and all the day was one red blindness "

But the sensuousness of Rossetti's verse travels beyond the mere expression of emotion in terms of sense. After all, Shelley and Browning also were colourists, and the difference between them and Rossetti is in this respect one of degree, not of kind. But in their sensuousness as poets they exhibit divergences which may be explained by saying that while all three give sensuous expression to feeling, Rossetti also gives sensuous expression to thought. It is here that we light upon that quality in Rossetti's verse that has given offence to some, and is responsible for the criticism that there is a voluptuous "hot-house" atmosphere about it.

Rossetti was three-quarters Italian, and he treats passion from the Southern and not from the Northern point of view. "Rossetti," wrote Ruskin in Præterita, "was really not an Englishman but a great Italian tormented in the inferno of London." The Italian side of Rossetti's temperament certainly impresses most of his work. The frank voluptuousness of his wonderful sonnet sequence, The House of Life, is the reverse of English. The Northern temperament, naturally reserved and secretive where the emotions of love and religion are concerned, shrinks from dwelling on the sensuous manifestations of passion. And one may add that if it is betrayed into doing so an aggressive coarseness displays itself at once.

This is not so with the Southern temperament, fevered and morbid as their erotic and devotional literature may seem, it is never coarse. The reverential devotion to the beauty of the body, which strikes most Englishmen as mawkish and unwholesome, and not a few as immoral, is far removed in spirit from mere eroticism. The senses were for Rossetti sacramental emblems of the spirit. In every department of thought and emotion, not in love only, Rossetti sought for the outward manifestations. Where Tennyson sentimentalises and Browning intellectualises, Rossetti read off the physical expression of certain sides of life. But he valued the physical expression, the outward manifestation, not as does the mere sensualist as something disconnected from the inner life, but as the visible sign of the invisible power that moulds life and character into beauty and nobility. He worshipped beauty.

"Whose speech Truth knows not from her thought,
Nor love her body from her soul "

Robert Buchanan's attack on Rossetti in The Fleshly School of Poetry is wide of the mark, because Rossetti's sensuousness is something other than sensuality. Indeed Buchanan came to realise he had condemned without justice, and years afterwards made a frank and unreserved retraction. Yet, if the heavy perfumed atmosphere of Rossetti's love poetry will always strike English readers as enervating, and if his outspokenness offends our constitutional reserve in matters of sexual love, let us at any rate recognise that the question is not one of morality but merely one of taste. Its real weakness lies not in its sensuousness but in its frequent lack of simplicity. Its rich ornamentation, its meticulous elaboration fatigues the eye; and to this extent it fails to appeal to us so potently as do Burns and Browning as poets of passion. In its own circumscribed sphere of sexual ecstasy transfigured by spiritual rapture, it is rarely beautiful and indeed unique in English poetry. But the vile breadth of Browning and the poignant pathos of Burns touch us more intimately by reason not only of their more welcome reticence but by their larger and fresher simplicity of treatment.

The limitations of Rossetti's sensuous complexity have been noted; let us not overlook, however, the peculiar grace and fascination it carries with it; for at its worst it is but the defect of his artistic virtue—a marvellously subtle imagination. This subtle imagination could spin the gossamer web of glamour and fantasy over the simplest themes, as in My Sister's Sleep, as well as revel in the rich storehouse of mediæval romance.

MY SISTER'S SLEEP

She fell asleep on Christmas Eve -
At length the long-ungranted shade
Of weary eyelids overweigh'd
The pain nought else might yet relieve.

Our mother, who had leaved all day
Over the bed from chime to chime,
Then raised herself for the first time,
And as she sat her down, did pray

Her little work-table was spread
With work to finish For the glare
Made by her candle, she had care
To work some distance from the bed

Without, there was a cold moon up,
Of winter radiance sheer and thin,
The hollow halo it was in
Was like an icy crystal cup

Though the small room, with subtle sound
Of flame, by vents the fire-shine drove
And reddened In its dim alcove
The mirror shed a clearness round

I had been sitting up some nights
And my tired mind felt weak and blank,
Like a sharp strengthening wine it drank
The stillness and the broken lights

Twelve struck That sound, by dwindling years
Heard in each hour, crept off, and then
The ruffled silence spread again,
Like water that a pebble stirs

Our mother rose from where she sat
Her needles, as she laid them down,
Met lightly, and her silken gown
Settled, no other noise than that

"Glory unto the Newly Born!"
So, as said angels, she did say,
Because we were in Christmas Day,
Though it would still be long till morn

Just then in the room over us
There was a pushing back of chairs,
As some who had sat unawares
So late, now heard the hour, and rose

With anxious softly-stepping haste
Our mother went when Margaret lay,
Fearing the sounds o'erhead—should they
Have broken her long watched-for rest?

She stooped an instant calm, and turned,
But suddenly turned back again
And all her features seemed in pain
With woe, and her eyes gazed and yearned

For my part, I but hid my face
And held my breath, and spoke no word
There was none spoken, but I heard
The silence for a little space

Our mother bowed herself and wept
And both my arms fell, and I said
"God knows I knew that she was dead"
And there, all white, my sister slept

Then kneeling upon Christmas morn
A little after twelve o'clock,
We said, ere the first quarter struck
'Christ's blessing on the newly born!'

As a mediævalist Rossetti is obviously in congenial surroundings, for the mingled warp of sensuousness and supersensuousness, so characteristic of the Middle Ages, suited to a merely his peculiar genius.

The human elements of old romance were finely apprehended by Scott and William Morris; the sensuous elements attracted Keats; the mystic elements inspired Coleridge. But no one poet has gathered up all these diverse elements in the way that Rossetti has done. In such poems as Stretton Water, The King's Tragedy, and The White Ship, he touches the popular ballad with all its rough simplicity and naïveté; and if he fails to realise the hearty humanity that touches Scott's best work, he is more faithful to the conventions of the old ballad form. Again, he has essayed in poems like The Bride's Prelude and Rose Mary to reproduce that sensuous atmosphere which gave such richness of effect to The Eve of St Agnes and Lamia; and his success here is unquestioned. Keats himself never excelled the pictorial splendour of The Bride's Prelude or the opulent imagery of Rose Mary, and in sheer intellectual grasp of old superstitions and ancient customs he is distinctly inferior to Rossetti. The opening of The Bride's Prelude is perfect in its way, where the air is languorous and redolent with musk, myrrh, and the noonday sun, while ever and anon the sounds float in through the casement of murmuring water and the melody of the lute.

"Amelotte laughed into the air
With eyes that sought the sun
But where the walls in long brocade
Were screened, as one who is afraid
Sat Aloof within the shade

And even in shade was gleam enough
To shut out full repose
From the bride's 'tiring-chamber, which
Was like the inner altar niche
Whose dimness worship has made rich

Within the window's heaped recess
The light was counter-changed
In blent reflexes manifold
From perfume-caskets of wrought gold
And gems the bride's hair could not hold

All thrust together and with these
A slim-curved lute which now,
At Amelotte's sudden passing there,
Was swept in somehow unawares,
And shook to music the close air

Against the halved lattice-panes
The bridesmaid sunned her braid
Then to the glass turned tall and fair,
And braced and shifted daintily
Her loin belt through her cote hardie

The belt was silver, and the clasp
Of lozenged arm hangings,
A world of mirrored tints minute
The rippling sunbeam wrought into it
That flushed her hand and warmed her foot

At least an hour had Aloof—
Her jewels in her hair,—
Her white gown, as became a bride,
Quartered in silver at each side,—
Sat thus aloof, as if to hide

Over her bosom, that lay still,
The vest was rich in grain
With close pearls wholly overset
Around her throat the fastenings met
Of chequerable and martelet

Her arms were laid along her lap
With the hands open—'hile
Itself did seem at fault with her
Beneath the drooping brows, the stir
Of thought made noonday heavier"

Rossetti's power of mystic suggestion has no peer save in Coleridge. What Coleridge did for the earlier years of the century Rossetti did for the later years. After the rush of poetry, charged and often heavily weighted with practical problems of the hour, he brought back the mystic spirit to our verse. Not the religious mysticism of his sister and of Tennyson and Browning, but the mysticism of the artist with its fascination for the half-lights, for the undiscovered countries of thought and feeling. He had the power of impressing the imagination with splendid lines that suggested some half-expressed thought, some dimly-shadowed emotion, such lines as :

"Girt in dark growths, yet glimmering with one star."

"The ground-whirl of the perished leaves of Hope"

"Words, whose silence wastes and kills"

"The spacious vigil of the stars."

That wonderful poem, The Blessed Damozel—wonderful had it been the mature work of the writer, more wonderful considering he was quite a youth when he wrote it—is full of fine, subtle touches. It has a freshness and spaciousness of imagination that is lacking in some of his more ornate later pictures.

The Blessed Damozel leaning out from the gold bar of Heaven :

"From the fixed place of Heaven she saw
Time like a pulse shake fierce
Through all the worlds. Her gaze still strove
Within the gulf to pierce
Its path, and now she spoke as when
The stars sang in their spheres"

The sense of vastness is splendidly conveyed in these lines.

Then follows a stanza worthy of Coleridge, perhaps not unimpaired by his magic.

"The sun was gone now, the curled moon
Was like a little feather
Fluttering far down the gulf, and now
She spoke thro' the still weather,
Her voice was like the voice the stars
Had when they sang together"

In contrast with this sense of immensity, where in a bold line the earth is described as spinning in the void like a fretful ridge, comes the wistful longing of the maiden for her lover still on earth, and her passionate prayers for him to come to her soon.

Coleridge alone could match the haunting mystery of lines like these

"Here high up in the balcony,
Sister Helen,
The moon flung face to face with me
Out-ado it's morry in the wind's wake,
Sister Helen
In the shaken trees the chill stars shake
Hush, heard you a horse tread, as you spake,
Little brother?"

All the witchery of twilight is here :

"When the leaf shadows at a breath,
Shrinks in the road, and all the heath,
Forest and water far and wide
Lie with the mystery of death"

Sometimes, like Keats, he can suggest in a single superb line

"And her far seen moon as a single shell"

What poet has more exquisitely caught the spirit of the dream world, as seen through a lover's eye, as in Love's Nocturn :

"Master of the murmuring courts
Where the shapes of sleep convene !—
Lo ! my spirit here exhorts
All the powers of the demesne
For their aid to woo my queen
What reports
Yield thy jealous courts unseen ?
Vaporous, unaccountable,
Dream-world lies forlorn of light,
Hollow like a breathing shell,
Ah ! that from all dreams I might Choose one dream and guide its flight !
I know well
What her sleep should tell to-night"

Here a common psychical experience is wrought into a thing of beauty by subtlety of treatment.

"I have been here before,
But when or how I cannot tell,
I know the grass beyond the door,
The sweet keen smell,
The sighing sound the lights around the shore"

While the sensuous beauty of Rossetti's verse is fully recognised, the intellectual power and the moral force of his genius have had far less than its due. It is as if Englishmen could not appreciate the spiritual power of a writer unless he ascended the pulpit. The moral must be thrust before their eyes : the religion must be crystallised into a creed, or they suspect a moral flabbiness.

And yet the moral beauty of his work is clear enough, and ought never to have been called in question.

There is no finer treatment of the social problem in poetry than may be found in Jenny—a poem refreshingly free from the awkward sentiment that so often spoils verse dealing with this subject. Then again, mark the lofty imagination of The Burden of Nineveh. The huge winged stone bulls of Nineveh start a reverie in the poet's mind in which he thinks with misgiving on the civilisation of our own day. He reflects how snugly we talk of the baseness of the older civilisations, and shake our heads at mention of Babylon and Nineveh. Yet may it not be that this bas-relief, dug out from the ruins of Nineveh and now looking down from the walls of the British Museum, will be discovered years hence in the ruins of London, and the discoverers imagine it to be our God ?

"Who finding in this desert place
His form, shall hold us for some race
That walked not in Christ's lowly ways,
But bowed its pride and vowed its praise
Unto the God of Nineveh."

A vein of delicate and austere satire runs throughout the poem, giving its impressive rhythm all possible effect.

How admirable is the idealism in those beautiful sonnets, Lost Days and A Superscription :

"The lost days of my life until to-day,
What were they could I see them on the street
Lie as they fell ? Would they be ears of wheat
Sown once for food but trodden into clay ?

Or golden coins squandered and still to pay ?
Or drops of blood dabbling the guilty foot ?
Or such spilt water as in dreams must cheat
The undying throat of Hell, athirst alway ? "

But one day he will hear those wasted hours accusing him of self-murder, muttering

" I am thyself—what hast thou done to me ? "

The mystery of life is hunted at with exquisite delicacy in The Sea Limits :

" Listen alone beside the sea,
Listen alone among the woods,
Those voices of twin solitudes
Shall have one sound alike to thee
Hark where the murmurs of thronged men
Surge and sink back and surge again,—
Still the one voice of wave and tree
Gather a shell from the strown beach
And listen at its lips—they sigh
The same desire and mystery,
The echo of the whole sea's speech
And all mankind is thus at heart
Not anything but what thou art
And Earth, Sea, Man, are all in each "

Profounder thinkers, and more varied singers the last century has given us, but Rossetti has expressed, in a way no other poet has done, the hunger of the human heart for love and beauty, the hunger of the human soul for those impalpable mysteries that touch the horizon of human thought.

JENNY

Lazy laughing languid Jenny,
Fond of a kiss and fond of a guinea,
Whose head upon my knee to night
Rests for a while, as if grown light
With all our dances and the sound
To which the wild tunes spun you round
Fair Jenny mine, the thoughtless queen
Of kisses which the blush between
Could hardly make more daintier,
Whose eyes are as blue skies whose hair
Is countless gold incomparable
Fresh flowers, scarce touched with signs that tell
Of Love's exuberant hotbed—Nay,
Poor flower left torn since yesterday
Until to-morrow leave you bare,
Poor handful of bright spring water
Flung in the whirlpool's shrieking face ;
Poor shameful Jenny, full of grace
Thus with your head upon my knee—
Whose person or whose purse may be
The lodestar of your reveno ?

This room of yours, my Jenny, looks
A change from mine so full of books,
Whose serried ranks hold fast, forsooth,
So many captive hours of youth,—
The hours they thieve from day and night
To make one's cherished work come right,
And have it wrong for all their theft,
Even as to-night my work was left—
Until I vowed that since my brain
And eyes of dancing seemed so faint,
My feet should have some dancing too—
And thus it was I met with you,
Well, I suppose 'twas hard to part,
For here I am And now, sweetheart,
You seem too tired to get to bed

It was a careless life I led
When rooms like this were scarce so strange
Not long ago. What breeds the change,—
The many arms or the few years ?
Because to-night it all appears
Something I do not know again.

The cloud's not danced out of my brain,—
The cloud that made it turn and swim
While hour by hour the books grew dim.
Why, Jenny, as I watch you there,—
For all your wealth of loosened hair,
Your silk ungirdled and unlace'd
And warm sweets open to the waist,
All golden in the lamplight's gleam,—
You know not what a look you seem,
Half-read by lightning in a dream !
How should you know, my Jenny ? Nay,
And I should be ashamed to say—
Poor beauty, so well worth a kiss !
But while my thought runs on like that
With wasteful whims more than enough
I wonder what you're thinking of

If of myself you think at all,
What is the thought ?—Conjectural
On sorry matters best unsolved ?—
Or only is each grace resolved
To fit me with a lure ?—or (sad
To think !) perhaps you're merely glad
That I'm not drunk or ruffianly
And let you rest upon my knee

For sometimes, were the truth confess'd,
You're thankful for a little rest,—
Glad from the crush to rest within,
From the heart-sickness and the dim
Where only a voice at virtue's pitch
Mocks you because your gown is rich,
And from the pale girl's dumb rebuke
Whose ill-clad grace and toil-worn look
Proclaim the strength that keeps her weak,
And other nights than yours bespoken,
And from the wise mischievous elf,
To schoolmate lesser than himself
Pointing you out, what thing you are—
Yes, from the daily jeer and jar,
From shame and shame's outbraving too,
Is rest not sometimes sweet to you ?—
But most from the hatefulness of man
Who spares not to end what he began,
Whose acts are ill and his speech ill,
Who, having used you at his will,
 thrusts you aside, as when I dine
I serve the dishes and the wine

Well, handsome Jenny mine, sit up ;
I've filled our glasses, let us sup,
And do not let me think of you,
Lest shame of yours suffice for two
What, still so tired ? Well, well then, keep Your head there, so you do not sleep,
But that the weariness may pass
And leave you merry, take this glass.
Ah ! lazy hily hand, more bless'd
If no'er in rings it had been dress'd
Nor over by a glove conceal'd !

Behold the lilies of the field,
They toil not neither do they spin ;
(So doth the ancient text begin,—
Not of such rest as one of these Can share) Another rest and ease
Along each summer sated path
From its new lord the garden bath,
Than that whose spring in blessings ran
Which praised the bounteous husbandman,
Ere yet, in days of hankering breath,
The lilies sickened unto death

What, Jenny, are your lilies dead ?
Aye, and the snow-white leaves are spread
Like winter on the garden-bed
But you had roses left in May,—
They were not gone too Jenny, nay,
But must your roses die, and those
Their purified buds that should unclothe
Even so, the leaves are culled apart,
Still red as from the broken heart
And here's the naked stem of thorns.

Nay, nay, mere words Here nothing warns
 As yet of winter sickness here
 Or want alone could waken fear,—
 Nothing but passion wrings a tear
 Except when there may rise unsought
 Haply at times a passing thought (Of the old days which seem to be Much older than any history
 That is written in any book,
 When she would lie in fields and look
 Along the ground through the blown grass,
 And wonder where the city was,
 Far out of sight whose broil and hale
 They told her then for a child's tale.

Jenny, you know the city now
 A child can tell the tale there, how
 Some things that are not yet enroll'd
 In market lists are bought and sold
 Even till the early Sunday light,
 When Saturday night is market night
 Everywhere, be it dry or wet,
 And market night in the Haymarket.
 Our learned London children know,
 Poor Jenny all your pride and woe;
 Have seen your lifted silken skirt
 Advertise dainties through the dirt;
 Have seen your coach-wheels splash rebuke
 On virtue, and have learned your look
 When wealth and health slipped past, you stare
 Along the streets alone and there,
 Round the long park across the bridge
 The cold lamps at the pavement's edge
 Wind on together and apart,
 A fiery serpent for your heart

Let the thoughts pass an empty cloud!
 Suppose I were to think aloud,—
 What if to her all this were said?
 Why, as a volume seldom read
 Being opened halfway shut again,
 So might the pages of her brain
 Be parted at such words, and thence
 Close back upon the dusty scene.
 For is there hue or shape defined
 In Jenny's desecrated mind,
 Where all contagious currents meet,
 A Lethe of the middle street?
 Nay, it reflects not any face
 Nor sound is in its sluggish pace,
 But as they coil those cuddies clot,
 And night and day remember not

Why Jenny, you're asleep at last!—
 Asleep, poor Jenny, hard and fast—
 So young and soft and tired, so fair,
 With chin thus nestled in your hair,
 Mouth quiet, eyelids almost blue
 As if some sky of dreams shone through!

Just as another woman sleeps!
 Enough to throw one's thoughts in heaps
 Of doubt and horror,—what to say
 Or think,—this awful secret sway,
 The potter's power over the clay,
 Of the same lump (it has been said)
 For honour and dishonour made,
 Two sister vessels Here is one.

My cousin Nell is fond of fun,
 And fond of dress, and change, and praise,
 So mere a woman in her ways
 And if her sweet eyes rich in youth
 Are like her lips that tell the truth,
 My cousin Nell is fond of love,
 And she's the girl I'm proudest of.
 Who does not prize her guard her well?
 The love of change, in cousin Nell,
 Shall find the best and hold it dear
 The unconquered mirth turn quieter
 Not through her own through others' woe:
 The conscious pride of beauty glow

Beside another's pride in her,
 One little part of all they share.
 For love himself shall ripen these
 In a kind soil to just increase
 Through years of fertilising peace.

Of the same lump (as it is said)
 For honour and dishonour made,
 Two sister vessels. Here is one.

It makes a goblin of the sun.

So pure,—so fall'n! How dare to think
 Of the first common kindred link?
 Yet, Jenny, till the world shall burn
 It seems that all things take their turn;
 And who shall say but this fair tree
 May need, in changes that may be,
 Your children's children's charity?
 Scorned then, no doubt, as you are scorn'd!
 Shall no man hold his pride forewarn'd
 Till in the end, the Day of Days,
 At Judgment one of his own race,
 As frail and lost as you, shall rise,—
 His daughter, with his mother's eyes?

How Jenny's clock ticks on the shelf!
 Might not the dial scorn itself
 That has such hours to register?
 Yet as to me, even so to her
 Are golden sun and silver moon,
 In daily largesse of earth's boon,
 Counted for life coins to one tune
 And if, as blindfold fates are toss'd
 Through some one man this life be lost,
 Shall soul not somehow pay for soul?

Fair shines the gilded aureole
 In which our highest painters place
 Some living woman's simple face
 And the stilled features thus described
 As Jenny's long throat droop'd aside—
 The shadows where the cheeks are thin,
 And pure wide curve from ear to chin,—
 With Raphael's, Leonardo's hand
 To show them to men's souls, might stand,
 Whole ages long, the whole world through,
 For preachings of what God can do
 What has man done here? How alone,
 Great God, for this which man has done?
 And for the body and soul which by
 Man's pitiless doom must now comply
 With lifelong hell, what lullaby
 Of sweet forgetful second birth
 Remains? All dark. No sign on earth.
 What measure of God's rest endows
 The many mansions of his house.

If but a woman's heart might see
 Such erring heart unerringly
 For once! But that can never be.

Like a rose shut in a book
 In which pure women may not look,
 For its base pages claim control
 To crush the flower within the soul,
 Where through each dead rose leaf that clings,
 Pale as transparent Psyche-wings,
 To the vile text, are traced such things
 As might make lady's cheek indeed
 More than a living rose to read,
 So nought save foolish foulness may
 Watch with hard eyes the sure decay;
 And so the life blood of this rose,
 Puddled with shameful knowledge, flows
 Through leaves no chaste hand may unclose:
 Yet still it keeps such faded show
 Of when 'twas gathered long ago,
 That the crushed petals' lovely grain,
 The sweetness of the sanguine stain,

Seen of a woman's eyes, must make
Her pitiful heart, so prone to ache,
Love roses better for its sake :—
Only that this can never be—
Even so unto her sex is she.

Yet, Jenny, looking long at you,
The woman almost fades from view.
A cipher of man's changeless sum
Of lust, past, present, and to come,
Is left—A riddle that one shrinks
To challenge from the scornful sphinx.

Like a toad within a stone
Seated while Time crumbles on,
Which sits there since the earth was curs'd
For Man's transgression at the first,
Which, living through all centuries,
Not once has seen the sun arise,
Whoso life, to its cold circle charmed,
The earth's whole summers have not warmed;
Which always—winthorse the stone
Be flung—sits there, deaf, blind, alone;—
Aye, and shall not be driven out
Till that which shuts him round about
Break at the very Master's stroke,
And the dust thereof vanish as smoke,
And the seed of Man vanish as dust—
Even so within this world is Lust.

Come, come, what use in thoughts like this?
Poor little Jenny, good to us,—
You'd not believe by what strange roads
Thought travels, when your beauty goads
A man to-night to think of toads!
Jenny, wake up—Why, there's the dawn!

And there's an early waggon drawn
To market, and some sheep that jog
Bleating before a barking dog,
And the old streets come peeping through
Another night that London knew,
And all as ghostlike as the lamp.

So on the wings of day decanips
My last night's frolic—Glooms begin
To sliver off as light creeps in Past the gauze curtains half drawn-to,
And the lamp's doubled shade grows blue,—
Your lamp, my Jenny, kept alight,
Like a wise virgin's, all one night!
And in the alcove coolly spread
Glimmers with dawn your empty bed;
And yonder your fair face I see
Reflected lying on my knee,
Where teems with first foreshadowings
Your pier-glass scrawled with diamond rings:
And on your bosom all night worn
Yesterday's rose now droops forlorn,
But dies not yet this summer morn.

And now without, as if some word
Had called upon them that they heard,
The London sparrows far and high
Clamour together suddenly
And Jenny's cage bird grown awake
Here in their song his part must take,
Because here, too, the day doth break.

And somehow in myself the dawn
Among stirred clouds and veils withdrawn
Strikes greyly on her. Let her sleep.
But will it wake her if I heap
Those cushions thus beneath her head
Where my knee was? No,—there's your bed,
My Jenny, while you dream—And there
I lay among your golden hair,
Perhaps the subject of your dreams,
These golden coins.

For still one deems
That Jenny's flattering sleep confers
New magic on the magic purse—
Grim web, how clogged with shrivelled flies!
Between the threads fine funica arise
And shape their pictures in the brain,
There roll no streets in glare and rain
Nor flagrant man-swine whets his tusk,
But delicately sighs in musk
The homage of the dim boudoir;
Or like a palpitating star
Thrilled into song, the opera-night
Breathes faint in the quick pulse of light;
Or at the carriage-window shine
Rich wares for choicé, or, free to dine,
Whirls through its hour of health (divine
For her) the concourse of the Park
And though in the discounted dark
Her function there and here are one,
Beneath the lamps and in the sun
There reigns at least the acknowledged belle Apparelled beyond parallel
Ah Jenny, yes, we know your dreams

For even the Paphian Venus seems
A goddess o'er the realms of love,
When silver-shroued in shadowy grove,
Aye, or let offerings nicely plac'd
But hide Priapus to the want,
And whose looks on him shall see
An eligible duty

Why Jenny, waking here alone
May help you to remember one
Though all the memory's long outworn
Of many a double-pillowed morn
I think I see you when you wake
And rub your eyes for nit, and shake
My gold in rising from your hair,
A Danaë for a moment there

Jenny, my love rang true ' for still Love at first sight is vague, until
That tankling makes him audible

And must I mock you to the last,
Ashamed of my own shame,—aghaast
Because some thoughts not born amiss
Rose at a poor fair face like this?
Well, of such thoughts so much I know,
In my life, as in hers, they show.
By a far gleam which I may near,
A dark path I can strive to clear.

Only one kiss—Good-bye, my dear.

I. POETRY: WILLIAM MORRIS. His Life—His Work—The Poet—The Craftsman— The Social Reformer

WILLIAM MORRIS (1834-1896)

HIS LIFE

BORN on 24th March 1834, at Elm House, Walthamstow, William Morris was the third child in a family of nine, and came of good middle-class stock, rich in sound, strong physique, with no remarkable gifts of intellect or imagination. In 1840 his parents moved to Woodford Hall in Essex. At this time there is a characteristic picture of the small boy, dressed in a suit of toy armour, riding a Shetland pony through Epping Forest, with his abundant curly hair flying in the breeze, and looking like some mediæval knight out hunting imaginary dragons.

He was an eager reader, and at seven years old had devoured most of Marryat's and many of Scott's novels, and his sister relates how, after reading The Old English Baron in the rabbit warren at Woodford Hall, they were wrought up to such a state of mind as to make them afraid to cross the park to reach home.

In 1843 he was sent to a private school at Walthamstow. For neither writing nor spelling had he a natural gift: his writing, however, became beautiful in later years; "but I remember having to stand on a chair with my shoes off," he has told us, "because I made so many mistakes in my spelling"—and spelling remained with Morris a lifelong failure.

At Marlborough College, from 1848-1851, we see a "thick-set, strong-looking boy—good-natured and kind, but with a fearful temper"; we also see the studious, restless enthusiast for art and architecture and old church music, with no love for games, but, like Dickens and Charlotte Brontë, in great request as a story-teller.

After reading for a year with a private tutor, Morris matriculated at Oxford in 1852, and first met with Edward Burne-Jones. The spell of Newman and the Anglo-Catholic revival still lingered in Oxford, and considerably influenced this serious and artistic youth—a pronounced High Churchman desirous of taking Orders. Then came his majority in 1854, and with it an income of £900 a year.

Having taken his degree in 1856, he might have settled down to a life of pleasure and idle comfort, but it was not in Morris' nature to do this. While on a holiday in France he and Burne-Jones had definitely given up the idea of the Church as a profession. Art was to be their Mistress: for Burne-Jones, painting; for Morris, the career of an architect. So, on leaving the university, he became an articled pupil in the office of George Edmund Street, the diocesan architect, Philip Webb being then senior clerk. When the office was moved to London Morris was soon happily sharing rooms with his friend Burne-Jones, while much of their spare time was spent with the poet-painter, Rossetti.

The influence of Rossetti was soon evident. Morris had already written several poems, collected in the little volume The Defence of Guenevere—and now "Rossetti says I ought to paint. I must try," and he made such rapid progress that when Burne-Jones and Rossetti were commissioned to execute the frescoes at the Union Debating Hall in 1857, Morris was invited to assist them.

With this visit to Oxford yet another interest entered his life. At the theatre he met Miss Jane Burden, whose beautiful face has been limned for us in so many of Rossetti's pictures. The friendship soon ripened into affection, and they were married at Oxford in 1859. On their return from a tour abroad Morris set to work on his new home, the famous Red House at Bexley Heath; in this undertaking he was assisted in various ways by Philip Webb the architect, Burne-Jones, Rossetti, and other friends.

The year 1861 saw the foundation of the firm of Morris, Marshall, Faulkner & Co.; this partnership was dissolved in 1875 and Morris became sole proprietor. In consequence of the rapid development of his business, Morris decided to sell the Red House in 1865 and move with his family to London. He had been ill with rheumatic fever, and the constant journeys to and from the city were beginning to be somewhat of a strain.

He was now planning The Earthly Paradise, and also writing Jason; after its publication he began to study Icelandic with Mr. Magnússon. Within a short time he was able to put this new venture to practical use in a series of Icelandic Sagas, the translation of which, with a tour in Iceland, occupied most of his spare time for the next few years.

Morris was not happy away from the country, so in 1871 he and Rossetti became joint-tenants of Kelmscott Manor, a charming old house on the banks of the Thames. The arrangement was more or less happy until 1874, when, after an illness, Rossetti departed.

It was in 1876 that the Eastern Question Association was founded with Morris as secretary—to protest against the lukewarm policy of the Conservative Government with reference to the atrocities in Bulgaria. Morris, as may be expected, was also on the side of the anti-war party regarding the troubles in Afghanistan. Having organised a gigantic meeting in 1878 on their behalf at which Gladstone had promised to speak, "The Parliamentaries," he said, "began to quake," the meeting was abandoned, and for a while Morris threw up politics in disgust. "I shall give up reading the papers," he remarked, "and stick to my work." But in 1881 we find him acting as treasurer of the National Liberal League, and on 17th January 1883 he joined the Democratic Federation; the next few years being given up to lecturing throughout the country on both Art and Socialism. On one occasion Morris asked a lady how she liked his lecture. "Not at all!" was the unexpected reply. "But I thought the colour of your blue shirt charming."

Overwork was largely responsible for a serious illness in 1885, but the next year he was again working, if possible, harder than ever. The Dream of John Ball was appearing in The Commonwealth, the organ of the Socialist League—Morris having started and financed both paper and League, and much of his best literary work made its first appearance in its columns.

The House of the Wolfings, published in 1888, was the first of his books to be printed from specially selected type. His next romance, The Roots of the Mountains, was bound in one of his own chintzes. "I am so pleased with my book," he wrote to a friend, "typography, binding, and, must I say it, literary matter." This peculiar interest in the production of books led to his founding the Kelmscott Press, set up in the Upper Mall, Hammer-smith—and News from Nowhere was the first of his volumes to be issued from it.

So attractive were the volumes issued by Morris that the University of Cambridge, in 1891, lent him Caxton's copy of The Golden Legend, from which he printed the Kelmscott edition of 1892.

After a few more years of literary work, numerous activities and lectures on behalf of the Social Democratic Federation, Morris' health gave way under the strain. A sea trip was advised, and he started for Norway, but he only longed for the time to come when he might return to Kelmscott, and no benefit resulted. When he arrived in England he was too ill to be taken beyond London. Yet he worked to the end. Early in September he dictated the last chapter of The Sundering Flood, and on 3rd October 1896 died at Hammer-smith, and three days later, at Kelmscott, was laid to rest, in a storm of wind and rain.

HIS WORK

A story is told of Morris that a man stopped him in the street one day with "Beg pardon, sir, were you ever captain of the Sea Swallow?" Into this random query is condensed the whole problem of Morris' personality. The inquirer may have been thinking of the sailor-like appearance of the man, with his rolling gait and vital, weather-beaten face. But to his friends there is more in the inquiry than lies here.

The look of rugged strength, the pleasant, hearty manner, and the suggestion of an underlying reserve force, all these things make us think of Morris as a master of men. A traveller on the high seas? Perhaps: but a captain, a leader assuredly. And no ordinary one either. Not a captain of some miserable craft, but a captain of the Sea Swallow—happy symbol of the dreamer element in Morris' nature.

The savour of the man's personality lay in the juxtaposition of these two divergent qualities, poetic imagination and practical sagacity. On the one side an artist, a lover of the beautiful, a Utopian visionary; on the other a man of shrewd common sense, direct, blunt, and downright. His dreams were no castles in the air, they had a definite ground plan. The dreamer devised beautiful things, beautiful poems, beautiful prose, beautiful handicrafts, the practical man expressed them in terms of utility. He loved beauty so well that he turned it into a limited company.

At first he sought relief from the ugliness of modern life by fashioning a secluded realm of beauty, remote from the noisy highway. But as he grew older this did not satisfy him. "Those who joy would win must share it," said Byron. "Happiness is born a twin." So Morris resolved to share it, and he could only hope to do this by trying to beautify the life about him. It was a lifelong task.

Ruskin's inspiration was of course of immense value here, and no literary utterance ever moved him more profoundly than the famous chapter "On the Nature of Gothic," that he took later as the text for all his social sermons.

Here is the passage:

"In the make and nature of every man, however rude or simple, whom we employ in manual labour, there are some powers for better things; some tardy imagination, torpid capacity of emotion, tottering steps of thought, there are, even at the worst, and in most cases it is all our own fault that they are tardy or torpid. But they cannot be strengthened, unless we are content to take them in their feebleness, unless we prize and honour them in their imperfection above the best and most perfect manual skill. And thus is what we have to do with all our labourers, to look for the thoughtful part of them, and get that out of them, whatever we lose for it, whatever faults and errors we are obliged to take with it. For the best that is in them cannot manifest itself but in company with much error. Understand this clearly: you can teach a man to draw a straight line, and to cut one, to strike a curved line, and to carve it, and to copy and carve any number of given lines or forms with admirable speed and perfect precision, and you find his work perfect of its kind; but if you ask him to think about any of those forms, to consider if he cannot find any better in his own head, he stops, his execution becomes hesitating, he thinks, and ten to one he thinks wrong, ten to one he makes a mistake in the first touch he gives to his work as a thinking being. But you have made a man of him for all that. He was only a machine before—an animated tool.

"And observe, you are put to stern choice in this matter. You must either make a tool of the creature or a man of him. You cannot make both. Men were not intended to work with the accuracy of tools, to be precise and perfect in all their actions. If you will have that precision out of them, and make their fingers measure degrees like cog wheels, and their arms strike curves like compasses, you must unhumanise them. All the energy of their spirits must be given to make cogs and compasses of themselves. The eye of the soul must be bent upon the finger-point, and the soul's force must fill all the invisible nerves that guide it, ten hours a day, that it may not err from its steepest precision, and so soul and sight be worn away, and the whole human being be lost at last—a heap of sawdust so far as its intellectual work in this world is concerned, save only by its heart, which cannot go into the form of cogs and compasses, but expands, after the ten hours are over, into irresponsible humanity. On the other hand, if you will make a man of the working creature, you cannot make a tool. Let him but begin to imagine, to think, to try to do anything worth doing, and the engine-turned precision is lost at once. Out come all his roughness, all his dulness, all his incapability; shame upon shame, failure upon failure, pause upon pause, but out comes the whole majesty of him also, and we know the height of it only when we see the clouds settling upon him. And, whether the clouds be bright or dark, there will be transfiguration behind and within them." . . . For individuals "to feel their souls withering within them, unthanked, to find their whole being sunk into an unrecognised abyss, to be counted off into a heap of mechanism, numbered with its wheels and weighed with its hammer-strokes—this nature bade not—this God blesses not—this humanity for no long time is able to endure."

The compelling interest of Morris' work lies in its amazing many-sidedness. Nor was it the many-sidedness of the merely clever, versatile man. It was the many-sidedness of a naturally vital nature that sought to absorb as many forms of human activity as were possible. Even as a lad his restless hands were ever weaving imaginary designs, and he never knew what rest was save in the few brief hours when the tired body sought sleep. His real recreation was change of work. And what enabled him to do so vast an amount was the superb detachment by which he could free himself from all the worries and preoccupations of the task he had been essaying, and project his whole undivided energies into something entirely fresh. Roughly speaking, we may divide his activities into those of the poet, the craftsman, and the social reformer.

The Poet

Morris was not a great poet in the sense that we call Milton and Shelley great poets, for rhythmic beauty was not the inevitable expression of his creative imagination. His well-known saying that a man who was unable to turn from an epic to a tapestry had better leave both alone, is finely significant of the man. He could do either with such admirable ease that it was often a moot point whether the outcome of his inspiration would take the form of words or fabric. Supreme art is subject to no such chance incarnation; it can only express itself in one way. But if we deny Morris a seat on Parnassus as a supreme poet, he would claim supremacy, assuredly, as a great artist who wrote verse as one of many media for expressing his innate sense of beauty. And if not one of the topmost peaks he certainly belongs to the heights. There is no poet whose work is so uniformly fine in quality, so happy in its level excellence.

His first volume of verse, The Defence of Guenevere and other Poems, was necessarily experimental, it is psychological, fantastic, dramatic, lyrical, narrative. He is feeling his way, and has not yet realised how that his best strength lay in the narrative direction. But all of it is the work of an artist who uses words as if he loved them. Even such verses as The Blue Closet, The Wind, The Tune of Seven Towers, though little more than pretty fancies, musical toys, are well done, and delightful in their slight, unpretentious way.

The chief interest of the volume lies in the vigour and insight with which he treats some old-world story, whether one of Arthurian inspiration, in The Defence of Guenevere, or some other tale of mediæval passion, as in The Haystack in the Floods with its poignant horrors, or Rapunzel with its pictorial beauty. Admirably did he serve his poetic apprenticeship in this volume before he passed on to the mode in which he was a master—the narrative method.

Both Jason and The Earthly Paradise are narrative poems, and while he excelled them in emotional fire when he wrote Sigurd, he never surpassed these poems in fluent sweetness and gracious charm. The familiarity of the Jason story accounts for its greater popularity, but there is necessarily more variety in that garment of divers colours—The Earthly Paradise—a lovely fabric of verse into which he has woven some of the most enchanting stories in the world, graceful fancies from Greece, gay romances of French origin, passionate legends from the North. The matter is diverse, but Morris has made it his own by treating one and all as pigments of rich colouring for his mediæval screen. Mediæval, assuredly, the poet always is in his outlook. "Troy," as Mr Mackail says, "is to his imagination a town exactly like Bruges, spired and gabled, red-roofed, filled with towers and swinging bells. The Trojan princes go out like the knights in Froissart, and tilt at the barriers."

The poem is of extraordinary length, yet it never drags. No heights or depths of passion are sounded, humour is rigorously excluded, yet the pensive dreamy atmosphere, the easy discursiveness of the writer preclude any sense of boredom. It does not grip the imagination, but it lures the fancy, and we are carried along, willing captives on the smooth, mellifluous cadence of verse. "There was little wind," he adds after one of his pleasant voyages. The phrase is significant of the entire poem. Little wind—too little indeed to disperse the haze that softens the harsh outlines of the poet's world.

Following The Earthly Paradise came Love is Enough (1871), a clever, technical experiment—a modernised edition of the old morality play, yet curiously ineffective because of its deliberately undramatic treatment. The real attraction in the book lies in its charming lyrics.

After an interesting interval of translation work, Sigurd the Volsung was published in 1876. The translation of the Æneids of Virgil in 1875 is an agreeable production—nothing that Morris attempted was negligible. But it does not exhibit the poet at his best. The one English poet to interpret Virgil was Tennyson, it needs rhythmic distinction and nicely chiselled phrases, not the ambling grace of Morris. Sigurd is quite another matter. Here Morris bows a piece of pristine savagery from the quarry of the old Sagas, and dropping for a while his gracious moods, enters with fine spirit into the elemental grandeur of the epic. Goro is the old dreamer, the gently flowing cadence. The verse thrills with virile power. The sweeping rhythm breaks over the story like big Atlantic breakers on a rocky shore. There is a note of passion here not discernible hitherto in Morris' work save, perhaps, in the Lovers of Gudrun. It symbolises, moreover, the growing spiritual dissatisfaction of Morris with his age. It is more than a metrical experiment, it is a spiritual challenge.

As a poet he never excelled Sigurd for grandeur, nor for grace The Earthly Paradise.

His next work on a big scale was the translation of the Odyssey, a vigorous and admirable piece of work. Certainly Morris was spiritually more akin to Homer than to Virgil.

The period of verse writing was now drawing to a close. No work in verse of any importance marks his later years. The Chants for Socialists, useful and spirited in their way, are necessarily on a lower level of art, delightful as are many of the songs that light up his prose romances, these are subordinate of course to the prose romances, and in any case mark no fresh departure.

These romances, written in prose, are essentially poetical in conception and treatment, and are in reality a fresh illustration of Morris' poetic powers, and, as Mr Watts-Dunton has acutely observed, exemplifying the distinction between real and poetical prose and the rhetorical prose of such writers as Ruskin and De Quincey.

In other words rhythmic beauty is an integral part of Morris' prose style in these romances, whilst humour and elaborate characterisation is as carefully excluded here as in the narrative verse. Artistically speaking, there is a mellow beauty about these romances in prose than about the verse romances, but they suffer from one drawback alien to The Earthly Paradise and Sigurd. The style is more involved, more self-conscious and more archaic. This comparative lack of simplicity somewhat limits their appeal, and it is to be regretted that Morris had been less generous with terms derived from the Saxon and Danish elements in our language.

The romances are nine in number: of these two are communistic in conception—The Dream of John Ball and News from Nowhere, the one a hark back to the past, the other a look forward to the future. The remaining tales are rank fantasies with flavours of German and Scandinavian sagas, with that peculiar Morris atmosphere in which dreamy melancholy and joyous vitality are piquantly blended, and where the author's passionate love of beauty breaks in every line even in the musical titles—10 The Water of the Wondrous Isles, The Wood beyond the World, The Well at the World's End, The Land of the Glittering Plain.

The Craftsman

Morris's craftsmanship is in reality only another aspect of his work as a poet. Superficially there may seem a good deal of difference between a tapestry, a stained-glass window, and an epic: fundamentally there is no distinction. The divergence is one of technique, not of art. Throughout his life his poetic imagination inspired his craftsmanship and his craftsmanship materially affected his poetry. It has been said that Rossetti wrote his pictures and painted his poems. In a sense this is a perfectly just criticism, and it is equally just to say that Morris wrote his epics, and, if we cannot add that he wrote his tapestries, this is because his craftsmanship affected far more materially his verse than did his metrical skill as a poet affect his craftsmanship. He thought in arabesques and curves rather than in metre and rhythm. Even when talking to friends in casual conversation his hands would be unconsciously mapping out some design. His earliest activities were in an ecclesiastical direction, and here he had the co-operation of his lifelong friend Sir Edward Burne-Jones. The scope and extent of his work may be judged from glancing at the circular issued by Morris and Company.

"The growth of Decorative Art in this country," says the circular, "owing to the efforts of English Architects, has now reached a point at which it seems desirable that Artists of reputation should devote their time to it. Although, no doubt, particular instances of success may be cited, still it must be generally felt that attempts of this kind hitherto have been crude and fragmentary. Up to this time, the want of that artistic supervision, which can alone bring about harmony between the various parts of a successful work, has been increased by the necessarily excessive outlay, consequent on taking one individual artist from his pictorial labours."

"The Artists whose names appear, hope by association to do away with this difficulty. Having among their number men of varied qualifications, they will be able to undertake any species of decoration, mural or otherwise, from pictures, properly so called, down to the consideration of the smallest work susceptible of art beauty. It is anticipated that by such co-operation, the largest amount of what is essentially the artist's work, along with his constant supervision, will be secured at the smallest possible expense, while the work done must necessarily be of a much more complete order, than if any single artist were incidentally employed in the usual manner."

"These Artists having for many years been deeply attached to the study of the Decorative Arts of all times and countries, have felt more than most people the want of some one place, where they could either obtain or get produced work of a genuine and beautiful character. They have, therefore, now established themselves as a firm, for the production, by themselves and under their supervision, of—

- "I. Mural Decoration, either in Pictures or in Pattern work, or merely in the arrangement of Colours, as applied to dwelling-houses, churches, or public buildings.
- "II. Carving generally, as applied to Architecture.
- "III. Stained Glass, especially with reference to its harmony with Mural Decoration.
- "IV. Metal Work in all its branches, including Jewellery.
- "V. Furniture, either depending for its beauty on its own design, on the application of materials hitherto overlooked, or on its conjunction with Figure and Pattern Painting. Under this head is included Embroidery of all kinds. Stamped Leather, and ornamental work in other such materials, besides every article necessary for domestic use."

"It is only requisite to state further that work of all the above classes will be estimated for, and executed in a business-like manner, and it is believed that good decoration, involving rather the luxury of taste than the luxury of costliness, will be found to be much less expensive than is generally supposed."

From the church to the home was to Morris a natural transition. Here the work was more uphill, for Victorian England had claimed as an essential of decoration a style of ponderous ugliness, which Morris found it a hard matter to change.

It is impossible to over-emphasize the metamorphosis he managed to accomplish, and to appreciate its magnitude we have but to compare the picturesque gabled country house of to-day, and the now familiar scheme of decoration in which graceful Eastern rugs, neat Indian matting, and cheerful Axminster carpets play their part with the stiff dinginess of the old mid-Victorian house. Having purged our houses both outwardly and inwardly of the evil spirits of dirtiness and ugliness, Morris turned to book illuminating; after which he went thoroughly into the whole matter of dyeing, which lay necessarily at the back of all forms of craftsmanship.

This is a significant illustration of the man's extraordinary thoroughness, and explains the secret of the distinctive glory that lay in his Hammer-smith carpets and Merton tapestries. For abjuring modern methods and the favourite aniline dyes of the day, he restored the method of a bygone age, set up his own dye-house, and triumphantly proved the superiority of the old vegetable dyes.

His latest experiment in craftsmanship was in the art of printing as exemplified by the beautiful publications of the Kelmscott Press. A glance at any of these will convince the observer that Morris had thoroughly tackled the paper problem and had availed himself of the best varieties of type.

He had an unrivalled instinct in assessing the aptitude of other craftsmen. On one occasion he said of a man who had brought some decorative work to him: "That man hasn't an equal in Europe for drapery; but he's no good at faces."

His memory was phenomenally retentive. A thing once seen he never forgot. "On one occasion," Mr Thackeray Turner says, "he had just returned from surveying an old church; Morris recalled everything about that church, the disposition and character of the ornaments, and could tell exactly at what point in the church these were situated. Yet his only visit to this church had been made about twenty years previously."¹

On another occasion, his friend Mr Philip Webb showed him a design. Morris made little comment and seemed to be engrossed in other matters. But a long time afterwards he referred to the design, only seen for a moment or so, and recalled every detail about it. The secret of this lay, no doubt, in the fact that Morris gave his undivided attention to the matter in hand, whether a poem, a point in political economy, or a design. He took it in completely, and although he had the faculty of putting everything away from him when he turned to fresh matters, he always retained a clear and trustworthy recollection of the thing noted.

Throughout these various forms of craftsmanship there ran a common purpose and a common aim. All the decorative arts were made subordinate to architecture, and every manifestation of applied art was so framed as to serve the community. Its beauty and social utility were always kept in view.

The Social Reformer

Morris was first and foremost an artist, and it is pertinent therefore to inquire how it was he left the pursuit of art during later years in order to preach social reform. The more we study Morris' life-work, the more are we convinced that all his activities, whether artistic or social, form a homogeneous whole. He loved beauty as passionately as did Rossetti; but feeling with Ruskin that the majority of his fellow-men would never care for beauty until the ugliness of their lives and environment were changed, he set about to try and effect this. Carlyle had first touched his social sympathies, but undoubtedly the most powerful stimulus came from Ruskin in his famous chapter "On the Nature of Gothic" in The Stones of Venice.

Here is the interconnection between art and life clearly formulated. Like Ruskin, Morris entered social politics through the gateway of Aestheticism. He became a Socialist because, in his lifelong trade against the ugliness of modern life, he felt that unless conditions of labour were changed, his extension of art into every side of life would be an impossibility. He opposed capitalism in the same spirit as he opposed aniline dye, not primarily because it made for cruelty, but because it made for ugliness. Morris had as little patience with the "Art for Art's sake" of the aesthete as he had for the "Art for Ethics' sake" of the moralist. For him it was "Art for Life's sake."

Morris' social ideal differed from that pictured by Bellamy in his Looking Backward—an ideal termed by Morris "a Cockney Paradise." Socialism for him meant a communistic society with its implication of voluntary co-operation for common ends. Yet here again, as always, he was no mere visionary. He had no belief in catastrophic communism; he did not imagine that we could go asleep "on a Saturday in a capitalistic society and wake on Monday in a communistic society." He repudiated the idea of open war as a means towards the end desired. The change would, he knew, be a gradual one; and the best means of bringing it about was constant education, and the continual making of Socialists. A transitional period between the present capitalistic system and that of communism he knew to be inevitable. "Democracy said and says,"¹ he wrote, "men shall not be the masters of others because hereditary privilege has made a race or a family or so, and they happen to belong to such race; they shall individually grow into being the master of others by the development of certain qualities under a system of another which artificially protects the wealth of every man, if he has acquired it in accordance with this artificial system, from the interference of every other, and from all others combined. The new order of things says, on the contrary, Why have masters at all? Let us be fellows working in the harmony of association for the common good, that is, for the greatest happiness and completest development of every human being in the community."

Morris' socialism differed from that of Ruskin in being democratic in basis rather than aristocratic. The dominant note in Morris' message is liberty and equality. Ruskin's instincts were against trusting the people to manage their own affairs. Morris found the modern exponents of Liberalism too weak-kneed, and passed them by. But he started on the Liberal platform, and it was not because he disliked Liberalism but because he was impatient of Liberals that he left them.

For Ruskin, on the other hand, Liberalism was always anathema. He called himself an Illiberal, denounced Liberalism as tending towards anarchy, and pointed to the stock example of Liberal principles—America!

Morris' value as a social reformer must not be estimated merely by his lectures and propaganda work, nor even by his communistic romances, but by the whole effect of his work as an artist-craftsman.

Herbert Spencer has said, "You cannot get golden conduct out of leaden instincts." Morris agreed; but he did not leave the instincts alone as Spencer did to work out their own salvation through the slow process of evolution. He did his best to change them. Art for him was never a luxurious toy but an ethic, a creed for the betterment of the whole community.

THE HAYSTACK IN THE FLOODS

Had she come all the way for this,
To part at last without a kiss?
Yes, had she borne the dirt and rain
That her own eyes might see him slain
Beside the haystack in the floods?

Along the dripping leafless woods,
The stirrup touching either shoe,
She rode astride as troopers do ;
With kirtle kilted to her knees,
To which the mud splash'd wretchedly ;
And the wet dripp'd from every tree
Upon her head and heavy hair,
And on her eyelids broad and fair ;
The tears and rain ran down her face.

By fits and starts they rode apace,
And very often was his place
Far off from her ; he had to ride
Ahead, to see what might betide
When the roads cross'd, and sometimes, when
There rose a murmuring from his men,
Had to turn back with promises ;
Ah me ! she had but little ease .
And often for pure doubt and dread
She sobb'd, made giddy in the head
By the swift riding, while, for cold,
Her slender fingers scarce could hold
The wet reins, yes, and scarcely, too,
She felt the foot within her shoe
Against the stirrup all for this
To part at last without a kiss
Beside the haystack in the floods

For when they near'd that old soak'd hay,
They saw across the only way
That Judas, Godmar, and the three
Red running lions distantly
Grinn'd from his pennon, under which,
In one straight line along the ditch,
They counted thirty heads.

So then,
While Robert turn'd round to his men,
She saw at once the wretched end,
And stooping down, tried hard to rend
Her coil the wrong way from her head,
And hid her eyes, while Robert said .
" Nay, love, 'tis scarcely two to one,
At Poitiers where we made them run
So fast—why, sweet my love, good cheer,
The Gascon frontier is so near,
Nought after this "

But, " O," she said,
" My God ! my God ! I have to tread
The long way back without you, then
The court at Paris, those six men ;
The gratings of the Châtelet,
The swift Seine on some rainy day
Like this, and people standing by,
And laughing while my weak hands try
To recollect how strong men swim.
All this, or else a life with him,
For which I should be damned at last,
Would God that this next hour was past ! "

He answer'd not, but cried his cry,
" St. George for Marny ! " cheerily ;
And laid his hand upon her rein,
Alas ! no man of all his train
Gave back that cheery cry again ;
And, while for rage his thumb beat fast
Upon his sword-hilt, some one cast
About his neck a kerchief long,
And bound him.

Then they went along
To Godmar, who said " Now, Jehane,
Your lover's life is on the wane
So fast, that, if this very hour
You yield not as my paramour,
He will not see the rain leave off—
Nay, keep your tongue from gibe and scoff,
Sir Robert, or I slay you now "

She laid her hand upon her brow,
Then gazed upon the palm, as though
She thought her forehead bled, and—" No,"
She said, and turn'd her head away,
As there were nothing else to say,

And everything were settled . red
Grew Godmar's face from chun to head
" Jehane, on yonder hill there stands
My castle, guarding well my lands :
What hinders me from taking you,
And doing that I list to do
To your fair wifely body, while
Your knight lies dead ? "

A wicked smile
Wrinkled her face, her lips grew thin,
A long way out she thrust her chin :
" You know that I should strangle you
While you were sleeping, or lute through Your throat, by God's help—ah ! " she said,
" Lord Jesus, pity your poor maid !
For in such wise they hem me in,
I cannot choose but sin and sin,
Whatever happens, yet I think
They could not make me eat or drink,
And so should I just reach my rest "
" Nay, if you do not my behest,
O Jehane, though I love you well,"
Said Godmar, " would I sail to tell
All that I know " " Foul lies," she said,
" Eh ? lies my Jehane ? by God's head,
At Paris folks would deem them true "

Do you know, Jehane, they cry for you,
" Jehane the brown ! Jehane the brown !
Give us Jehane to burn or drown ! "
" Eh—gag me, Robert !—sweet my friend,
Thus were indeed a piteous end
For those long fingers, and long feet,
And long neck, and smooth shoulders sweet ;
An end that few men would forget
That saw it—So, an hour yet
Consider, Jehane, which to take
Of life or death ! "

So, scarce awake,
Dismounting, did she leave that place,
And totter some yards, with her face
Turn'd upward to the sky she lay,
Her head on a wet heap of hay,
And fell asleep, and while she slept,
And did not dream, the minutes crept
Round to the twelve again, but she,
Being waked at last, sigh'd quietly,
And strangely childlike came, and said
" I will not " Straightway Godmar's head,
As though it hung on strong wires, turn'd
Most sharply round, and his face burn'd

For Robert—both his eyes were dry,
He could not weep, but gloomily
He seem'd to watch the rain ; yes, too,
His lips were firm, he tried once more
To touch her lips, she reach'd out, sore
And vain desire so tortured them,
The poor grey lips, and now the hem
Of his sleeve crush'd them

With a start
Up Godmar rose, thrust them apart,
From Robert's throat he loosed the bands
Of silk and mail, with empty hands
Held out, she stood and gazed and saw
The long bright blade without a flaw
Glide out from Godmar's sheath, his hand
In Robert's hair, she saw him bend
Back Robert's head : she saw him send
The thin steel down ; the low toll'd well,
Right backward the knight Robert fell
And moan'd as dogs do, being half dead,
Unwitting, as I deem, so then
Godmar turn'd grinning to his men,
Who ran, some five or six, and beat
His head to pieces at his foot.

Then Godmar turn'd again and said :
" So, Jehane, the first fite is read !
Take note, my lady, that your way
Lies backward to the Châtelet ! "

She shook her head and gazed awhile
At her cold hands with a rueful smile,
As though this thing had made her mad

This was the parting that they had
Beside the haystack in the floods

NOW THEY COME TO A NEW LAND

Three days they drave before the wind, and on the fourth the clouds lifted, the sun shone out and the offing was clear, the wind had much abated, though it still blew a breeze, and was a head wind for sailing toward the country of Langton. So then the master said that since they were bewildered, and the wind so ill to deal with, it were best to go still before the wind that they might make some land and get knowledge of their whereabouts from the folk thereof. Withal he said that he deemed the land not to be very far distant.

So did they, and sailed on pleasantly enough, for the weather kept on mending, and the wind fell till it was but a light breeze, yet still foul for Langton.

So wore three days, and on the eve of the third, the man from the topmast cried out that he saw land ahead, and so did they all before the sun was quite set, though it were but a cloud no bigger than a man's hand.

When night fell they struck not sail, but went forth toward the land far and softly; for it was early summer, so that the nights were neither long nor dark.

But when it was broad daylight, they opened a land, a long shore of rocks and mountains, and nought else that they could see at first. Nevertheless as day wore and they drew nigher, first they saw how the mountains fell away from the sea, and wore behind a long wall of sheer cliff, and coming nigher yet, they beheld a green plain going up after a little in green bents and slopes to the feet of the said cliff wall.

No city nor haven did they see there, not even when they wore far nigher to the land; nevertheless, whereas they hankered for the peace of the green earth after all the toiling and unrest of the sea, and whereas also they doubted not to find at the least good and fresh water, and belike other bait in the plain under the mountains, they still sailed on not unerringly, so that by nightfall they east anchor in five-fathom water hard by the shore.

Next morning they found that they were lying a little way off the mouth of a river not right great; so they put out their boats and towed the ship up into the said river, and when they had gone up for a mile or thereabouts they found the sea-water failed, for little was the ebb and flow of the tide on that coast. Then was the river deep and clear, running between smooth grassy land like to meadows. Also on their left board they saw presently three head of neat cattle going, as if in a meadow of a homestead in their own land, and a few sheep, and thereafter, about a bow-draught from the river, they saw a little house of wood and straw-thatch under a wooded mound, and with orchard trees about it. They wondered little therat, for they know no cause why that land should not be builded, though it were in the far outlands. However, they drew their ship up to the bank, thinking that they would at least abide awhile and ask tidings and have some refreshment of the green plain, which was so lovely and pleasant.

But while they were busied herein they saw a man come out of the house, and down to the river to meet them, and they soon saw that he was tall and old, long-hoary of hair and beard, and clad mostly in the skins of beasts.

He drew nigh without any fear or mistrust, and coming close to them gave them the sele of the day in a kindly and pleasant voice. The shipmaster greeted him in his turn, and said withal: Old man, art thou the king of this country?

The elder laughed: It hath had none other a long while, said he, and at least there is no other son of Adam here to gainsay.

Thou art alone here then? said the master.

Yes, said the old man, save for the beasts of the field and the wood, and the creeping things, and fowl. Wherefore it is sweet to me to hear your voices.

Said the master: Where be the other houses of the town?

The old man laughed. Said he: When I said that I was alone, I moant that I was alone in the land and not only alone in this stead. There is no house save thus betwixt the sea and the dwellings of the Bears, over the cliff-wall yonder, yea and a long way over it.

Yea, quoth the shipmaster grinning, and be the bears of thy country so manlike, that they dwell in builded houses?

The old man shook his head. Sir, said he, as to their bodily fashion, it is altogether manlike, save that they be one and all higher and bigger than most. For they be bears only in name, they be a nation of half wild men; for I have been told by them that there be many more than that tribe whose folk I have seen, and that they spread wide about behind these mountains from east to west. Now, sir, as to their souls and understandings I warrant them not; for miscreants they be, throwing neither in God nor his hallows.

Said the master: Trow they in Mahound then?

Nay, said the elder, I wot not for sure that they have so much as a false god, though I have it from them that they worship a certain woman with mickle worship.

Then spake Walter: Yea, good sir, and how knowest thou that? dost thou deal with them at all?

Said the old man: Whiles some of that folk come hither and have of me what I can spare, a calf or two, or half-dozen of lambs or hoggets, or a skin of wine or cyder of mine own making, and they give me in return such things as I can use, as skins of hart and bear and other peltries, for now I am old, I can but little of the hunting horseabout. Whiles, also, they bring little lumps of pure copper, and would give me gold also, but it is of little use in this lonely land. Sooth to say, to me they are not masterful or rough-handed; but glad am I that they have been here but of late, and are not like to come again this while, for terrible they are of aspect, and whereas ye be aliens, belike they would not hold their hands from off you, and moreover ye have weapons and other matters which they would covet sorely.

Quoth the master: Since thou dealest with those wild men, will ye not deal with us in chaffer? For whereas we are come from long travel, we hanker after fresh victual, and here abroad are many things which were for thine avail.

Said the old man: All that I have is yours, so that ye do but leave me enough till my next ingathering. Of wine and cyder, such as it is, I have plenty for your service, ye may drink it till it is all gone, if ye will. A little corn and meal I have, but not much, yet are ye welcome thereto, since the standing corn in my garth is done blossoming, and I have other meat. Cheeses have I and dried fish, take what ye will thereof. But as to my neat and sheep, if ye have sore need of any, and will have them, I may not say you nay. But I pray you if ye may do without them, not to take my milch-beasts or their engenderers; for, as ye have heard me say, the Bear-folk have been here hut of late, and they have had of me all I might spare. But now let me tell you, if ye long after flesh-meat that there is venison of hart and hind yea, and of huck and doo, to be had on this plain, and about the little woods at the foot of the rock-wall yonder. Neither are they exceeding wild, for since I may not take them, I scare them not, and no other man do they see to hurt them, for the Bear-folk come straight to my house, and fare straight home thence. But I will lead you the nighest way to where the venison is easiest to be gotten. As to the wares in your ship, if ye will give me aught I will take it with a good will; and chiefly if ye have a fair knife or two and a roll of linen cloth, that were a good refreshment to me. But in any case what I have to give is free to you and wot come.

The shipmaster laughed: Friend, said he, we give thee mickle thanks for all that thou biddest us. And wot well that we be no lifters or sea-thieves to take thy livelihood from thee. So to-morrow, if thou wilt, we will go with thee and upraise the hunt, and meanwhile we will come aland, and walk on the green grass, and water our ship with thy good fresh water

So the old oarle went back to his house to make them ready what cheer he might, and the shipmen, who were twenty and one, all told, what with the mariners and Arnold and Walter's servants, went ashore, all but two who watched the ship and abode their turn. They went well-weaponed, for both the master and Walter deemed wariness wisdom, lest all might not be so good as it seemed. They took of their sail-cloths ashore, and tilted them in on the meadow betwixt the house and the ship, and the oarle brought them what he had for their avail, of fresh fruits, and cheeses, and milk, and wine, and cyder, and honey, and there they feasted nowise ill, and were right fain.¹

I. POETRY. ALGERNON CHARLES SWINBURNE His Life—His Work.

ALGERNON CHARLES SWINBURNE (1837-1909)

HIS LIFE

"Who gave thee words more golden than fine gold
To carve in shapes more glorious than of old,
And build thy songs up in the sight of time
As statues set in godhead manifold. . . .

The music of thy living mouth lives."

THESE felicitous words, written in 1872 on the death of his friend, Théophile Gautier, the French poet, apply with equal happiness to our English poet, Algernon Charles Swinburne.

Born in London on 5th April 1837, he was the eldest child of Admiral Charles Henry Swinburne (of an old Northumbrian family), who died in 1877, and Lady Jane Henrietta, daughter of the third Earl of Ashburnham, whose love for Italy and knowledge of Italian she imparted to her small son.

After an early education at home from tutors, Swinburne entered Eton in 1849, a small boy of twelve with a flowing mass of bright auburn hair, a highbred, intellectual face, and great brow—"nothing else big or strong about him," says Mrs. Warren Cornish, "except his huge literary tastes for obscure dramatists and Scotch reviewers"—and he might frequently be seen perched on a ladder in the Fellows' Library, hungrily devouring the writings of some beloved Elizabethan author.

Having won the Prince Consort's Prize for French, he was presented with a beautifully illustrated copy of Victor Hugo's Notre Dame de Paris. With this his delight was unbounded. On arriving home he came "hopping on one foot into the room, hugging the book," and could hardly bear it out of his sight. Thirty years later his joy was as great on meeting the famous author when, in November 1882, Le Roi s'Amuse was revived in Paris.

At Eton Swinburne was not always the good, studious little boy. "Here comes little Swinburne, late again," was the invariable greeting, and on one occasion he was ironically hailed by his tutor as "the rising sun." There is also a story told of him that when recovering from an attack of measles, a maid-attendant was asked to continue reading while he took his tea—she did so; but he, with the spirit of mischievous boyhood, took the opportunity to turn a pot of jam upside down on her head. Those with a taste for symbolism may construe this early escapade as an illustration of his later attitude towards the reading public.

A remarkably good swimmer, he was equally at home in the river as in the sea. "I can remember no earlier enjoyment," he once wrote, "than being held up naked in my father's arms and brandished between his hands, then shot like a stone from a sling through the air, shouting and laughing with delight, head foremost into the coming wave—which could only have been the pleasure of a very little fellow. I remember being afraid of other things, but never of the sea." This passion for the sea, however, nearly cost the poet his life at Etretat, but for the timely aid of some fishermen.

On leaving Eton in 1854, Swinburne read for two years with Dr. Woodford, and in 1856 went up to Balliol College, Oxford, his scholarly habits attracting the attention of the Master, Benjamin Jowett, who became his lifelong friend.

A literary set, presided over by John Nichol, of which the leading spirits were T. H. Green, A. V. Dicey, Birkbeck Hill, and Swinburne, founded the "Old Mortality" reading society, the members met once a week during term for reading and discussion. Differences of opinion inevitably arose between them, but as Swinburne had "the great power of loving his friends and bearing with them," this in no way marred their gatherings. Other friendships were also formed at this time. Dante Gabriel Rossetti was at work on the frescoes of the new building of the Oxford Union, William Morris and Edward Burne-Jones were also there, and Swinburne was soon drawn into that little circle of Pre-Raphaelites which included other intimate friends whom death alone claimed from him one by one.

Though he left Oxford in 1860 without a degree, it was admitted that Swinburne had a fine knowledge of Greek, in 1858 he had taken the Taylorian Prize for French and Italian, and in other subjects far exceeded the knowledge of his fellow-students, but failing to satisfy the examiners in Scripture he was "ploughed."

Of Swinburne's literary labours we hear of "four crudities," as he called them, contributed in 1858 to the short-lived Undergraduate Papers edited by John Nichol: the author criticises his papers as "showing a youngster's honest impulses, and sympathies, and antipathies." His third contribution, Church Imperialism, was, he tells us, "a terrific onslaught on the French Empire and its clerical supporters—which must, no doubt, have contributed to its (the Undergraduate Papers) ultimate collapse."

When I think of the marvellous work that

Rossetti had done at the same age, I am abashed at the recollection of my own rubbish."

On leaving Oxford, Swinburne spent some weeks in Italy, where he met "the most ancient of the demi-gods," as he was pleased to style Walter Savage Landor. Returning to London, where he might easily have led a life of leisure, he preferred to work, and throw in his lot with the Bohemian life of his friends. In 1862 he joined the Rossettis and George Meredith at 16 Choyne Walk, Chelsea; it was their intention to live a kind of collegiate life, each to have his own sitting-room, but with a dining-room in common. This arrangement was not successful, first Meredith departed, then Swinburne left to roam from one set of rooms to another until 1872, when the supreme friendship of his life began in the meeting with Theodore Watts-Dunton. From that time the two became inseparable. This friendship of high forty years is one of the most memorable in the history of our literature, and Watts-Dunton's devoted care proved the physical salvation of Swinburne, who at one time seemed marked out for an early death.

Few men have been more steadfast in their friendships than was Swinburne. In 1862, on the outburst against Meredith's Modern Love, he paid full homage to his friend's work in the columns of the Spectator, and in 1870, in dealing with Rossetti's Poems, that Buchanan attacked so venomously as The Fleishy School of Poetry,—Swinburne's generous tribute in the Fortnightly is noteworthy. "The subject-matter of Rossetti's work," said his brother poet, "is always great and fit, nothing trivial, nothing illicit, nothing unworthy the workmanship of a master-hand. What he would do is always what a poet should, and what he would do is always done." Triumph of Lyonesse was thus inscribed in 1882: "To my best friend, Theodore Watts, I dedicate in this book the best I have to give him."

With fine physical energy, a lover of the open air and the simplicities of life, he might be seen almost any morning about midday leaving The Pines, Putney Hill, in sunshine or rain, despoising overcoat or umbrella, for his walk across Wimbledon Common. The children were on the look-out for their friend, for they knew he was quite ready to play with them, and that his pockets were filled with sweets and biscuits.

"Two years and a half before Rossetti's death," writes Mr. Watts-Dunton,¹ "Swinburne and I became house-mates at The Pines, Putney Hill. From this moment his connection with bohemian London ceased entirely."

"He was now living en famille with me and my two sisters and a child, and then, after my marriage, with me and my wife. He always spoke of this change as the happiest event that had occurred in his life since his childish days in the bosom of his own family. . . . Here we received, besides the members of his own family, and his cousin Mrs. Disney Leith and her youngest daughter, very many friends. For he was fond of society, but it had to be what he called 'society of the right sort'—men and women of intellect and culture. Some of these have already recorded what they then saw of him. And many more will undoubtedly do so in the future. Gradually death removed many 'old familiar faces': these were replaced by new and younger ones. When we lost the most loyal of all, Jowett, I remember our serious talk—I remember showing Swinburne a few words of mine which I hope I shall be pardoned for recalling here, for they affected him deeply:

"One after one they go, and glade and heath,
Where once we walked with them, and garden
bowers
They made so dear, are haunted by the hours
Once musical of those who sleep beneath;
One after one does Sorrow's every wreath
Bind closer you and me with funeral flowers,
And Love and Memory from each loss of ours
Forge conquering glaives to quell the conqueror Death."

Thus, the later years of Swinburne's life moved tranquilly on. The fevers of youth were over, the stimulus at once intellectually provocative and emotionally disturbing of active participation in the social life of the day gave place to the healing balm and quieter joys of life at The Pines. There was no radical change in Swinburne's attitude towards men and things, his verse still retained its old trumpet note of exultation, but the note is deeper and mellower, and the raptures circle more and more around the large simplicities of nature. But if he withdrew from active participation in the life of the day, he never lost interest in affairs. What is more important, he never lost the power of eager enthusiasm that had marked his earlier years. Alas! that youthfulness of spirit should not keep pace with youthfulness of physique. Reckless of the failing faculty of physical recuperation, he defied the uncertainties of our climate, as had always been his wont, and paid the inevitable penalty. That attractive but trying jade, the English Spring—whom Robert Browning had wisely complimented from the warmth of Italy—turned and slew her intrepid admirer; and in 1900 "Keen April's clarion sound" proved the poet's death-knell.

He was buried in Bonchurch graveyard in the Isle of Wight.

"That enthusiastic, high-souled, and courageous man," wrote the Danish critic, George Brandes, at the time of his death—"I do not think that the English public venerated him as he deserved, and it is a disgrace to the Scandinavian North that he did not receive the Nobel Prize."

HIS WORK

The striking appearance and arresting personality of Swinburne have given rise to a legion of stories and pen portraits, many of which are entirely apocryphal, and not a few absurdly misleading.

Immediately after his death some descriptions of the man were given that are best epitomised as inspired by Pellegrini's famous caricature, and by the outrageous stories told about him by De Maupassant, whom Swinburne once designated as "a lar of the first magnitude." In these notices, Swinburne is seriously described as a sort of freak with an enormous head set upon a very slender neck with extremely sloping shoulders. As a matter of fact, every photograph of him entirely contradicts this. Swinburne's height was five feet four and a half inches, and his limbs were quite unusually strong and muscular. His head, as a whole, was but very little bigger than that of most men of his size, but it was his enormous dome of forehead which made it seem so big. As to his abnormally thin neck, the Rossetti portrait of him—by far the best of any—shows that his neck was, if anything, decidedly too thick.

Rossetti, like Ruskin and Burne-Jones, considered him very handsome, although rather too juvenile-looking for his age. Rossetti, indeed, proposed to him to sit for Sir Galahad. This proposition came to nothing, but he did succeed in securing him to sit for St. George in the St. George and Dragon cartoons for the Morris firm, and very beautiful cartoons they are. Rossetti frequently used Swinburne as a model.

As a young man, his splendid hair, intensely blue eyes, and lyrical utterance, marked him out especially. The beauty of his voice and the rapt unconcern with which he would descend on something that had stirred his enthusiasm, were characteristics that were as noticeable during his last days as they had been in his exuberant youth. Vehement and passionate as he could be when roused, bitingly satirical on matters that had stirred his contempt, there was a childlike trustfulness and a singular sweetness of disposition that made of him the most delightful of friends. Lyrical and sensitive natures such as his, are prone to be swept by storms of extravagant feeling from time to time, but beneath the easily ruffled surfaces, were depths of tranquil affection: "too full for sound and foam."

It is a safe thing to judge a man's character finally, by his friends and personal enthusiasms. The assertive virility of Landor, the noble humanitarianism of Mazzini, the superb passion of Victor Hugo, the enduring tenderness of Watts-Dunton,—such were the forces that counted most in Swinburne's life. Some of his "imperfect sympathies" (to use Lamb's expressive phrase) may have been due to little infirmities of temperament from which the best men are not free, but his sympathies were never misplaced. If there were great men whom he underrated; he never overrated little men. His heroes were real Olympians.

In an age of cultured poets, Swinburne was easily first. Even as a lad his range of reading was extraordinary; and his scholarship as a man gave him a distinctive place among our poets. His facility of expression was a natural endowment, but along with this was the fine self-criticism of the great literary artist, and no one could accuse him of premature publication. Much of his earliest work was relentlessly destroyed, and it was not till his twenty-fourth year that he published his first volume, The Queen Mother and Rosamond (1860).

The volume attracted little attention, but its successor, Atalanta in Calydon (1865) triumphantly vindicated Swinburne's place to a foremost position among the poets of his time. As a lyrical drama it is a superb piece of work, which marks out as clearly his kinship with Shelley as did Rossetti's poems his affinity with Keats. Then came Poems and Ballads in 1866, rich in music and colour, and vibrant with the pagan inspiration of Swinburne's earlier years. Rossetti's influence is more marked here than in Atalanta, and many of the poems indeed were written before Atalanta, but if influenced by Rossetti the individuality of the poet is clear and unequivocal enough, as the Hymn to Proserpine, with its metrical glory, would alone have attested. For the future Swinburne's work was divided between the dramatic and lyrical form; but even in the dramas the lyrical note is uppermost, and it is rather as a singer than as a teller of stories in action that Swinburne appeals to us. Yet he has produced, like Browning, a considerable body of dramatic work, and cherished, as Browning did, the ambition of achieving success in this direction. Each failed for opposite reasons; Browning because he was too much of the psychologist; Swinburne because he was too little. Browning analysed his creations, when he should have illustrated their characters in action—synthetically. Swinburne rhapsodised about his characters in place of letting them speak for themselves. But in neither case can the literary student afford to neglect the dramas. If Browning's are the more interesting intellectually, Swinburne's are richer in fine poetry. His unequalled knowledge of the Elizabethan dramatists proved a plenary poetic inspiration to lyric and drama alike, and Bothwell (1874), Mary Stuart (1881), Lochner (1887), to mention a few of the happiest, are delightful companions in the study.

In Songs before Sunrise (1871), the revolutionary note in Swinburne's work is uppermost. Already in A Song of Italy (1867), afterwards merged into Songs of Two Nations (1875), the love of liberty and hatred of tyranny had proclaimed itself, and another link with Shelley been revealed. But in his Songs before Sunrise, the note is fuller and more challenging than before. Mazzini's influence has swept away those elements in his work that bound him to Rossetti and the Pre-Raphaelites. He is never more eloquent in his passion, more orchestral in his music, than when singing of Italy and of her struggle for freedom.

The Republican ideal that glows through all the earlier political verse of the poet, contrasts strangely with his bitter attack on the Boers in later years, and warm admirers of the youthful Swinburne have shrunk repelled from the Swinburne of later years. Certainly he exhibited, more prominently than do many poets, the reactionary tendencies that often accompany age, as we have seen illustrated in the two Locksley Halls of Tennyson, but Swinburne's position is not such a reversal as at first sight it may seem. We have to remember that he was intensely national and patriotic as a poet, yet the England of his ideal was not Victorian England but the England of the seventeenth century.

Though he had not hesitated to rate his countrymen for their lukewarmness in matters that roused him to white-hot indignation, he saw in English institutions something far more consonant with his old republican ideal than he saw in the rule of Kruger, and rightly or wrongly he sided with England in the struggle against the Transvaal.

Yet, one cannot but turn back with a sense of relief to such noble utterances as the Sonnet to Louis Rossuth (1877). If in political matters he is less satisfying as a poet with the course of years, none could say that his muse lost either in cunning or in passion. Literature inspires him less and nature more, as time went on; and the beautiful nature poetry of his later years is among his most cherished work. None of our poets has more completely expressed in rhythmic beauty, "the rapturous resurrection of the year." If his powers mellowed as he grew older, his spirits seemed to grow more youthful. The poet of A Midsummer Holiday is younger than the poet of Faustine; and the fresh Blake-like sweetness of his lyrics on childhood, makes the amorous verse of the sixties strangely sophisticated and middle-aged by force of contrast.

So if the conservative accretions of age circumscribed his intellectual life with the passing of time, his imaginative life expanded and clarified. The influence of his intimate friend—one might say his only really intimate friend—Watts-Dunton, is no doubt largely responsible for this. Watts-Dunton's influence, both as man and as a distinguished man of letters, was of incalculable value to Swinburne; and none realised this more than the poet himself, as several of his famous dedications testify.

Technically, Swinburne's verse shows little development after the Poems and Ballads; for his powers as a literary artist ripened with astonishing rapidity. But the work of his later years gains in breadth and freshness, while losing no tittle of its brilliant finish and metrical beauty.

So far we have surveyed roughly the general trend of Swinburne's verse, let us now regard it in the light of certain real and inherent qualities.

It has been said of Swinburne that his inspiration came from books and not from life. So far as the latter half of Swinburne's poetic career is concerned the statement is grotesquely wrong; as regards the earlier half it is one of those mischievous half-truths harder to combat than a downright lie.

Swinburne was, as we have seen, a man of wide culture and fine scholarship; and his extensive acquaintanceship with the literature not merely of his own country but of Europe, is quite obvious to students of his poetry. It may be admitted that great erudition is not necessarily an advantage to a poet. often indeed it has served to chill and de-vitalise the creative imagination. The truth of this may be illustrated from the poetic work of Landor and Matthew Arnold. But in Swinburne's case it is not so. His earlier work shows a special sensibility to literary impressions, but even here he derives more from nature, and from the life of his time, than did his friend and contemporary William Morris. The chief point to note, however, is that there is nothing of the pedant or mere bookworm about his verse.

The fire of Swinburne's muse has power to fuse all his vast learning into an incandescent splendour, and only by delicate gradations of tint in the jets of glowing flame here and there do you recognise the rich purples of the South or the delicate amber of Provence, a flicker of Gallic gaiety or a flash of Italian passion. The learning is all there, but it has caught light. "The bush burns with fire and is not consumed." Naturally, there are poems that appeal more to the cultured than to the uncultured reader;

but it is a mistake to imagine that Swinburne's appeal is limited to the few.

It may surprise some people to learn that he appeals more strongly to the thoughtful artisan reader to-day than either Shelley or Tennyson. If there ever was a time when the merely literary poet would be elbowed aside, it would be to-day when there is an imperative demand for poets who shall deal with the primal matters of life and keep in close touch with living actualities.

Swinburne's popularity to-day is a tribute to the vitality of his work, even more than it is to its beauty. Beauty of workmanship has indeed never been more roughly and grudgingly appraised than it is to-day, as the present low ebb of Tennyson's popularity sufficiently indicates. We cannot therefore explain away Swinburne's hold on the reading public on purely æsthetic grounds. I believe that the power of fresh and happy observation (denied to Swinburne by some critics) is largely responsible for this. Take as illustration the following passages and examine them apart from their rhythmic loveliness, the touches of pictorial clarity are italicised.

"They watching till the day should wholly die
Saw the far sea sweep to the far grey sky,
Saw the big sands sweep to the long grey sea,
And night made one sure mist of moor and heath
And only far off shone the foam gave light,
And life in them sank silent as the night " 1

"The pastures are herdless and sheepless,
No pasture or shelter for herds,
The wind is relentless and sleepless,
And restless and songless the birds,
Their cries from far fall breathless,
Their wings are as lightnings that flee,
For the land has two lords that are deathless;
Death's self, and the sea " 2

"Tall the plumage of the rush-flower towses,
Sharp and soft in many a curve and line
Gleam and glow the sea-coloured marsh mosses,
Salt and splendid from the circling brine
Streak on streak of glimmering seashine towses
All the land sea-saturate as with wine " 3

"In a cleft of the cliff between lowland and highland,
At the sea-down's edge between windward and lee,
Walled round with rocks as an inland island,
The ghost of a garden fronts the sea
A girdle of brushwood and thorn encloses
The steep square slope of the blossomless bed
Where the weeds that grew green from the graves of its roses
Now he dead " 4

"Between the mowdawn and the sundown here
The twilight hangs half starless,
But higher the steep green sterile fields, thick set
With flowerless hawthorn even to the upward verge
Whence the woods gathering watch new cliffs emerge
Higher than their highest of crowns that sea-winds fret,
Hold fast, for all that night or wind can say,
Some pale pure colour yet,
Too dim for green and luminous for grey " 5

Are they not singularly happy in their detailed touches of observation, and in their open-air fragrance?

Swinburne's scholarship, then, is never pedantic. If this quality of Swinburne's verse, viz his vitalised scholarship, be regarded as one important feature, a more important still is the melodic splendour. This of course is the most obvious thing about his poetry, and even his most grudging critics have conceded it. Yet like many obvious criticisms the full value of its signification is not always realised. All great poetry must necessarily charm both the eye and the ear: these are the avenues by which it seeks to hold the imagination of the reader. To concede melodic beauty to a poet is really only to say in other words that he is a poet, and the question therefore in Swinburne is one of degree, not of kind. And it is here that the emphatic quality of Swinburne's music is appreciated; for he is the most musical of our poets.

In many of our poets the pictorial faculty is quite as dominant, sometimes, as in Rossetti's case, more dominant than the melodic. But in Swinburne's case everything is subordinate to the melodic.

"I would never have believed," said a distinguished critic, "that there could be such music in words, and especially in the English language." Just as Rossetti made thought pictorially sensuous, Swinburne has made thought musically sensuous. He is not merely melodic—Shelley was gloriously melodic—he is harmonic. Shelley's music is the music of the lute, Swinburne's the music of a full orchestra, his melodies are rich and complex, with a sweeping grandeur that no other poet has equalled, much less excelled.

The difference between the two may be appreciated if we compare Shelley's Cloud with one of the choruses in Atlantis—

"When the hounds of spring are on winter's traces,
The mother of months in meadow or plain
Fills the shadows and windy places
With hup of leaves and ripple of rain,
And the brown bright nightingale anorous
Is hilt assuaged for Ixylus
For the Thracian ships and the foreign faces,
The tongueless vigil, and all the pain

Where shall we find her, how shall we sing to her,
Fold our hands round our knees, and cling?
O that man's heart were as fire and could spring to her
Fire, or the strength of the streams that spring!
For the stars and the winds are unto her
As rament, as songs of the harp-player,
For the risen stars and the fallen cling to her,
And the south-west wind and the west wind sing."

Swinburne's verse may be likened to an orchestral concert with instrumental solos: we recognise both the melodious sweetness and quality of differing instruments, and the concerted harmonies of all playing together.

Here, for instance, is the wistful cadence of the violin:

"Here, where the world is quiet,
Here, where all trouble seems
Dead wind's and spent waves' riot
In doubtful dreams of dreams,
I watch the green field growing
For reaping folk and sowing,
For harvest-time and mowing,
A sleepy world of streams

I am tired of tears and laughter,
And men that laugh and weep;
Of what may come hereafter
For men that sow to reap

I am weary of days and hours,
Blown buds of barren fields
Desires and dreams
And every

Here we seem to hear the
"By the waters of Babylon we sat down and Remembering thee,
That for ages of agony hast endured, and slept,
And wouldst not see.

By the waters of Babylon we stood up and sang,
Considering thee,
That a blast of deliverance in the darkness rang,
To set thee free

And with trumpets and thunderings and with morning song

Came up the light,
And thy spirit uplifted me to forget thy wrong
As day doth night."

The expressive contralto of the viola sounds in the dirge:

"For a day and a night Love sang to us, played with us,
Folded us round from the dark and the light;
And our hearts were fulfilled of the music he made
with us
Made with our hearts and our lips while he stayed
with us,
Stayed in mid passage his pinions from flight
For a day and a night," and the limpid flutings of the reed instruments in these familiar lines:

"If love were what the rose is,
And I were like the leaf,
Our lives would grow together
In sad or singing weather,
Blown fields or flowerful closes,
Green pleasures or grey grief,
If love were what the rose is,
And I were like the leaf

If I were what the words are,
And love were like the tune
With double sound and single Delight our lips would mingle,
With kisses glad as birds are
That get sweet rain at noon;
If I were what the words are,
And love were like the tune

If you were life, my darling,
And I your love were death
We'd slune and snow together
Ere March made sweet the weather
With daffodil and starling
And hours of fruitful breathing,
If you were life, my darling,
And I your love were death

If you were thrall to sorrow,
And I were page to joy
We'd play for lives and seasons
With loving looks and treasons
And tears of night and morrow
And laughs of mad and boy,
If you were thrall to sor' Gw,
And I were page to joy

If you were April's lady,
And I were lord in May,
We'd throw with leaves for hours,
And draw for days with flowers,
Till day like night were shady
And night were bright like day;
If you were April's lady,
And I were lord in May

If you were queen of pleasure,
And I were king of pain,
We'd hunt down love together,
Pluck out his flying-feather,
And teach his feet a measure,
And find his mouth a rein,
If you were queen of pleasure,
And I were king of pain."

Whilst in Messidor rolls up the rhythmic beat of the drum and trumpets:

"For the hour is for harvest or fight
To clothe with raiment of red,
O men sore stricken of hours,
Lo, this one, is not it ours,
To glean, to gather, to smite?
Let none make risk of his head
Within reach of the clean scythe-sweep,
When the people that lay as the dead
Put in the sickle and reap

Lo, this one, is not it ours,
Now the ruins of dead things rattle,
As dead men's bones in the pit,
Now the Kings wax lean as they sit
Girt round with memories of powers,
With musters counted as cattle,
And armies folded as sheep,
Till the red blind husbandman battle
Put in the sickles and reap"

Finally, in the Hymn to Proserpine, the combined strength and beauty of the full orchestra are brought into requisition, and the result is a rush and glory of words unsurpassed in our language:

"In the night where thine eyes are as moons are in heaven the night where thou art,
Where the silence is more than all tunes, where sleep
overflows from the heart
Whose the poppies are sweet as the rose in our world, and the red rose is white,
And the wind falls faint as it blows with the flame of the flowers of the night,
And the murmur of spirits that sleep in the shadow of gods from afar
Grows dim in thine ears and deep as the deep dim soul of a star,
In the sweet low light of thy face, under heavens untold by the sun,
Let thy soul with their souls find place, and forget what is done and undone
Thou art more than the Gods who number the days of our temporal breath,
For these give labour and slumber, but thou, Proserpina, death
Therefore now at thy feet I bide for a season in silence
I know
I shall die as my fathers died, and sleep as they sleep, even so
For the glass of the years is brittle wherein we gaze for a span;
A little soul for a little bears up this corpse which is man
So long I endure no longer; and laugh not again, neither weep
For there is no God found stronger than death, and death is a sleep"

Nor is this orchestral analogy a mere fanciful analogy as some may imagine. Swinburne's verbal music is no more a mere matter of verbal sound than is great instrumental music. Its delight does not stop short at the ear. It is the medium through which he expresses his thought, just as a nocturne by Chopin, a sonata by Beethoven, a study by Schumann is the means of conveying to us, in terms of musical notation, the moods and fundamental ideas of the musician. What the proseman does by logical suasion, and most poets by pictorial appeal and intellectual suggestion, Swinburne tries to achieve by metrical modulation, and the countless vagaries of rhythmic cadence. The attempt is a daring one, and, it may be frankly conceded, is a method of approach that is apt to fatigue the reader when carried to excess. You cannot transfer the methods of one art to another without doing some violence to that other. And after all, language is not music, however musical it may be made. Yet this is only to say that Swinburne, like many another great literary poet, suffers at times from the defects of his artistic virtues.

Swinburne's prose is not on a level with his verse, as an art form, any more than Elizabethan prose is commensurate with its verse; indeed his prose has many, both of the excellences and defects of Elizabethan prose. It is over-elaborated, diffuse, and lacking in light and shade, it is also full of colour and impetuous strength, and more intensely individual than his verse.

Quite obviously, Swinburne lacked one essential of the great critic: a sense of relative values. His appraisement runs always to superlatives; his disapproval tends to become invective. He reminds one of the schoolboy who said he divided his books into those that were "topping" and those that were "rotten." Swinburne's critical appraisement is too often confined to incense and vitriol. This defect prevents some readers from appreciating the occasional flashes of wonderful critical acumen that light up many of his essays. He is not a great critic, but he has great moments as a critic. In his note on the Brontës, in his criticism of Matthew Arnold, of Shakespeare, Marlowe, and the Elizabethans generally, he abounds in brilliant suggestiveness, while his eulogy of Browning and of Blake is well-nigh perfect in its subtle appreciation and interpretative power, whilst even his panegyric on Dickens, overstrained as it is by superlatives, contains some of the truest things ever said about that great story-teller of the common people.

Moreover one thing emerges from his prose, and that is the spiritual intensity of the man, a quality of soul that you will find only in the great poet, and having apprehended it in his prose, you will realise it more clearly in his verse, especially with the progress of years. The shrill defiance of his earlier work deepens into a more comprehending sympathy as he grew older, though he never lost his spirit of vigorous independence and love of freedom. But he lays hold more firmly of the world of spirit, and of dimly understood forces and influences behind the world of sense and appearance, he deals more often with the life of man and the simple and primal facts of life.

There are times, of course, when the old magic fails; when his eloquence runs into misty verbosity. But no poet can always maintain the heights, and the wings of the most aspiring droop listlessly at times. So let us not cavil at his limitations, or blame him for what he never professed to give, but rather render thanks to the Muses for sending this daring and glorious singer at the close of an age so rich in poetic genius as the age of Shelley, Tennyson, and Rossetti.

KING LEAR

Of all Shakespeare's plays, King Lear is unquestionably that in which he has come nearest to the height and to the likeness of the one tragic poet on any side greater than himself whom the world in all its ages has ever seen horn of time. It is by far the most Æschylean of his works, the most elemental and primal, the most oceanic and Titanic in conception. He deals here with no subtleties as in Hamlet, with no conventions as in Othello; there is no question of "a divided duty" or a problem half insoluble, a matter of country and connection, of family or of race; we look upward and downward, and in vain, into the deepest things of nature, into the highest things of providence, to the roots of life, and to the stars, from the roots that no God waters to the stars which give no man light, never a world full of death and life without resting-place or guidance.

But in one main point it differs radically from the work and the spirit of Æschylus. Its fatalism is of a darker and harder nature. To Prometheus the fates of the lord and enemy of mankind were bitter, upon Orestes the hand of heaven was laid too heavily to bear, yet in the not utterly infinite or everlasting distance we see beyond them the promise of the morning on which mystery and justice shall be made one, when righteousness and omnipotence at last shall kiss each other. But on the horizon of Shakespeare's tragic fatalism we see no such twilight of atonement, such pledge of reconciliation as this. Requital, redemption, amend, equity, explanation, pity and mercy, are words without a meaning here.

"As flies to wanton boys are we to the gods;
They kill us for their sport."

Here is no need of the Eumenides, children of Night everlasting, for here is very Night herself.

The words just cited are not casual or episodic, they strike the keynote of the whole poem, lay the keystone of the whole arch of thought. There is no contest of conflicting forces, no judgment so much as by casting of lots; far less is there any light of heavenly harmony or of heavenly wisdom, of Apollo or Athene from above. We have heard much and often from the theologians of the light of revelation, and some such thing indeed we find in Æschylus, but the darkness of revelation is here.

For in this the most terrible work of human genius it is with the very springs and sources of nature that the student has set himself to deal. The veil of the temple of our humanity is rent in twain. Nature herself, we might say, is revealed—and revealed as unnatural. In face of such a world as this a man might be forgiven who should pray that chaos might come again. Nowhere else in Shakespeare's work or in the universe of jarring lives are the lines of character and event so broadly drawn or so sharply cut. Only the supreme self-command of this one poet could so mould and handle such types as to restrain and prevent their passing from the abnormal into the monstrous: yet even as much as this, at least in all cases but one, it surely has accomplished. In Regan alone would it be, I think, impossible to find a touch or trace of anything less vile than it was devilish. Even Goneril has her one splendid hour, her fire-faught of hellish glory, when she treads under foot the half-hearted goodness, the wordy and windy though sincere abhorrence, which is all that the mild and impotent revolt of Albany can bring to bear against her imperious and damnable devilhood, when she flaunts before the eyes of her "milk-livered" and "moral fool" the coming banners of France about the "plumed helm" of his slayer.

On the other side, Kent is the exception which answers to Regan on this. Cordelia, the brotherless Antigone of our stage, has one passing touch of intolerance for what her sister was upwards to hand as indiscipline and dotage in their father, which redeems her from the charge of perfection. Like Imogen she is not too unhumanly divine for the sense of divine irritation. Godlike though they be, their very godhead is human and feminine, and only therefore credible, and only therefore adorable. Cloten and Regan, Goneril and Iachimo, have power to stir and embitter the sweetness of their blood. But for the contrast and even the contact of antagonists as abominable as these, the gold of their spirit would be too refined, the light of their holiness too radiant, the violet of their virtue too sweet. As it is Shakespeare has gone down perforce among the blackest and the basest things of nature to find anything so equally exceptional in evil as properly to counterbalance and make bearable the excellence and extremity of their goodness. No otherwise could either angel have escaped the blame implied in the very attribute and epithet of blameless. But where the possible depth of human hell is so foul and unfathomable as it appears in the spirits which serve as foils to these, we may endure that in them the inner height of heaven should be no less immaculate and immeasurable.

It should be a truism well-nigh as musty as Hamlet's half-cited proverb, to enlarge upon the evidence given in King Lear of a sympathy with the mass of social misery more wide and deep and direct and bitter and tender than Shakespeare has shown elsewhere. But as even to this day and even in respectable quarters the murmur is not quite duly extinct which would charge on Shakespeare a certain share of divine indifference to suffering, of godlike satisfaction and a less than compassionate content, it is not yet perhaps utterly superfluous to insist on the utter fallacy and falsity of their creed who, whether in praise or in blame, would rank him to his credit or discredit among such poets as on this side at least may be classed rather with Goethe than with Shelley and with Gautier than with Hugo. A poet of revolution he is not, as none of his country in that generation could have been; but as surely as the author of Julius Cæsar has approved himself in the best and highest sense of the word at least potentially a republican, so surely has the author of King Lear avowed himself in the only good and rational sense of the words a spiritual if not a political democrat and socialist.¹

I. POETRY. THE PESSIMISTIC NOTE IN VICTORIAN POETRY Introduction.—A. H. Clough—M. Arnold—E. FitzGerald—James Thomson

THE PESSIMISTIC NOTE IN VICTORIAN POETRY

"THE poetry of later paganism lived by the senses, and incidentally, the poetry of mediæval Christianity lived by the heart and the imagination. But the main element of the modern spirit's life is neither the senses and understanding, nor the heart and imagination; it is the poetry of reason." In this last phrase we have the germ of the poetry of Pessimism. It was the endeavour to intellectualise the visions of the imaginative life that led Arnold, Clough, FitzGerald, and James Thomson into that mood of wastful melancholy, that crystallised soon into a more or less pessimistic criticism of life.

In each case, though in different ways, the poetic impulse was governed by the questioning attitude of a sceptical intellect

ARTHUR HUGH CLOUGH (1819-1861) was as a youth one of Thomas Arnold's pupils at Rugby. He entered Balliol College, Oxford, in 1837, and was deeply influenced by the theological controversies of the time. The friend of that stalwart and brilliant Roman Catholic, W. G. Ward, he was never able to accept his friend's unquestioning attitude, and with scrupulous conscientiousness that always marked him, he resigned a fine position as Fellow and Tutor of Oriel College, on account of his religious difficulties, and signalled this step not by any weighty manifestation of his feelings, but by a mirthful pastoral, The Bothe of Tober-na-Vuolich (1848), for he was at heart intensely relieved by this definite severance with the implication of orthodoxy. "I rejoice to see before me," he wrote, "the end of my servitude, yea, even as the weary feet-traveller rejoices at the sight of his evening hostelry, though there still lies a length of dusty road between." This was his first long poem, and gives us a just view of his capabilities and temperament. For all its play of humorous fancy, there is a deep underlying seriousness in the poem, and a sensitive appreciation of the weightiness of modern social problems. Interesting in its subject-matter and fresh in its treatment, it suffers from a certain roughness of artistry. Clough is only moderately successful in the use of the hexameter, and a much pleasanter illustration in modern verse may be found in Longfellow's Evangeline. His next publication was Amours de Voyage, written while travelling in Italy. The poem has slight artistic merit and is far inferior to its predecessor, but the theme is thoroughly characteristic of the man and his time—a kind of modern Hamlet, smitten by his own introspective questionings, so that he can embark on no settled course of conduct.

In the work that followed this, Clough essays an even bigger spiritual problem, and Dipsychus has been not unfairly compared in its general trend with Goethe's Faust, and in its treatment of evil, with Hawthorne's Marble Faun. It is a poem of considerable beauty in parts, but the subject was too vast for one with Clough's limited artistic powers to grapple with satisfactorily.

Clough is most satisfactory as a poet in his shorter pieces. His delicate spiritual feeling and intellectual hesitancy are nowhere more happily expressed than in the verses:

"Old things need not be therefore true,
O brother men, nor yet the new
Ah! still awhile the old thought retain,
And yet consider it again!

The souls of new two thousand years
Have laid up here their toils and fears,
And all the earnings of their pain,
Ah, yet consider it again!

We! what do we see? each a space
Of some few yards before his face,
Does that the whole wide plan explain?
Ah, yet consider it again!

Alas! the great world goes its way,
And takes its truth from each new day:
They do not quit, nor can retain,
Far less consider it again."

The pessimistic note is by no means dominant in Clough, and cheerfulness will break through at times, but there is more cloud than sunshine. There is even more cloud in the work of his better accomplished contemporary, Matthew Arnold.

MATTHEW ARNOLD (1822-1888)

HIS LIFE

Matthew Arnold, the eldest son of Dr. Arnold of Rugby, was born near Staines, December 24, 1822, receiving his education at Winchester, Rugby, and Balliol College, Oxford. Having secured the Newdigate Prize he passed to Oriel, and was elected a Fellow in 1845. For a while he served as private secretary to Lord Lansdowne, afterwards accepting an Inspectorship of Schools.

In 1849 he published his first volume, The Strayed Reveller and other Poems, "By A"; Empedocles on Etna came in 1852, a second series of poems in 1855, Merope in 1859, and the New Poems in 1867. Meanwhile it was in 1853 that he first gave a taste of his quality as a proseman. His critical prose was collected in 1865 and published under the title of Essays in Criticism; this was followed by Lectures on the Study of Celtic Literature (1867), Culture and Anarchy (1869), Last Essays on Church and Religion (1877), Mixed Essays (1879), and Irish Essays (1882).

In 1857 he had been elected Professor of Poetry at Oxford, received a pension of £250 a year in 1883, dying suddenly at Liverpool in April 1888.

A quiet, slight, delicate-looking man with a touch of superciliousness in his pleasant cultured voice, though nothing but graciousness in his manner; a presence that seemed to breathe a refined scholarly atmosphere. Unlike many poets who pass through one or other of the universities, Arnold was the personification of choice academic tradition. Oxford inspired some of his happiest verse, and who has summed up its peculiar charm more aptly than he?

"Beautiful city! So venerable, so lovely, so unravaged by the fierce intellectual life of our century, so serene! There are our young barbarians, all at play! And yet, steeped in sentiment as she lies, spreading her gardens to the moonlight, and whispering from her towers the last enchantment of the Middle Ages, who will deny that Oxford, by her ineffable charm, keeps over calling us nearer to the true goal of all of us, to the ideal, to perfection—to beauty, in a word, which is only truth seen from another side? Nearer, perhaps, than all the sciences of Tübingen. Adorable dreamer whose heart has been so romantic! who has given thyself so prodigally, given thyself to sides and heresies not mine, only never to the Philistines! home of lost causes, and forsaken beliefs, and unpopular names, and impossible loyalties!"

Roughly speaking, his earlier life is preoccupied with verse, his later with prose. But verse at occasional intervals he continued to write throughout his life from the early forties to the late sixties, though the bulk of it was written while he was a young man.

In his verse he is a critic of life—in the abstract; in his prose a critic of life—in the concrete; but a critic always, urbane, detached, with sincerity and serenity in everything that he has written.

HIS WORK

The writings of Matthew Arnold are characterised by three persisting qualities: Suavity—Wistfulness—and Serenity

He has other characteristics, as for instance lucidity, at which he aimed so continuously and successfully, and a faculty for sympathetic interpretation which gives much value to his critical work. But these and other qualities were not, I think, especially personal to Arnold; he shares them with other writers, whereas the suavity of his method, the wistfulness of his muse, and the serenity of his outlook are peculiarly individual.

There is a persuasive charm, a gracious sympathy about everything that Arnold wrote. He never storms or bullies, he will attack with gentle irony, but he is always courteous, always fair-minded. Even when limitations of temperament prevent him from appreciating poets like Shelley, no exception would be taken to his method of stating his comparative misfidence. Nothing could be better expressed from his own point of view than his summing up of Shelley as "a beautiful and intellectual angel beating in the void his luminous wings in vain."

The excessive praise and violent blame which some fine critics—as for instance Swinburne—do light in, was alien to his nature, and no better way of appreciating the mellow suavity of his critical method could be mentioned than that of picking out the writers whose work provoked no response in Arnold's breast.

There is a suavity rather than passion in his poetry. He will never be a favourite with ardent, impetuous temperaments. He is too severe, too chill for the sensitive emotion of youth. He is not fierce and scornful like Byron, even in his moods of opposition, but he is courteously hostile, ironical often, satirical rarely.

In the initial sonnet to the volume of 1849, he strikes this note of suave detachment:

"One lesson, Nature, let me learn of thee,
One lesson that in every wind is blown,
One lesson of two duties served in one,
Though the loud world proclaim their enmity—
Of toil unscovered from tranquillity!"

The suavity of Arnold is at its happiest in The Scholar Gipsy and Thyrsis, which rank among his best achievements. Here, Oxford and the Thames are the inspirations. These two poems cover nearly twenty years of his work.

Friendship inspired his art as it had inspired Tennyson's and Shelley's, and he forgets to brood and analyse his feelings. He is drawn out of himself. Friendship, the charm of Oxford, and the spell of the Thames—all these potent inspirations to Arnold meet and blend in those poems.

With what exquisite lucidity he paints the landscape in Thyrsis:

"So, some tempestuous morn in early June,
When the year's primal burst of bloom is o'er,
Before the roses and the longest day—
When garden-walks, and all the grassy floor,
With blossoms, red and white, of fallen May,
And chestnut flowers are strewn—

So have I heard the cuckoo's parting cry,
From the wet field, through the vest garden trees
Come with the volleying rain and tossing breeze
The bloom is gone, and with the bloom go I!

Too quick despairer, whenfore wilt thou go?
Soon will the high Midsummer pomps come on,
Soon will the musk carnations break and swell,
Soon shall we have gold-dusted snapdragon,
Sweet William with its homely cottage-smell,
And stocks in fragrant blow.
Roses that down the alleys shine afar,
And open, jasmine-muffled lattices
And groups under the dreaming garden-trees,
And the full moon, and the white evening-star."

How tenderly he bids the Scholar Gipsy fly from present-day complexities, in much the same spirit as Wordsworth did, though with a gentle importunity all his own.

This velvet glove of suavity, however, concealed a strong, virile hand. Arnold had the intellectual courage, the calm self-confidence of the great critic. But he had strong, decided opinions on politics, theology, and art, many of them directly counter to popular opinion. Yet bitter attack never disturbed him from his suavity, nor did neglect sting him into shouting as some writers have done when the world seemed deaf to their admonitions.

In temperament, analytical, introspective, prone to weigh, reluctant to be swayed by emotions, he felt the intellectual difficulties of his time, and could never quite escape their disturbing atmosphere. Empedocles solves the problem by throwing himself into a crater; Arnold, more restrained, throws himself into a sonnet, or elegy and thereby eases his mind.

In the poems to Marguerite (five in number)—a fair blue-eyed girl at Bernes—Arnold strikes that note of wistfulness so characteristic of his most individual poetic work. Conspicuously fine is the poem which begins:

"Yes! in the sea of life ensiled,
With echoing straits between us thrown,
Dotting the shoreless, watery wild,
We mortal millions live alone."

The dreamy sadness of the poet finds beautiful expression in lines which are at once forcible and nobly reticent:

"And bade betwixt their shores to be
The unplumb'd, salt, estranging sea."

How delicate the pathos in the more fanciful poem The Forsaken Mermaid. It has the quaintness, the naive simplicity and charm of Hans Andersen's Little Mermaid. Compare with this poem, The Buried Life, and Longing, and we realise forcibly the almost intolerable longing for human affection, especially womanly affection, that leaps up again and again in Arnold's work.

Take this from The Buried Life, with all its melancholy there is no self-sufficient pessimism. He shows what companionship may do to alleviate the fret and worry of life:

"Only—but this is rare—
When a beloved hand is laid in ours,
When, jaded with the rush and glare
Of the interminable hours,

Our eyes can in another's eyes read clear,
 When our world-deafen'd ear
 Is by the tones of a loved voice caress'd,
 A bolt is shot back somewhere in our breast
 And a lost pulse of feeling starts again :
 The eye sinks inward, and the heart lies plain,
 And what we mean, we say, and what we would,
 we know.
 A man becomes aware of his life's flow
 And hears its winding murmur, and he sees
 The meadows where it glides, the sun, the breeze.
 And there arrives a lull in the hot race
 Wherein he doth for ever chase
 That flying and elusive shadow, Rest
 An air of coolness plays upon his face,
 And an unwonted calm pervades his breast
 And then he thinks he knows
 The Hills where his life rose,
 And the Sea where it goes "

The serenity of Arnold differs from the serenity of Wordsworth, in that it is a state of mind consequent on intellectual effort, whereas with Wordsworth it was, largely at any rate, I believe, a matter of temperament. The brooding calm and emotional asceticism of Wordsworth, is best expressed by the word tranquillity. He had a native genius for transmuting sorrow and weakness into a quiet, but none the less intense, spiritual rapture

He wrought on sorrow till it became

"Sorrow that is not sorrow, but delight."

There is a sublime confidence about Wordsworth's muse, a deep cheerfulness—for him

"The harvest of a quiet eye,
 That broods and sleeps on its own heart"—

and it is the deep cheerfulness that Arnold lacks.

Arnold's serenity is the quiet stoicism of a melancholy soul.

"We cannot kindle when we will
 The fire which in the heart resides,
 The spirit bloweth, and is still—
 In mystery our soul abides—
 But tasks in hours of insight will'd
 Can be thro' hours of gloom fulfilled

With aching hands and bleeding feet
 We dig and heap, lay stone on stone,
 We bear the burden and the heat
 Of the long day, and wish 'twere done.
 Not till the hours of light return
 All we have built do we discern "

No whining with Arnold, no luxury of grief, no sentimental pessimism. Neither is there any joy, any real peace. It is the serenity of a troubled but brave spirit.

What could be more profoundly melancholy than the exquisite poem Dover Beach? Yet there is nothing maudlin, nothing unmanly about it. Poem after poem might be quoted, each imbued with a yearning, gentle wisdom, a pathetic resignation. He is restful—but not at rest, serene—but not tranquil.

He is not satisfied with calm:

"Calm is not life's crown, tho' Calm is well.
 'Tis all perhaps that man requires,
 But 'tis not what our youth desires."

But Arnold's outlook on life is not without hope. In The Future he points, with all the keen appreciation of Morris, to the message of the past, and contrasts its large vitality and freshness with the jaded commercial restlessness of to-day. In The New Age he adverts again to the past, bidding us reverence its traditions. There is a touch of hope as well as of pity in A Summer Night, and has melancholy, but it has also a hardy stoicism.

"Plainness and clearness without shadow of stain,
 Clearness divine!
 Ye Heavens, whose pure dark regions have no sign
 Of languor, though so calm, and though so great
 Are yet untroubled and unpassionate
 Who, though so noble, share in the world's toil,
 And though so task'd, keep free from dust and soil;
 I will not say that your mild depths retain
 A tinge, it may be, of their silent pain
 Who have long'd deeply once, and long'd in vain.
 But I will rather say that you remain
 A world above man's head, to let him see
 How boundless might his soul's horizon be,
 How vast, yet of what clear transparency
 How it were good to sink there, and breathe free
 How high a lot to fill
 Is left to each man still "

There is an increasing note of hopefulness and courage as the years roll on.

One turns to his reiterated admiration for Wordsworth and Goethe, as largely shaping his own ideal of life.

"But we brought forth, and reared in hours
 Of change, alarm, surprise,
 What shelter to grow ripe is ours,
 What leisure to grow wise

Too fast we live, too much are tried,
 Too harassed to attain,
 Wordsworth's sweet calm and Goethe's wide
 And luminous view to gain "

The calm and joy of Wordsworth, especially in his outlook on Nature, and the sane, large view of Goethe, in the healing power of Nature and the clarifying power of culture, Arnold found his inspiration. The quiet, delicate intelligence of Arnold is more readily seen in his prose, in his admirable criticism of modern social life in Culture and Anarchy.

In conclusion we may take note of the poet's fastidious workmanship, and of the many rhythmic felicities with which his work abounds:

"Still nursing the unconquerable hope—Still clutching the inviolable shade "

"Who saw Life steadily and saw it whole."

"She let the legions thunder past
 And plunged in thought again "

"And on his grave with shining eyes
 The Syrian stars look down "

"Strew on her roses, roses,
 And never a spray of yew.
 In quiet she reposes
 Ah! would that I did too."

"Of pebbles which the waves draw back, and fling,
At their return, up the high strand,
Begin, and cease, and then again begin,
With tremulous cadence slow, and bring
The eternal note of sadness in."

Then as an exquisite vignette of Nature, this from Tristram and Iseult—the sleeping children—Brittany:

"Ah, tired madoaps, you be still
But were you at the window now
To look forth on the fairy sight
Of your illum'd haunts by night—
To see the park-glades where you play
Far lovelier than they are by day
To see the sparkle on the caves,
And upon every giant laugh
Of those old oaks, whose wet red leaves
Are jewell'd with bright drops of rain—
How would your voices run again!
And far beyond the sparkling trees
Of the castle park one sees
The bare heaths spreading, clear as day,
Moor behind moor far, far away,
Into the heart of Brittany,
And here and there lock'd by the land,
Long miles of smooth glittering sea,
And many a stretch of watery sand
All shining in the white moon-beams
But you see further in your dreams"

Finally, this:

"All puns the immortal spirit must endure"

In short, Matthew Arnold was a fine artist; more limited than Tennyson in his music; less wide than Browning in his grasp of life, but unequalled in depicting certain wistful moods of the spirit.

Edward Fitzgerald's position as a poet stands somewhat apart from the Oxford men (Tough and Arnold), for he is not concerned immediately with the abstract questioning of his day. Yet spiritually he is akin with them, and his translation of Omar is a perfect expression, in terms of paganism, of the sceptical spirit.

EDWARD FITZGERALD, of Irish stock, was born at Bredfield House, Suffolk, in 1809, and educated at King Edward VI's School. In 1826 he went up to Trinity College, Cambridge. On leaving the university in 1830 he resided with his parents for eight years, after which, in a small cottage on his father's estate at Boulgo Hall, near Woodbridge, he lived the life of a recluse with his books and garden. In 1853 he changed his mode of living and settled at Furlingay Hall near Irv, and three years after married the daughter of his friend Bernard Barton, the Quaker poet, they separated shortly afterwards, and lived the remainder of their lives apart.

Slow to form friendships, when once made they were not easily broken. James Spedding and J. M. Kemble had been his friends at school, Thackeray and Tennyson had been with him at Cambridge, and it was to FitzGerald that Tennyson dedicated Tiresias,—all remained in closest intimacy with him till his death, notwithstanding his petulant and wayward disposition, and a certain want of tact in his critical estimates of their work.

Yachting and gardening were his favourite outdoor amusements, and he delighted in the society of the old fisherfolk of Aldborough and Lowestoft. While paying his annual visit to his friend the Rev. George Crabbo at Merton Rectory, Norfolk, he died suddenly in 1883, and is buried at Boulgo.

His first work, Euphranor, was published anonymously in 1851, and a year later Polonius. A Collection of Wise Sayings and Sayings From a study of Spanish he turned to Persian. When visiting the Bodleian Library in 1856 he became attracted by the works of Omar Khayyám, the eleventh-century astronomer-poet of Persia, and he at once set to work on a translation that he published anonymously in 1859. FitzGerald was also a charming letter writer, the most interesting letters, perhaps, being those To Fanny Kemble.

By nature a shy, diffident man, of simple tastes and eccentric habits, he had nothing of that itch for fame that drives many men into literature, yet as Johnson said of Swift, "he touched nothing that he did not adorn," was an exquisite proseman, and a translator of the highest kind. What that kind is, Professor Norton has admirably indicated, "One who should express the poetic transfusion of a poetic spirit from one language to another, and the representation of the ideas and moods of the original . . . the work of a poet inspired by the work of a poet . . . the redactions of a poetic imagination."

His earliest experiments in translation were from Calderon's dramas. With his genius for discerning the spirit beneath the mere letter, he made no attempt at literal translation, omitting and adding with a freedom that would appal the dry-as-dust scholar. As a result he made Calderon live for English readers.

In dealing with Sophocles and Æschylus his omissions and additions are less justifiable, for he is not so successful here in preserving the spirit of the original, but in his last and greatest work, his translation of the Rubáiyát of Omar Khayyám (1859), he is supremely successful. And for this reason. Although only a tolerable scholar, with a partial knowledge of Persian, he found in Omar a writer with whom he was spiritually at one, and for this reason his bold and unblushing liberties with the text, his own variation to the original music are in perfect accord with the primal melody. A literal translation, as the student of letters knows, often does far less justice to the genius of the original than a free translation.

FitzGerald's Omar, it may be admitted, has more of FitzGerald than of the Persian poet in its actual content. Indeed we must say, FitzGerald's version is less properly described as a translation than as a transcript in terms of Western feeling of an Oriental subject, and we have only to place side by side some of the literal translations extant with FitzGerald's version, to feel that it is quite possible to have the letter and miss the spirit.

For this reason FitzGerald's translation has the force and beauty of an original work. Omar's indebtedness to FitzGerald is really scarcely inferior to the English poet's more obvious indebtedness to the Persian. No book of primary significance ever made so insignificant an appearance. Two hundred and fifty copies only were printed, and two hundred of these FitzGerald presented to his publisher, Quaritch, most of the remainder were hurried into some obscure hiding-place, the author believing that scarcely anyone would be interested and not a few shocked by his work. He had not gauged incorrectly the lack of interest. A year after their publication, Rossetti and Swinburne came across copies at a penny each, this being the price the average inquisitive customer placed on the poem.

The Rubáiyát is like some rich mosaic, constructed out of divers patterns, each with a design and scheme of its own, yet related also in a large sense to some general scheme of decoration. In its cumulative effect it may be compared with In Memoriam. In each case we have a succession of moods cunningly wrought, each mood fashioned with delicate artistry, yet in its varying pictures presenting a certain oneness of design. Like Tennyson's great poem, the Rubáiyát is also a criticism of life, less explicit, less polemical in its form, but none the less definite. In its outlook Tennyson's poem stands midway between FitzGerald's Rubáiyát and Browning's Easter Day, blending the two characteristics of the day—a wistful hesitancy and a religious optimism—in a way that proved by its very compromise extremely welcome and soothing to many minds. FitzGerald's frank fatalism appealed to only a few, and repelled the majority, yet no more beautiful expression of an Epicurean philosophy has been uttered by an English writer. However we may resent its implications or dissent from its philosophy of life, we cannot as students of literature be blind to its artistic beauty, and its fine sincerity of utterance. FitzGerald's Omar has been likened to Horace, and the points of contact are admittedly obvious. Yet there are very pronounced differences.

Horace's gay cynical acceptance of things as they are, his airy and graceful materialistic outlook is fundamentally separated from the passionate regrets and genuine intensity of the Rubáiyát. Each writer, it is true, says in effect, Let us eat and drink, for to-morrow we die, but the tone is vastly different. "Carpe Diem," cried Horace, with the easy indifference of a cultured man of the world. Enjoy your day and make the most of your pleasant moments while you have the capacity to enjoy. FitzGerald strikes a more poignant note:

"Alas, that Spring should vanish with the Rose!
That Youth's sweet-scented Manuscript should close!
The Nightingale that in the Branches sang,
Ah whence, and whither flown again, who knows?"

Horace questions the meaning of life, and finding it insoluble, shrugs his shoulder and passes on, FitzGerald finds it equally inscrutable, but cannot adopt the careless pose of the Persian:

"There was the Door to which I found no Key;
There was a Veil past which I could not see;
Some little Talk awhile of ME and THEE
There seemed—and then no more of THEE and ME."

If we cannot accord FitzGerald a place among our greatest poets, because his work necessarily lacks creative originality in its primary inspiration, he is none the less a poet of great distinction, and a literary artist of the first order.

Inferior in his art to FitzGerald, yet like him endowed with a very real poetical imagination, and probably the most imaginative of all our sceptical poets, is JAMES THOMSON (the second). He was born in 1834 and died in 1882. His was a storm-tossed unhappy life, as much the result of an unfortunate temperament as of untoward circumstances. The son of a sailor, he was born at Port Glasgow, educated at the Caledonian Asylum, and became first an army schoolmaster, then a journalist. He was a striking though unequal writer of prose, and the same inequality pertains to his verse, but the power and intensity of his City of Dreadful Night (published originally in a "free-thought" newspaper, the National Reformer) is unquestionable. Thomson was forty years old when he wrote this poem, and the gloom and depression that envisage the poem are due largely to the many disappointments he had suffered, intensified by his constitutional intemperances.

Life is a hell, and Progress an illusion, that is the burden of the poem. Pessimism could go no further, but happily few pessimists even carry out their convictions to the logical extreme. Even Thomson had his brighter moods, and fought for a while his despairing creed, while despite his views on progress, he grudged no time nor labour in aiding his fellow-men.

In addition to The City of Dreadful Night, Thomson wrote also Vane's Story (a thinly disguised fragment of autobiography), and Weldah and Om-el-Bonair, less powerful than The City of Dreadful Night, but exhibiting a great deal of poetic beauty, and though sombre in view the greys are flecked here with gold. These are all of considerable length. His earliest and latest work contain poems of lighter and more agreeable quality, such as The Two Idylls of Cockayne, and Sunday up the River and Sunday at Hampstead (1859), and He heard her sing (1892). As a man, his brighter moments are even more frequent than as a writer, and it is somewhat curious to read of him during his later days that on one occasion his host "recalls three days of incessant mirth and midsummer pleasure, Thomson being chief jester!"

His infirmities were unhappy legacies of a vitiated stock; for the rest he was, in his happier moments, an affectionate and steadfast friend, a delightful companion, and an unselfish worker in the cause of humanity.

INTRODUCTION

THAT women should not only have made their mark in English fiction before they achieved distinction in verse, but continue to excel in prose rather than in verse, may at first sight appear strange to those who regard women as the more emotional and more imaginative sex. But so soon as we realise that psychological differentiation between the sexes (touched upon when dealing with the rise of the woman novelist), the predominance of woman in fiction and her relatively slight achievements in poetry become quite explicable. For woman is neither more emotional nor more imaginative than man, but her emotions and her imagination move on a different plane, a plane more concrete, more personal, more circumscribed in its interests, and the feminine impulse towards self-expression finds more readily, more easily, expression in a medium dealing on the whole less in abstractions, less logical and exacting in form than in verse. There are exceptions, of course, as I said in dealing with the rise of the woman novelist, just as there are masculine women and feminine men, and just as the normal sexual impulse is subject to the most extraordinary perversions, but as a rule—and happily for mankind—the unagitative and intellectual life of men and women is a complementary and divergent one.

In ballad writing, the contributions of women writers are comparatively slight, a few women have written songs, no whit inferior to the best that Burns has given us though giving a distinctively feminine point of view—as for instance, Auld Robin Gray, The Land o' the Leal, and Call'er Herrin'. Indeed, Scotland may claim priority to England as the nursery of the woman poet, for in addition to the balladists there was JOANNA BAILLIE who, though less original than Fanny Burney, occupies somewhat the same place in the development of the woman poet that the author of Evelina did in the development of the woman novelist. A more versatile and accomplished writer of verse was FANNY KEMBLE, grandmother of the tragedienne Mrs Siddons, but neither in her case nor in the case of the facile Mrs Hemans is there much originality, or a pronounced feminine note. Sara Coleridge wrote too little for us to judge fairly of her artistic power, but she had certainly a touch of the Coleridge genius, and of her intellectual gifts there can be no question. The genius of the Sheridan family is illustrated by its two brilliant sisters, one, HELEN SHERIDAN (Lady Dufferin), whose Lament of the Irish Emigrant has a tender charm that no familiarity can spoil; while her younger sister, CAROLINE (Hon Mrs Norton), whose life story inspired Meredith with his Diana of the Crossways, can at any rate hold her own with Mrs Hemans as a flamboyant but spirited balladist. In Mrs CLIVE (1801–1873) there is less force than in many of her predecessors, but greater distinction and artistic finish.

In EMILY BRONTË there is both force and distinction, and that to a remarkable extent, slight as is the body of her work. Indeed Emily Brontë is the only one of the Brontë sisters whose verse has directly the touch of genius. CHARLOTTE BRONTË's verse rarely, and ANNE BRONTË's never, rises above the commonplace.

The position of Emily Brontë in our literature is indeed unique. That one whose experience of life was so limited, whose literary training was so slight, whose artistic content is so little varied and extensive in quantity should have impressed us indisputably, as a woman of high genius, is one of the marvels of literary history. Of Wuthering Heights, which is fundamentally not a novel but a prose-poem, rough brown, elemental and sublime, mention is made elsewhere. I cannot, as some critics do, place her verse on a higher level, or even so high a level, though the famous Last Lines assuredly touch that level.

No coward soul is mine,
No trembler in the world's storm-troubled sphere
I see Heaven's glories shine,
And faith shines equal, arming me from fear

O God within my breast,
Almighty, ever-present Deity!
Life—that in me has rest,
As l—ndying Life—have power in thee!

Vain are the thousand creeds
That move men's hearts; unalterably vain,
Worthless as withered weeds,
Or idlest froth amid the boundless main,

To waken doubt in one
Holding so fast by truth's infinity,
So surely anchored on
The steadfast rock of immortality

With wide-embracing love
Thy spirit animates eternal years,
Pervades and broods above,
Charges, sustains, dissolves, creates, and rears

Though earth and man were gone,
And stars and universe cease to be,
And Thou wert left alone,
Every existence would exist in Thee

There is not room for Death
Nor atom that his might could render void—
Thou—Thou art Being and Breath,
And what Thou art may never be destroyed."

But she rarely wrote a stanza that has not the touch of fine poetry in it; such poems as A little while, a little while, the weary task is put away, Remembrance, Shall Earth no more inspire thee? The Linnet in the rocky dell—to mention a few only, are instinct with true poetic genius—a genius that triumphs over slight technical defects.

Greatness also belongs to a writer whose body of work is, of course, far more considerable, and more closely connected with the life of her age—ELIZABETH BARRETT BROWNING

ELIZABETH BARRETT BROWNING
(1806-1861)

Elizabeth, daughter of Edward Moulton Barrett, was born at Coxhoe Hall, Durham, on March 6, 1806. She was naturally studious, thoughtful, and dreamy, delighting to " . . . escape

As a soul from the body, out of doors
Then back again before the house should stir"— and lived in a world of books, with a keen love for the Greek classics. Her garden was laid out to represent "Old Hector, once of Troy," and she almost believed that it contained the disembodied soul of her hero.

Educated at home and with her brother Edward until he was sent to Charterhouse, she pursued her studies with the blind scholar, Hugh Stuart Boyd, and wrote The Battle of Marathon, published by her father in 1826. At fifteen, through a spinal injury, she became an invalid.

Shortly after the removal of the family to London, the young poetess published The Romaunt of Margret, The Rhyme of the Duchess May, and The Lay of the Brown Rosary, and formed many notable friendships—Wordsworth, Landor, Miss Mitford—and John Kenyon, to whose unfailing interest she owed so much.

In 1840 her beloved brother Edward, while on a visit to her at Torquay, was drowned in Babbacombe Bay. At first prostrate with grief, her wonderful courage and innate cheerfulness induced her to throw herself into her work, although practically a prisoner moving only from bed to sofa.

Mutually attracted as they were, when Robert Browning and Elizabeth Barrett first met, she deemed it her duty to hide her feelings, but her scruples were soon overcome, and their marriage took place.

A deep sympathy with the oppressed and down-trodden women and children had found earlier expression. In later years she threw her whole heart and soul into the struggle for Italian Independence. After the Peace of Villafranca she was seriously ill, and the subsequent death of her hero, Cavotti, probably hastened her end. Seized with a bronchial attack, she died in the arms of her husband on June 28, 1861, and was buried in the English cemetery at Florence.

An eager and enthusiastic student with a sensitive and strongly emotional nature, she began to write long before she had mastered the technique of her art. And her active imagination and vital interest in human affairs were always in excess of her power of execution. But despite an astonishing amount of slovenly writing there is work of the highest quality; and even her poorest output never lacked vitality. She has many of the merits of the great romantic writers; but the defects and weaknesses that poets like Keats and Coleridge sternly combated and subdued remained with Elizabeth Barrett Browning all her life, and have distressed some readers as they long ago distressed and exasperated FitzGerald, so as to blind them to the splendid opulence and deep imaginative insight of a goodly portion of her work.

Mrs Browning's poetry bears much the same relation to the life of her times as does Charles Reade's fiction. It is charged with a passionate humanitarianism that makes of it a vigorous radical force in all the forward movements of the day. She is quâ literary artist thoroughly romantic in her methods and ideals, but her romanticism is chiefly turned upon the problems of her own age and of her own sex, for Charlotte Brontë herself was not more thoroughly feminine in her outlook than Elizabeth Barrett Browning. Indeed it is the eagerness and enthusiasm with which she takes up these problems, that makes her careless as an artist. In her lack of form she resembles her husband, but there is this difference. Browning deliberately chose a rough medium, in order more effectually to express his thoughts; at times he is inartistic by malice prepense. Mrs Browning seems entirely unconscious of what form she is using, when she is thoroughly possessed of her subject; and even when she is on the alert, her artistic sensibilities are blunter than those of Robert Browning, and the awkward line or the jarring sound will spoil some passage of great beauty.

Mrs Browning's sequestered life and scholarly sympathies give necessarily a bookish inspiration to her earliest work, but her lyrical gift, with all its sweetness and spontaneity, is disclosed even in this experimental stage. The first poem in which she showed her power is the Romaunt of Margret. This is thoroughly in the old romantic vein; a vein that suited her methods very happily, for her sense of mystery, her simple human longings, even her very peculiarities of diction harmonize with the genre of the romantic ballad. But she had too urgent a sense of present-day actualities to rest content with these pleasant ways of verse, although she has returned to them somewhat later in The Rhyme of the Duchess May and the Lay of the Brown Rosary, poems richer than Margret in romantic feeling and certainly surer in workmanship.

Personal griefs and delicate health suddenly forced upon her attention the universal problem of pain and suffering, and for some years her work is essentially didactic in form, as witness The Cry of the Human and The Dead Pan. But despite lines of beauty, these poems are lacking in that appealing magic that we find in her best work.

One of her happiest social utterances in verse is The Cry of the Children, that by its large-hearted compassion and simplicity of treatment, deservedly takes a high place in propaganda poetry, though here and there perhaps the greater artistic restraint shown by her contemporary, Hood, would have added to its poignancy.

THE CRY OF THE CHILDREN

Do ye hear the children weeping, O my brothers,
Ere the sorrow comes with years?
They are leaning their young hearts against their mothers,

And that cannot stop their tears
The young lambs are bleating in the meadows,
The young birds are chirping in the nest,
The young fawns are playing with the shadows,
The young flowers are blowing toward the west—

But the young, young children, O my brothers,
They are weeping bitterly !
They are weeping in the playtime of the others,
In the country of the free.

They look up with their pale and shrunken faces,
And their looks are sad to see,
For the man's hoary anguish drawn and presses
Down the cheeks of infancy
" Your old earth," they say, " is very dreary ;
Our young feet," they say, " are very weak !
Few paces have we taken, yet are weary—
Our grave-rest is very far to seek
Ask the aged why they weep, and not the children ;
For the outside earth is cold,
And we young ones stand without, in our bewildering,
And the graves are for the old "

Alas, alas, the children ! they are seeking Death in life, as best to have,
They are binding up their hearts away from breaking
With a cement from the grave
Go out, children, from the mine and from the city,
Sing out, children, as the little thrushes do ;
Pluck your handfuls of the meadow cowslips pretty,
Laugh aloud, to feel your fingers let them through !
But they answer, ' Are your cowslips of the meadows
Like our weeds anear the mine ?
Leave us quiet in the dark of the coal-shadows,
From your pleasures fair and fine !

" For oh," say the children, " we are weary,
And we cannot run or leap,
If we cared for any meadows, it were merely
To drop down in them and sleep
Our knees tremble sorely in the stooping,
We fall upon our faces, trying to go,
And, underneath our heavy eyelids drooping,
The reddest flower would look pale as the snow !
For, all day, we drag our burden turning
Through the coal-dark, underground—
Or, all day, we drive the wheels of iron
In the factories, round and round

" For, all day, the wheels are droning, turning,—
Their wind comes in our faces,—
Till our hearts turn,—our head, with pulses burning,
And the walk turn in their places
Turns the sky in the high windows blank and reeling,
Turns the long light that drops adown the wall,
Turn the black flies that crawl along the ceiling,
All are turning, all the day, and we with all
And all the day, the iron wheels are droning
And sometimes we could pray,
' O ye wheels ' (breathing out in a mad moaning),
' Stop ' be silent for to-day ! "

They look up with their pale and sunken faces,
And their look is dread to see,
For they mind you of their angels in high places,
With eyes turned on Deity :—
" How long," they say, " how long, O cruel nation,
Will you stand, to move the world, on a child's heart,—
Stifle down with a mailed heel its palpitation,
And tread onward to your throne amid the mart ?
Our blood splashes upward, O gold-heaper,
And your purple shows your path !
But the child's sob in the silence curses deeper Than the strong man in his wrath "

The love story of Mrs Browning proved a significant factor not only in her emotional experience but in her work as a poet. The poems in which she has enshrined that love remain her highest achievement in poetry. The so-called Sonnets from the Portuguese, published in 1850, were written some years earlier.

Browning has told us of his first introduction to them. " One day, early in 1847, their breakfast being over, Mrs Browning went upstairs, while her husband stood at the window watching the street till the table should be cleared. He was presently aware of some one behind him, although the servant was gone. It was Mrs Browning, who held him by the shoulder to prevent his turning to look at her, and at the same time pushed a packet of papers into the pocket of his coat. She told him to read that, and tear it up if he did not like it ; and then she fled again to her own room "

The restraining influence necessarily laid upon the writer by the form of the sonnet, gave unusual excellence to her craftsmanship here, whilst the personal character of the poem was particularly suited to her genius. She did her best invariably under the influence of powerful emotion and her intense affection for Robert Browning finds frank and unreserved expression in these beautiful poems. No finer statement of a woman's passion—of love from the feminine standpoint—exists in our literature.

SONNETS FROM THE PORTUGUESE

I thought once how Theocritus had sung
Of the sweet years, the dear and wished for years,
Who each one in a gracious hand appears
To bear a gift for mortals, old or young
And, as I mused it in his antique tongue,
I saw, in gradual vision through my tears,
The sweet, sad years, the melancholy years,
Those of my own life who by turns had flung
A shadow across me. Straightway I was wiser,
So weeping how a mystic Shape did move
Behind me, and drew me backward by the hair,
And a voice said in mystery while I strove
" Guess now who holds thee ? "—" Death," I said
But then,

The silver answer rang . . . " Not Death, but Love "

XXXV

If I leave all for thee, wilt thou exchange
And be all to me ? Shall I never miss
Home talk and blessing and the common kiss
That comes to each in turn, nor count it strange,
When I look up, to drop on a new range
Of walls and floors, another home than this ?
Nay, wilt thou fill that place by me which is Filled by dead eyes too tender to know change ?
That is hardest. If to conquer love, has tried
To conquer grief, true more as all things prove,
For grief indeed is love and grief beside Alas ! I have guessed so I am hard to love
Yet love me—wilt thou ? Open thine own heart wide
And fold within, the wet wings of thy dove

XLIII

How do I love thee ? Let me count the ways,
I love thee to the depth and breadth and height
My soul can reach, when feeling out of sight
For the ends of Being and ideal Grace
I love thee to the level of every day's
Most quiet need, by sun and candlelight
I love thee freely, as men strive for Right ;
I love thee purely, as they turn from Praise,
I love thee with the passion put to use
In my old griefs, and with my childhood's faith,
I love thee with a love I seemed to lose
With my lost saints,—I love thee with the breath,
Smiles, tears, of all my life!—and, if God choose,
I shall but love thee better after death

Italy, that affected so strongly her husband's work, proved also a freshening inspiration in her own ; better health, a more varied experience of life, played their part also in giving a larger ease and surer mastery of her material to her work during her married life. Undoubtedly, Aurora Leigh, which is the chief fruit of those later years, presents us at once with the writer's maturest thought on the social problems of her day and some of her best work as a poet. Aurora Leigh is a fragment of spiritual autobiography, and its vitality lies in its intimate revelation of the writer's nature, temperament, and outlook. The story, of course, is a fictitious one, and like many stories in verse, is neither very clear nor very effective. Mrs. Browning had little narrative power, and it would have been better had she not planned her poem on so ambitious and elaborate a scale. Its faults are obvious enough; it lacks dramatic grip, lacks at times knowledge of the phases of life she is depicting, and is hampered by the thesis she is so anxious to prove. But despite these weaknesses, it is rich in great poetry, while its passion, its sincerity, and its pulsing life are incontestable. Moreover, like nearly everything that Mrs. Browning wrote, it is essentially an eloquent exposition of the woman's point of view.

Such memorable lines as these take the reader by the throat, so true and beautiful are they in their poignant femininity:

"How dreary 'tis for women to sit still
On winter nights by solitary fires
And hear the nations praising them far off,
Too far! ay, prising our quick sense of love,
Our very heart of passionate womanhood,
Which could not beat so in the verse without Being present also in the unskissed lips
And eyes undried because there's none to ask
The reason they grow moist."

"No hly-muffled hum of a summer bee,
But huds some coupling with the spinning stars;
No pebbles at your foot but prove a sphere,
No chaffinch but implies the cherubim,
And (glancing on my own thin, veined wrist),
In such a little tremor of the blood
The whole strong clunour of a vehement soul Doth utter itself distinct. Earth's crammed with heaven,
And every common bush afire with God;
But only he who sees, takes off his shoes,
The rest sit round it and pluck blackberries,
And laugh their natural faces unaware
More and more from the first similitude."

It is tragic to think that a poem that contains work of this quality, fine touches moreover, such as the following:

"Young
As Eve with Nature's daybreak in her Face!"
"Because we are of one flesh after all
And need one flannel (with a proper sense
Of difference in the quality)" . . . She had lived
A sort of cage-bird life, born in a cage,
Accounting that to leap from perch to perch
Was act and joy enough for any bird."

"Those hot fire-seeds of Creation held In Jove's clonched palm before the worlds were sown," should have so many platitudes and such arid wastes of obscure and almost choke the fresh and lovely oases that greet the patient reader.

None the less, when criticism has had its say, and the wheat has been vigorously winnowed from the chaff, there is a goodly crop of precious sustenance. For with all her limitations she is one of our great poets.

In striking contrast with Elizabeth Barrett Browning is Christina Rossetti. In the first place, her body of work is slight. In the second place, it is practically in one key; a wistful and delicate asceticism. In the third place, it is wrought with most scrupulous art.

CHRISTINA ROSSETTI

CHRISTINA GEORGINA ROSSETTI, born on December 5, 1830, was the younger daughter of Gabriele Rossetti, and sister of the poet-painter. With the exception of a tour in Normandy in 1861, and with her mother to Italy in 1865, she lived a life of retirement in London, devoted to her parents, to her poetry, and religious works.

At eleven years old she began to write verses, a small volume of these being privately published by her grandfather, Gaetano Polidori, in 1847; she likewise wrote some lyrics for The Germ, the organ of the Pre-Raphaelites, in 1850, under the nom-de-plume of "Ellen Alleen."

The deep religious tone pervading most of her work was also part of Christina Rossetti's daily life. She was a consistent member of the Church of England, and much as her heart's love went out to Charles Cayley, who wished to marry her, she refused to do so rather than consent to a union with one not in sympathy with her religious views.

Self-sacrificing throughout life, she was most retiring and sensitive in disposition. Of a naturally delicate constitution, the last few years of her life were those of an invalid, and after a long illness she died on December 29, 1894, and was buried in Highgate Cemetery.

Her principal works are Goblin Market and other Poems, published in 1862, The Prince's Progress (1866), A Pageant and other Poems (1881), Verses (1893), New Poems, published posthumously in 1896, and Sing-Song, a book of verse for children.

Her work is almost entirely in the minor key; and looking merely at the subject-matter of her poems, one would expect to find the constant preoccupation with death and the futility of life, intolerably sad and depressing. But so exquisite is her art, so subtle her sense of beauty, that the insistent minor fascinates us rather than depresses us, and we are distracted from her melancholy matter by her charm of manner, partly also because she does not strive or cry, does not wail or repine, but accepts the pain and sadness of life as she finds it, and though at the opposite pole of thought from Fitzgerald's, yet like him expresses, in consummate art, her temperament and outlook. Like her brother, she could treat supernaturalism at times in the spirit of fantastic decoration, with a kind of deliberate artistic triviality that is very attractive in its way. Of such is Goblin Market and The Prince's Progress. Unlike him, however, she is not more onamoured of religion for its æsthetic beauty, for it appealed to her deepest feelings; and as a devotional poet she has no superior in English literature, save Crashaw and Francis Thompson.

Yet with all her intense religious feeling, there is nothing of the preacher or teacher in her. She does not seek, with Mrs. Browning, to justify the ways of God to man; she is content to picture with subtle simplicity the mystical moods of the spirit. Perhaps Blake alone among our poets can convey with equal clearness the reality of things unseen and unheard of by the ordinary senses, only his method is quite different from that of Christina Rossetti. Blake impresses us with his power of actualising the supernaturalism of the natural world; Christina Rossetti with her gift of actualising rather the naturalism of the supernatural world. But her peculiar originality as a religious poet lies in the fact that, unlike the majority of religious poets, she is in no way concerned with preaching to others or moralising for others, or dealing with the intellectual difficulties that beset faith. She believes—and worships. Her entire attitude is that of a worshipper; and in the moods of awe and ecstasy, she certainly has few rivals.

Take for instance the poem Despised and Rejected. What other poet would have visualised in all its naked simplicity this spiritual tragedy, without a word of comment, without the slightest effort to apply it, as the theologians say, to the individual life or to the life of her day?

"Then I cried out upon him: Cease,
Leave me in peace,
Fear not that I should crave
Aught thou mayst have
Leave me in peace, yea trouble me no more,
Let I arise and chase thee from my door
What, shall I not be let Alone, that thou dost vex me yet?
But all night long that voice spake urgently:
'Open to Me'
Still harping in mine ears
'Rise, let Me in'
Pleading with tears
'Open to Me, that I may come to thee'
While the dew dropped, while the dark hours were cold:
'My Feet bleed, see My Face,
See My Hands bleed that bring thee grace,
My Heart doth bleed for thee,
Open to Me'
So till the break of day.
Then died away
That voice, in silence as of sorrow;
Then footsteps echoing like a sigh
Passed me by,
Lingering footsteps slow to pass.
On the morrow
I saw upon the grass
Each footprint marked in blood, and on my door
The mark of blood for evermore."

Critics like her brother have noted the ascetic passion of her verse, yet the asceticism is not that of the bloodless soul of one in whom loves and living are withered up, but of one who has all the capacity for enjoying the sensuous delights of life, yet has deliberately put them aside, and turned her eyes skywards, from choice.

A BIRTHDAY

My heart is like a singing bird
Whose nest is in a watered shoot;
My heart is like an apple-tree
Whose boughs are bent with thickest fruit;

My heart is like a rainbow shell
That paddles in a halcyon sea,
My heart is gladder than all these
Because my love is come to me.

Raise me a dais of silk and down;
Hang it in var and purple dyes;
Carve it in doves, and pomegranates,
And peacocks with a hundred eyes;
Work it in gold and silver grapes,
In leaves and silver fleur-de-lys;
Because the birthday of my life
Is come, my love is come to me,

AN ECHO FROM WILLOWWOOD

Two gazed into a pool, he gazed and she,
Not hand in hand, yet heart in heart, I think,
Pale and reluctant on the water's brink,
As on the brink of parting which must be
Each eyed the other's aspect, she and he,
Each felt one hungry heart leap up and sink,
Each tasted bitterness which both must drink,
Thore on the brink of life's dividing sea
Lahes upon the surface, deep below
Two wistful faces craving each for each,
Resolute and reluctant without speech —
A sudden ripple inside the faces flow
One moment joined, to vanish out of reach
So those hearts joined, and ah! were parted so,

and

SINO-SONG

Love me,—I love you,
Love me, my baby;
Sing it high, sing it low,
Sing as it may be
Mother's arms under you,
Her eyes above you;
Sing it high, sing it low,
Love me,—I love you,

was no anæmic votary of what George Eliot has called aptly "Otherworldliness."

There is all the magic of the half lights about Christina Rossetti's verse, its subdued melancholy, and its monotone. We miss, naturally, the immense vitality, the varied beauty, the glory of colour, that attend our poets of the morning and midday. Her appeal is more restricted, and there are times when its brooding sweetness and faintly tinted landscape oppress us, even enervate us.

An incomparably greater artist than Mrs. Browning, with a level excellence in her verse to which the writer of Aurora Leigh could never reach, with a more delicate and subtle intuition into certain moods and phases of the imaginative life, she yet lacks that thrilling human note which characterises Mrs. Browning at her greatest. In their sonnet sequence, where the two women challenge comparison each is at her best. We see the breadth of the one and the subtlety of the other. It is not that Christina Rossetti is less capable of passionate emotion than Mrs. Browning—at times she can be as fierce in her ardour: and her music has the same power of intensity as Mrs. Browning's, though it is less varied. Miss Rossetti is oftener on the heights of Parnassus than her contemporary; but now and again Mrs. Browning has touched a peak to which Christina Rossetti never attained.

ELIZA COOK (1818-1883), despite her popular vogue, scarcely reaches the mediocre level of Mrs. Hemans, and quite a number of verse writers fall considerably below that modest standard.

The verse of GEORGE ELIOT deserves attention if only for her position as a highly cultured woman and a great novelist, but it is far inferior to her prose. There are no cheap rhetorical effects, no facile sentimentalities, but the merits of The Spanish Gypsy and The Legend of Jubal are mostly negative, and though here and there a fine thought is happily expressed, there is really nothing that could not have been said equally well and better in prose. In her shorter pieces there are pleasant fancies to be found; but her Muse on the whole is stiff and cumbersome, and her imaginative sensibility never plays freely and easily. There is more poetry in a passage from Silas Marner than in all her verses put together.

A good deal of agreeable verse was written by ADELAIDE ANNE PROCTER (1825-1864), who inherited her father "Barry Cornwall's" gift of verse-making. Much of her work was published by Charles Dickens in Household Words under a pseudonym; and for a while he was ignorant who his contributor really was. She was popular, as Eliza Cook was popular, for she had all the elements that make for an immediate appeal; she was facile, sentimental, and homely; but she lacked power, and freshness of inspiration.

Her contemporary JEAN INGELOW (1820-97) had both power and to some extent freshness. Prolix and unequal, she is decidedly one of the poets who count. There is grip and imagination in The High Tide on the Coast of Lincolnshire, and Requiescat in Pace; and her shorter pieces especially display much versatility and subtlety of fancy. If she is not always musical, that is because she was not content with the jog-trot rhythm usually in favour, and there is abundant technical cleverness in some of her metrical experiments.

THE HIGH TIDE ON THE COAST OF LINCOLNSHIRE (1871)

The old mayor climbed the belfry tower,
The ringers ran by two, by three,
"Pull, if ye never pulled before,
Good ringers, pull your best," quoth he.
"Play uppe, play uppe, O Boston bells!
Ply all your changes, all your swells,
Play uppe The Brides of Enderby."
Men say it was a stolen tyde—
The Lord that sent it, He knows all;
But in mine ears doth still abide
The message that the bells let fall:
And there was nought of strange, beside
The flights of mews and poewits pled
By millions crouched on the old sea wall.
I sat and spun within the doore,
My thread brake off, I raised myne eyes;
The level sun, like ruddy ore,
Lay sinking in the barren skies,
And dark against day's golden death
She moved white Linds wandereth,
My sonne's faire wife, Elizabeth.
"Cusha! Cusha! Cusha!" calling,
Ere the early dews were falling,
Farre away I heard her song
"Cusha! Cusha!" all along
Where the reedy Linds floweth,
Floweth, floweth,
From the meads where melick groweth
Faintly came her milking song—

I looked without, and lo! my sonne
Came riding downe with might and main;
He raised a shout as he drew on,
Till all the welkin rang again,
"Elizabeth! Elizabeth!"
(A sweeter woman no'er drew breath
Than my sonne's wife, Elizabeth).
"The olde sea wall (he cried) is downe,
The rising tide comes on apace,
And boats adrift in yonder towne
Go sailing uppe the market-place"
He shook as one that looks on death.
"God save you, mother!" straight he saith;
"Whore is my wife, Elizabeth!"
"Good sonne, where Linds winds away,
With her two barns I marked her long;
And ere yon balls beganne to play
Afar I heard her milking song."
He looked across the grassy lea,
To right, to left, "Ho, Enderby!"
They rang "The Brides of Enderby!"
With that he cried and beat his breast;
For, lo! along the river's bed
A mighty eygre roared his crest,
And uppe the Linds ragging sped,
It swept with thunderous noises loud;
Shaped like a curling snow-white cloud,
Or like a demon in a shroud.
And rearing Linds backward pressed
Shook all her trembling bankes amaine;
Then madly at the eygre's breast
Flung uppo her weltering walls again
Then bankes came downe with run and rout—
Then beaten foam flow round about—
Then all the mighty floods were out

That flow strewed wrecks about the grass,
That ebbe swopt out the flocks to sea,
A fatal ebbe and flow, alas!
To manye more than myne and mee:
But each will mourn his own (she saith)
And sweeter woman no'er drew breath
Than my sonne's wife, Elizabeth.

I shall never hear her more
By the reedy Linds shore,
'Cusha! Cusha! Cusha!' calling
Ere the early dews be falling;
I shall never hear her song.—

"Leave your meadow grasses mellow,
Mollow, mellow;
Quit your cowslips, cowslips yellow;
Come uppe Whitefoot, come uppe Lightfoot;
Quit your pipes of parsley hollow,
Hollow, hollow;
Come uppe Lightfoot, rise and follow;
Lightfoot, Whitefoot,
From your clovers lift the head;
Come uppe jetty, follow, follow,
Jetty, to the milking shed"

ECHO AND THE FERRY

Ay, Oliver! I was but seven, and he was eleven:
He looked at me pouting and rosy. I blushed where I stood.
They had told us to play in the orchard (and I only seven!
A small guest at the farm); but he said "Oh, a girl was no good!"
So he whistled and went, he went over the stile to the wood
It was sad, it was sorrowful! Only a girl—only seven!
At home in the dark London smoke I had not found it out.
The pear-trees looked on in their white, and blue birds flashed about,
And they too were angry as Oliver. Were they eleven?
I thought so. Yes, every one else was eleven—eleven!

In AUGUSTA WEBSTER (1837-1894) we have a writer less attractive superficially than Jean Ingelow, but with an intrinsic strength and originality of outlook that places her easily among the most distinguished women poets of the era. She was a woman of great mental energy and wide practical experiences of life. Her father was a distinguished rear-admiral, and during her earlier years she lived on board ship at Banff Castle and at Penzance. Later on we find her at Cambridge, while her father was Chief Constable of the counties of Cambridge and Huntingdon. She married a Fellow of Trinity College in 1863, and for a period sat as member of the London School Board. She was always interested in social and educational subjects, and has written about them with ability and discernment. But it is as a poet that she will best be remembered; a poet with a deep and tender insight into life, and with dramatic power and psychological subtlety to reinforce her insight.

Some of her best work may be found in A Woman Sold, and other Poems (1867), and Portraits (1870). Like all high-class work achieved by women, it is distinctly feminine, and the woman's point of view is insisted on again and again with force and passion. In such poems as A Cantaway, with its grim and powerful picture of the so-called "daughter of joy"; in Too Faithful, with its simple, unforced pathos; Tired, with its searching analysis of a superficial life, in the delicate Orientalism of Yu-Pe-Ya's Lute; and in some of her scholarly translations and dramas, she has made a genuine and valuable addition to English letters.

TOO FAITHFUL

Too fond and faithful, wilt thou vainly yet
Waste love on one who does not ask it now
And, having wronged thee, seeks but to forget?

A farrier face smiles on his love, and thou,
Thou with thy truth, and fervour, stand aside,
Thou nobler-natured to her beauty bow.

There lingers in thee yet this much of pride
That he who has wronged himself and thee
Could never win thy truth, whate'er betide.

Since in thine eyes he never more may ho
So true and great that thou couldst bend to him,
Oh never more! Why is thy heart not free?

Oh wilt thou weep because his eyes are dim?
And wilt thou blush because his choice is shame
Falling on one whose love is but a whim?

An idle whim to stir a languid heart,
A business chaffering of the more and less
And use and falling of the marriage mart.

Yet is it cause to deepen thy distress
That he shall suffer for his misplaced trust?
For did he come into thy life to bless?

He buys a bauble something touched with rust,
Passing through many hands that did not hold,
Its lustre deadened by the market's dust.

But what to thee, if he for this has sold
His faith, his living heart his nobler mind,
And given gold for that which is not gold?

Oh better that he should rest ever blind,
Better for him—but should he wake to see
The gorn, he dreamed so pure, of paltriest kind.

Too fond and faithful, what were that to thee?
Thou hast thy sorrow, wherefore look beyond
To sorrow for his sorrow that shall be?

Too fond and faithful, weak in being fond,
False to thyself by faithfulness to him,
Since he has freed thee wherefore art thou bond?

But if his cup hold poison to the rim,
Dregged with life's malady beyond life's cure,
Why should its bitter drops to thine o'erbrim?

And yet, if thou hast love so deep and pure
That, whatsoever change the years shall bring,
Before the sight of God it may endure,

And if it seem to thee a holy thing
That, should he need it in his day of pain,
Thou mayst have sister power of comforting,

Well, if thy love be thus, let it remain;
Thou wilt not fear to name it in thy prayer,
As though it were some passion wild and vain.

Well, let it be, it may make less that care
Centered in self thou canst not wholly quell,
If others, not thine own, its place shall share.

NOT TO BE

The rose said "Let but this long rain be past,
And I shall feel my sweetness in the sun
And pour its fulness into life at last."
But when the rain was done,
But when dawn sparkled through unclouded air
She was not there.

The lark said "Let but winter be away,
And blossoms come, and light, and I will soar
And lose the earth, and be the voice of day."
But when the snows were o'er,
But when spring broke in blue news overhead,
The lark was dead.

And myriad roses made the garden glow,
And skylarks carolled all the summer long—
What lack of birds to sing and flowers to blow?
Yet, ah, lost scent, lost song!
Poor empty rose, poor lark that never trilled!
Dead unfulfilled!

FROM YU-PE-YA'S LUTE

Too soon so fair, fair lilies
To bloom is then to wane,
The folded bud has still
To-morrow at its will,
Blown flowers can never bloom again.

Too soon so bright, bright noontide;
The sun that now is high
Will henceforth only sink
Towards the western brink,
Day that's at prime begins to die.

Like Augusta Webster, MATHILDE BLIND (1847-1896) was a woman of wide culture, and if she has not the original force and imaginative insight of her contemporary, she was at any rate one of the women poets who count. She has a sense of drama and a distinct lyrical gift, but she is at her best as a sonneteer, and had her work been surer, would have achieved a higher position among women poets. In her sonnet The Dead and in some of the songs in Love in Exile, we have worthy illustrations of her power and grace as a verse writer.

LOVE IN EXILE

Why will you haunt me unawares,
And walk into my sleep,
Pacing its shadowy thoroughfares,
Where long-dried perfume scents the air,
While ghosts of sorrow creep,
Where on Hope's ruined altar stairs
With ineffectual beams,
The Moon of Memory coldly glares
Upon the land of dreams ?

My yearning eyes were fain to look
Upon your hidden face ;
Their love, alas ! you could not brook,
But in your own you mutely took
My hand, and for a space
You wrung it till I throbb'd and shook,
And woke with wildest moan
And wet face channelled like a brook
With your tears or my own.

Two women poets who deserve mention, wrote in collaboration as "MICHAEL FIELD." Their work shows no slight measure of that breadth of imagination that we associate with the Elizabethan age. Even their shortcomings are Elizabethan, and come from an excess of emotion, and an undisciplined power, that one may readily overlook, in view of their many felicities.

A SUMMER WIND

O wind, thou hast thy kingdom in the trees,
And all thy royalties
Sweep through the land to-day.
It is mid June,
And thou, with all thy instruments in tune,
Thine orchestra
Of heaving fields and heavy swinging fir,
Strikest a lay
That doth rehearse
Her ancient freedom to the universe.
All other sound in awe
Repeats its law.
The bird is mute, the sea
Sucks up its waves, from rain
The burthened clouds refrain,
To listen to thee in thy leafery,
Thou unconfin'd,
Lavish, large, soothing, refluxent summer wind.

There is an agreeable lyrical quality in the verse of Madame DARMESTETER, and a fresher and original note in the Irish rural muse of Miss JANE BARLOW, while among other living lyric-writers none are sweeter and more spontaneous in their song than KATHARINE TYNAN (Mrs Hinkson); show finer tragic power than DORA SIGERSON (Mrs Clement Shorter), or a more delicate sense of artistic form than Mrs MEYNELL. Indeed in sheer craftsmanship, Mrs Moynell is certainly the ablest of women verse-writers now living.

MISCELLANEOUS POETS OF THE LATER VICTORIAN ERA

AMONG the chief influences in the poetry of later Victorian times is that of Tennyson, Browning, Rossetti, and Swinburne. For instance we can trace Swinburne in Lord de Tabley; Rossetti in William Bell-Scott; Tennyson in Mr. Stephen Phillips; Browning's influence has been more diffused and indirect, and has been shown in the subject-matter rather than the style of a good many modern verse-writers; whereas the influence of Tennyson and Swinburne has been one of manner and treatment. The influence of Pre-Raphaelitism is apparent in the later verse of WILLIAM BELL-SCOTT (1812-1890), though much of his thoughtful and cultured verse belongs to an earlier period, and is independent of the romantic inspiration. But his association with Rossetti makes it convenient to treat of him as one of the more critical of the Pre-Raphaelite group. His work is essentially philosophic and contemplative; and he is more of a thinker in verse than a good literary artist. Yet there is some originality in his work, especially The Sphinx, and he is a more considerable figure in literature than THOMAS WOOLNER (1826-1892), whose excellence lay in another art than that of letters, or the poet-painter NOEL PATON (1821-1901).

COVENTRY PATMORE (1823-1896) has never lacked powerful admirers, and his place among the greater poets would be upheld by not a few able critics. None the less, despite his many rhythmic felicities, and his undoubted technical skill, his excessive fluency, and frequent banalities, seem to the present writer to exclude Patmore from the front rank. His projected poem in many volumes on the joys of married life was never carried out, "for the simple reason," as his great admirer Dr. Garnett has admitted, "that though married life is a very great subject, it is not a very poetical one." Certainly, to have justified its thesis, The Angel in the House should have been dealt with in more concrete fashion, and with such a power of psychological insight as Browning and Meredith brought to their work in James Lee's Wife and Modern Love. The Angel in the House is a happier piece of work than Faithful for Ever or The Victorias of Love; but its merit lies in fine passages of description and flashes of sententious wisdom. His later work, The Unknown Eros, and Amelia, have less pedestrian qualities perhaps, and show a remarkable mastery of metre, but Patmore was too unguarded as a poet about political and religious prejudices. These are out of place in serious verse. As a writer of satirical verse, he might have done notable work, had he given some of the time to it that he expended on his "angelic" themes. He was a man of very distinctive individuality, with a power of neat and trenchant expression, as shown in his famous squib on the first German Emperor:

"That is to say, my dear Augusta,
We've had another awful buster,
Ten thousand Frenchmen sent below,
Thank God from whom all blessings flow."

WIND AND WAVE

The wedded light and heat,
Winnowing the witless space,
Without a let,
What are they till they beat
Against the sleepy sod, and there begot
Porchance the violet!
Is the One found,
Amongst a wilderness of as happy grace,
To make Heaven's bound,
So that in Her
All which it hath of sensitively good
Is sought and understood
After the narrow mode the mighty Heavens prefer!
She, as a little breeze
Following still Night
Ripples the spirit's cold, deep seas
Into delight,
But, in a while,
The unmeasurable smile
Is broke by fresher airs to flashes blent
With darkling discontent,
And all the subtle zephyr hurries gay,
And all the heaving ocean heaves one way,
T'ward the void sky-line and an unguessed weal,
Until the vanward billows see
The agitating shallows, and divine the goal,
And to foam roll,
And spread and stray
And traverse wildly, like delighted hands,
The fair and fleckless sands,
And so the whole
Unlathiomable and immense
Triumphing tide comes at the last to reach
And burst in wind-kiss'd splendours on the deafening beach,
Where forms of children in first innocence
Laugh and fling pebbles on the rainbow'd crest
Of its untired unrest.

"He never weeded his garden," said Dr. John Brown, "and will I fear be strangled in his waste fertility." These words, uttered of SYDNEY DOBELL (1824-1874), epitomise truly enough his besetting weakness. Lack of self-criticism had seriously affected the reputation of greater poets like Mrs Browning and Wordsworth; and Dobell was not a great poet; yet he is often a remarkable one, and as a poet with a genuine passion for liberty, he has written some spirited and stirring verse, notably The Youth of England to Garibaldi's Legion, and England in Time of War.

THE MARKET-WIFE'S SONG

The butter an' the cheese weel stowit they be,
I sit on the hen-coop, the eggs on my knee,
The land kail jigs as we jog owre the rigs,
Tho gray mare's tail it wags wi' the kail,
The warm simmer sky is blue aboon a',
An' whuddie, whuddie, whaddie, gang the auld wheels twa

I sit on the coop, I look straight before,
But my heart it is awa' the braid ocean owre,
I see the bludy fiel' where my an' bonny chiel',
My wee bairn o' a', gred to fight or to fa',
An' whuddie, whuddie, whaddie, gang the auld wheels twa

I see the gran' o' toun o' the big forn' loun,
I hear the cannon soun', I see the reek aboon,
It may be lang John letan' aff his gun,
It may be the mist—your mother diana wist—
It may be the kirk, it may be the ha',
An' whuddie, whuddie, whaddie, gang the auld wheels twa

An' I ken the Black Sea, ayont the rock o' dool,
Like a muddie blot o' ink in a buik fra' the solule
An' Jock! it pears me mun' o' your bukkies lang syne,
An' mindin' o' it a' the tears begin to fa',
An' whuddie, whuddie, whaddie, gang the auld wheels twa

Then the bull roars fra' the scaur, ilka rook's a bull agen,
An' I hear the trump o' war, an' the carse is fu' o' men,
Up an' down the morn I ken the hughie horn,
Ilka birdie sma' as the ffeem' cannon ba',
An' whuddie, whuddie, whaddie, gang the auld wheels twa
Guid Heavens! the Russian host! We maun e'en gie up for lost,

Gin ye gain the hattle hae ye countit a' the cost?
Ye may win a gran' name, but wad wee Jock come hame?
Dinna fecht, dinna fecht! there's room for us a',
An' whuddie, whuddie, whaddie, gang the auld wheels twa

In vain, in vain in vain! They are marchin' near and far!
Wi' swords an' slings an' wi' instruments o' war!
Oh, day so dark an' sair! ilka man seven feet an' mair!
I bow my head an' say, "Gin the Lord wad smit them a'!"
An' whuddie, whuddie, whaddie, gang the auld wheels twa

Then forth fra' their ban' there steps an' armed man,
His targe at his breast an' his claymore in his han',
His gowd pow glitters fine an' his shadow fa's behin',
I think o' great Goliath as he stan's before them a',
An' whuddie, whuddie, whaddie, gang the auld wheels twa

To meet the Philistine leaps a laddie fra' our line,
Oh my heart! oh my heart! 'tis that wee lad o' mine!
I start to my legs—an' down fa' the eggs—
The cooks an' hens a' they cackle an' they ca',
An' whuddie, whuddie, whaddie, gang the auld wheels twa

Oh, Jock, my Hielan' lad,—oh, Jock, my Hielan' lad, Never till I saw thee that moment was I glad!
Aye sooner sud thou dee before thy nither's e'e
Than a man o' the clan sud hae stept out but thee!
An' soo I cry to God—while the hens cackle a'
An' whuddie, whuddie, whaddie, gang the auld wheels twa

A NUPTIAL EVE

Oh, happy, happy maid,
In the year of war and death
She wears no sorrow!
By her face so young and fair,
By the happy wrath
That rules her happy hair,
She might be a bride to-morrow!
She sits and sings within her moonlit bower,
Her moonlit bower in rosy June,
Yet, ah, her bridal breath,
Like fragrance from some sweet night-blowing flower,
Moves from her moving lips in many a mournful tune!

She sings no song of love's despair,
 She sings no lover lowly laid,
 No fond peculiar grief
 Has ever touched or bud or leaf
 Of her unblighted spring.
 She sings because she needs must sing :
 She sings the sorrow of the air
 Whereof her voice is made,
 That night in Britain howsoever
 On any chords the fingers strayed,
 They gave the notes of care.
 A dim sad legend old
 Long since in some pale shade
 Of some far twilight told,
 She knows not when or where,
 She sings, with trembling hand on trembling lute-strings laid.

"The murmur of the mourning ghost
 That keeps the shadowy kine,—
 Oh, Keith of Ravelston,
 The sorrows of thy line !

"Ravelston, Ravelston,
 The merry path that leads
 Down the golden morning hill
 And through the silver meads ;

"Ravelston, Ravelston,
 The stile beneath the tree,
 The maid that kept her mother's kine,
 The song that sang she !

"She sang her song, she kept her kine,
 She sat beneath the thorn,
 When Andrew Keith of Ravelston,
 Rode thro' the Monday morn

"His henchmen sang, his hawk-bells ring,
 His belted jewels shine—
 Oh, Keith of Ravelston,
 The sorrows of thy line !

"Year after year, where Andrew came,
 Comes evening down the glade,
 And still there sits a moonshine ghost
 Where sat the sunshiny maid.

"Her misty hair is faint and fair,
 She keeps the shadowy kine ;—
 Oh, Keith of Ravelston,
 The sorrows of thy line !

"I lay my hand upon the stile,
 The stile is lone and cold,
 The burnie that goes babbling by
 Says naught that can be told.

"Yet, stranger ! here, from year to year,
 She keeps her shadowy kine,—
 Oh, Keith of Ravelston,
 The sorrows of thy line !

"Step out three steps wher Andrew stood—
 Why blanch thy cheeks for fear ?
 The ancient stile is not alone,
 'Tis not the burn I hear !

"She makes her immemorial moan,
 She keeps her shadowy kine,—
 Oh, Keith of Ravelston,
 The sorrows of thy line !"

If the quality of Dobell's work at his best shows an engorging power, that of his contemporary ALEXANDER SMITH (1830-1867), exhibits high pictorial beauty. Three volumes practically cover his work in verse, though it must not be forgotten that he wrote a charming volume of rural essays, Dream-thorpe ; these volumes are Poems (1853), City Poems (1857), Edwin of Devra (1861). Of these, undoubtedly the finest flowers of his imagination are to be found in the City Poems. Over ornate at times, his descriptive passages abound in many beauties. His picture of Glasgow is one of his most remarkable things, and is rich in the poetry of crowds—a poetry so seldom realised by our verse writers.

"Instead of shores where ocean beats
 I hear the ebb and flow of streets."

Where Alexander Smith stumbles is in the scenic extravagances of his style. In this respect he is in the same company with Dobell, but otherwise they have little in common, and whereas Dobell's work suffers from excess of thought, Smith's suffers from excess of feeling—that is to say, his sensuousness runs riot on occasion, as was the case with the youthful Keats. He had a good knowledge of blank verse, which he used with excellent effect in earlier verse, The Life Drama. He is certainly more neglected as a poet than he deserves to be, and if once he was unduly praised, to-day he is unfairly passed over.

GLASGOW

Sing, Poet, 'tis a merry world ;
 That cottage smoke is rolled and curled
 In sport, that every moss
 Is happy, every inch of soil—
 Before me runs a road of toil
 With my grave cut across.
 Sing, trailing showers and breezy downs—
 I know the tragic hearts of towns.

City ! I am true son of thine ;
 Ne'er dwelt I where great mornings shine
 Around the bloating pens ;
 Ne'er by the rivulet I strayed,
 And ne'er upon my childhood weighed
 The silence of the glens
 Instead of shores where ocean beats,
 I hear the ebb and flow of streets

Black labour draws his weary waves,
 Into their secret moaning caves,
 But with the morning light,
 The sea again will overflow
 With a long weary sound of woe,
 Again to faint in night
 Wave am I in that sea of woes,
 Which, night and morning, obli and flows.

I dwelt within a gloomy court,
 Whence did never sunbeam sport
 Yet there my heart was stirr'd—
 My very blood did dance and thrill,
 When on my narrow window-sill,
 Spring lighted like a bird
 Poor flowers—I watched them pine for weeks,
 With leaves as pale as human cheeks

Afar, one summer, I was borne
 Through golden vapours of the morn,
 I heard the hills of sleep.
 I trod with a wild ecstasy
 The bright fringe of the living sea :
 And on a ruined keep
 I sat, and watched an endless plain
 Blacken beneath the gloom of rain

O fair the lightly sprinkled waste,
 O'er which a laughing shower has raced !
 O fair the April shoots !
 O fair the woods on summer days,
 While a blue hyacinthine haze
 Is dreaming round the roots !
 In thee, O city ! I discern
 Another beauty, sad and stern.

THE CELTIC NOTE

A little group of poets, more or less Celtic in their inspiration, now claim our notice. These are Arthur O'Shaughnessy, the younger Aubrey de Vere, Samuel Ferguson, William Allingham, Thomas Edward Brown, Lewis Morris, Charles Mackay, George Macdonald, and Robert Buchanan. To these may be added, JOHN STUART BLACKIE (1809-1895), a delightful and original personality who, however, is best remembered for his encouragement of the study of Celtic literature, shining in only a modest way as a maker of verse.

ARTHUR O'SHAUGHNESSY (1844-1881) was a melodious and agreeable writer of considerable sweetness if little originality, much influenced by the Pre-Raphaelite School. He wrote An Epic on Women (1870), Lays of France (1872), Music and Moonlight (1874), while Songs of a Worker (1881) was published after his death.

The younger AUBREY DE VERE (1814-1902) was a voluminous writer of verse, among his best work being Innecfau and other Poems (1861) and The Legends of St. Patrick (1872). Like O'Shaughnessy he is more imitative than original, and modelled himself largely upon Wordsworth. Both he and Sir SAMUEL FERGUSON (1810-1886) were hampered by a fatal facility in verse-making, which mars their work. Ferguson's best volume is his Lays of the Western Gair (1865), for his portentously long epic, Congal, is wearisome and commonplace.

In WILLIAM ALLINGHAM (1824-1889), we have a fresher and more original writer; not strong, nor varied, but like O'Shaughnessy undeniably sweet. His most striking work lies in his Poems (1850) and Day and Night Songs (1854).

Sir LEWIS MORRIS (1833-1907) is one of the very few representatives we have of the Cymric poet. His writings once were exceedingly popular; the Epic of Hades having passed blithely through nearly forty editions. He was facile to a degree, and knew how to blend didacticism and sentiment into an acceptable bolus for his large public to swallow. His cheery outlook on life contributed also to his success as a verse writer. But there are hundreds of obscure and little-read poets, who had more real inspiration than this successful Welshman. A writer far superior to him in every way is the MANXMAN THOMAS EDWARD BROWN (1830-1897), whose dialect verses Fo'c'sle Yarns (1881) are among the best of their kind. Nor was he merely a clever dialect writer, he could write in good classical English almost as well, and his best work shows genuine dramatic power, insight into character (especially that of simple folk), and a refreshing vein of humour. His ample output suffers from occasional diffuseness and a lapse into the pretty-pretty; but he is certainly one of the poets who count.

In CHARLES MACKAY (1814-1889) we have a spirited though rather commonplace representative of the Scottish Celt, and in GEORGE MACDONALD (1824-1905), one who achieved distinction in several branches of literature, with a deep and delicate imagination, who, although happier in prose than in verse, has written some admirable religious verse (e.g. Love's Ordeal and The Diary of an Old Soul) and a few delightful lyrics, Blake-like in their fresh simplicity, e.g. Where did you come from, Baby dear?

By far the ablest, however, of the modern Scottish poets was ROBERT BUCHANAN (1841-1901). The son of a Glasgow journalist, he came early to London to try his fortune. His friend, a young and promising poet, David Gray, soon gave up the struggle and left London only to die. Buchanan remained, and after one or two tentative volumes, published in 1866 his London Poems, that contain some of his best and most representative work.

In dealing with the problems of poverty and humble life, Buchanan is more in touch with the methods of Crabbe than those of Wordsworth; but he had a greater sense of beauty than Crabbe possessed, for ugly and sordid as are the stories and studies he put into verse, they are framed in a fine imaginative setting.

In The Book of Orm, the Celt, the realistic method is discarded, but behind the fervent imaginings of this remarkable book there looms that uncompromising sense of reality that never deserted Buchanan, even in his most imaginative flights.

Buchanan indeed is a poet who has not received the mood of praise due to his considerable powers. The greater popularity of his novels and his plays has obscured the fact that his genius is more fully expressed in his verse than anywhere else; impressive and striking as some of his novels may be. He was an acute observer, a vigorous thinker, with a strong sense of humour and a versatile imagination. In his highest moments moreover, he shows the spiritual intensity of the Scot at his best. To some extent we may regard Buchanan as the pioneer of the note of romantic realism in verse, so greatly in vogue at the present day.

NELL

She gazes not at her who hears,
But, while the gathering darkness cries,
Stares at the vacancy through tears,
That burn upon her glistening eyes,
Yet do not flow. Her hair falls free
Around a face grown deathly thin
Her elbow rests upon her knee
And in her palms she props her chin.

See Nan! his little face looks pinch'd with fright,
His little hands are clench'd together tight!
Born dead, that's comfort I quiet too, when one Thinks of what kill'd him! I kiss him, Nan, for me
Thank God, he never look'd upon the sun
That saw his father hang'd on gallows-tree
O boy, my boy! you're better dead and sleeping
Kill'd by poor mother's fears, and shame, and weeping,
She never loved another living man.
But hold to father all through, right or wrong—
Ah yes! I never turn'd against him, Nan,
I stuck by him that stuck by me so long!

You're a kind woman, Nan! say kind and true!
God will be good to faithful folk like you!
You knew my Ned!

A better, kinder lad never drew breath—
We loved each other true, though never wed
In church, like some who took him to his death.
A lad as gentle as a lamb, but lost
His senses when he took a drop too much—
Drink did it all—drink made him mad when cross'd—
He was a poor man, and they're hard on such.

O Nan ! that night ! that night !
 When I was sitting in this very chair,
 Watching and waiting in the oandle-light,
 And heard his foot come creaking up the stair,
 And turn'd, and saw him standing yonder, white
 And wild, with staring eyes and rumpled hair !
 And when I caught his arm and call'd in fright,
 He push'd me, swore, and to the door he pass'd
 To lock and bar it fast !
 Then down he drops just like a lump of lead,
 Holding his brow, shaking, and growing whiter,
 And—Nan !—just then the light seem'd growing brighter,
 And I could see the hands that held his head,
 All red ! all bloody red !
 What could I do but scream ? He groan'd to hear,
 Jump'd to his feet, and gripp'd me by the wrist,
 "Be still, or I shall kill thee, Nell !" he hissed
 And I was still for fear
 "They're after me—I've knifed a man !" he said
 "Be still !—the drink—drink did it—he is dead !"
 And as he said the word, the wind went by
 With a whistle and cry—
 The room swam round—the babe unhorn seem'd to scream out and die !
 Then we grew still, dead still I couldn't weep—
 All I could do was cling to Ned and hark—
 And Ned was cold, cold, cold, as if asleep,
 But breathing hard and deep
 The candle flicker'd out—the room grew dark—
 And—Nan !—although my heart was true and tried,—
 When all grew cold and dim,
 I shudder'd—not for fear of them outside,
 But just afraid to be alone with him
 For winds were waiting—the wild rain cried,—
 Folk's footsteps sounded down the court and died—
 What could I do but clasp his knees and cling ?
 And call his name beneath my breath in pain ?
 Until he threw his head up, listening,
 And gave a groan, and hid his face again
 "Ned ! Ned !" I whisper'd—and he moan'd and shook—
 But did not heed nor look !
 "Ned ! Ned ! speak ! tell me it is not true !"
 At that he raised his head and looked so wild
 Then, with a stare that froze my blood, he threw
 His arms around me, crying like a child,
 And held me close—and not a word was spoken—
 While I clung tighter to his heart and press'd him—
 And did not fear him, though my heart was broken—
 But kiss'd his poor stain'd hands, and cried, and bless'd him !
 Then, Nan, the dreadful daylight, coming cold
 With sound of falling rain,—
 When I could see his face, and it look'd old,
 Like the pinch'd face of one that dies in pain !
 Well, though we heard folk stirring in the sun,
 We never thought to hide away or run,
 Until we heard those voices in the street,
 That hurrying of feet
 And Ned leap'd up, and knew that they had come.
 "Run, Ned !" I cried, but he was deaf and dumb.
 "Hide, Ned !" I scream'd, and held him—"hide thee, man !"
 He stared with blood-hot eyes, and hearken'd, Nan !
 And all the rest is like a dream—the sound
 Of knocking at the door—
 A rush of men—a struggle on the ground—
 A mist—a tramp—a roar
 For when I got my senses back again,
 The room was empty—and my head went round !
 The neighbours talk'd and stirr'd about the lane,
 And Seven Dials made a moaning sound ;
 And as I listen'd, lass, it seem'd to me
 Just like the murmur of the great dark Sea,
 And Ned a-lying somewhere stiff and drown'd !
 God help him ? God will help him ! Ay, no fear !
 It was the drink, not Ned—he meant no wrong ;
 So kind ! so good !—and I am useless here,
 Now he is lost that loved me true and long.

Why, just before the last of it, we parted,
 And Ned was calm, though I was broken-hearted ;
 And ah, my heart was broke ! and ah, I cried
 And kiss'd him,—till they took me from his side,
 And though he died that way (God bless him !) Ned
 Went through it bravely, calm as any there
 They've wrought their fill of spite upon his head,
 And—there's the hat and clothes he used to wear !

. . . That night before he died
 I didn't cry—my heart was hard and dried
 But when the clock went "one," I took my shawl
 To cover up my face, and stole away,
 And walk'd along the silent streets, where all
 Look'd cold and still and gray,—
 Only the lamps o' London here and there
 Scatter'd a dismal gleaming,
 And on I went, and stood in Leicester Square,
 Ay, like a woman dreaming !

But just as "three" was sounded close at hand,
 I started and turn'd east, before I knew,—
 Then down Saint Martin's Lane, along the Strand,
 And through the toll-gate, on to Waterloo.
 How I remember all I saw, although 'Twas only like a dream !—
 The long still lines o' lights, the chilly gleam
 Of moonshine on the deep black stream below ;
 While far, far, far away, along the sky
 Streaks soft as silver ran,
 And the pale Moon look'd paler up on high,
 And little sounds in far-off streets began !
 Well, while I stood, and waited, and look'd down,
 And thought how sweet 'twould be to drop and drown,

Some men and lads went by,
 And turning round, I gazed, and watch'd 'em go,
 Then felt that they were going to see him die,
 And drew my shawl more tight, and follow'd slow,
 How clear I feel it still !

The streets grew light, but rain began to fall ;
 I stopp'd and had some coffee at a stall,

Because I felt so chill ;
 A cock crew somewhere, and it seem'd a call
 To wake the folk who kill !

The man who told the coffee stared at me !
 I must have been a sorry sight to see !

More people pass'd—a country cart with hay
 Stopp'd close beside the stall,—and two or three Talk'd about it ! I moan'd, and crept away !

Ay, nearer, nearer to the dreadful place,
 All in the falling rain,
 I went, and kept my shawl upon my face,
 And felt no grief or pain—

Only the wet that soak'd me through and through Seem'd cold and sweet and pleasant to the touch—

It made the streets more drear and silent, too,
 And kept away the light I fear'd so much
 Slow, slow the wet streets fill'd, and all seem'd going,
 Laughing and chatting, the same way,

And grayer, sadder, lighter, it was growing,
 Though still the rain fell fast and darken'd day !

Nan !—every pulse was burning—I could feel
 My heart was made of steel—

As crossing Ludgate Hill, I saw, all blurr'd,
 Saint Paul's great clock and heard it slowly chime,

And hadn't power to count the strokes I heard,
 But strain'd my eyes and saw it wasn't time.

Ah ! then I felt I dared not creep more near,
 But went into a lane off Ludgate Hill,

And sitting on a doorstep, I could hear
 The people gathering still !

And still the rain was falling, falling,

And deadening the hum I heard from there,

And wet and stiff, I heard the people calling,

And watch'd the rain-drops glistening down my hair,

My elbows on my knees, my fingers dead,—

My shawl thrown off, now none could see,—my head
 Dripping and wild and bare.

I heard the crying of a crowd of men
And next, a hollow sound I knew full well,
For something gripp'd me round the heart!—and then

There came the solemn tolling of a bell!
O God! O God! how could I sit close by,
And neither scream nor cry?
As if I had been stone, all hard and cold,
I listen'd, listen'd, listen'd, still and dumb,
While the folk murmur'd, and the death-bell toll'd,
And the day brighten'd, and his time had come . . .
. . . Till—Nan!—all else was silent, but the knell
Of the slow bell!
And I could only wait, and wait, and wait,
And what I waited for I couldn't tell—
At last there came a groaning deep and great—
Saint Paul's struck "eight"—
I scream'd, and seem'd to turn to fire, and fell!

God bless him, live or dead!
Oh, he was kind and true—
They've wrought their fill of spite upon his head—
Why didn't they be kind, and take me too?
And there's the dear old things he used to wear,
And here's a lock o' hair!
And Ned! my Ned!
Is fast asleep, and cannot hear me call;—
God bless you, Nan, for all you've done and said,
But don't mind me! My heart is broke, that's all!

RATCLIFFE MEG

Then methought I saw another sight,
Darkness—a Garret—a rushlight dying—
On the broken down bed a Sailor lying,
Sleeping fast, in the feeble light,—
The Wind is waiting, the Rain is weeping
She croucheth there in the chamber dim,
She croucheth there with her eyes on him
As he leth sleeping—
Hark! Hark!
Who cries outside in the dark?
Only the Wind on its way,
Only the wild gusts astray
In Tiger Bay

Still as a child the Sailor lies—
She waits—she watches—is she human?
Is she a Tigress? is she a woman?
Look at the gleam of her deep-set eyes!
Bleated and stain'd in every feature,
With iron jaws, throat knotted and bare,
Eyes deep sunken, jet-black hair,
Crouches the creature
Hark! Hark!
Who cries outside in the dark?
Only the wind on its way,
Only the wild gusts astray
In Tiger Bay

Hold her! scream! or the man is dead,
A knife in her tight-clench'd hand is gleaming;
She will kill the man as he leth dreaming!
Her eyes are fixed, her throat swells red
The Wind is waiting, the Rain is weeping,
She is crawling closer—O Angels! that love him!
She holds her breath and bends above him,
While he stirs leth sleeping
Hark! Hark!
Who cries outside in the dark?
Only the Wind on its way,
Only the wild gusts astray
In Tiger Bay

A silken purse doth the sleeper clutch,
And the gold peeps through with a fatal glimmer;
She creepeth near—the light grows dimmer—
Her thick throat swells, and she thrusts to touch

She looks—she pants with a feverish hunger—
She dashes the black hair out of her eyes—
She glares at his face . . . he smiles and sighs
And the face looks younger
Hark! Hark!
Who cries outside in the dark?
Only the Wind on its way,
Only the wild gusts astray
In Tiger Bay

She gazeth on,—he doth not stir—
Her fierce eyes close, her brute lip quivers;
She longs to strike, but she shrinks and shivers
The light on his face appalleth her
The Wind is waiting, the Rain is weeping
Something holds her—her wild eyes roll;
His soul shines out, and she fears his Soul,
Tho' he leth sleeping.

Hark! Hark!
Who cries outside in the dark?
Only the Wind on its way,
Only the wild gusts astray
In Tiger Bay

ROSES

Sad, and sweet and wise,
Here a child reposes,
Dust is on his eyes,
Quietly he lies,— Satan, strew Roses!

Weeping low, creeping slow,
Came the Weary-Winged!
Roses red over the dead
Quietly he sing'd.

"I am old," he thought,
"And the world's day closes;
Pals and fever-fraught,
Sadly have I brought
These blood-red Roses"

By his side the mother came
Shudderingly creeping,
The Devil's and the woman's heart
Bitterly were weeping

Swift he came and swift he flew,
Hopeless he reposes,
Waiting on is weary too,— Wherefore on his grave we strew
Bitter, withering Roses.

The Devil gripp'd the woman's heart,
With gall he staunch'd its bleeding;
Far away, beyond the day
The Lord heard interceding

"Lord God, One in Three!
Sure Thy anger closes,
Yesterday I died, and see
The Weary-Winged over me
Bitterly streweth Roses"

The voice cried out, "Rejoice! rejoice!"
There shall be sleep for evil!"
And all the sweetness of God's voice
Passed strangely through the Devil.

If Buchanan is a notable example of the Celtic Scot, WILLIAM BUTLER YEATS (1866) is an equally significant illustration of the Irish Celt. Though he has neither the versatility nor the dramatic force of Buchanan, yet in sheer poetic quality he is certainly superior. There is a delicate and haunting music about his work, and the title of one of his volumes, The Wind among the Reeds, is no inapt symbol of his muse. He is like a wandering voice of the woods, a lyric cry, somewhat thin and faint at times, with a certain chilly sweetness, but with an attractive magno of its own, unlike that of any other contemporary singer. In his Plays, while there is little genuine drama, there is often a poignant beauty. But Mr Yeats is essentially a dreamer, and his dreams seem wrought out of "the dreams the drowny gods

Breathe on the burnished mirror of the world,
And then smooth out with loving hands and sigh."

The war fever that swept over England in the mid-century, occasioned by the Crimean War, inspired a few writers of verse with the patriotic motif. GERALD MASSEY'S War Waits; E. C. JONES' The Waves and the War, and La Nation Boutiquière and Points of View by HENRY and FRANK LUSHINGTON, were among the more notable contributions of the time, though as writers of patriotic verse, none of them attained the beauty and finish of Tennyson's patriotic verse, or the grip of Kipling's ballads.

RODEN NOEL (1834-1894) and PHILIP BOURKE MARSTON (1850-1887) were verse makers of the later Victorian era, of fine merit. Noel's best work may be found in his Modern Faust and A Little Child's Monument, where he shows strength and sincerity, if not much art. MARSTON, the blind poet, is chiefly remembered by a few musical lyrics and neatly turned sonnets. He is particularly happy with the wind as a poetic inspiration—as in his Wind Waves (1883).

THOMAS GORDON HAKE (1809-1895), whose name is pleasantly associated with that of the greater Pre-Raphaelites, is one of the more remarkable names in the poetic literature of the late century. A physician by profession, of wide experience, he varied his scientific studies with experiments in literature. Here he showed much versatility, exhibiting no mean power of characterisation in his novel Her Winning Ways in 1870, and achieving distinction in sonnet, narrative, and dramatic verse. Over elaborated at times, and in his earlier work somewhat crude in artistic form, his poetry impresses the reader with the realisation of a fresh, vigorous, and original personality. His best work may be found in New Symbols (containing such striking poems as The Snake Charmer and Michael Angelo), and in The New Day, a series of nearly a hundred Sonnets, musical and expressive and seminal in thought. Perhaps the most lasting impression left on the mind of the reader is the poet's subtle insight into varieties of character, and the spiritual breadth of his sympathies.

THE SNAKE CHARMER

The forest rears on lifted arms
Its leafy dome, whence verdurous light
Shakes through the shady depths and warms
Proud tree and stealthy parasite,
There where those cruel coils enclasp
The trunks they strangle in their grasp.

An old man creeps from out the woods,
Breaking the vine's entangling spell
He thrids the jungle's solitudes
O'er bamboos rotting where they fell
Slow down the tiger's path he wends
Where at the pool the jungle ends.

No moss-greened alley tells the trace
Of his lone step, no sound is stirred,
Even when his tawny hands displace
The boughs, that backward sweep unheard;
His way as noiseless as the trail
Of the swift snake and pilgrim snail.

The old snake-charmer,—once he played
Soft music for the serpent's ear,
But now his cunning hand is stayed;
He knows the hour of death is near.
And all that live in brake and bough,
All know the brand is on his brow.

Yet where his soul is he must go;
He crawls along from tree to tree,
The old snake-charmer doth he know
If snake or beast of prey he be?
Bewildered at the pool he lies
And sees as through a serpent's eyes.

Weeds wave with white-flowered lily crops
Drink of the pool, and serpents lie
To the thin brink as noonday drops,
And in the froth-daubed rushes lie
There rests he now with fastened breath
'Neath a kind sun to bask in death.

The later years of the era had its scholar poets no less than its earlier period, though they are not quite so prominently in evidence.

WILLIAM CORY (1823-1892) and FRANCIS TURNER PALGRAVE (1824-1897) are cases in point. Cory was the finer scholar, and he excelled in translations from the Greek and Latin, and was always scrupulously classical in form in his original work. His Ionica, published in 1858, had to wait long for recognition; and admittedly its appeal is only to the highly cultured few. Palgrave is best remembered for his admirable Golden Treasury of Songs and Lyrics, where he showed a fine faculty for critical discernment. His original work is tame and nerveless.

JOHN BYRNE LEICESTER WARREN, Lord de Tabley (1835-1895), was another scholarly poet, sensitive to the influences of his age, yet unlike poetic scholars like Garnett and Myers (the distinction is a real one), had a distinctive and original power of his own, when all allowances are made for the influences that greater poets like Tennyson and Swinburne especially left on his work.

His earliest work was dramatic in form, Philotes (1866) and Orestes (1867), exhibiting an essential mastery of blank verse. His later work is more lyrical, and although this did not come so easily to him, he achieved some notably artistic successes as a lyric writer, showing a simplicity and strength as well as a sweetness in his song. Though scarcely appreciated by many of his contemporaries, among whom Gladstone was certainly not to be included, and never receiving the deserts due to his artistic gifts, he had some wise and discerning friends, none more so than Mr Watts-Dunton, who wrote the obituary notice of him in the Athenaeum. He there testifies to the remarkable versatility of Lord de Tabley's intellectual gifts:

"On first visiting him, as on many a subsequent occasion, I was struck by the variety of his intellectual interests, and the thoroughness with which he pursued them all. I have lately said in print what I fully believe—that he was the most learned of English poets, if learning meant something more than mere scholarship. He was a skilled numismatist, and in 1862 published through the Numismatic Society, 'An Essay on Greek Federal Coinage,' and 'An Essay on some Coins of Lycia under Rhodian Domination and of the Lycian League.' He even took an interest in book-plates, and actually in 1880 published 'A Guide to the Study of Book-Plates.' He was a profound botanist, and wrote books upon the botany of Cheshire.¹

Nature poems he wrote like an imaginative man of science, whose science is not blended with his art in what chemists call a mechanical mixture, but in what they call a chemical mixture, when they blend absolutely into a fresh, distinctive entity.

A WINTER SKETCH

When the snow begins to feather,
And the woods begin to roar,
Clashing angry boughs together,
As the breakers grind the shore,
Nature then a bankrupt goes,
Full of wreck and full of woes.
When the swan for warmer forelands
Leaves the sea firth's ice-bound edge.
When the gray geese from the moorlands
Cleave the cloud in noisy wedge,
Woodlands stand in frozen chains,
Hung with ropes of solid rains.
Shepherds creep to hyre and haven,
Sheep in drifts are nipped and numb;
Some belated rook or raven
Rocks upon a sign-post dumb.
Mere-waves solid as a clod
Howl with skaters thunder-shod
All the roofs and chimneys rumble,
Roads are ridged with slush and sleet;
Down the orchard apples tumble,
Ploughboys stamp their frosty feet.
Millers, jolted down the lanes,
Hardly feel for cold their reins
Snaps are calling from the trenches,
Frozen half and half at flow,
In the porches servant wenches
Work with shovels at the snow.
Rusty blackbirds, weak of wing,
Clean forget they once could sing
Dogs and boys fetch down the cattle,
Deep in mire and powdered pale;
Spinning wheels commence to rattle,
Landlords spice the smoking ale.
Hail, white winter, lady fine,
In a cup of elder wine.

Very different in its appeal, but equally fine, and with the clarity and restraint of the true poet, are his pathetic verses

MISREPRESENTATION

Peace, there is nothing more for men to seek
A larger wisdom than our lips' decrees
Of that dumb mouth no longer reason seek,
No censure reaches that eternal peace,
And that immortal ease.
Believe them not that would disturb the end
With earth's invidious comment, idly meant.
Speak and have done thine evil, for my friend
Is gone beyond all human discontent,
And wisely meant.

Say what you will and have your sneer and go.
You see the specks, we only heed the fruit
Of a great life, whose truth—men hate truth so—
No lukewarm age of compromise could suit,
Laugh and be mute!

The second LORD LYTTON (1831-91) known in literature as "Owen Meredith," inherited most of his father's versatility and impressionability. A widely read man, his work reflects far more clearly the influence of his great contemporaries than it mirrors any individual outlook. He echoed Tennyson, Mrs. Browning, and the Pre-Raphaelites at various times, and with considerable popular success.

Just as we may follow the vagaries of English fiction and the rise and decline of differing tendencies in the versatile work of the elder Lytton, so may we judge the popular taste of the day in verse by a study of "Owen Meredith's" work.

Another cultured man, who also achieved popular success, was Sir EDWIN ARNOLD (1832-1901), but there is more of the genuine poet in him than in his contemporary.

The Light of Asia (1879) may not be a great poem, but it breaks fresh and fascinating ground, and although we may desire for so vast a subject a more dignified, a more profound treatment, yet it has that agreeable fluency and play of fancy that pleases a large number of readers. At any rate it opened what was practically a sealed book to the public at large—the life and faith of an Eastern people—a subject that of late years has received increasing attention from men of letters.

But it was a far cry from the graceful saccharine sentiment of Sir Edwin Arnold to the imaginative insight of a FILLIDA HALL in his Soul of a People, or to the delicate discernment of a LAMARCO HEARN.

Of quite another type of poet is WILLIAM CALDWELL ROSCOE (1823-1859), who came of literary stock, and is responsible for a varying though attractive body of delicate, artistic verse. Roscoe is essentially a Nature poet, preferring to dwell on her more peaceful aspects, which he does in a graceful and musical manner, with hints of fundamental brainwork behind the melody, that saved him from the ladylike productions of some graceful poetasters.

DAYBREAK IN FEBRUARY

Over the ground white snow, and in the air
Silence. The stars, like lamps soon to expire,
Gleam tromblingly, serene and heavenly fair,
The eastern hanging crescent climbs the higher
See, purple on the azure softly steals
And Morning, faintly touched with quivering fire,
Leans on the frosty summits of the hills,
Like a young girl over her hoary sire
Oh, such a dawning over me has come,
The daybreak of thy purity and love,—
The sadness of the never saluate tomb
Thy countenance hath power to remove,
And from the sepulchre of Hope, thy palm
Can roll the stone, and raise her bright and calm.

Approximating to Roscoe in his delicate art and love of Nature, is the quaint mediævalism of SEBASTIAN EVANS (1830); and the mystic mediævalism of GEORGE AUGUSTUS SIMCOX.

More playful and extravagant in his moods is WILLIAM BRIDGET RANDS (1823-1880). He excelled in the fantastic and had a rich gift for parabolic fancies, such as Lilliput Legends, Silver Sand and The Carrier Pigeon. In his quality of imagination he reminds us not infrequently of Nathaniel Hawthorne. There is a delightful whimsicality about his work, and some of his graceful absurdities will long outlive the portentous verse of many a contemporary.

TORSYTURVEY-WORLD

If the butterfly courted the bee,
And the owl the porcupine ;
If churches were built in the sea,
And three times one were nine ;
If the pony rode his master,
If the buttercups ate the cows,
If the oat had the dire disaster
To be worried, sir, by the mouse ;
If mamma, sir, sold the baby
To a gipsy for half a crown ;
If a gentleman, sir, was a lady,—
The world would be Upside-Down !
If any of all those wonders
Should ever come about,
I should not consider them blunders,
For I should be Inside-Out !

Chorus

Ba-ba, black wool,
Have you any sheep ?
Yes, sir, a pack-full,
Creep, mouse, creep !
Four-and twenty little maids
Hanging out the pie
Out jumped the honey-pot,
Guy-Fawkes, Guy !
Crown latch, cross latch,
Sit and spin the fire,
When the pie was opened,
The bird was on the brier !

POLLY

Brown eyes,
Straight nose,
Dirt pies,
Rumpled clothes

Torn books,
Spoilt toys,
Arch looks,
Unlike a boy's ;

Little rages,
Obvious arts,
(Three her age is),
Cakes, tarts,

Falling down
Off chairs,
Breaking crown
Down stairs ;

Catching flies
(On the pane)
Deep sighs,—
Cause not plain.

Drinking you
With kisses
For a few
Farthing blisses ;

Wide awake,
As you hear,
Mersey's sake,
Quiet dear !

New shoes,
Now frock ;
Vague views
Of what's o'clock.

When it's time
To go to bed,
And scorn sublime
For what is said

Folded hands,
Saying prayers.
Understands
Not, nor cares,

Thanks it odd,
Smiles away ;
Yet may God
Hear her pray.

Bedgown white,
Kiss Dolly,
Good night !—
That's Polly.

Fast asleep,
As you see ;
Heaven keep
My girl for me !

Another verse writer with a blessed sense of humour, though, owing to the exigencies of a hard-driven life, with less art, is MORTIMER COLLINS (1827-1876). His best lyrics have grace and charm, and his humour, with admirable antiseptic properties, destroys the bacteria of sentimentality that flourishes too often in graceful minor verse.

To F C

Fast falls the snow, O lady mine,
Sprinkling the lawn with crystals fine,
But by the gods we won't repine
While we're together,
We'll chat and rhyme, and kiss and dine,
Defying weather.

So stir the fire and pour the wine,
And let those sea-green eyes divine
Pour their love-madness into mine :
I don't care whether
The snow or sun or rain or shine
If we're together.

There is a pleasant old time atmosphere about the cultured romantic verse of CANON DIXON (1833-1900), the friend of Morris and Burne-Jones, while the romance of Anglo India has one of its earlier singers in Sir ALFRED LYALL (1835).

Mention of other lands recalls also yet another romantic poet, ADAM LINDSAY GORDON (1833-1870), whose vivid and picturesque pictures of Bush life in Australia find many admirers not merely across the seas, where he is regarded with special affection, but in England, where his local colour cannot affect us as strongly as it does down south.

Born in the Azores, and educated at Cheltenham, he had a roving and varied career. A youthful exuberance at home led to his departure over seas, and for six years he was in the Mounted Police of South Australia, with occasional experiments as a horse-breaker. After various vicissitudes, and a fairly constant repitching of his tent, he settled in Melbourne, where his verse was first published under the title of Sea Spray and Smoke Drift. This was followed by Bush Ballads and Galloping Rhymes. Straitened circumstances, however, and failing health preyed upon his mind, and one morning it was found that he had put an end to his anxieties by means of a bullet. He was a fine athlete, and knew his Australia well. The life there appealed particularly to his imagination, and without the stimulus of that environment it is doubtful whether he would ever have made a name as a verse writer

The vigorous and imaginative intensity of his work may be gauged from the following illustration :

CONFITEOR

The shore boat lies in the morning light,
By the good ship ready for sailing,
Tho' the skies are clear, and the dawn is bright,
Tho' the bar of the bay is fleck'd with white,
And the wind is fitfully wailing,
Near the tiller stands the priest, and the knight
Leans over the quarter railing

There is time while the vessel tarries still,
There is time while her shrouds are slack,
There is time ere her sails to the west wind fill,
Ere her tall masts vanish from town and from hill,
Ere cleaves to her keel the track
There is time for confession to those who will,
To those who may never come back

Sir priest, you can shrive these men of mine,
And, pray you, shrive them fast,
And shrive those hardy sons of the brine,
Captain and mates of the Eglantine,
And sailors before the mast,
Then pledge me a cup of the Cyprus wine,
For I fain would bury the past

And hast thou naught to repent, my son ?
Dost thou scorn confession and shrift ?
Ere thy sands from the glass of time shall run
I their naught undone that thou should'st have done
Naught done that thou should'st have left ?
The guiltiest soul may from guilt be won,
And the stoniest heart be cleft

Have my ears been closed to the prayer of the poor
(Or deaf to the cry of distress ?
Have I given little, and taken more ?
Have I brought a curse to the widow's door ?
Have I wronged the fatherless ?
Have I steep'd my fingers in guiltless gore,
That I must perforce confess ?

Have my steps been guided in purity
Through the paths with wickedness rife ?
Hast thou never smitten thine enemy ?
Hast thou yielded naught to the lust of the eye,
And naught to the pride of life ?
Hast thou passed all snares of pleasure by ?
Hast thou shunn'd all wrath and strife ?

Nay, certes ! a sinful life I've led,
Yet have suffered, and lived in hope ;
I may suffer still, but my hope has fled,—
I've nothing now to hope or to dread,
And with fate I can fairly cope,
Were the waters closing over my head,
I should scarcely catch at a rope "

Along with Gordon may be placed HENRY CLARENCE KENDALL (1841-1882), who was an Australian by birth as well as by inspiration. He is a poet of richer and intenser imagination than his contemporary, and is a kind of spiritual counterpart to Gordon. Where Gordon is picturesque and vigorous, Kendall is mystical and passionate. His landscapes, as compared with those of Gordon, are turning from a Rembrandt to look at a Constable. A venturesome and varied life, a life also of struggle and unhappiness, he was cut off in his prime, succumbing to the exactions of trying climatic conditions.

SEPTEMBER IN AUSTRALIA

Grey winter hath gone like a wearisome guest,
And behold, for repayment,
September comes in with the wind of the west,
And the spring in her raiment !
The ways of the frost have been filled of the flowers,
While the forest discovers
Wild wings with the halo of hyaline hours,
And the music of lovers

September, the maid with the swift, silver feet,
She glides, and she graces
The valleys of coolness, the slopes of the heat,
With her blossomy traces
Sweet month, with a mouth that is made of a rose,
She lightens and lingers
In spots where the harp of the evening glow,
Attuned by her fingers

The stream from its home in the hollow hill slips
In a darling old fashion,
And the day goeth down with a song on its lips
Whose key-note is passion
Far out in the fierce, bitter frost of the sea
I stand, and remember
Dead things that were brothers and sisters of thee,
Resplendent September

The west, when it blows at the fall of the noon,
And beats on the heaches
Is filled with a tender and tremulous tune
That touches and teaches
The stories of Youth of the burden of Time,
And the death of devotion
Come back with the wind, and are themes of the rhyme
In the waves of the ocean

We, having a secret to others unknown
In the cool mountain mosses,
May whisper together September, alone
Of our loves and our losses
One word for her beauty, and one for the grief
She gave to the hours,
And then we may kiss her and suffer her fall
To sleep with the flowers

High places that knew of the gold and the white
On the forehead of morning,
Now darken and quake, and the steps of the Night
Are heavy with warning !
Her voice in the distance is lofty and loud,
Through its echoing gorges,
She hath hidden her eyes in a mantle of cloud,
And her feet in the surges !

On the top of the hills, on the turreted cones—
Chief temples of thunder—
The gale, like a ghost in the middle watch moans,
Gliding over and under
The sea flying white through the rack and the rain,
Leapeth wild to the forelands,
And the plover, whose cry is like passion with pain,
Complains in the moorlands

Oh, season of changes, of shadow and shine,
September the splendid !
My song hath no music to mingle with thine,
And its burden is ended,
But thou being born of the winds and the sun,
By mountain by river
May lighten and listen, and loiter and run
With thy voices for ever

Another scholar who has shown a gift of narrative is Mr. JOHN PAYNE (1842), but of greater importance are his translations for the Villon Society, and his Decameron. The Villon translations are particularly fine. His Arabian Nights has met with high praise from experts, though they consider it less accurate than Burton's

There is an atmosphere of competent mediocrity about a considerable number of late Victorian writers. They are mostly men of taste and culture, skilled in the art of letters—as accomplished craftsmen often, too, highly distinguished in other fields, but there is little freshness and originality or poetic distinction about their work. They have drunk deep from the well of poesy, and have learned much from the great men of the past; they are seldom varied, often graceful, melodious, and thoughtful, but poetry seems to be in their hands more of an agreeable by-product, than a genuine and spontaneous expression of their temperament and personality. To such belong Sir ALFRED AUSTIN, late Poet Laureate, RICHARD GARNETT, JOHN ADDINGTON SYMONDS, EDWARD DOWDEN, ERNEST MYERS, FREDERIC W. H. MYERS, WILLIAM SHARP, and SAMUEL WADDINGTON.

Symonds, Dowden, Garnett, and Myers have won their laurels in literary and art criticism, whilst Sharp has distinguished himself also in imaginative prose, and their memories are stored with the poetical riches of the past. There is nothing trivial, nothing slovenly, in their polished scholarly verse, neither is there that breath of spontaneous impulse that often visits many a writer far more ill-equipped, far less skilful in craftsmanship than they.

On the other hand, two other writers of our time have written verse that has in it a welcome note of distinction and spontaneity—ANDREW LANG (1844–1912), and JOHN TODDUNTER (1839). In technical power it is in no way superior to that already mentioned, but it exhibits more life and individuality. Take for instance,

ALMAE MATRES

St Andrews, 1862–Oxford, 1865

St Andrews by the Northern Sea,

A haunted town it is to me!

A little city, worn and gray,

The grey North Ocean guards it round,

And o'er the rocks and up the bay,

The long sea rollers surge and sound

And still the thun and huting spray

Drives down the melancholy street,

And still endure, and still decay,

Towers that the salt winds vainly beat

Ghost-like and shadowy they stand

Clear mirrored in the wet sea-sand.

O, ruined chapel, long ago

We loiter'd idly where the tall

Fresh-budded mountain-ashes blow

Within thy desecrated wall!

The tough roots broke the tomb below,

The April birds sang clamorous,

We did not dream, we could not know

How soon the fates would smite us!

O broken minster, looking forth

Beyond the bay, above the town,

O, winter of the kindly North,

O, college of the scarlet gown,

And shining sands beside the sea,

And stretch of links beyond the sand

Once more I watch you, and to me

It is as if I touched his hand!

And therefore art thou yet more dear,

O, little city gray and sore,

Though shrunken from thine ancient pride

And lonely by thy lonely sea,

Than these fair halls on Isis' side,

Where Youth an hour came back to me.

A land of waters green and clear,
Of willows and of poplars tall,
And in the Spring-time of the year,
The white may breaking over all,
And Pleasure quick to come at call;
And Summer rides by marsh and wold,
And Autumn with her crimson pull
About the towers of Magdalen rolled
And strange enchantments from the past,
And memories of the friends of old,
And strong Tradition binding fast
The flying terms with bands of gold,—
All these hath Oxford: all are dear,
But dearest far the little town,
The drifting surf, the wintry year,
The college of the scarlet gown,
St Andrews by the Northern Sea,
That is a haunted town to me!

NIGHTINGALE WEATHER

I'll never be a nun, I trow,
While apple bloom is white as snow,
But far more fair to see,
I'll never wear nun's black and white
While nightingales make sweet the night
Within the apple tree

Ah, listen! 'tis the nightingale,
And in the wood he makes his wail,
Within the apple tree.
He singeth of the sore distress
Of many ladies loverless,
Thank God, no song for me.

For when the broad May moon is low,
A gold fruit seen where blossoms blow
In the bough of the apple tree,
A stop I know is at the gate—
Ah, love, but it is long to wait
Until night's noon bring thee!

Between lark's song and nightingale's
A silent space, while dawning pales,
The birds leave still and free
For words and kisses musical,
For silence and for sighs that fall
In the dawn, 'twixt him and me.

The themes are trite enough, but they are touched by a light and airy grace that individualises them. In others—the Ballades, for instance—there is a kind of blithe wisdom, a note of pensive gaiety, that has a special charm. The Ballade to Theocritus in Winter is a happy example of this.

Dr Todhunter is more deliberate, and a shade more studied, than his contemporary, but he has the same power to give force and distinction to trifles, has attempted with admirable success the risky experiment of the unrhymed lyric, and shows real skill in his manipulation of blank verse.

THE BANSHEE

Green, in the wizard arms
Of the foam-bearded Atlantio,
An isle of old enchantment,
A melancholy isle,
Enchanted and dreaming lies:
And there, by Shannon's flowing,
In the moon-light spectro-thum,
The spectre Erin sits.

An aged desolation,
She sits by old Shannon's flowing,
A mother of many children,
Of children exiled and dead,
In her home, with bent head, homeless,
Clasping her knees she sits,
Keening, keening!

And at her keene the fairy-grass
Trembles on dun and barrow;
Around the foot of her ancient crosses
The grave grass shakes and the nettle swings;
In haunted glens the meadow-sweet
Flings to the night wind
Her mystic mournful perfume;
The sad spear-mint by holy walls
Breathes melancholy balm

Sometimes she lifts her head,
With blue eyes tearless,
And gazes athwart the look of night
Upon things long past,
Upon things to come

And sometimes, when the moon
Brings tempest upon the deep,
And roused Atlantic thunders from his caverns in the west,

The wolfhound at her feet
Springs up with a mighty bay
And chords of mystery sound from the wild harp at her side,

Strung from the heart of poets,
And she flies on the wings of tempest
Around her shuddering isle,
With grey hair streaming.
A meteor of evil omen,
The spectre of hope forlorn,
Keening, keening!

She keenes and the strings of her wild harp shiver
On the gusts of night
O'er the four waters she keenes—over Moyle she keenes,
O'er the sea of Milnth, and the Strait of Strongbow,
And the ocean of Columbus

And the Fama hear, and the ghost of her cloudy hovering heroes,

And the swan, Fianoula, wails o'er the waters of Inisfail,
Chanting her song of destiny,
The rune of the weaving Fates

And the nations hear in the void and quaking time of night,
Sad unto dawning, dirges,
Solemn dirges,
And snatches of bardic song;
Their souls quake in the void and quaking time of night,
And they dream of the weird of kings,
And tyrannies moulting, sick
In the dreadful wind of change.

Wail no more, lonely one, mother of exiles wail no more,
Banishes of the world—no more!
Thy sorrows are the world's, thou art no more alone,
Thy wrongs, the world's.

There is strength and the note of revolt (preluding the Victorian reaction) in the verse of FRANCIS B. T. MONEY-COUTTS (1852), that is combined with graceful and delicate art. His most representative work is found in The Revelation of St. Love the Divine (1898), The Poet's Charter and The Book of Job (1903). Lacking the gift of popular appeal, he is certainly a real force in modern poetry, and his treatment of Love has much of the sane vigour, though less imaginative strength, that we find in the work of such men as Mr. Edward Carpenter.

Force and sweetness, though more typically Victorian, is shown also in the work of ALFRED HAYES (1857), but his lyrics, though agreeable and musical, are less original and distinctive than his narrative work. In The March of Man (1892) and The Storming of Nazareth he shows both force and restraint, and these poems have many striking felicities of phrase.

Sweetness without strength characterises the verse of RICHARD LE GALLIENNE (1866). Fluency, grace, pleasing fancy, and a gift of melody are certainly his, but the tendency to affectation and to amorous gush—pardonable in a very young writer—have not decreased in the course of years, and he can scarcely be said to have redeemed his early promise. Mr. Le Gallienne is a man of wide culture and of fine critical insight (as witness his books on Meredith and Kipling), and his talent is far more virile than one would judge from his verse.

NORMAN GALE (1862), on the other hand, has lyric charm and sweetness; with a freshness of outlook and a light and airy strength that make him an agreeable addition to the band of late Victorian verse-writers, with individuality of their own. He belongs to the "Spring" order of Nature poets, for there is in his verse the lilt, the keenness, the blitheness of the Spring.

A PASTORAL

Along the lane beside the mead
Where cowslip gold is in the grass
I matched the milkmaid's easy speed,
A tall and springing country lass:
But though she had a merry plan
To shield her from my soft replies,
Love played at Catch-me-if-you-Can
In Mary's eyes.

A nule or twain from Varley Bridge
I plucked a dock leaf for a fan,
And drove away the constant midge,
And cool'd her forehead's strip of tan
And though the maiden would not spare
My hand her pretty finger-tip,
Love played at Kiss-me-if-you-Dare
On Mary's lip.

And now the village flashed in sight,
And closer came I to her side,
A flush ran down into the white,
The impulse of a pinky tide
And though her face was turned away
How much her panting heart confessed
Love played at Find-me-if-you-May
In Mary's breast

THE POETRY OF CHILDHOOD

Less powerful and versatile, but not unlike De Tally in the delicate beauty of his best work, is THOMAS ASHE (1835-1892). He also was a man of scholarly attainment, and lacked the popular appeal, but the appreciative few cheered him on, and he met the general indifference of the reading public with philosophic resignation. His fascination for child life, and his attitude towards children recalls on its sentimental side that of another mathematician—"Lewis Carroll."

Perhaps a touch or so of Carroll's humour might have been of advantage to Ashe as a poet, and obviate the faint though appreciable, strain of morbidity in Ashe's fancies.

The Poetry of Child Life is of two kinds: that in which the grown-up peer down at dawning life, fascinated by its fresh simplicity and adolescent charm; and that where the grown-up, by virtue of his sympathetic imagination, identifies himself with the child, looking at the world through the child's eyes. This is the rarer gift and the most attrac-tivo. Ashe had the one, Stevenson the other. STEVENSON'S art is not happily expressed in much of his verse, and his ballads are greatly inferior to Newbolt's, but all his youthful, whimsical, and Puck-like qualities emerge in his Child's Garden of Verse. They are entirely delightful, and without any rival in our literature.

MY SHADOW

I have a little shadow that goes in and out with me,
And what can be the use of him is more than I can see !
He is very, very like me from the heels up to the head ;
And I see him jump before me when I jump into my bed

The funniest thing about him is the way he likes to grow—
Not at all like proper children, which 's always very slow.

For he sometimes shoots up taller like an india-rubber ball,
And he sometimes gets so little that there's none of him
at all.

He hasn't got a notion of how children ought to play,
And can only make a fool of me in every sort of way
He stays so close beside me, he's a coward you can see,
I'd think shame to stick to nurse as that shadow sticks to me !

One morning very early, before the sun was up,
I rose and found the shining dew on every buttercup,
But my lazy little shadow, like an arrant sleepy-head,
Had stayed at home behind me and was fast asleep in bed

There is quite an individual charm about the lyric verse of WILLIAM CANTON (1845), who spent many of his earlier years in America, and received some of his happiest inspiration from his environment there. He excels in depicting with fresh beauty the familiar aspects of Nature, and has written with tenderness and grace and restraint on childhood.

The pleasant lyrical sweetness of GEORGE BARLOW (1847) is at its best in homely and simple themes, such as his tender verses :

THE DEAD CHILD

But yesterday she played with childish things,
With toys and painted fruit
To-day she may be speeding on bright wings
Beyond the stars ! We ask The stars are mute.

But yesterday her doll was all in all ;
She laughed and was content
To-day she will not answer, if we call :
She dropped no toys to show the road she went.

But yesterday she smiled and ranged with art
Her play things on the bed
To-day and yesterday are leagues apart !
She will not smile to-day, for she is dead

THE CALL OF THE TOWN IN VICTORIAN VERSE

The Call of the Town, and especially the Call of London, that has lured some of our great novelists, from Dickens onwards, has, for obvious reasons, proved less of a spell in verse than in prose. In the age of Pope, the "dear, damn'd, distracting town" exercised a sorcery that Nature was powerless to counteract. Artificial verse needs artificial inspiration. But from the Romantic Revival onwards the poets breathed more easily in the open air, on the mountain top, "beside the lake, beneath the trees." None the less, that there is a poetry of the town no less than a poetry of the countryside was realised by so fervent a high priest of Nature as Wordsworth, as his sonnet on Westminster Bridge will testify, and the keen discerners will note among the poets of the Victorian age, not a few whose art has been touched by what has been called "The greatest wonder which the world can show . . . London." Rossetti, Tennyson, Browning, Matthew Arnold, were all indebted at times to the stimulus of the crowded streets. Arnold's poetry reflects again and again the problems of the City, e.g. his sonnet on East London ; Tennyson recalls Fleet Street with affection ; Browning's crowd worship is frank enough, and Rossetti, for all his old-time romanticism, has left in two poems dealing with the life of the Town, Jenny and The Burden of Nineveh, some of his strongest work. Similarly, the student may trace without much difficulty the magic of the City in many of the poets. But it is only in comparatively recent times, when a more realistic note was creeping into our literature, that the Call of the Town declares itself as an insistent and ever dominant one. The call is unmistakable in the London Visions of that accomplished and versatile poet, LAURENCE BINYON (1869), still more so in much of Henley's work.

"O the wonder, the spell of the streets !
The stature and strength of the horses,
The rustle and echo of footfalls,
The flat roar and rattle of wheels !
A swift train floats huge on us . . .
Is't a dream ?
The smell of the mud in my nostrils
Is brave—like a breath of the sea !"

There is nothing half-hearted about this.

While in Davidson, Kipling, and Arthur Symonds, to mention no others, the "spell of the streets" had proved an equally potent inspiration.

WILLIAM ERNEST HENLEY (1849–1903) was a distinguished and forceful man of letters, provocative as a critic, though undeniably fresh and suggestive ; interesting if not satisfying as a dramatist, and certainly stimulating and unconventional as a poet. His verses entitled The Hospital : Rhymes and Rhythms, assuredly pioneered the realistic verse of to-day, and are the product of a mind at once brutally concrete and highly imaginative. The deft and happy phrase in which he suggests the background of these verses, bespeaks a genuine poetic imagination :

"The morning mists still haunt the stony street ;
The northern summer air is shrill and cold ;
And lo, the Hospital, grey, quiet, old,
Where life and death like friendly chaffers meet."

Better still, for he allows himself greater imaginative scope, are the London Voluntaries. Apart from the London note in his work, Henley showed himself to be a spirited and impassioned lyric writer, and has added materially to our store of vigorous patriotic verse.

SOME LATTER-DAY POETS

Another writer of patriotic verse, simpler and less rhetorical in its appeal than was Henloy's, is HENRY JOHN NEWBOLT (1862). Temperamentally as an artist he is closely akin to Mr Kipling; but in a matter of literary indebtedness he owes nothing to him, though some critics have spoken as if he were one of Kipling's followers. With a breezy humour, a simple, direct appeal, and a happy faculty of expressing energy in verse, Sir Henry Newbolt has proved an extremely popular poet; but he has not merely caught the ear of the groundlings, he has pleased fastidious ears; and for all his seeming roughness is a deft and accomplished craftsman, who has gauged many possibilities of metrical structures.

Political life does not often yield a notable poet, but it did so in the case of WILFRED SCAVEN BLUNT (1840), who has been both a diplomatist and a traveller, as well as a man of letters. He attracted considerable notice by his warm championship of the cause of Arabi Pasha, England, my England, resented the implied slur upon her general attitude towards the Egyptian Question. His sympathy for oppressed nationalities went beyond the usual literary protest of the poet, and he was proud of "the honour" of spending two months in prison for the sake of Ireland. As a poet he has a fresh, original outlook, intensity of feeling, and indubitable sincerity; those things give genuine interest to the vital and aggressively assertive personality which we find in The Love Sonnets of Proteus, and in the volume In Vincula.

This survey of later Victorian verse may conclude with a brief estimate of the work of our present Laureate, Robert Bridges, and Francis Thompson.

A greater contrast with Mr Bridges than is afforded by Francis Thompson would be impossible: yet on one point they fall into line. Neither owes any spiritual indebtedness to his age. Each stands aloof from the spirit of his time; each, in his own very different manner, harking back to the music of the seventeenth century, in no imitative way, but by virtue of his temperament. But the unobtrusiveness and delicate enjoyment of Mr Bridges is strangely at variance with the insistent and thrilling raptures of Thompson.

The distinguishing qualities in ROBERT BRIDGES' (1844) verse are sober sincerity and a fastidious simplicity. In his love of experimentalising, in his dainty and delicate sense of rhythm, in the freshness of his diction, he derives from romanticism. Yet how unlike are the pearl greys of his decorative muse, to the glowing tints of romantic verse as we know it. Take for instance this song:

"I have loved flowers that fade,
Within whose magic tents
Rich hues have marriage made,
With sweet unmemoried scents.
A honeymoon delight,—
A joy of love at sight,
That ages in an hour —
My song be like a flower !
I have loved aurs, that die
Before their charm is writ
Along a liquid sky
Trembling to welcome it

Notes, that with pulse of fire
Proclaim the spirit's desire,
Then die, and are nowhere.—
My song be like an air

Die, song, die like a breath,
And wither as a bloom
Fear not a flowery death,
Dread not an airy tomb !
Fly with delight, fly hence !
'Twas thine love's tender sense
To feast ; now on thy hier
Beauty shall shed a tear.

This is like a lyric from one of the Elizabethan song-writers, minus the rapture.

Mr. Bridges is certainly a passionate writer, yet the passion has light without heat. His finest work has the chill beauty of a spring dawn—a dawn of gradually diffused silver grey, never merging into anything warmer than a faint delicate amber. There are no scarlets, no purples in his work. It expresses no thrill of wonder, no strange apocalypse of beauty; merely a wistful surmise, or ecstasy so faint that unless we listen carefully to his tones we may miss it. And the ecstasy is there—the primal quality of Mr Bridges' work is emotional, not intellectual, as a hasty survey might lead us to imagine. He belongs neither to the philosophic verse-maker, as illustrated by Matthew Arnold, nor the marmoreal school of sculptured phrase, of which Landor is so distinguished an exponent. He is reflective and pensive like Arnold, he is austere cool like Landor, but his muse, unlike these, is essentially a lyric muse, though sometimes the music is more than and ghostly in its timbre, and lacking that haunting sweetness that we look for in our song writers. Perhaps Mr. Bridges has made his point of view sufficiently clear in this verse:

"Simple enjoyment calm in its excess,
With not a grief to cloud, and not a ray
Of passion overhot my peace to oppress ;
With no ambition to reproach delay,
Nor rapture to disturb my happiness."

This is more ascetic even than Wordsworth, whose austere raptures were none the less raptures, whereas the "simple enjoyment" of Mr Bridges seems a curiously negative affair. Where, it may be asked, is the emotional quality here? To some this rigid tranquillity may suggest stagnation. Yet there is certainly never that, and although it may be frankly conceded such a temperament is singularly restricted in its appeal, yet to a few it can make a very definite appeal. But the work of Mr Bridges is essentially the work of a sensitive scholar, who dallies delicately with the simplicities and complexities of Nature and of Art, shrinking from robust expression and fervent rapture as something noisy and distasteful. We can fancy him retreating with faint, well-bred amazement from the coverts where the nightingale was singing out her heart, not wholly unresponsive, for after all he is a singer also, but inclined to endorse the criticism of the lady who observed after one of these tumults of song, "Very pretty; but don't you think the bird overdoes it?"

Mr. Bridges has a horror of overdoing anything, and we cannot help thinking that an occasional orgy would do him no little good.

But we must take the gifts the gods provide; and the delicate flutings of our Poet Laureate carry with them admittedly a magic of their own, while the deft skill of his prosodic experiments interest even when they do not convince. There is a twilight charm about his poetry, not the warm brown twilight of Rossetti that hints at nocturnal mysteries; but a cool silver grey from which he whispers to us sedately and graciously.

FRANCIS THOMPSON was born at Preston, Lancashire, in 1859. With a view to the Roman Catholic priesthood he was sent to Ushaw College, but from a curious melancholy and absent-mindedness, attributed to indolence, his superiors decided he had no vocation. He then went to Owen's College, Manchester, to study for his father's profession—that of a doctor. Here he distinguished himself in Greek, but the shy, self-centred, visionary youth found nothing congenial in the prospect of the dissecting-room, and would not attend classes. This inability to carry out his father's wishes preyed upon a naturally introspective mind, a nervous illness followed, and, like Do Quincey, whose Confessions was his constant companion, he had recourse to opium, responsible for so much later misery.

Thompson at length made his way to "the unfathomable abyss" of London, where, friendless and without money, he suffered much privation; for a time he (or rather a part of him, and that a small part) was a bookseller's assistant, a messenger, and a boot-black, but his whole sentient life, his sympathies, and all that was real in him, went into his poetry. In 1887 he sent the fruit of his labour to Mr and Mrs Meynell, a close intimacy sprang up between them, and with the family he eventually made his home. Indeed, without their ungrudging care and sympathy Francis Thompson could not have long existed.

Thompson's first volume of Poems was published in 1893, followed by Sister Songs in 1895, his prose works include Health and Holiness (1904), a complaint made by the Body "Brother Ass" against its ruler the Soul, an Essay on Shelley, a brilliant piece of decorative prose; and he did much fine critical work for the Academy and the Athenæum.

A naturally fragile constitution had been impaired by his erratic mode of living, while the opium, though it may have helped for a while the lung trouble, proved a paralysing curse, from which he never really escaped. All that love could do was done for him by his devoted friends, but without avail, and his death took place in London at the early age of forty-eight.

With the ascetic passion of Miss Rossetti, Thompson shows some affinity; and inasmuch as each excelled in devotional poetry, they have at any rate one common aim and aspiration. But Thompson's genius is richer and more tempestuous, and by virtue of this, as well as by his curious inequalities, he has more in common with Crashaw than with any poet of his own century. The imaginative daring and sonorous beauty of the Hound of Heaven, his most arresting piece, is generally admitted to-day; and no writer has excelled him in the subtle intensity with which he has presented in artistic form the psychological aspects of Catholic philosophy and pietism.

But he is by no means merely the poet of mysticism, and has wrought some of his own miserable, De Quincey-like experiences into exquisite verse:

' Forlorn, and faint, and stark,
I had endured through watches of the dark
The abashless inquisition of each star,
Yea, was the outcast mark
Of all those heavenly passers' scrutiny;
Stood bound and helplessly
For Time to shoot his barbed minutes at me;
Suffered the trampling hoof of every hour
In night's slow-wheeled car,
Until the tardy dawn dragged me at length
From under those dread wheels, and, bled of strength,
I waited the inevitable last.

Then there came past
A child, like thee, a spring-flower but a flower
Fallen from the budded coronal of Spring,
And through the city-streets blown withering
She passed,—O brave, sad, loveliest, tender thing!
And of her own scant pittance did she give,

That I might eat and live:
Then fled, a swift and trackless fugitive "1

Sometimes the magnificence of his style o'erleaps itself, and the glittering phrasing turns the eye like the sun on the high Alps, while his fondness for Latinised diction leads him into obscurities and absurdities that imperil the beauty. This is the greater pity, since no poet could be simpler and more lucid when he chose, as his poem Daisy shows:

" She went her unremembering way,
She went, and left in me
The pang of all the partings gone,
And partings yet to be.

She left me marvelling why my soul
Was sad that she was glad,
At all the sadness in the sweet,
The sweetness in the sad.

Still, still I seemed to see her, still Look up with soft replies,
And take the berries with her hand,
And the love with her lovely eyes.

Nothing begins and nothing ends,
That is not paid with moan;
For we are born in others' pain,
And perish in our own."

That he is at his best a fine and true poet none could question; whether he is so great as some modern critics are inclined to rate him is a more debatable point that must be left for judgment to that High Court of Appeal—Time.

LIGHT VERSE AND THE ART OF PARODY

HUMOROUS and satirical verse became a force in our literature with the advent of Samuel Butler, and from Hudibras to the polished gibes of Sir Owen Seaman, humorous verse has rarely failed to find an experienced and effective craftsman. We may regard Lucilius as the first to nurture the satirical muse, he is "the founder of the mocking style," and to him Horace, Juvenal, and Persius owe much of their satirical treatment of men and manners. The old Greek dramatists—Aristophanes especially—furnish much matter for mockery at the infirmities of human nature; but the Latin genius gave the mocking note that peculiar tang which brings it into line with the modern satire. It was natural that the other great romance nation, France, should foster this form of literature with special care, and when Butler wrote his Hudibras, he was deeply read in Gallic satire. In the hands of Matthew Prior, a lighter and more genial note is introduced. He showed that the spirit of comedy could be airy and graceful as well as tart and savage; while in Gay we lost sight of the didacticism that underlay the humorous verse of his predecessors, he is essentially sprightly and unmoral.

More pungent in his wit, and neat and fluent as a verse writer, is JOHN HOOKHAM FRERE (1709-1846), who took part with Canning in founding the Anti-Jacobin. Byron owed much to him, for it was not until he had seen Frere's treatment of the octave stanza that he stumbled on the medium that was to prove his salvation as a poet. And so Beppo was written frankly in imitation of Frere's work, which had taken Byron's fancy. Byron's wit is the finer, and the better sustained; but Frere's is happy in snatches:

- * Dinner and supper kept their usual hours;
Breakfast and luncheon never were delay'd,
While to the sentries on the walls and towers
Between two plates hot messes were convey'd
At the departure of the invading powers,
It was a boast the noble Abbot made,
None of his monks were weaker, paler, thinner,
Or, during all the siege, had lost a dinner."¹
- "Poets consume excusable commodities,
They raise the nation's spirit when victorious,
They drive an export trade in whims and oddities,
Making our commerce and revenue glorious,
As an industrious and painstaking body 'tis
That poets should be reckon'd meritorious:
And therefore I submissively propose
To erect one Board for verse and one for Prose."²

THE BOY AND THE PARROT

"Parrot, if I had your wings
I should do so many things:
The first thing I should like to do
If I had little wings like you,

¹ The Monks and the Grants

I should fly to Uncle Bartle,
Don't you think 'twould make him startle,
If he saw me when I came,
Flapping at the window frame
Exactly like the parrot of fame?"
All this the wise old parrot heard.
The parrot was an ancient bird,
And paused and ponder'd every word,
First, therefore, he began to cough,
Then said,—“It is a great way off,
A great way off, my dear:” and then
He paused awhile—and coughed again —
“Master John, pray think a little,
What would you do for beds and victual?”
“Oh! parrot, Uncle John can tell—
But we should manage very well:
At night we'd perch upon the trees,
And so fly forward by degrees.”
“Does Uncle John,” the Parrot said,
“Put nonsense in his nephew's head?
Instead of telling you such things,
And teaching you to wash for wings,
I think he might have taught you better,
You might have learnt to write a letter —
That is the thing that I should do
If I had little hands like you.”

If Frere outshines Gay in his wit, JAMES and HORACE SMITH transcend him as parodists. Indeed their Rejected Addresses rank among the comic classics in our language. HORACE SMITH (1779-1849) was a most lovable character, to whose charm of personality both Leigh Hunt and Shelley testified:

“Wit and sense,
Virtue and human knowledge, all that might
Make this dull world a business of delight,
Are all combined in Horace Smith.”

His parodies are not of equal excellence: that would be expecting too much, but the Scott and the Moore are admirable.

A TALE OF DRURY LANE

As Chaos, which, by heavenly doom,
Has slept in everlasting gloom,
Started with terror and surprise
When light first flash'd upon her eyes—
So London's sons in nightcap woke,
In bed-gown woke her dames,
For shouts were heard 'mid fire and smoke,
And twice ten hundred voices spoke—
“The playhouse is in flames!”
And, lo! where Catherine Street extends,
A fiery tail its lustre lends
To every window-pane;
Blushes each spout in Martlet Court,
And Barbican, moth-eaten fort,
And Covent Garden kennels sport,
A bright ensanguined drain,
Meux's new Browhouse shows the light,
Rowland Hill's Chapel, and the height
Where Patent Shot they sell,
The Tennis Court, so fair and tall,
Partakes the ray, with Surgeons' Hall,
The Ticket-Porters' House of Call,
Old Bedlam, close by London Wall,
Wright's shrimp and oyster shop withal,
And Richardson's hotel

Among JAMES SMITH'S (1775-1839) happiest contributions are the Wordsworth and Southey parodies.

THE BABY'S DEBUT, BY W. W.

My brother Jack was nine in May,
And I was eight on New-Year's day;
So in Kate Wilson's shop
Papa (he's my papa and Jack's)
Bought me, last week, a doll of wax,
And brother Jack a top

Jack's in the pouts, and thus it is,—
He thinks mine came to more than his;
So to my drawer he goes,
Takes out the doll, and, O, my stars!
He pokes her head between the hairs,
And molts off half her nose!

Quite cross, a bit of string I beg,
And tie it to his peg-top's peg,
And bang with might and main,
Its head against the parlour-door,
Off flies the head, and hits the floor,
And breaks a window-pane

This made him cry with rage and spite:
Well, let him cry, it serves him right
A pretty thing, forsooth!
If he's to molt, all scalding hot,
Half my doll's nose, and I am not
To draw his peg-top's tooth!

Aunt Hannah heard the window break,
And cried, "O naughty Nancy Lake,
Thus to distress your aunt
No Drury Lane for you to-day!"
And while papa said, "Pooh, she may!"
Mamma said, "No, she sha'n't!"

Harsher in substance, though dexterous enough in their rhythmic ingenuities, are the Ingoldsby Legends of RICHARD BARHAM (1788-1845). These first appeared in Bentley's Miscellany, then under the editorship of Charles Dickens. They proved a little godsend to the earlier Victorian reciters, though their popularity, once so great, has declined almost to zero of late years. Barham had a vein of poesy in his nature, as his verses As I lay a thynkyng show, but, unlike many of the best writers of light verse, he subdues this entirely in his Legends, and his drolleries weary one, save in judicious snatches, through their noisy and spun-out farcicalities.

The brilliant Society jester by no means necessarily shines as a literary wit. This is shown by comparing the verses of THEODORE HOOK (1788-1841) with the stories around him and the neat audacious sallies with which he enlightened his escapades. In cold print his fun seems commonplace and mechanical. He excelled at comic improvisation, but the jest loses at once if torn from its context. Thus, for instance, which is a smart enough quip delivered on the spur of the moment. Being interrupted in a song on one occasion, by a man named Winter, who was a tax-collector, he continued his song and introduced the following verse:

"Here comes Mr. Winter, collector of taxes;
I'd advise you to pay him whatever he axes;
Excuses won't do, he stands no sort of flummery,
Though Winter his name is, his process is summary."

JAMES ROBINSON PLANCHÉ (1796-1880), a prolific laywriter, showed an agreeable knack in the direction of extravaganzas, and ephemeral as most of them are, yet his humour wears better than that of Hook; there is more play of fancy, and a lighter touch. Take for instance:

ANSWER TO THE ALPHABET

Dear friends! although no more a dunce
Than many of my betters,
I'm puzzled to reply at once
To four-and twenty letters.

Perhaps you'll think that may not be
So hard a thing to do,
For what is difficult to me
Is A B C to you

However, pray dismiss your fears,
Nor fancy you have lost me,
Though many, many bitter tears
Your first acquaintance cost me.

Believe me, till existence ends,
Whatever ills beset you,
My oldest literary friends,
I never can forget you

SAMUEL LOVER (1797-1868), novelist, painter, dramatist, song-maker, composer, and etcher, was a versatile Irishman, whose characteristic Celtic humour, whimsical, extravagant, and tender, finds pleasant expression in his verse:

THE ROAD OF LIFE, OR SONG OF THE IRISH POST-BOY

Oh! youth, happy youth! what a blessing
In thy freshness of dawn and of dew!
When hope the young heart is caressing,
And our griefs are but light and but few:
Yet in life, as it swiftly flies o'er us,
Some musing for sadness we find,
In youth—we've our troubles before us,
In age—we leave pleasure behind.

Aye—Trouble's the post-boy that drives us
Up-hill—till we get to the top,
While Joy's an old servant behind us
Who call on forever to stop
"Oh, put on the drag, Joy, my jewel,
As long as the sunset still glows;
Before it is dark 'twould be cruel
To haste to the hill-foot's repose."

But there stands an inn we must stop at,
An extinguisher swings for the sign,
That house is but cold and but narrow—
But the prospect beyond it—divine!
And there—whence there's never returning
When we travel—as travel we must—
May the gates be all free for our journey!
And the tears of our friends lay the dust!

"Butterfly BAYLY" (1797-1839), whose sentimental verse is referred to elsewhere, also wrote light humorous verse—e.g. Why don't the Men Propose?—but his work stands on a much lower level than that of Lover.

So far, however, there is no one writer save Hookham Frere who has carried on the polished, satirical tradition of Prior. Humorous verse has shown a tendency rather to deviate in the direction of burlesque or fantasy.

In WINTEROP MACKWORTH PRAED (1802-1839), however, we meet the lineal descendant of Prior, one who proved an exceedingly deft maker of poetic soufflé. Without the range of Prior, he has a lighter and more sensitive touch. Indeed as a writer of vers de société he is unsurpassed. In his play of fancy he shows some affinity with Hood, but he relies far less on mere verbal humours, and his wit has a finer bouquet. On the other hand, of course, he showed no trace of that vivid and powerful imagination that Hood could command. True, he is a mere trifler, but he is a very Prince of Triflers.

THE BELLE OF THE BALL-ROOM

Years—years ago,—ere yet my dreams
Had been of being wise or witty,—
Ere I had done with writing themes,
Or yawn'd o'er this infernal Chitty —
Years—years ago,—while all my joy
Was in my fowling piece and filly,—
In short while I was yet a boy,
I fell in love with Laura Lily.

I saw her at the County Ball,
There, when the sound of flute and fiddle
Gave signal sweet in that old hall
Of huncus across and down the middle,
Hers was the subtlest spell by far
Of all that set young hearts romancing,
She was our queen, our rose, our star,
And then she danced—O Heaven, her dancing!

Dark was her hair, her hand was white;
Her voice was exquisitely tender,
Her eyes wore full of liquid light,
I never saw a waist so slender!
Her every look, her every smile,
Shot right and left a score of arrows,
I thought 'twas Venus from her isle,
I wondered where she'd left her sparrows.

She talk'd,—of politics or prayers,—
Of Southey's prose, or Wordsworth's sonnets,—
Of daggers,—or of dancing bears,
Of battles,—or the last new bonnets,
By candle-light, at twelve o'clock,
To me it mattered not a tittle,
If those bright lips had quoted Locke,
I might have thought they murmured Little.

Through sunny May, through sultry Juno,
I loved her with a love eternal,
I spoke her praises to the moon,
I wrote them for the Sunday Journal
My mother laughed, I soon found out
That ancient ladies have no feeling,
My father frowned, but how should gout
See any happiness in kneeling?

She was the daughter of a Dean,
Rich, fat, and rather apoplectic;
She had one brother, just thirteen,
Whose colour was extremely hectic;
Her grandmother for many a year,
Had fed the parish with her bounty;
Her second cousin was a peer,
And Lord Lieutenant of the county.

She smil'd on many, just for fun—
I knew that there was nothing in it;
I was the first—the only one,
Her heart had thought of for a minute;
I knew it, for she told me so,
In phrase which was divinely moulded;
She wrote a charming hand—and oh!
How sweetly all her notes were folded!

Our love was like most other loves;—
A little glow, a little shiver,
A rose bud, and a pair of gloves,
And 'Fly not yet'—upon the river;

Some jealousy of some one's heir,
Some hopes of dying broken-hearted,
A miniature, a lock of hair,
The usual vows,—and then we parted.

We parted,—months and years rolled by—
We met again four summers after;
Our parting was all sob and sigh,—
Our meeting was all mirth and laughter;
For in my heart's most secret cell
There had been many other lodgers;
And she was not the ball room Belle,
But only—Mrs—Something—Rogers!

Mention must be made of GEORGE OUTRAM (1805–1856), who is in many ways a Scottish Præd, with shrewd insight into character, and a neat technique. Called to the Scottish Bar in 1827, and for many years editor of the Glasgow Herald, he wrote chiefly for the benefit of his friends, and is one of the very few verse-writers who really did—what a polite convention declares of so many—"publish by request." One of his most amusing pieces is The Annuity.

THE ANNUITY

I gaed to spend a week in Fife—
An unco week it proved to be—
For there I met a wassome wife
Lamentin' her viduity
Her grief brak out sae fierce and fell,
I thought her heart waud burst the shell;
And—I was sae left to mysel'—
I sell't her an annuity.

The bargain lookit fair enough—
She just was turned o' sixty-three—
I couldna guess'd she'd prove sae tough
By human ingenuity
But years have come, and years have gane
And thero she's yet as stieve's a stane—
Tho himmer's growin' young again,
Since she got her annuity

Last Yule she had a fearfu' hoast—
I thought a kink might set me free;
I led her out, 'mang snaw and frost,
Wi' constant asiduity.
But Deil ma' care '—the blast gaed by,
An' miss'd the auld anatomy.
It just cost me a tooth, forbye
Discharging her annuity.

RICHARD MONCKTON MILNES, Lord Houghton (1809–1885), was a cultured and versatile man of letters, to whom Carlyle said on one occasion, with reference to his catholic sympathies—"There is only one post fit for you, and that is the office of perpetual president of the Heaven and Hell Amalgamation Society." Milnes could write seriously as well as trifle excellently, and his serious, critical prose is admirable. Despite the gift of pathos, he is, as a verse-writer, happiest when in light and irresponsible mood.

WILLIAM EDMONSTONE AYTOUN (1813–1865) was a sprightly Professor of English Literature in Edinburgh University, whose spirited Scottish lyrics have already been noted. He wrote in collaboration with Sir THEODORE MARTIN (1816–1909) The Bon Gaulther Ballads (1855), delightful in their sub-acid yet perfectly good-natured humour, also Firmilian (1854), satirising a prevalent school of verse dubbed "The Spasmodic School."

On a lower level are LAMAN BLANCHARD (1804-1845) and SHIRLEY BROOKS (1816-1874), editor of Punch in 1870, on the death of Mark Lemon), who resembled Hood in their mingling of fun and gravity, but with little of his imaginative power. Brooks, however, is the nearer to Hood in his serious moments

THACKERAY deserves a passing tribute for his light, agreeable verse, especially for his delightful Ballad of Boullabaisse; but EDWARD LEAR (1812-1888) is something much more than a distinguished maker of light verse. He is one of the great original comic forces of the century, and his incomparable Nonsense verses constitute a landmark in the development of humorous literature. He is absolutely sublime in his whimsical extravagances; and he may be as safely applied as an infallible test for the sense of humour to any doubtful person, just as we should adjudge a man's imaginative faculty by his attitude towards The Ancient Mariner.

One recalls Ruskin's pleasant extravagance: "I should place him first of my hundred authors."

A Lancashire man, and the youngest of twenty-one children, he showed at an early age artistic leanings, and was always fond of natural history. He was a great traveller, and a fairly successful landscape painter, but it is as the inspired jester of the Book of Nonsense—first published in 1846—that he will be remembered by old and young alike

There was an Old Man in a tree, who was horribly bored
by a bee,
When they said, "Does it buzz?" he replied, "Yes, it does"
It's a regular brute of a bee!"

There was an Old Man who said, "How shall I flee from that horrible cow?
I will sit on this stile, and continue to smile,
Which may soften the heart of that cow!"

There was an Old Man of Jamaica, who suddenly married a Quaker,
But she cried out, "Alack! I have married a black!"
Which distressed that Old Man of Jamaica!

There was an Old Person of Anerley, whose conduct was strange and unmannerly,
He rushed down the Strand, with a pig in each hand,
But returned in the evening to Anerley

There was a Young Lady of Portugal, whose ideas were excessively nautical,
She climbed up a tree to examine the sea,
And declared she would never leave Portugal

There was an Old Person whose habits induced him to feed upon rabbits,
When he'd eaten eighteen he turned perfectly green,
Upon which he relinquished those habits

There was an Old Lady whose folly induced her to sit in a holly,
Whereupon by a thorn her dress being torn,
She quickly became melancholy

There was an Old Person of Chili, whose conduct was painful and silly,
He sat on the stairs eating apples and pears,
That imprudent Old Person of Chili.

There was a Young Lady whose bonnet came untied
when the birds sat upon it,
But she said, "I don't care! all the birds in the air
Are welcome to sit on my bonnet!"

There was an Old Man on a hill, who seldom, if ever, stood still,
He ran up and down in his grandmother's gown,
Which adorned that Old Man on a hill

FREDERICK LOCKER-LAMPSON (1821-1895) carries on the Praed tradition; and if he is somewhat less dexterous and polished in his triflings, he has a richer poetic strain in his nature than Praed could claim, as At Her Window can illustrate.

AT HER WINDOW

Ah, minstrel, how strange is
The carol you sing!
Let Psyche who ranges
The garden of spring,
Remember the changes
December will bring

Beating heart! we come again
Where my Love reposes.
This is Mabel's window-pane;
These are Mabel's roses.

Is she nested? Does she kneel
In the twilight still,
Lily clad from throat to heel,
Sho, my virgin Lily?

Soon the wan, the wistful stars,
Fading, will forsake her,
Elves of light, on beamy bars,
Whisper then, and wake her.

Let this friendly pebble plead
At her flowery grating,
If she hear me will she heed?
Mabel, I am waiting

Mabel will be deck'd anon,
Zoned in bride's apparel;
Happy zone! O hark to yon
Passion-shaken carol!

Sing thy song, thou tranced thrush,
Pipe thy best, thy clearest,—
Hush, her lattice moves, O hush—
Dearest Mabel!—dearest . . ."

Then comes CHARLES STUART CALVERLEY (1831-1884), a fine scholar, a clever (but over-rated) parodist, and a delightful companion. He was a fine translator, had a remarkable sense of rhythm, and a keen, if somewhat tart, sense of humour. Though famous as a parodist, he is, despite the brilliant work he accomplishes here, less first-rate than in his miscellaneous work, for strong literary prejudices have marred to an extent his art of mimicry. This point will be appreciated by all who compare his well-known parody of Browning, The Cock and the Bull, with that of his successor, J. K. Stephen.

THE COCK AND THE BULL

J K STEPHEN (1859-1892) had a finer portio imagination than Calverley, and more plastic sympathies, and his parodies strike deeper than do Calverley's Calverley burlesques the syntax of Browning, but Stephen burlesques with a light unmitable touch the Browning attitude also.

OF R. B. TO A. S.

Birthdays ? yes, in a general way ;
 For the most if not for the best of men :
 You were born (I suppose) on a certain day :
 So was I . or perhaps in the night . what then ?

Only this . or at least, if more,
 You must know, not think it, and learn, not speak ,
 There is truth to be found on the unknown shore ;
 And many will find where few will seek.

For many are called and few are chosen,
 And the few grow many as age's lapse
 But when will the many grow few what dozen
 Is fused into one by Time's hammer taps ?

P. S.

There's a Me Society down at Cambridge,
 Where my works, cum nota variorum,
 Are talked about, well, I require the same bridge
 That Euclid took toll at as Asinorum

And, as they have got through several ditties
 I thought were as stiff as a brick-built wall,
 I've composed the above, and a stiff one it is,
 A bridge to stop asses at, once for all.

More acidulated in his humour, lacking the breadth and human note of some of his contemporaries in light verse, such as Locker-Lampson and J. K Stephen ; yet unexcelled by any in his metrical ingenuity, is WILLIAM SCHWENCK GILBERT
 (1836-1911)

Gilbert is at his best in the Bab Ballads, written during the sixties. How many of the comic ideas, elaborated in the Savoy Operas, are seen at their freshest and happiest, as thumbnailed sketches.
 The great merit of the Gilbert and Sullivan collaboration lies in the fact that here we have two humorists blending their fun in different arts.
 Sullivan's infectious gaiety and melodic charm succeed in toning down the acerbity of his collaborator, while exhibiting to their best advantage Gilbert's extravagances Gilbert interpreted in music is a sheer delight, and how the nimbler jesters gained from this setting may be judged by listening to the operas and then reading the libretti in the study On the other side, it is only fair to add that the rhythmic ingenuities of Gilbert, and his aptitude for writing real, singing songs, proved of great help to Sullivan.

One of his most amusing efforts was the well-known burlesque of Æstheticism in Patience.

THE ÆSTHETE

If you're anxious for to shine in the high Æsthetic line
 as a man of culture rare,
 You must get up all the germs of the transcendental terms, and plant them every where
 You must lie upon the daisies, and discourse in novel phrases of your complicated state of mind
 The meaning doesn't matter if it's only idle chatter of a transcendental mind

And every one will say,
 As you walk your mystic way,
 "If this young man expresses himself in terms too deep for me,
 Why, what a very singularly deep young man this deep young man must be !"

Thou a sentimental passion of a vegetable fashion must excite your languid spleen,
 An attachment à la Plato for a bashful young potato, or a not-too French French bean !
 Though the Philistines may jestle, you will rank as an apostle in the high æsthetic band,
 If you walk down Pieradilly with a poppy or a hly in your mediæval hand

And every one will say,
 As you walk your flowery way,
 "If he's content with a vegetable love which would certainly not suit me,
 Why, what a most particularly pure young man this pure young man must be !"

Of lesser note, but worthy of mention, are HENRY
 S LEIGH (1837-1889), who wrote Carols of Cockayne, facile, nimbler pleasantness in verse, and ASHBY
 STERRY (1838), whose dainty and sparkling penan of river scenes and life are well known to faithful students of Punch.

THE TWINS

In form and feature, face and limb,
 I grew so like my brother,
 That folks got taking me for him,
 And each for one another
 It puzzled all our kith and kin,
 It reach'd an awful pitch,
 For one of us was born a twin,
 Yet not a soul knew which.

This fatal likeness even dogg'd
 My footsteps when at school,
 And I was always getting flogg'd,
 For John turn'd out a fool
 I put this question hopelessly
 To every one I knew,—
 What would you do, if you were me,
 To prove that you were you ?

Our close resemblance turn'd the tide
 Of my domestic life
 For somehow my intended bride
 Became my brother's wife
 In short, year after year the same
 Absurd mistakes went on,
 And when I died—the neighbours came
 And buried brother John !

Two modern writers of distinction remain to be noticed : "Lewis Carroll"—master of comic fantasy —and Austin Dobson, whose delicate art is unequalled in its airy daintiness and grace, save by Præd and Locker-Lampson at their best

"LEWIS CARROLL" (Rev. C. L. Dodgson), (1833-1898), has this in common with Edward Lear, that he owes nothing to any predecessor for his vein of humour, and has succeeded in delighting children of all ages with it "Whom shall I bring?" wrote Thoreau to his friend Emerson on the occasion of one of his famous huckleberry parties "All children from six to sixty," was the prompt reply And all children from six to sixty may come to Carroll's parties

What is the distinctive feature of his humour? It is not madly extravagant like Lear's, for there is a delicious wayward intellectuality about it, an inverted logic that appeals to the cultured mind; while it can be enjoyed equally well by children who see only the inventive fertility; absurdities they are quite ready to take seriously, as part of their own imaginative experiences The glorious incongruities of such things as the Alice books, and The Hunting of the Snark, is rendered the more delightful by the droll affectation of precision and the mock serious manner

There may be some who can read unmoved the wild ballad of the Jabberwock, or that genuine "slice of life" in a fantastic key, The Walrus and the Carpenter, and indeed we have heard tell of those to whom The Hunting of the Snark, with its parabolic extravagances, was merely a "piece of dull silliness" For such we can only say (à la Elia) that we suspect their taste in higher matters

In his later writings, "Lewis Carroll" largely forsook his earlier vein, with unhappy results There are some of the old individual touches in Sylvie and Bruno: but for the most part it is as inferior to the Alice books and The Hunting of the Snark as is a turnip to a nectarine At his best, and that is considerable, "Lewis Carroll" is the most delightful spinner of whimsical dreams that our literature can boast of

THE AGED MAN

I'll tell thee everything I can;
There's little to relate
I saw an aged aged man,
A sitting on a gate.
"Who are you, aged man?" I said,
"And how is it you live?"
And his answer trickled through my head
Like water through a sieve

He said "I look for butterflies
That sleep among the wheat:
I make them into mutton pies,
And sell them in the street
I sell them unto men," he said,
"Who sail on stormy seas,
And that's the way I get my bread—
A trifle, if you please"

But I was thinking of a plan
To dye one's whiskers green,
And always use so large a fan
That they could not be seen.
So, having no reply to give
To what the old man said,
I cried "Come, tell me how you live!"
And thumped him on the head

His accents mild took up the tale;
He said "I go my ways,
And when I find a mountain-rill,
I set it in a blaze;

And thence they make a stuff they call
Rowland's Macassar Oil—
Yet twopence-halfpenny is all
They give me for my toil."

But I was thinking of a way
To feed oneself on batter,
And so go on from day to day
Getting a little fatter
I shook him well from side to side,
Until his face was blue:
"Come, tell me how you live," I cried,
"And what it is you do!"

He said "I hunt for haddocks' eyes
Among the heather bright,
And work them into waistcoat buttons
In the silent night.
And these I do not sell for gold
Or oom of silvery shine,
But for a copper halfpenny.
And that will purchase nine

"I sometimes dig for buttered rolls,
Or set lured twigs for crabs,
I sometimes search the grassy knolls
For wheels of Hansom-cabs
And that's the way" (he gave a wink)
"By which I get my wealth—
And very gladly will I drink
Your Honour's noble health"

I heard him then, for I had just Completed my design
To keep the Menai Bridge from rust
By boiling it in wine
I thanked him much for telling me
The way he got his wealth,
But chiefly for his wish that he Might drink my noble health

And now, if e'er by chance I put
My fingers into glue,
Or madly squeeze a right-hand foot
Into a left-hand shoe,
Or if I drop upon my toe
A very heavy weight,
I weep, for it reminds me so
Of that old man I used to know—
Whose look was mild, whose speech was slow,
Whose hair was whiter than the snow,
Whose face was very like a crow,
With eyes, like cinders, all aglow,
Who seemed distracted with his woe,
Who rocked his body to and fro,
And muttered mumblingly and low,
As if his mouth were full of dough,
Who snorted like a buffalo—
That summer evening long ago
A-sitting on a gate

Mr AUSTIN DOBSON (1840) is not merely a writer of clever and amusing jingles, he has a ripe and scholarly imagination, a delicate and plastic fancy ranging from grave to gay, and a technical mastery over rhyme and metre, that is never at fault. He is perfectly aware of his own limitations, but within these, he moves like a great artist. He has done for verse what Jane Austen did for prose.

The following snatches may give some idea of his range and variety:

INCOGNITA

Just for a space that I met her—
Just for a day in the train!
It began when she feared it would wet her,
That tiniest spurtle of rain:

So we tucked a great rug in the sashes,
And carefully padded the pane,
And I sorrow in sackcloth and ashes,
Longing to do it again!

Then it grew when she begged me to reach her
A dressing-case under the seat;
She was "really so tiny a creature,
That she needed a stool for her feet!"
Which was promptly arranged to her order
With a care that was even minute,
And a glimpse—of an open-worked border,
And a glance—of the fairest boot.

Then it drooped, and revived at some hovels—
"Were they houses for men or for pigs?"
Then it shifted to muscular novels,
With a little digression on pigs.
She thought Wives and Daughters "so jolly";
"Had I read it?" She knew when I had,
Like the rest, I should dote upon "Molly"
And "poor Mrs Gaskell—how sad!"

"Like Browning?" "But so-so" His proof lay
Too deep for her frivolous mood,
That preferred your mere metrical soufflé
To the stronger poetical food
Yet at times he was good—"as a tonic";
Was Tennyson writing just now?
And was this new poet Byronic,
And clever and naughty, or how?

Then we trifled with concerts and croquet,
Then she daintily dusted her face
Then she sprinkled herself with "Eau Bouquet,"
Fished out from the foregoing case,
And we chatted of Gessner and Grisi,
And voted Aunt Sally a bore;
Discussed if the tight rope were easy,
Or Chopin much harder than Spohr.

And oh! the odd things that she quoted,
With the prettiest possible look,
And the price of two buns that she noted
In the prettiest possible book,
While her talk like a musical rillet
Flashed on with the hours that flew,
And the carriage, her smile seemed to feel it
With just enough summer—for Two.

Till at last in her corner, peeping
From a nest of rugs and of furs,
With the white shut eyelids sleeping
On those dangerous looks of hers
She seemed like a snowdrop breaking,
Not wholly alive nor dead
But with one blind impulse waking
To the sounds of the spring overhead;

And I watched in the lamplight's swerving
The shade of the down-dropt lid,
And the lip-line's delicate curving,
Where a slumbering smile lay hid.
Till I longed that, rather than sever,
The train should shriek into space,
And carry us onward—for ever—
Me and that beautiful face.

But she suddenly woke in a fidget,
With fears she was "nearly at home,"
And talk of a certain Aunt Bridget,
Whom I mentally wished—well, at Rome;
Got out at the very next station,
Looking back with a merry Bon Sour,
Adding, too, to my utter vexation
A surplus, unkind Au Revour

So left me to muse on her graces,
To doze and to muse, till I dreamed
That we sailed through the sunniest places
In a glorified galley, it seemed,
But the cabin was made of a carriage,
And the ocean was Eau-de-Cologne,
And we split on a rock labelled MARRIAGE,
And I woke,—as cold as a stone
And that's how I lost her—a jewel,
Incognita—one in a crowd,
Not prudent enough to be cruel,
Not worldly enough to be proud.
It was just a shut lid and its lashes,
Just a few hours in a train,
And I sorrow in sackcloth and ashes,
Longing to see her again

The foregoing sketch of the development of light verse makes no pretence of completeness. All it has been possible to do here is to touch on the most representative of the "light brigade." As we approach our own time the number of omissions must necessarily be larger. During the last twenty years there has been a remarkable renaissance of parody and satirical verse, and there is no richer store-house for seeking these than in the pages of Punch. What is especially remarkable is the level excellence of the work: Praed, Calverley, and Stephen have served as admirable mentors, and at the present day light verse—whether vers de société or parody—is probably in the zenith of its glory.

Among a host of writers, all approximating to this high standard of technical merit, may be especially mentioned the present editor of Punch, Sir OWEN SEAMAN, R. C. LEHMANN, C. L. GRAVES, E. V. LUCAS, BARRY PAIN, "DUM-DUM," "ADRIAN ROSS," and HARRY GRAHAM. The late editor, Sir FRANCIS BURNAND, found more congenial expression in prose than in verse for his exuberant sense of fun, but the present editor, admirable in each capacity (though his wit may be a shade too dry in flavour for some palates), has raised the metrical standard of Punch to a pitch that it has never before reached; and while there may be some clever verse-writers who have not yet found a home in that national institution of humour, The London Charivari, it may be safely averred that during the last twenty years at any rate much of the best humorous verse of the day has first seen light in its columns.

CHARLES DICKENS (1812-1870)

HIS LIFE

"I was born on a Friday," said David Copperfield
In this, and in many another particular, were David and his creator at one.

Charles Dickens was born at Landport in Hampshire, on February 7, 1812, his father, John Dickens, was a Clerk in the Navy Pay Office at Portsmouth Dockyard; of his mother little is recorded.

When the boy was two years old his parents moved to London, three years later to Chatham.

Genial and lively in disposition, but delicate in constitution, this "very queer small boy" much preferred to curl himself up in a corner with a book than take part in the mildest of games: in fact he was "a terrible boy to read," said his nurse. Shakespeare's Henry IV, with its realistic highway robberies and royal pranks, was a mighty favourite, and it is well known how the boyish dream of owning the house called "Gad's Hill Place," built on the site of those old associations, was realised.

The happy days at Chatham were exchanged for a depressing existence in a dingy London suburb. The family became involved in debt and creditors many and pressing; at length John Dickens was arrested and imprisoned in the Marshalsea.

At this serious crisis in the family fortunes, Charles, now eleven years old, "a child of singular abilities, quick, eager, and delicate," went out to earn his living in a blacking factory. "My mother and father were quite satisfied," he says "They could hardly have been more so if I had been twenty years of age . . . and going to Cambridge."

How difficult was the task to make his few shillings a week last out till the next pay day, he tells us in David Copperfield. At last "I wrapped it into six little parcels, each containing the same amount, and labelled with a different day"—Sunday was spent with his father in the Marshalsea.

Notwithstanding these painful experiences he had an abundance of animal spirits, and a fund of humour that probably kept him from breaking down, but how deeply the life affected him may be seen in the various allusions to it in his novels.

At length the hateful employment came to an end and Charles was sent to school. At Wellington House Academy, in the Hampstead Road he learned little, but he laid by a store of material for future use. At fifteen he left school, and found employment with Messrs. Ellis & Blackmore, attorneys, of Gray's Inn. A fellow-clerk says: "He could imitate in a manner that I have never heard equalled the low population of the streets of London, in all their varieties . . . and the popular singers of that day, whether comic or patriotic, as to his acting, he could give us Shakespeare by the ten minutes, and imitate all the leading actors of that time." There was, however, small prospect of Dickens distinguishing himself in the legal profession, so he turned to the mysteries of shorthand, and so quickly gained proficiency that in 1830 he became a Parliamentary reporter. Many years later, in speaking on behalf of the Newspaper Press Fund, he said: "I have worn my knees by writing on them on the old back row of the old gallery in the House of Commons; and I have worn my feet by standing to write in a preposterous pen in the old House of Lords, where we used to be huddled together like so many sheep," and "to the wholesome training of severe newspaper work when I was a very young man, I constantly refer my first success."

In 1833 Dickens made his first essay in authorship. One evening at twilight, with fear and trembling, he stealthily dropped his first manuscript "into a dark letter box, in a dark office, up a dark court in Fleet Street." When he saw it in print he walked down to Westminster Hall and turned into it for half an hour, he tells us, "because my eyes were so dim with joy and pride, and not fit to be seen in the street."

Then came Pickwick—and Fame!

Almost concurrently with the first number of Pickwick, Dickens married Miss Catherine Hogarth, daughter of a fellow-worker on the Morning Chronicle. The next few years his literary output was simply prodigious: Nicholas Nickleby, Oliver Twist, The Old Curiosity Shop; and after Barnaby Rudge, in 1841, Dickens was asked to represent the town of Reading in Parliament; but he never coveted Parliamentary honours, and the request was met with a polite refusal.

A warm and hearty invitation from Washington Irving decided him to visit America, and on January 4, 1842, he left for the States, where he met with an enthusiastic reception. When, however, the American Notes and Martin Chuzzlewit appeared, in which he spoke so courageously against the Slavery system, ill-will sprang up across the Atlantic, and in a burlesque of Macbeth at one of the New York theatres the actors exhibited their feelings in the incantation scene by pitching into the witches' cauldron a copy of the novel. But all this had been forgotten when he made his second visit in 1867-1868.

After Martin Chuzzlewit came the famous Christmas Carol (1843). Dickens had hoped to make £1000 by its sale, but only realised about £700. As he was in want of money, he sold the fourth share in his work for the next eight years to Messrs. Bradbury & Evans for £2800, bought "a good old shabby devil of a coach," engaged a courier, let his house in Devonshire Terrace, and accompanied by Mrs. Dickens, her sister Miss Hogarth, five children and a maid, left England for Italy, where they remained till July 1845; in the Pictures from Italy we have the experiences of this tour.

On his return Dickens became involved in a big journalistic scheme and was the first editor of the Daily News, with charge of its literary department, but he soon wearied of the drudgery of editorship, and vacated the post in three weeks. The following year, 1846, he went to Paris for three months and made the acquaintance of the elder Dumas, Victor Hugo, Scribe, Lamartine, and Chateaubriand, and began to write Dombey and Son, his last Christmas story, The Hunted Man, appearing the same year.

In order to obtain the local colour for the famous Peggotty scenes in David Copperfield, written in 1849-50, the novelist spent some time at Yarmouth, at that time a quaint and quiet fishing town. The first chapter of this, his favourite work, appeared in Household Words at the birth of the magazine on March 30, 1850. At the conclusion of the novel he wrote to his friend Forster: "If I were to say half what Copperfield makes me feel, how strangely, even to you, I should be turned inside out. I seem to be sending some part of myself into the shadowy world."

The year 1851 was a sad one; his father, to whom he was sincerely attached, died in March, and a baby daughter died suddenly while Dickens was at a dinner on behalf of the Theatrical Fund. In the same year he left Devonshire Terrace for a larger house in Tavistock Square, and began to write Bleak House; when published (1853), Dickens and Wilkie Collins made a holiday tour in France and Italy, and on their return Dickens gave his first public reading at Birmingham, when nearly £500 was realised for the benefit of a local institute.

The success of these readings induced him to start on a tour. In everything that Dickens did he gave of his very best, but the constant strain upon his nervous energies told seriously upon his health, and a railway accident was a tremendous shock from which his nerves never recovered; well or ill, he always bestowed the same care and attention upon his readings, and the exhaustion afterwards, on some occasions, was terrible to witness. With nerves worn and shattered, he gave a reading tour in 1866 throughout the British Isles and Paris, and the following year sailed once more for America.

In 1869 he began his last novel, The Mystery of Edwin Drood, destined to be left unfinished, though the copyright was already disposed of for £7500.

On March 15, 1870, he gave a final reading in London. Never had he faced a larger or more enthusiastic audience. The reading over, in response to numerous calls, he returned and spoke with a voice full of emotion, ending with the words "From these garish lights I vanish now for evermore, with a heartfelt, grateful, respectful, and affectionate farewell." On June 9th, he devoted the entire day to writing some fresh chapters in Edwin Drood, and was taken ill suddenly at six o'clock, his sister-in-law's efforts to get him on the sofa were unavailing. "On the ground," he murmured, and shortly afterwards passed away without recovering consciousness.

"No death since 1866," wrote Carlyle referring to that of his wife, "has fallen on me with such a stroke. The good, the gentle, high-gifted, ever-freely and noble Dickens—every inch of him an honest man."

In the Poets' Corner, Westminster Abbey, one early morning he was buried quietly and without ostentation by Dean Stanley, in the presence of his immediate family and a few friends. Strange that the last words he should ever write were these from the unfinished chapter of Edwin Drood: "Changes of glorious light from moving boughs, songs of birds, scents from gardens, woods and fields . . . penetrate into the Cathedral, subdue its earthly odour, and preach the Resurrection and the Life."

HIS WORK

The immediate success of Dickens was due to two causes: one literary, the other social.

On the literary side he came precisely at the right time in the history of English fiction. The dominating factor in the history of the early century was the rapid growth of town life under the stimulus of the industrial revolution. The countryside had found its story-tellers in Scott, Maria Edgeworth, Susan Ferrier, and Jane Austen; but for a chronicler of town life one had to go back to the age of Fielding; and social conditions had changed vastly since the time of Evelina and

Tom Jones. Dickens knew from painful experience the life of the workshop, the office, and the terrible life of the streets. So, as the story-teller of London life, he occupies a niche claimed by no other writer of the time. He was not, of course, the only writer who had described the town life of his day, and some of the Cockney humours of Pickwick owe something no doubt to the picaresque extravagances of Pierce Egan, but he was the first genuine story-teller.

The other cause of his popularity lay in the fact that he was not merely a story-teller but a social reformer who used fiction as a platform for his social appeals, and who proved to be that rare type of reformer who could moralise with a smile on his lips, and mix his sermonic powder in such excellent jam, that his contemporaries did not realise for a while that he was doctoring them for their good. So Dickens taught us to laugh at a time of storm and stress when we badly needed it, and having laughed with him, we took heed of his passionate denunciations.

Yet both these causes would have proved insufficient had not the novelist been a writer of genius. He was the pioneer of a great age of fiction, and would soon have been elbowed aside had he lacked the elements of greatness. But his stories, however they may suffer at times from over insistence on the primary colours, are so amazingly rich in vitality, that "age cannot wither them nor custom stale their infinite variety." He is not only the first great story-teller of the common lives of commonplace people in commonplace surroundings, but remains, after countless imitators and brilliant successors, yet facile princeps. For he took the trivialities of everyday life, the little worries, the little pleasures, the little hardships, the little comedies, the little tragedies, and irradiated them with his glorious humour and ever-flowing sympathy.

THE HUMORIST

"Humour," said Carlyle, "is a sympathy with the seamy side of things." Whatever may be said of this as a comprehensive definition of that elusive quality, humour, it fastens with unerring insight upon the essentials of Dickens' humour. A sympathy with what is odd, out-of-the-way, bizarre, lies at the bottom of all his uproarious fun and quick sensibility. His humour and pathos are not to be sharply differentiated; laughter and tears lie closely together in his writings and frequently invade one another's territory. In no other writer of our time do we realise more fully the truth of John Bunyan's quaint comment, "Some things are of that nature as to make one's fancy chuckle while his heart doth ache."

Both the strength and weakness of Dickens' humour and pathos lie in his hypersensitive imagination. There are no great depths to his imagination as there are in Shakespeare and Milton, no such subtleties as in Meredith and Thomas Hardy, but for acute sensibility he has no peer in English letters. Thus both humour and pathos alike are rich in inventive fancy. His imagination plays round his subject, let it be what it may—the appearance of a London street, a door knocker, a Cockney urchin, a middle-aged oddity, a short-tempered landlady, a ne'er-do-weel, a humbug, a London fog, a coach ride, an east wind, until he has invested its familiar aspects with strange grotesque fantasies that none-the-less are not extraneous extravagances, but are logical and integral parts of his subject; and thus a genuine Dickens character and Dickens scene are at once amazingly like and amazingly unlike anything in our own experience.

For this reason most of us accept his humour the more readily for its unexpected extravagances, though we are sometimes repelled by the intrusion of the gargoyle into the domain of pathos. So long as his fun and pathos are intermingled the appeal is not to be withstood, as in the adventures of young David Copperfield; where he sets his scene determined to be solemn at all costs, as in the death scene of little Paul or little Nell, we realise a sense of artificiality.

Yet undoubtedly the humour of Dickens is at its best when he can mingle the humour with the pathos; and he never does this more effectively than when he is dealing with childhood.

There we have a humour that carresses, a pathos that brightens, a rainbow humour where the author is smiling at us through his tears. It is hard to overpraise Dickens' sketches of child life. Dickens did not describe a child—he became a child for the time being. He lived over again his own childish days. Hence the poignancy and actuality of his pictures. Perhaps on occasion his sentimentalism and his love for a "curtain," as in the death scene of Pip, and Joe the crossing sweeper, lead him to utter a false note or so. But the false notes are very rare; and the beauty, delicacy, and tender humour of his pictures of child life need no encomium at this date. The merits of his three notable studies of sensitive, nervous childhood—Paul, David, and Pip—are universally recognised. Here obviously his own temperament is speaking; but he was also extremely happy in describing children and young people of other temperaments than his own. There is Robin Toodles, the robustious offspring of the nurse in Dombey and Son; Noah Claypole, the loutish charity boy, is another type; Joe, the crossing-sweeper, is a typical Cockney lad; Traddles and Steerforth as boys at school are admirable studies in contrast. How lifelike is this description:

"Poor Traddles in a tight, sky-blue suit that made his arms and legs like German sausages, he was the merriest and most miserable of all the boys. He was always being caned—I think he was caned every day, except on holiday Monday, when he was only ruled on both hands, and was always going to write to his uncle about it, and never did. After laying his head on the desk for a little while he would cheer up somehow, begin to laugh again and draw skeletons all over his slate before his eyes were dry. I used to wonder what comfort Traddles found in drawing skeletons, and for some time looked upon him as a sort of hermit, who reminded himself by those symbols of mortality that caning couldn't last for ever, but I believe he only did it because they were easy and didn't want any features."

In his Christmas story, The Haunted Man, there are some spirited sketches of the small Tetterbys; of Dolphus, a newspaper boy, àt ten, who hit upon the brilliant invention of varying the first vowel in the word "paper," and thus imparting a colour and interest in the day's routine. So before daylight he would yell "morning pa-per," an hour before noon "morning pap-per," which about two changed to "morning pip-per," which in a couple of hours changed to "morning pop-per," and so declined with the sun into "evening pup-per," to the great relief and comfort of this young gentleman's spirits.

Who can readily forget, moreover, the amusingly precocious children in The Holly Tree Inn story, a story abounding in touches of sympathetic observation of children's ways? But no doubt the most enduring of his sketches of precocious children is the poor little half-starved slavey in The Old Curiosity Shop, a far more vital study than poor little Nell. The curious mixture of worldly shrewdness and childlike sweetness is admirably suggested. Almost driven insane through ill-treatment, a natural strain of goodness survives the ill-treatment of Sally Brass. The scenes between Dick Swiveller and the Marchioness are the most delightful and the most enduring in this novel, though we cannot agree with Mr Swiveller that Sophronia Sphynx, albeit "euphonious and genteel," was a name worthy of her.

THE PICTORIAL ARTIST

To pass from the humorist to the pictorial artist. What gives the humorist such compelling power is the dramatic genius of the writer. He can actualise, vitalise things no less than people.

Dickens' stories and sketches, especially the later ones, abound in fine dramatic situations of incalculable help to him as a painter of London life. That the drama tends to degenerate into melodrama, may be frankly admitted. But the melodramatic element is chiefly noticeable in his earlier work, in Oliver Twist and Nicholas Nickleby, while the simple poignancy, the restraint and dignity of many of his scenes from David Copperfield onwards, are under-estimated by many.

It is hard to overpraise scenes so admirable as the finding of Steerforth's body, the duel between Madame Defarge and Miss Pross, the death of Sidney Carton, the river scenes in Our Mutual Friend, the tragic fooling of Dr. Manigold, the quarrel of the young men in Edwin Drood.

None but a genuine dramatic artist could modulate his style as Dickens can so as to take on the mood of the moment. His treatment of the wind is a case in point. He uses it as a stage property, with the most astounding effect. Whether blustering cheerily through Pickwick, or wailing through The Chimes; whether taking on the note of comedy or informing with sinister accompaniment the note of tragedy, the effect is always achieved with fine art. In the striking description of the marshes at the beginning of Great Expectations, with its creeping fog and flat loneliness, his language becomes almost a mist of words and phrases. In his description of a coach ride, the language quickens and slackens, becomes rollicking or deliberate, according to the pace of the coach. In reading the ride of Tom Pinch to London one recalls the famous lines in Homer and Virgil, where the sound of the horses' hoofs is imitated in the rhythm. What especially attracts him in Nature is just what we should expect from a man of his temperament—her restless vitality. No writer can better convey the idea of physical exhilaration. His descriptions of journeys from country to town abound in rich observation, but the physical experiences are especially emphasized. Very little is said of those mental states of feeling dear to Mr. Thomas Hardy. Egdon Heath would have been little more than a wind-blown ridge to Dickens. As a rule, novelists have a preference for the summer-time, but Dickens not only gives the preference to winter, but is far more effective in his winter sketches. Often he describes cold weather with the genial appreciation of a full-blooded man, at other times, perhaps, some early experience inspiring him or the sight of some wretched, shivering beggar, he describes the miseries of the cold with a Dantesque power of imagination. What is this but using natural phenomena with the eye of the dramatist who makes things, both animate and inanimate, serve to intensify and vivify the situations he is describing? and by reason of this power there is no better guide to the London of the early nineteenth century, than in his pages.

This is well illustrated in his sensibility to the "genius of places."

Thus, for instance, of Harley Street, from Little Dorrit:

"Like unexceptionable society, the opposing rows of houses in Harley Street were very grim with one another. Indeed, the mansions of their inhabitants were so much alike in that respect, that the people were often to be found drawn up on opposite sides of dinner tables, in the shade of their own loftiness, staring at the other side of the way with the dullness of the houses. . . . The expression in uniform twenty houses, all to be knocked at and rung at in the same form, all approachable by the same dull tops, all fended off by the same pattern of railing, all with the same unpracticable fire-escapes, the same inconvenient fixtures in their heads, and everything without exception, to be taken at high valuation."

Here you have deadly respectable dullness, a dullness which spread itself over large tracts of Bayswater in Dickens' day, and has now extended in the direction of West Kensington. Contrast with the above, the almost affectionate mockery lurking in his picture of Lant Street.

Lant Street also is dull—but it is shabby; and Dickens can never resist a certain tenderness towards shabbiness.

"There is an air of repose about Lant Street in the Borough, which sheds a gentle melancholy on the soul."

If a man wished to extract himself from the world, to remove himself from within the reach of temptation, to place himself beyond the possibility of any inducement to look out of the window, he should by all means go to Lant Street. The majority of the inhabitants either direct their energies to the letting of furnished apartments, or devote themselves to the healthful and invigorating pursuit of mangle. The chief features in the still life of the street are green shutters, lodging bills and brass door plates, the pot-boy, the muffin youth, and the baked potato man. The population is migratory, usually disappearing on the verge of quarter-day, and generally by night. His Majesty's revenues are seldom collected in this happy valley: the rents are dubious, and the water communication is very frequently out of."

The Uncommercial Traveller is rich in these dramatic touches. Dickens not only felt keenly the personality of a street and the larger personality of the Great City, but could actualise it for us.

"The way in which it tumbles and tosses before it can get to sleep. Except in the Haymarket, which is the worst kept part of London, and about Kent Street in the Borough, and along a portion of the line of the Old Kent Road, the peace was seldom violently broken. But it was always the case that London, as if in imitation of the individual citizens belonging to it, had expiring fits and starts of restlessness. After all seemed quiet, if one cab rattled by, half a dozen would surely follow, and Houselessness even observed that intoxicated people appeared to be magnetically attracted towards each other."

That might be written to-day. The description of "the stones that pave the way to Waterloo Bridge," and the thumbnail sketch of the toll-keeper, are clearly dated. So also the reverie about the Courts of Law in Westminster, which hinted "in low whispers what numbers of people they were keeping awake, and how intensely wretched and horrible they were rendering the small hours to unfortunate suitors."

The spirit of modernity has touched the Inns of Court since Dickens' day; but only gently, and the genius loci may still be felt as Dickens felt it. The peculiar sense of loneliness in those solitary chambers again and again he has pictured in a novel and fugitive paper.

"It is not to be denied that on the terrace of the Adelphi . . . or anywhere among the neighbourhoods that have done flowering and have run to seed, you may find Chambers replete with the accommodation of solitude, closeness, and darkness, where you may be as low-spirited as in the genuine article, and might be as easily murdered, with the placid reputation of having merely gone down to the seaside. But the many waters of life did run musical in those dry channels once,—among the Inns never."

Here is a sketch of Symond's Inn, which has vanished now for many a year. Once it stood lonely and haggard in Curator Street, Chancery Lane; now it is replaced by the stir and whirr of printing.

"A little, pale wall-eyed, woe-begone Inn, like a large dustbin of two compartments and a sifter. It looks as if Symond were a sparing man in his day, and constructed his Inn of old building materials, which took kindly to the dry rot, and to dirt, and all things decaying and dismal, and perpetuated Symond's memory with congenial shabbiness."

If Dickens is at his best as a dramatic artist in his later books, yet the earlier ones are by no means devoid of striking scenes. The trial scene of Fagin is as impressive as anything in his later work; there are masterly touches in the pictures of South London in The Old Curiosity Shop, and unmistakable power, though crudely used, in the scene where Jonas Chuzzlewit goes down to murder Montague Tigg.

The value afforded by this dramatic power to

Dickens as a painter of London life is quite obvious. Walter Bagehot well described him as "a special correspondent for posterity." His retentive memory, his keen perceptions, his genius for minutiae are remarkable enough, certainly, and impress all that he wrote. But more remarkable even than the sights he witnessed and the things he observed is the fantastic imagination that read new and distinctive meanings into what he witnessed and observed. It is not the "special correspondent" in him so much as the humorist that gives such vitality to his pictures of London life. Apparently the most objective of writers, he is really intensely subjective, as every great humorist must be. He lulls by the familiarity of his settings, into the belief that he is a realist. But his realism lies only on the surface, and his pictures of London life are magnificent pieces of idealised description, sometimes as fantastic as a passage from Notre Dame. With all its mannerisms there is the element of greatness about Dickens' style. For colour, movement, and variety it is a remarkable style. Tawdry and mannered at times, if you will, but despite this, fascinating, arresting, and with the impress of the writer's infectious personality.

THE HUMANITARIAN NOTE

A third quality in Dickens' writing—its humanity—is best seen by a consideration of his character drawing.

What is our dominant feeling after closing a book of Dickens' ? We do not feel we have been absorbed in the study of conflicting emotions and psychological subtleties as we do after reading Meredith's, we do not feel we have been moving in a world of force, primal passions as we do after closing a book of Victor Hugo's. But we do feel that we have been living in a quaint, picturesque world, inhabited by a variety of human beings whose every detail of manners, appearance, dress, is impressed upon our memory. A fantastic world, a burlesque of the world we live in is our first impression perhaps; with some people, it is the ultimate impression. But to others (including the present writer) the fantasy fades from view after a while, and the essential reality and humanity of the world of Dickens remains. Despite the broad brush of caricature, despite the over-insistence on the externals of his characters, he makes them live; and they live, as we shall see, by virtue of their humanity. Yet it cannot be denied that the way in which Dickens relies on expressing his people in physical terms, has been made the basis of an attack upon the reality of his creations. It has been said that when not incarnations of certain qualities they are merely puppets with certain tricks and mannerisms, insisted upon in a wearisome manner to distract our attention from the wooden and lifeless character of the people described. Mr. Pecksniff, it is said, is hypocrisy personified; Mr. Dombey pride personified; Tom Pinch amiability personified; in each case a special quality is so magnified that we lose sight of all other traits and characteristics. The Dickens enthusiast will repel this accusation with indignation, and say that to him at any rate the characters are emphatically alive. But we must not rest content with mere assertion. Is there any basis of truth in this criticism, and if so, how much is false and how much true ?

Now it cannot be denied that Dickens has in certain cases rounded off his characters rather in order to point some moral, or to add definiteness to a satire, than to present a reasonable human being. There are a good many Pecksniffs in the world, but who would venture to say that they kept up so persistently the moral pose as does the character in Martin Chuzzlewit ? Nor does it follow that a Pecksniff must be a man of no intellectual weight whatever. As a matter of fact we know that hypocrisy and ability very often go hand in hand, and although Mr. Pecksniff's architectural futilities are amusing enough, they detract, we must admit, from the lifelike character of the representation. The fact is, that Dickens has drawn a certain number of satirical portraits which must be placed outside the range of his characterisations at large, and to these cases the adverse criticisms mentioned may with some fairness be applied, not otherwise. For the rest it is not Dickens who has over-stated, but we who fail in our observation. Broadly speaking, the characters of Dickens fall into two main divisions:

- 1 The normal
- 2 The abnormal

With the first class we can group many of his men, notably the so-called heroes of the story, and the majority of his women and children. The second division may be further sub-divided into:

- a Satirical portraits (drawn for a special purpose).
- b The villains
- c The grotesques.

First, the normal

I take these first because here, with certain exceptions, Dickens is the least happy and the least individual. He has a genius for transforming geese into swans, for pointing out the possibilities of ugly ducklings, he can make you a silk purse of a sow's ear, or a tolerable imitation thereof, and discovers a gleam of gold in the most unpromising soil. Nevertheless—putting aside the children—some eccentricity of manner, some mental twist, some intellectual slowness is required by him in order to obtain the fullest effects of his art. With the average young man and young woman, and with people who have nothing superficially to differentiate them, he is less interested, and seems rather at a loss how to treat them. How shadowy are Martin Chuzzlewit, Nicholas Nickleby, and Walter Gay compared with Tom Pinch, Newman Noggs, and Captain Cuttle. Why is this ? Partly, no doubt, because these characters are less adapted to his methods of character delineation; they make no call upon his sense of humour, nor do they arouse his satirical purpose. Partly also because Dickens does not concern himself with the spiritual history of men and women; and here an interesting contrast is afforded by the writings of George Eliot. Her method of character study is precisely the reverse of Dickens'. Dickens treats of his characters primarily from without, and only such characteristics as may express themselves externally are dwelt upon by him. George Eliot conducts you within; she is first and foremost anxious to show you the growth and expansion of the inward man or woman—that something we call the soul. It is only secondarily, and even then not always, that she is concerned with the externals of her characters. Dickens was not a scientific student of character; he was a shrewd observer of certain types of character, and although he did not confine his character studies altogether to these types, yet he was rarely successful when he diverged from them.

Physical beauty did not appeal strongly to Dickens as it did to Thackeray. As a novelist and a sentimentalist he was bound to pay some homage at the shrine of feminine grace and charm, but his description of such strikes the reader as strained and artificial. Compare the strained sentimentality of his picture of Ruth Pinch, meant to convey her personal attractiveness, with that of George Eliot's convincing description of Hetty Sorrel's beauty. He could convey many things with his picturesque and powerful pen, but the subtle charm of sex was not among them.

The tragedy of sensitive, ill-used children is a tragedy that Dickens could draw with force, tenderness, and imaginative insight, but the tragedy of love, the tragedy of pitiful passions, of futile affections, the tragedy of Juliet, of Maggie Tulliver, of Tess of the D'Urbervilles, is outside his range altogether. Estella is little more than a youthful edition of Edith Domby. She has been brought up by Miss Havisham (another of Dickens' failures) to look with contempt on affection and sentiment. She is drilled into a hard, cynical young woman, who breaks hearts as a pastime. The beautiful woman without a heart is common enough in fiction, but never was anyone more devoid of semblance to humanity than Estella. She does not talk like a creature of flesh and blood, but as a personified theory. Pip, deeply in love with her, tells her of his feelings.

"It seems," said Estella, very calmly, "that there are sentiments and fancies—I don't know how to call them—which I am not able to comprehend. When you say you love me I know what you mean, as a form of words, but nothing more, you address nothing in my heart, you touch nothing there. I don't care for what you say at all."

Is this the language of a cynical young woman, or, indeed, of any young woman?

With another type of woman Dickens is far more successful. With women past their first youth, who are eccentric in their ways, who have little or no physical charm and often no mental brilliance, yet who have a certain soundness and sweetness of heart, with women of this type Dickens is extraordinarily happy. And although these fall within the grotesque group, they may be considered here while dealing with the women. Betsy Trotwood, Miss La Creevy, and Miss Pross may be cited as noteworthy examples. Betsy Trotwood is easily first; indeed, she ranks among one of Dickens' unqualified successes, and from the moment she administers the strange mixture of restoratives to her young nephew ("I am sure I tasted linseed water, anchovy sauce, and salad dressing") to her kindly hints to David about Agnes, almost at the end of the book, she attracts us to her, what a dear, golden-hearted old lady she must have made, her little peculiarities and occasional acerbity just giving an agreeable fillip to her sterling qualities. Long may her type exist to sweeten human life and to help the many Mr. Dicks floating about the world!

Dickens is also no less successful when shrewd observation rather than psychological analysis is called for. This type is drawn almost entirely from the lower class. Consider his terragnants and shrews: Mrs. Joe, Mrs. Snagsby, Mrs. Varden, Mrs. Sowerberry, Mrs. Gummidge, Miss Miggs, Mrs. MacStinger, Mrs. Jellyby, and Mrs. Pocket, to mention a few. What a detestable collection of females; what an unpromising assortment of minor vices! Yes, minor vices, they haven't enough character to be even vicious on a big scale. Yet with what amazing art are they drawn, not a repulsive feature missed, and yet etched in with such humorous twists and twirls that you cannot help laughing at them, however foolish or contemptible they may be.

Of the London landlady no one had a wider knowledge than Dickens, it is amazing the varieties he gives you of a type which one would have thought admitted of so few. Mrs. Bardell belongs, perhaps, to the region of farcical romance, but there is enough life about Mrs. Raddle and Mrs. Crupp. Mrs. Todgers, who would probably have objected to be classed as a landlady, has some good points. She is by no means altogether the calculating vixen—at the same time one would like to see her—only at rare intervals. Mrs. Lumper, who gives the name to one of his short stories, is the most human, and perhaps it is unfair to class her among the disagreeables, but we fancy she would rather get on the "nerves," her kindness notwithstanding.

Taken on the whole, then, we must pronounce Dickens' women characters as ineffective, except where they are either eccentric or disagreeable. Accepting these qualifications he has contributed some remarkably humorous and not a few genuinely pathetic figures to the world of noveldom.

MRS. PIPCHIN

Mrs. Pipchin was an elderly lady, who had for some time devoted all the energies of her mind to the study and treatment of infancy. She was generally spoken of as "a great manager" of children, and the secret of her management was, to give them everything that they didn't like, and nothing that they did. Mrs. Pipchin had also founded great fame on being a widow lady whose husband had broken his heart in pumping water out of the Peruvian mines. This was a great recommendation to Mr. Domby, for it had a rich sound. Broke his heart of the Peruvian mines, missed Mr. Domby. Well, a very respectable way of doing it.

This celebrated Mrs. Pipchin was a marvellous ill-favoured, ill-conditioned old lady, of a stooping figure, with a mottled face, like bad marble, a hook nose, and a hard grey eye, that looked as if it might have been hammered at on an anvil without sustaining any injury. Forty years at least had elapsed since the Peruvian mines had been the death of Mr. Pipchin, but his relict still wore black bombazine, of such a lustreless, deep, dead, sombre shade, that gas itself couldn't light her up after dark, and her presence was a quencher to any number of candles. She was such a bitter old lady, that one was tempted to believe that there had been some mistake in the application of the Peruvian machinery, and that all her waters of gladness and milk of human kindness had been pumped out dry, instead of the mines.¹

To pass from the normal to the abnormal is to pass at once from a group of characterisations which greatly vary in merit to a group that—with a few reservations concerning the bold, bad villains—are uniformly and extraordinarily successful. It is to pass from a territory in which other writers of less power have succeeded often much better than our author, to a little domain of which Dickens is the master and ruler, in which he is unapproachable.

Never alone come the eccentrics! The bad characters—the out-and-out bad characters—succeed just where we should expect them to succeed, and fail where we should expect them to fail. Where they present merely studies in coarse brutality, animal ferocity combined with the intelligence of the "rough" or "cad," they are effective enough. The cowardice of the "bully," the savage anger and treachery of the blackguard, is excellently depicted. Sikes and Fagin, Jonas Chuzzlewit and, on the whole, Quilp, serve their purpose well enough. But not every devil may be detected by his cloven foot, not every villain by his scowl. Yet unless Dickens could show some physical manifestation of the soul, could hint by a deformity of limb the deformity of moral fibre, he was unable to impress the reader with the personality of the character. Carker's villainy seems so inseparably bound up with his gleaming white teeth, that were he almost persuaded that were he to become on a sudden toothless he would ipso facto develop into a highly virtuous gentleman. He suggests a study in molars and morals!

Dickens is, as has been said, in no sense a psychologist. His work is impressionistic, not analytical. When he elaborates his portrait, it is not to show the quality of motives so much as the quantity of waistcoat buttons. Such as they are, however, the villains as a rule serve their purpose well, and where they fail, as in the case of Carker, Monks, and Uriah Heep, it is because some psychological insight into the workings of the mind is wanted to give vitality and reality to the picture.

To turn now to the class of grotesques which play the most conspicuous share in his writings. Here physical uncouthness and mental disability, ranging from good-natured stupidity down to sheer imbecility, is shown combined with sterling moral qualities—in particular, tenderness and sympathy. The recipe for the characters is not especially promising, and one would surmise that they would quickly weary. This, however, is certainly not the case. From Newman Noggs, who appeared in Nickleby, down to Joe Gargery in Great Expectations, each creation is a fresh delight, each has some new and unexpected touch of humour, and with none of them would we part. Some are lovable, some are merely amusing, but all of them are creatures of warm flesh and blood to be reckoned among the friends of our imagination.

And here let me say that by the phrase abnormal I do not mean unnatural or necessarily cranky—though some are cranks—but characters removed from the ordinary average human being by reason of certain peculiarities or eccentricities of temperament. Joe Gargery is not the normal blacksmith; he is abnormal, luckily for us, and his oddities are irradiated by the searchlight of the author's penetrating humour. Yet he is perfectly natural; we may never have met Joe, but we feel we might meet him at any moment. He is a genuine creation.

"Joe being invited to sit down to table looked all round the room for a suitable spot on which to deposit his hat, as if it were only on some few very rare substances in nature that it could find a resting-place, and ultimately stood it on an extreme corner of the chimney-piece, from which it ever afterwards fell off at intervals."

"Do you like tea or coffee, Mr. Gargery?" asked Herbert.

"Thank'ee, sir," said Joe, stiff from head to foot, "I'll take whichever is most agreeable to yourself."

"What do you say to coffee?"

"Thank'ee, sir," returned Joe, evidently dispirited by the proposal, "since you are so kind as to make choice of coffee, I will not run contrary to your opinions. But don't you never find it a little 'eatung'?"

"Say tea, then," said Herbert, pouring it out.

"Here Joe's hat tumbled off the mantelpiece and he started out of his chair, and fitted it to the same exact spot, as if it were an absolute point of good breeding that it should tumble off again soon."

"When did you come to town, Mr. Gargery?"

"Were it yesterday afternoon?" said Joe, after coughing behind his hand as if he had had time to catch the whooping cough since he came. "No, it were not, yes it were. Yes, it were yesterday afternoon" (with an appearance of mingled wisdom, relief, and strict impartiality).

"Have you seen anything of London yet?"

"Why yes, sir," said Joe. "Me and Wopsle went off straight to look at the Blacking Ware'us. But we didn't find it come up with its likeness to the red bills on shop doors, which I mean to say," added Joe, "as it is there draw'd too architectonically!"

"I really believe Joe would have prolonged the word (mightily expressive to my mind of some architecture that I know) into a perfect chorus, but for his attention being providentially attracted by his hat, which was toppling. Indeed, it demanded from him a constant attention and a quickness of eye and hand very like that exacted by wicket keeping. He made extraordinary play with it, and showed the greatest skill—now rushing at it and catching it neatly as it dropped, now merely stopping it midway, beating it up, and humouring it in various parts of the room, and against a good deal of the pattern of the wall, finally splashing it into the slop basin, where I took the liberty of laying hands on it."

Apart from the perfect touches of characterisation, what a genius for "stage business" this and similar passages show! One can well believe how excellent an actor Dickens was.

On similar lines, though not with such delicacy of touch or such play of humorous fancy, is the character of Mr. Peggotty drawn. Peggotty loses in interest somehow when he goes in quest of Emily, whereas Joe grows upon us as the story proceeds, and is perhaps the most lovable of all Dickens' characters; the strength and tenderness of the man being portrayed with infinite skill.

Excellent, as studies of trustful simplicity, are the characters of Tom Pinch and his first cousin, Bob Cratchit, who idealises Scrooge in a way not altogether dissimilar from that of Pinch!

Belonging, of course, to these grotesques are certain female characters we have glanced at already when dealing with Dickens' women—Betsy Trotwood, Miss Pross, Mrs Gamp, Betsy Prig. It is curious how sure is his touch and effective his portraiture when grotesquior, involving some measure of humorous fantasy, enters into the character. Putting aside the shrewd and crazy women, he scarcely ever draws a live woman except grotesque. Among the male characters also, his most striking successes are grotesques, but he has drawn some interesting portraits apart from these, e.g. Pip, Steerforth, Traddles, Jaggers, Tulkinghorn, and for the matter of that, the majority of his lawyers. Two, however, of his most notable paintings must be classed with the "grotesques," even though, as in the case of Joe and Mr Peggotty, the grotesque element only faintly colours the portrait and does not interfere with its lifelike character. I allude to Dick Swiveller and Mr Micawber. Stripped of their engaging personalities and looked at through the cold eye of criticism, it is difficult to see anything especially attractive about them. Dick is a chronic tippler, rarely sober, a shiftless Bohemian, alternating between getting into drink and into debt.

Surely here is a man who might be held up as an awful example by the temperance party, yet as seen by the humorous and sympathetic eye of Dickens his failings fall into insignificance, even his intemperance is presented in a merry, fantastic light, whereas the good-heartedness of the character and the happy go-lucky, mercurial temperament are emphasized and dwelt upon with rare skill. We are made to feel that there is a refinement about the man, that he is not only a "good sort" at heart but that under happier circumstances "the fire of soul would have been kindled at the taper of conviviality" of a more moderate character.

Mr Micawber is another type of the attractive mercurial temperament, ready to look on the bright side of things at the smallest provocation. Apart from this the needy, improvident man would have served the stern moralist's purposes almost as well as Swiveller. But really we are scarcely conscious of his faults, so delighted are we by his company. This, it may be said, is due to the author making unfair use of his gift of humour, and idealising the man out of all human probability. That he idealises may be admitted.

MR MICAWBER

The counting house clock was at half-past twelve, and there was a general preparation for going to dinner, when Mr Quinion tapped at the counting-house window, and beckoned me to go in. I went in, and found there a stoutish, middle-aged person, in a brown suit and black tights and shoes, with no more hair upon his head (which was a large one, and very shining) than there is upon an egg, and with a very extensive face, which he turned full upon me. His clothes were shabby, but he had an imposing shirt-collar on. He carried a jaunty sort of a stick with a large pair of rusty tassels to it, and a quizzing glass hung outside his coat—for ornament, I afterwards found as he very seldom looked through it, and couldn't see anything when he did.

"This," said Mr Quinion, in allusion to myself, "is he."

"This," said the stranger, with a certain condescending roll in his voice, and a certain indescribable air of doing something genteel, which impressed me very much, "is Master Copperfield. I hope I see you well, sir?"

I said I was very well, and hoped he was. I was sufficiently ill at ease, Heaven knows, but it was not in my nature to complain much at that time of my life, so I said I was very well, and hoped he was.

"I am," said the stranger, "thank Heaven, quite well. I have received a letter from Mr Murdstone, in which he mentions that he would desire me to remove into an apartment in the rear of my house, which is at present unoccupied—and is, in short, to be let as a— in short," said the stranger, with a smile and in a burst of confidence, "as a bedroom—the young beginner whom I have now the pleasure to—" and the stranger waved his hand, and settled his chin in his shirt collar.

"This is Mr Micawber," said Mr Quinion to me. "Ahem!" said the stranger, "that is my name." "Mr Micawber," said Mr Quinion, "is known to Mr Murdstone. He takes orders for us on commission, when he can get any. He has been written to by Mr Murdstone on the subject of your lodgings, and he will receive you as a lodger."

The only visitors I ever saw or heard of, were creditors. They used to come at all hours, and some of them were quite ferocious. One dirty-faced man I think he was a boot-maker used to edge himself into the passage as early as seven o'clock in the morning, and call up the stairs to Mr Micawber—"Come! You ain't out yet, you know I've us, will you? Don't hide you know, that's mean. I wouldn't be mean if I was you? Pay us, will you? You just pay us, d'ye hear? Come!" Receiving no answer to these taunts he would mount in his wrath to the words "swindlers" and "robbers", and these being ineffectual too would sometimes go to the extremity of crossing the street, and roaring up at the windows of the second floor where he knew Mr Micawber was. At these times, Mr Micawber would be transported with grief and mortification, even to the length (as I was once made aware by a scream from his wife) of making motions at himself with a razor, but within half an hour afterwards, he would polish up his shoes with extraordinary pains, and go out, humming a tune with a greater air of gentility than ever!

All Dickens' characters are idealised one way or the other. That is part of his method. That it is done to an artistic extent, that it deprives the character of human interest cannot be admitted. Surely we can recall many persons whose charm of manner or whose personal magnetism has affected us so strongly that we have been inclined to overlook their weaknesses and condone their faults, faults that in less sympathetic or attractive characters would have provoked disgust and disapprobation.

Herein comes the special and enduring value of Dickens' character-painting. So sure is his touch, so vital his imagination, that the credibility or psychological accuracy of a character study scarcely affects its success at all. Some of his frankest caricatures live with us, as do few of the correctly-drawn personages of other novelists. So intensely does he believe in Pecksniff, Stiggins, Chadband, Scrooge, ay, and his Winkles and Tupmans too, that we also are compelled to believe in them. The reformed Scrooge screaming out of the window for the largest turkey, or digging the astonished Cratchit in the ribs, is outrageously improbable. But improbable or not, Scrooge is alive and declines to be dismissed into the limbo of forgotten worthies. And are not many of Dickens' characterisations wrought into the very texture of our thoughts, impressed upon our imaginations as are few characters even in real life?

If one will only compare the multitudinous Christmas stories that are written nowadays with the Christmas tales of Dickens, then one will appreciate more than ever the beauty and moral stimulus of that novelist's work. The feeling that Dickens in his Christmas books did so much to deepen the feeling of kindness, of universal love, of practical sympathy, is absent from the majority of these volumes written for Christmas time. It may be said that Dickens' Christmas is largely convention, yet it is a convention to which these books owe their existence, and the tender, tolerant, generous spirit of Dickens influences few of them. The Christmas message of Dickens, we have been told, is a roast-beef-and-plum-pudding-and-plenty-to-drink message. It was so to this extent only that he recognised that nothing could be hoped for in the way of social uplifting while men and women and little children know what hunger is, that it is cant to talk of the blessings of poverty, or to force a sermon upon an empty stomach.

And thus it is that the Christmas stories of Dickens touch us as do few others, inasmuch as they carry within them sunshine of a gentle-hearted gaiety. No scene of his so darkly drawn but had its rainbow, and therein lies the compelling charm of stories like The Carol, The Chimney, and The Cricket on the Hearth. In fact, Dickens seemed to say, "Food before you moralise, satisfy the hunger of these poor folk before you try to teach them what to do and what not to do." A simple enough lesson, but one all the same that was badly needed. Too much of the piety of the time was hard and unsympathetic, and one is reminded of the sensible old woman in one of George Eliot's early stories who remarked about the parson's housekeeper, "I have nothing to say again her piety, my dear, but I know very well I shouldn't like her to cook my vittles. When a man comes in hungry and tired piety won't feed him, I reckon. Hard carrots lie heavy on the stomach, piety or no piety." I called in one day when she was dishing up Mr. Tryan's dinner, and I could see his potatoes was as watery as watery. It's right enough to be spiritual, I'm no enemy to that, but I like my potatoes nicely. I don't see as any-one'll get to heaven any the sooner for not digesting their dinners provided they don't die sooner." This practical philosophy appealed very strongly to Dickens, and no one has illustrated its truth more picturesquely or more humorously.

There are some books from which we rise with the knowledge that our souls are the sweeter and saner for what we have read. And among such books none have exerted a more compelling interest towards a greater tolerance for men and women, a livelier sympathy for the poor and outcast, than the Christmas stories of Charles Dickens.

Betsy Trotwood's famous advice to her nephew fairly epitomises the teaching of Dickens. "Never be mean, never be false, never be cruel." Never be mean, that is the burden of his Christmas books. Never be false, that sentiment runs beneath all his satire. Never be cruel, that is the mainspring of his tender humour—his compassion for the weak, the infirm, the oppressed.

Dickens has touched with pity and tenderness the springs of our national life, and English life no less than English letters, is the saner, the sweeter, and the sunnier for his presence.

CHARLES KINGSLEY

CHARLES KINGSLEY was born at Holne Vicarage, Devonshire, on June 12, 1819, his boyhood being passed among the fens of Nottingham. His father was a man of cultivated tastes, a cleric, an artist, a linguist, and a keen sportsman; his mother was a Miss Lucas of Barbadoes, from whom he inherited the romance in his nature. A debater, sensitive, and precocious child, he began to write poems and preach sermons to imaginary congregations when four years old.

Educated at Clifton during the time of the Bristol Riots, the horrors witnessed at that time awakened in him an unwonted courage. Twenty-seven years later, when giving a lecture there, he said:

"It was in this very City of Bristol that I received my first lesson in what is now called 'social science,' and yet, alas, ten years elapsed ere I could even spell out that lesson though it has been written for me (as well as for all England) in letters of flame, from one end of the country to the other. It is good for a man to be brought once at least in his life, face to face with fact, ultimate fact, however horrible it may be, and have to confess to himself, shuddering, what things are possible upon God's earth."

Kingsley was not popular as a schoolboy, for while active he was not keen on games. Of endurance to pain he had no lack, he would heat a poker to cauterise his wounded finger, yet at the same time was tender-hearted to others, of most forgiving nature, while keenly sensitive to ridicule.

In 1839 he went up to Cambridge, and came under the influence of Coleridge, Carlyle, and Maurice. After his ordination in 1842 he settled as curate in Eversley, Hants, to be his home, with a short interval, for thirty-three years. After his marriage to Miss Fanny Grenfell in 1844, he became rector, and very popular. His aim was to be "all things to all men"—and he would give his sympathy and advice alike to huntsman and poacher, to farmer and labourer, while taking the lead in the social life of his poorer parishioners.

In 1848 appeared The Saint's Tragedy. This year was a strenuous one, for in addition to his parish and literary work he accepted the Professorship of English Literature at Queen's College, London. On May 6 appeared the first number of Politics for the People, his own contributions being over the signature of "Parson Lot." Yeast was also running serially in Fraser's Magazine. Nerves and brain wore continually on the stretch, and resulted in a breakdown. For months he could do nothing but wander on the seashore at Ilfracombe, where he had removed with his family for rest.

When Alton Locke was published in 1849, furious attacks were made upon this expression of the author's socialistic views, but "he stuck to his guns." After Hypatia (1853), Westward Ho (1855), and Two Years Ago (1857), he was appointed Professor of Modern History at Cambridge (1860); then came the charming fantasy, Water Babies (1863), and the quarrel with Cardinal Newman that resulted in the publication of the Apologia.

In 1869 Kingsley was made Canon of Chester, and of Westminster in 1873. The following year he went to America, where he lectured and preached to large crowds, but had a serious illness in Colorado. Returning to Eversley in August, he took up his work there with the same grim determination and noble self-repression that had marked his whole life. But his life work was nearly over. Having preached in Westminster Abbey on Advent Sunday he was much exhausted the following day he was taken ill, and died on January 23, 1875.

THE WORK OF KINGSLEY

Kingsley belonged temperamentally to the Romantic school, and that particular side of the Romantic school which followed in the wake of Scott. He is a good, spirited writer of the second rank, virile, straightforward, and of a lively imagination. Hence he is a capital writer for boys and in any case is best enjoyed in the uncritical days of youth, when his prejudices and partialities ride lightly over us. But his strong anti-Catholic sentiment, and horror of celibacy and the ascetic life, become rather troublesome obsessions in his stories. In Westward the Wake this is of less moment, we are interested in the writer's vigorous portraiture of the Viking nature, with its coarse power and passionate tenacity; but the Elizabethan setting of Westward Ho brings the partisanship more prominently forward, and this spirited story, with its warm patriotic note, would have been all the better had he been less anxious to idealise our attractive but not over-squintish old sea-dogs, Hawkins and Drake, and to paint in such lurid colours the Catholic Spaniard. Narrow and intolerant they may have been, but no whit more so than the Protestants of the time. The Spaniard was a poor coloniser as compared with the Englishman, and certainly treated the Indian cruelly. Kingsley sees this clearly enough. It is a pity that he does not see equally clearly that our treatment of the Irish was no whit less odious, and that the wholesale thieving of Messrs. Hawkins and Company is not to be counted for righteousness so far as those gallant and picturesque navigators were concerned.

Directly Kingsley approached modern times his sense of moral perspective is wonderfully clear. Once he is away from his hughbears—Catholicism and Asceticism—his sense of justice is unpeccable. If from the standpoint of the literary artist his humanitarian fictions are inferior to his romances, they certainly exhibit his fine social sympathies, and both Yeast and Alton Locke are excellent as preachments. Here he supplements the work of Dickens very usefully. It was good to point out as Dickens had done, the moral qualities of the poor and uneducated, it was equally good to show as Kingsley did, that the poor man had a head as well as a heart.

ENGLISH MARINERS

One bright summer's afternoon, in the year of grace 1575, a tall and fair boy came lingering along Bideford quay, in his scholar's gown, with a satchel and slate in hand, watching wistfully the shipping and the sailors, till, just after he passed the bottom of the High Street, he came opposite to one of the many taverns which looked out upon the river. In the open bay window sat merchants and gentlemen, discoursing over the afternoon's draught of sack, and outside the door was gathered a group of sailors, listening earnestly to some one who stood in the midst. The boy, all alive for any sea news, must needs go up to them and take his place among the sailor-lads who were peeping and whispering under the elbows of the men, and so came in for the following speech delivered in a loud bold voice with a strong Devonshire accent, and a fan-spun kluge of onths:

"If you don't believe me go and see, or stay here and grow all over blue mould. I tell you as I am a gentleman, I saw it with these eyes and so did Salvation Yeo there, through a window in the lower room, and we measured the heap as I am a christened man, seventy foot long, ten foot broad and twelve foot high of silver bars, and each bar between a thirty and forty pound weight. And says Captain Drake, 'There my lads of Devon, I've brought you to the mouth of the world's treasure-house, and it's your own fault now if you don't sweep it out as empty as a stock-fish.'"

"Why didn't you bring some of they home, then, Mr Oxenham?"

"Why weren't you there to help to carry them? We would have brought 'em away, safe enough, and young Drake and I had broke the door aboard already, but Captain Drake goes off in a dead faint and when we came to look he had a wound in his leg you might have laid three fingers in, and his boots were full of blood and had been for an hour or more, but the heart of him was that, that he never knew it till he dropped, and then his brother and I got him away to the boats, he kicking and struggling, and bidding us let him go on with the fight, though every step he took in the sand was in a pool of blood. And so we got off. And tell me, ye sons of shotten herrings, wasn't it worth more to save him than the dirty silver? for silver we can get again, brave boys, there's more fish in the sea than ever came out of it and more silver in Nombre de Dios than would pave all the streets in the west country. But of such captains as Franky Drake, Heaven never makes but one at a time and if we lose him, good bye to England's luck says I, and who don't agree, let him choose his weapons, and I'm his man."

He who delivered this harangue was a tall and sturdy personage, with a florid black bearded face and bold restless dark eyes, who leaned, with crossed legs and arms skimbo, against the wall of the house, and seemed in the eyes of the schoolboy a very magnifico, some prince or duke at least.

CHARLES READE

CHARLES READE was born at Ipsden House, Oxfordshire, in 1814, his mother, 'to whom,' he said, "I owe the larger half of what I am" being the daughter of John Scott Waring, a member of Parliament and the friend of Grote and Wilberforce. After graduating at Oxford he became Dean of Arts at Magdalen in 1845, and Vice-President of his college in 1851. At this time his style of dress—notably a green coat with brass buttons—caused some sensation. Although called to the Bar in 1843, the law had no attraction for him as a profession—though, doubtless, his legal equipment well served him later in the many lawsuits which, through a hasty and imperious temper, he became involved.

As a dramatist he made his first essay with The Ladies' Battle; this was followed by Masks and

Faces, written in collaboration with Tom Taylor. During the rehearsal of this play at the Haymarket Theatre, he made the acquaintance of Mrs Laura Seymour, an actress and his friend for many years, who advised him to try fiction. Acting on her suggestion he turned the incidents of this play into a novel, Peg Woffington, and wrote Christie Johnstone, as novels they were successful, but £30 was all they brought to their author. However, he was a prolific writer and not daunted by small pay. In drawing up his "account with literature" in 1851, he says for the first eighteen years "In all, one hundred and five pounds. That is to say, about half a crown a week—not enough to pay for pens, ink, and paper, leaving copying and shoe leather out of the question" . . . "Had it not been for the fellowship . . . and a mother's generous help, I must have been in the workhouse or breaking stones on the highway."

In 1855 the trial of the Governor of Birmingham Gaol for cruelties to the prisoners under his charge attracted Reade's attention, and after studying the gaols of Durham, Oxford, and Reading, his indignation was aroused, and he wrote It's Never too Late to Mend (1856). In 1859 The Cloister and the Hearth, as A Good Fight, made a partial appearance in Once a Week, and increased its circulation by twenty thousand. The tale was brought to an abrupt conclusion by Reade in consequence of the liberties taken with the manuscript by the editor. Hard Cash in 1863, and Griffith Gault two years later. For the latter Reade received his highest payment for a novel—£1500 for the serial rights—from Mrs Henry Wood, founder of the Argosy. Some further dramatic ventures, more or less remunerative, followed, but his greatest success, Drunk (adapted from Zola's L'Assommoir), in 1879, brought the author £20,000.

As a man Reade was a contradictory, irascible, litigious, kind-hearted and extremely generous man; always ready to listen to anyone with a grievance, and was especially interested in those who had "come down" in the world. A great lover of animals, he kept quite a menagerie at his residence in Knightsbridge, where he lived from 1868-1880. He died at Shophord's Bush in 1884.

CHARACTERISTICS OF READE AND KINGSLEY

Both Reade and Kingsley had so much in common as literary artists that it may prove suggestive to consider their work in the light of certain salient characteristics.

(1) A Vivid Appreciation of the Dramatic Element in Life

Both men were inclined to regard human life as a successive series of crises, a constant diorama of situations.

Kingsley came from a long line of country gentlemen and soldiers. With his big fund of animal spirits, his store of nervous energy, he turned naturally to those phases of concrete life where opposing forces made themselves most readily felt. He had the instinct of the soldier who loves to fight against heavy odds. His own life was a hard struggle between his passions and his ideals, between the natural man and the ethical man. Much superfluous energy he worked off in characteristic fashion. He scaled the high wall of his college to begin fishing some miles away one morning at three o'clock, and he met the troubles of headache, not by bromide but by a long tramp over the fens in a head wind. It is easy to understand, therefore, why he was excellent as a parish priest in a rough country village. He was one of his people, able to understand their weaknesses and frailties. And this quality, that made him forceful as a pastor, made him forceful as a writer. The man who is keenly alive to the dramatic side of life may be a bad historian and an unblushing partisan, but he never lacks the power to interest. He may not be a clear thinker, but he is certainly a clear observer. His romances are dramas, and his best poems are dramas. Hervey is the drama of the old Gods, Westward Ho, the drama of religious creeds, Hypatia, the drama of the clash between the East and the West at the dawn of Christianity, Eastward the Wake, the drama of the Viking and Ascetic Ecclesiasticism, Yeast and Alton Locke, the drama of industrial strife, Three Fishers and The Sands of Dee, the drama of Man versus Nature. Even in that charming fancy, Water Babies, the dramatic element is not lacking.

Turning from Kingsley to Reade, we find the same pre-eminence of the dramatic element—with a difference. What is this difference? It is not a difference of attitude but of placement. A boy, if asked to state it, would say that Reade was the more overtly dramatic. The critic would expound this difference by pointing out that Reade, while no less interested than Kingsley in the moral element of drama, is more emphatic about its physical constituents. Kingsley is absorbed by his story because it deals with a conflict, Reade because it deals with a picturesque and thrilling conflict. He is more self-conscious than Kingsley, more of the deliberate artist, and often frankly delights in his situations as situations. It was the dream of his life to write a successful play, and he devoted eighteen years to the study of art, preferring the drama to the novel. His chief friends were connected with the stage rather than with letters. Never too Late to Mend was evolved from his own play, Gold, that in its turn being inspired by a play; Peg Woffington is a novel based on his play Masks and Faces.

He had a knowledge of stage technique that Kingsley lacked, and this makes him superior to Kingsley in dramatic intensity, though Kingsley at his best is more spontaneous and less mannered.

For sheer manipulation of thrilling situations he has no superior in English fiction, though his contemporary, Wilkie Collins, excelled him at times in subtlety of method in achieving his effects. The reader must be hard to move, however, who could read with tranquil pulse such finely devised episodes as that of the scuttled ship in Hard Cash, of the man-hunt in Never too Late to Mend, the escape by windmill in The Cloister and the Hearth, or the fight with the pirate ship in Hard Cash.

(2) The Fundamental Realism of their Fiction

The union of the elder romance and the younger realism that we note in Scott is yet further developed by some of the Victorian novelists. Despite their rich romantic equipment, both Reade and Kingsley are essentially realists in method. One recalls the villago feast in Yeast, with its coarseness and sodden gaiety; such portraits as that of the poacher, or that rough diamond Mackenzie, in Alton Locke, and Reade is even more thorough in his realism. He is less prone than Kingsley was to stop and moralise; he knew the value of "cutting the cackle and coming to the 'osces"; and if he is inordinately long at times (as he is in his masterpiece, The Cloister and the Hearth), this is not because he wants to preach, but because he is over generous with his sensations. One reservation must, however, be made, his realism deals with things rather than with people. His heroes and heroines and villains are more often than not mere abstractions, useful puppets for furthering his ingenious purposes as a story-teller, but unconvincing as vital portraits of real men and women.

But turn from the puppets of the drama to the background, and Reade is nearly always clear and convincing whether he is treating of prison life or of convict settlements, or private asylums, or life on a desert island, he has gripped his subject-matter, mastered his facts, and makes the reader see the thing described with his own eyes.

(3) The Social Purpose in the Novels

Both Reade and Kingsley were preachers at heart, and there is the same downright, vigorous morality in their writings. Both men not only attacked injustices but proposed remedies. Artistically, Reade has the greater power to fuse his social purpose and dramatic imagination; and as a humanitarian force, though no more strenuous than Kingsley, he is more varied, more impressive. Indeed no English novelist—Dickens himself not excepted—put his genius with fiercer disinterestedness at the service of the public than did Reade. His realism, clever as it is, would have been of slight service had not his romantic imagination reinforced it. Lacking Kingsley's lyric faculty, he is none-the-less a poet at heart. No man without the poet's soul could have penned The Cloister and the Hearth. There is the true "Romance of Wonder" in its pages.

In short, both men were realists in the best sense of the word, which implies no slavish reproduction of the externals of life, but a faithful presentation of such primal facts as love, pity, courage, endurance, and especially those simple domesticities beloved by Teutonic races. Kingsley's pisan of love is but the prelude to his glorification of happy home life, and Reade is never so happy as when he is showing that even in the most degraded breast, clear, simple home affection may still be lurking.

THE FIGHT WITH THE BEAR

There was a peculiar sound, like something heavy, but not hard, rushing softly over the dead leaves. Gerard turned round with some little curiosity. A colossal creature was coming down the road at about sixty paces distant.

He looked at it in a sort of calm stupor at first, but the next moment he turned ashy pale.

"Denys!" he cried. "Oh, God! Denys!"

Denys whirled round.

It was a bear as big as a cart-horse.

It was tearing along with its huge head down, running on a hot scent. The very moment he saw it Denys said in a sickening whisper.

"The cub!"

Oh! the concentrated horror of that one word, whispered hoarsely, with dilating eyes! For in that syllable it all flashed upon them both like a sudden stroke of lightning in the dark—the bloody trail, the murdered cub, the mother upon them, and at DEATH.

All this in a moment of time. The next she saw them. Hugo as she was, she seemed to double herself (it was her long hair bristling with rage) she raised her head big as a hull's, her swine-shaped jaws opened wide at them, her eyes turned to blood and flame, and she rushed upon them, scattering the leaves about her like a whirlwind as she came.

"Shoot!" screamed Denys, but Gerard stood shaking from head to foot, useless.

"Shoot, man! ten thousand devils, shoot! too late! Tree! tree!" and he dropped the cub, pushed Gerard across the road, and flew to the first tree and climbed it, Gerard the same on his side, and as they fled, both men uttered inhuman howls like savage creatures grazed by death.

With all their speed one or other would have been torn to fragments at the foot of his tree, but the bear stopped a moment at the cub.

Without taking her blood-hot eyes off those who was hunting, she smelt it all round, and found, how, her Creator only knows, that it was dead, quite dead. She gave a yell such as neither of the hunted ones had ever heard, nor dreamed to be in nature, and flew after Denys. She reared and struck at him as he climbed. He was just out of reach.

Instantly she seized the tree, and with her huge teeth tore a great piece out of it with a crash. Then she reared again, dug her claws deep into the bark, and began to mount it slowly, but as surely as a monkey.

Denys's evil star had led him to a dead tree, a mere shaft, and of no very great height. He climbed faster than his pursuer and was soon at the top. He looked this way and that for some bough of another tree to spring to. There was none, and if he jumped down, he knew the bear would be upon him ere he could recover the fall and make short work of him. Moreover, Denys was little used to turning his back on danger, and his blood was rising at being hunted. He turned to bay.

Gerard's heart was better than his nerves. He saw his friend's mortal danger, and passed at once from fear to blindish rage. He slipped down his tree in a moment, caught up the cross-bow, which he had dropped in the road, and running furiously up, sent a bolt into the bear's body with a loud shout. The bear gave a snarl of rage and pain, and turned its head irresolutely.

"Keep aloof!" cried Denys, "or you are a dead man!"

"I care not," and in a moment he had another bolt ready and shot it fiercely into the bear, screaming, "Take that! Take that!"

Denys poured a volley of oaths down at him. "Get away, idiot!"

He was right. The bear finding so formidable and noisy a foe behind him, slipped growling down the tree, rending deep furrows in it as she slipped. Gerard ran back to his tree and climbed it swiftly. But while his legs were dangling some eight feet from the ground, the bear came rearing and struck with her fore paw, and out flew a piece of bloody cloth from Gerard's hose. He climbed, and climbed, and presently he heard as it were in the air a voice say, "Go out on the hough!" He looked, and there was a long massive branch before him shooting upwards at a slight angle. He threw his body across it, and by a series of convulsive efforts worked up it to the end.

Then he looked round panting.

The bear was mounting the tree on the other side. He heard his claws scrape, and saw her bulge on both sides of the massive tree. Her eye not being very quick, she reached the fork and passed it, mounting the main stem. Gerald drew breath more freely. The bear either heard him, or found by scent she was wrong. She paused, presently she caught sight of him. She eyed him steadily, then quietly descended to the fork. Slowly, cautiously she stretched out a paw and tried the bough. It was a stiff oak branch, sound as iron. Instinct taught the creature this. It crawled carefully out on the bough, growing savagely as it came.

Gerald looked wildly down. He was forty feet from the ground. Death below. Death moving slow but sure on him in a still more horrible form. His hair bristled. The sweat poured from him. He sat helpless, hunched, tongue tied.

As the fearful monster crawled growing towards him, incongruous thoughts coursed through his mind. Margaret: the Vulcan, where it speaks of the rage of a she-bear robbed of her whelps—Rome—Eternity.

The bear crawled on. And now the stupor of death fell on the doomed man, he saw the open jaws and blood-hot eyes coming, but in a mist.

As in a mist he heard a twang, he glanced down, Denys, white and silent as death, was shooting up at the bear. The bear snarled at the twang, but crawled on. Again the cross-bow twanged, and the bear snarled, and came nearer. Again the cross-bow twanged, and the next moment the bear was close upon Gerald, where he sat with hair standing stiff on end and eyes staring from their sockets, pale and dead. The bear opened her jaws like a grute, and hot blood spouted from them upon Gerald as from a pump. The bough rocked. The wounded monster was reeling, it clung, it struck its sickles of claws deep into the wood, it toppled, its claws held firm, but its body rolled off and the sudden shock to the bough shook Gerald forward on his stomach with his face upon one of the bear's straining paws. At this, by a convulsive effort, she raised her head up, up, till he felt her hot fetid breath. Then huge teeth snapped together loudly close below him in the air with a lusty effort of baffled hate. The ponderous carcass rent the claws out of the bough then pounded the earth with a tremendous thump. There was a shout of triumph below, and the very next instant a cry of dismay for Gerald had swooned, and without an attempt to save himself, rolled headlong from the perilous height.

Denys caught at Gerald, and somewhat choked his fall, but it may be doubted whether this alone would have saved him from breaking his neck, or a limb. His best friend now was the dying bear, on whose hairy carcass his head and shoulders descended. Denys tore him off her. It was needless. She panted still, and her limbs quivered, but a hare was not so harmless; and soon she breathed her last.

THE FIGHT WITH THE PIRATES

Dodd cast his eyes all round the horizon for help.

The sea was blank.

The bright sun was hidden now, drops of rain fell, and the wind was beginning to sing, and the sea to rise a little.

"Gentlemen," said he, "let us kneel down and pray for wisdom, in this sore strait."

He and his officers knelt on the quarter-deck. When they rose, Dodd stood napt about a minute, his great thoughtful eye saw no more of the enemy, the sea, nor anything external, it was turned inward. His officers looked at him in silence.

"Sharpe," said he at last, "there must be a way out of them both with such a breeze as this is now, if we could but see it."

"Ay, ay," groaned Sharpe.

¹ The Cloister and the Hearth

Dodd mused again.

"About ship!" said he softly, like an absent man.

"Ay, ay, sir!"

"Steer due north!" said he, still like one whose mind was elsewhere.

While the ship was coming about, he gave minute orders to the mates and the gunner, to ensure co-operation in the delicate and dangerous manoeuvres that were sure to be at hand.

The wind was WNW. He was standing north, one pirate lay on his lee bow, stopping a look between wind and water, and hacking the deck clear of his broken mast and yards. The other fresh, and thirsting for the easy prey, came up to weather on him and hang on his quarter, pirate fashion.

When they were distant about a cable's length, the fresh pirate, to meet the ship's change of tactics, changed his own, luffed up, and gave the ship a broadside, well aimed but not destructive, the guns being loaded with ball.

Dodd, instead of replying immediately, put his helm hard up and ran under the pirate's stern while he was jammed up in the wind, and with his five eighteen-pounders raked him fore and aft, then paying off, gave him three cannonades crammed with grape and canister, the rapid discharge of eight guns made the ship tremble, and enveloped her in thick smoke, loud shrieks and groans were heard from the schooner, the smoke cleared, the pirate's mainmast hung on deck, his jibboom was cut off like a carrot and the sail struggling, his foremast looked lacerated, lanes of dead and wounded lay still or writhing on his deck, and his lee scuppers ran blood into the sea. Dodd squared his yards and bore away.

The ship rushed down the wind, leaving the schooner staggered and all abroad. But not for long, the pirate wore and fired his bow-chasers at the now flying Aggra, split one of the cannonades in two, and killed a Las-car, and made a hole in the foremast, this done, he hoisted a mainmast again in a trice, sent his wounded below, flung his dead overlaid to the horror of their foes, and came after the flying ship, yawning and firing his bow-chasers. The ship was silent. She had no shot to throw away. Not only did she take these blows like a coward, but all signs of life disappeared on her, except two men at the wheel, and the captain on the main gangway.

Dodd had ordered the crew out of the rigging, armed them with cutlasses and laid them flat on the fore-castle. He also compelled Kenealy and Fullalove to come down out of harin's way, no wiser on the smooth-bore question than they went up.

The great patient ship ran unenvied by her foes, one destroyer right in her course, another in her wake, following her with yells of vengeance, and pounding away at her—but no reply.

Suddenly the yells of the pirates on both sides ceased, and there was a moment of dead silence on the sea.

Yet nothing fresh had happened.

Yes, this had happened. The pirates to windward, and the pirates to leeward, of the Aggra had found out, at once and the same moment, that the merchant captain they had landed, and hulled, and tortured was a patient but tremendous man. It was not only to rake the fresh schooner he had put his ship before the wind, but also by a double, daring master-stroke to hurl his monster ship bodily on the other. Without a foresail she could never get out of her way. The pirate crew had stopped the lark, and cut away and unshipped the broken foremast and were stepping a new one, when they saw the huge ship bearing down in full sail. Nothing easier than to slip out of her way could they get the foresail to draw, but the time was short, the deadly intention manifest, the coming destruction swift.

After that solemn silence came a storm of cries and curses, as their seamen went to work to fit the yard and raise the sail, while their fighting men seized their matchlocks, and trained the guns. They were well commanded by an heroic, able villain. Astern the consort thundered, but the Aggra's response was dead silence more awful than broadsides.

For then was seen with what majesty the enduring Anglo-Saxon fights

One of that indomitable race on the gangway, one at the foremast, two at the wheel, conued and steered the great ship down on a hundred matchlocks and a grinning broadside just as they would have conued and steered her into a British harbour

"Starboard!" said Dodd, in a deep calm voice, with a motion of his hand

"Starboard it is"

The pirate wriggled ahead a little The man forward made a silent signal to Dodd.

"Port!" said Dodd quietly.

"Port it is"

But at this critical moment the pirate astern sent a mischievous shot and knocked one of the men to atoms at the helm.

Dodd waved his hand without a word, and another man rose from the deck, and took his place in silence, and laid his unshaking hand on the wheel stained with that man's warm blood whose place he took

The high ship was scarce sixty yards distant, she seemed to know she reared her lofty figure-head with great awful shoots into the air.

But now the panting pirates got their new foresail hoisted with a joyful shout, it drew, the schooner gathered way, and their furious consort close on the Agra's heels just then scoured her deck with grape.

"Port!" said Dodd calmly

"Port it is"

The giant prow darted at the escaping pirate. That act of coming canvas took the wind out of the swift schooner's foresail, it flapped oh, then she was doomed! That awful moment parted the races on board her, the Papuans and Sooloos, their black faces livid and blue with horror, leaped yelling into the sea, or crouched and whimpered, the yellow Malays and brown Portuguese, though blanched to one colour now, turned on death like dying panthers, fired two cannon slap into the ship's bows, and snapping their muskets and matchlocks at their solitary executioner on the ship's gangway, and out flew their knives like crushed wasps' stings. CRASH! the Indianman's outwater in thick smoke beat in the schooner's broadside down went her masts to leeward like fishing rods whipping the water, there was a horrible shrieking yell, wild forms leaped off on the Agra, and were hacked to pieces almost ere they reached the deck—a surge, a chasm in the sea, filled with an instant rush of engulfing waves a long, awful, grating, grinding noise, never to be forgotten in this world, all along under the ship's keel—and the fearful, majestic monster passed on over the blank she had made, with a pale crew standing silent and awe-struck on the deck, a cluster of wild heads and staring eyeballs bobbing like corks in her foaming wake, sole rebo of the blotted-out destroyer, and a wounded man staggering on the gangway, with hands uplifted and staring eyes.

Shot in two places, the head and the breast!

With a loud cry of pity and dismay, Sharpe, Fullalove, Kenecay, and others rushed to catch him—but, ere they got near, the captain of the triumphant ship fell down on his hands and knees, his head sunk over the gangway and his blood ran fast and patterned in the midst of them, on the deck he had defended so bravely!

Towards the close of the Victorian era, WALTER BESANT (1836–1901), an industrious man of letters, with a pleasant infusion of romantic imagination, dealt largely with contemporary life and manners, sometimes in collaboration with his friend, JAMES RICE, at other times, as in All Sorts and Conditions of Men, single-handed. The latter book dealt with life in East London, describing it with a humanitarian vigour and shrewd insight not without its influence on the goodly company of "East End" story-tellers that sprang up in the nineties. And the "People's Palace" in Whitechapel is a memorial of the profound influence that Besant exerted. During the last few years of his life Besant worked hard at a series of books dealing with London life throughout the ages, and excelled particularly in illuminating its social aspects. In his bigger studies of London he was helped by others, though the guiding spirit was his—but his admirable little volumes on Westminster and London run up to show the skill with which he could vitabuse the life of a bygone age.

At the close of the eighties the humanitarian note in our fiction becomes much less pronounced. The astingent realism that has proved one of the forces of the succeeding era gave a less propagandist, less sentimental flavour to the novel of social life and manners. Now and again, as in Mr. RICHARD WHITEING's No 5, John Street, humanitarian zeal lights up the record of "mean streets" and sordid living, but with the spread of Socialism a more dispassionate and scientific treatment of social problems succeeded the emotional appeal. But the humanitarian note had served its purpose, had shaken the complacency of the apathetic middle class, and had proved a powerful ally to supplement the work of such reformers as Wilberforce, Ashley, Oastler, Robert Owen. Their work to-day has been taken up by such playwrights as Bernard Shaw and John Galsworthy.

II. PROSE. (a) FICTION. THACKERAY AND THE NOVEL OF SATIRE Thackeray—Disraeli—Trollope—Butler

WILLIAM MAKEPEACE THACKERAY
(1811–1863)

HIS LIFE

WILLIAM MAKEPEACE THACKERAY came of a good old Yorkshire family, and was born in Calcutta, July 18, 1811, where his father, who held an important post under the East India Company, died in 1816. In 1817 the boy was sent to England in company with a young cousin, and well remembered being taken by a black servant to see the exiled

Napoleon at St. Helena, and being told that "he eats three sheep every day, and all the little children he can lay hands upon."

At no time inclined for study, he was sent first to school at Chiswick, then to Charterhouse in 1822 under Dr. Russell, who denounced him as "an idle, shuffling, profligate boy." A fellow-pupil named Liddell, afterwards Dean of Christchurch, Oxford, said, "He never attempted to learn. . . . We spent our time mostly in drawing. I remember one—Macbeth as a butcher brandishing two blood-reeking knives, and Lady Macbeth as a butcher's wife clapping him on the shoulder to encourage him." As most schoolboys, he had a liking for the "tuck shop," and on one occasion consumed half a crown's worth, "including ginger beer," a fight with his friend Venables ended in a broken nose, a noticeable feature in all his portraits.

After leaving Charterhouse he went down to Devonshire, here he made his first contribution to literature, a parody of Moore's Minstrel Boy, printed in a local newspaper, three humorous drawings in water-colour for a copy of The Birds of Aristophanes are also known to exist.

In 1829 he went up to Trinity College, Cambridge, became the moving spirit of a brilliant set that included Alfred Tennyson, Monckton Milnes, and Edward FitzGerald, he also won the Chancellor's prize for his poem Tinbuctoo, that afterwards appeared in the University journal—The Snob. Thackeray has said that he was "hooked into indolence" when a child, as a lad "abused into sulkiness," and later "bullied into despair," but nothing seems to have been an incentive to study; the itch of travel was felt in the blood, and he left the university in 1830 without a degree.

On coming of age he inherited about £20,000; of this he soon lost some in gambling, a little through the failure of a bank, then purchased a newspaper, the National Standard, that floated less than five months, and still further lessened his income; then with his stepfather, Major Carmichael Smyth, he focused his energies on a Radical newspaper named The Constitutional. In this Thackeray showed much promise as a journalist, but it required more than this to make it a success. It gradually collapsed, and with it the remainder of Thackeray's fortune.

While acting as Paris correspondent for The Constitutional he added to his responsibilities in 1836 by his marriage with Miss Isabella Shawe, daughter of Colonel Shawe of Cork. On leaving Cambridge he had travelled on the Continent in a dilottante fashion, studying French and German and frequenting the art schools of Paris. Now that he is thrown upon his own resources for a living his ambition is to become an artist. Many ventures were made without success, at last, on Dickens refusing his offer to illustrate Pickwick, Thackeray made a bid for literature. In this he was more fortunate. In 1837 he became a member of the staff and a regular contributor to Fraser's Magazine, for which he wrote The Letters of Mr C. J. Yellowplush (1837-8), Catherine (1839-40), The Great Hoggarty Diamond (1841) and the celebrated Memoirs of Barry Lyndon (1844). In 1842 he made a tour in Ireland and met with Charles Lever; the following year one of the most humorous of his works, The Irish Sketch-Book, was published.

In 1840 he was in sore trouble; the health of his young wife gave way—despite all his love and care, culminating in complete mental breakdown; and in 1844 he was left alone to lavish all his affection on their two little girls. Mrs Thackeray died in 1892.

On joining the staff of Punch, Thackeray made a wide appeal to the general public with The Book of Snobs (1846), but it was not till Vanity Fair appeared (1847-8) in monthly parts that he received full recognition, even the sale of this was so small at first that the publishers thought of suppressing it. However, with the sixth number and the account of Mrs Perkins's Ball, the sale increased enormously, and Vanity Fair became the talk of London.

Thackeray was never averse to talking about his books, and there is a little story of Vanity Fair in Dean Liddell's Life. Mrs Liddell said to him one day, "Oh, Mr Thackeray, you must let Dobbin marry Amelia!" "Well," he replied, "he shall, and when he has got her he will not find her worth having."

With all Thackeray's satirical condemnation of the life of Belgravia there was no more welcome figure in their midst; every house was open to him, and he thoroughly enjoyed their flattery and attention. "There are people who would give their ears, or half their incomes, to go to these fine places," he was heard to say. Yet he was equally happy and loyal to his friends in Bohemia.

After Vanity Fair came Pendennis (1848-50). In 1851 he broke new ground and gave the first of a course of lectures on The English Humourists of the Eighteenth Century.

"The audience," Charlotte Brontë tells us, "was said to be the cream of London society, and it looked so. . . . I could not always coincide with the sentiments expressed, or the opinions broached, but I admired the gentlemanlike ease, the quiet humour, the taste, the talent, and the originality of the lecturer."

After the London lectures he crossed to America, where he became very popular.

"Nobody is quiet here," he wrote, "nor am I. The rush and restlessness please me, and I like, for a little, the dash of the stream. I am not received like a god, which I like too. There is one paper which goes on every morning saying I am a snob, and I don't say no. Six people were reading it at breakfast this morning, and the man opposite me this morning popped it under the table-cloth. But the other papers roar with approbation."

In 1853 he published The Newcomes, Edmond (1855), with its sequel The Virginians (1857-9); and in 1860 started the Cornhill Magazine with Lovel the Widower, The Adventures of Philip, and the charming Roundabout Papers.

For some years Thackeray had been suffering from heart trouble, but he worked on steadily; he had just started on his new novel, Diana, when he died suddenly in December 1863.

Like many big men—Thackeray stood six feet four inches—he had the most gentle and lovable manner, and was the idol of his children and all young people.

"Few persons," says a contemporary, "would imagine his sterling qualities of solid mirth and faithfulness in friendship. With strangers reserved and uncommunicative, to those who knew him he is open-hearted, kindly disposed, and generous. To great sensibility and an innate love of all that is good and noble, he united sentiments of profound hate and contempt for falsehood, meanness, worldliness, and hypocrisy."

HIS WORK

Thackeray first found himself as a writer in The Book of Snobs. The weakness and the strength of his long-sustained satire against the social foibles of his time are revealed in that book. Other writers had dealt with it before Thackeray, but more to mock quietly than to rail bitterly as did he. The strength of his attack is better seen in the ampler illustrative material of Vanity Fair than in the thumbnail sketches here; for he is neither clear nor convincing in The Book of Snobs. That snobbery is contemptible all decent men and women are agreed, and most people are conscious of a snob when they meet one. It is a more delicate matter, though no less essential for a satirist, to clearly define in advance how the genus may be detected and what are its distinctive marks. Thackeray's own definition is somewhat inept: "He who meanly admires mean things is a snob"—for the snob is not to be caught and ticketed in this way.

It is surely not the mean admiration of mean things, but the mean admiration of anything, whatever be its worth or unworthiness, that is the essence of snobbery. Snobbery lies in its mental attitude, and has nothing necessarily to do with the object of the attitude. I am not a snob merely because I prefer a Duke to a dustman. I may prefer his company because I esteem culture, refinement, and breeding before ignorance, vulgarity, and coarseness. I am only a snob if I give my preference on the ground of his social position irrespective of his mental and moral qualities. "Hearts just as rich and rare may dwell in Belgrave Square as in the lowly air of Seven Dials." Thackeray himself was no snob; yet he frankly preferred the ways of "polite society" to the rough and roady ways of the Bohemian. He had a marked preference, as Mrs. Lynn Lynton once observed, for "good living, good manners, pretty women, and refined talk." You may call this a form of "social sensuality" if you like; but it is certainly not snobbery. Thackeray, however, was not in the least bound by the restrictions of his own definition; and applied the term snob indiscriminately to every variety of behaviour. To spend more money than you can afford, as Lady B—— does, may be a form of snobbery—though every spendthrift is not a snob—since this lady is truckling to mere position. But we may reasonably decline to place poor Sir Walter Raleigh on the black-list because of that little affair with the cloak on the muddy road-way.

It is quite arguable, of course, that there is a touch of snobbery in most of us, just as there is a touch of Sir Willoughby Patterne in most men; but Thackeray is not concerned with the general failings of human nature so much as the specific failings of certain people.

As a matter of fact snobbery became a literary obsession with Thackeray, and he read it into everything and into almost everyone.

This bluntness of perception mars the effect of a good deal of his satire. It is a pity, for Thackeray can be subtle enough in exposing our middle-class failings, as his powerful picture of the Crawleys, the Sedleys, and the Osbornes can testify.

Yet we do not see the best part of Thackeray in his mordant presentments of respectable mediocrities and pretentious fools. It was well done—but was it worth the doing on this scale? His finest art is shown in his pictures of rogues, male and female. There is promise, if little more than promise, in that genial rogue, Barry Lyndon; brilliant performance in Becky Sharp and Rawdon Crawley. Just as Dickens can make his mentally weak characters likeable, so can Thackeray attract us to his moral weaklings. Becky, despite her early Victorian dress, is a vital and triumphant creation; and Rawdon deserves to be bracketed with her.

Granted a spice of devilry, a dash of the vagabond element, and Thackeray as an artist moves with ease and cunning. Beatrice is not a scamp, but neither is she a model of all the virtues as is Amelia. Yet how much more alive?

Great praise has been accorded to the picture of Colonel Newcome, but for freshness, force, and truthness to life, commend me to the happy-go-lucky Pen and the peccant Costigan.

Thackeray's insight into the psychology of the plausible scoundrel and into thoughtless, hot-blooded youth, is seen not only in his novels but in his critical estimates. Read his English Humourists, and you will realise how admirably he seizes on the essential greatness of Fielding, and of Steele, not oblivious to their failings as men but valuing their defects in their proper relations. But face him with the pathological vagaries of a Swift or Sterne, and his detestation of the men blinds him in the most amazing way to their unquestionable genius.

Thackeray's inadequate treatment of Swift is the more curious inasmuch as these two have much in common. Each was continually harping on the insincerities and shams of life, each favoured irony as a method of presentment, in both there is a certain bitterness of spirit and disgust with contemporary life. Swift, of course, is infinitely more savage, more one-sided, more cynical, but Swift's nature cannot be estimated without taking his physical infirmities into account. Perhaps Thackeray's violence towards him is due to some instinctive appreciation of the bond between them and because he saw in Swift an exaggerated edition of himself.

Thackeray was no cynic, though he has often been termed one; and herein lies the fundamental difference between him and Swift. His bitterness, indeed, is often merely a cloak to hide his sensitiveness. His own life was clouded by tragedy, and he is intensely susceptible to the sinister elements in other human lives. It is the old story of the Princess and the Pea over again. But like many proud, sensitive natures he is terrified of taking the world into his confidence; of showing his inherent sentimentality (which will out in spite of him), and for fear he should be laughed at by the worldlings he savagely fastens upon the infirmities of human nature, whereas all the while he has a profound belief in the essential goodness of things;

thus he mocks and jests and taunts as poor Punchinello did, to hide his own aching sympathies.

How acutely he felt with suffering may be judged from the following passage :

"Between me and those fellow-creatures of mine who are sitting in the room below, how strange and wonderful is the partition ! We meet at every hour of daylight, and are indebted to each other for a hundred offices of duty and comfort of life, and we live together for years and don't know each other. John's voice to me is quite different to John's voice when he addresses his mates below. If I met Hannah in the street with her bonnet on, I doubt whether I should know her. And all these good people, with whom I may live for years and years, have cares, interests, dear friends and relatives, mayhap schemes, passions, longing hopes, tragedies of their own, from which a carpet and a few planks and beams utterly separate me. When we were at the seaside, and poor Helen used to look so pale, and run after the postman's bell, and seize a letter in a great scrawling hand, and read it, and cry in a corner, how should we know that the poor little thing's heart was breaking ? She fetched the water, and she smoothed the ribbons, and she laid out the dresses, and brought the early cup of tea in the morning, just as if she had no cares to keep her awake."

Dickens' pathos is genuine enough, but suffers too often from over-emphasis. Thackeray's greater artistic reticence keeps him from melodramatics :

"No more firing was heard at Brussels, the pursuit rolled miles away. Darkness came down on the field and city, and Amelia was praying for George, who was lying on his face dead, with a bullet through his heart."

What could be simpler or more briefly stated ? Yet in its very brevity and simplicity lies its power.

Equally compelling in its unforced pathos is the following :

"We were to leave our lodgings on Monday morning, but on Saturday evening the child was seized with convulsions, and all Sunday the mother watched and prayed for it, but it pleased God to take the innocent infant from us, and on Sunday at midnight, it lay a corpse on its mother's bosom. Amen ! We have other children happy and well, now round about us, and from the father's heart the memory of this little thing has almost faded, but I do believe that every day of her life the mother thinks of her first-born that was with her for so short a while, . . . and she wears still at her neck a little, little lock of golden hair, which she took from the head of the infant as he lay smiling in his coffin. It has happened to me to forget the child's birthday, but to her never !"

It is to be regretted that Thackeray did not deal more often with the pitiful side of things, and stand more aloof from the silliness and pretence he saw around him. Not that this did not need exposing, but it was not worth so much time as he spent over it. No one could depict adventurers, cheats, sycophants, and fools better than he : but the world is not made up of these, and no one knew that better than Thackeray. If only he had been less concerned to hide his feelings and had taken more pains to give freer expression to his real genius !

Thackeray satirised social conventions, Dickens national weaknesses. Pretence and snobbery felt the lash of the one hypocrisy and cruelty the rage of the other. Dickens uses a big brush and lays on the colours thickly ; subtle effects are more in Thackeray's line. Dickens paints in oils, Thackeray in water colours. Each has a big canvas, but Dickens excelled in vivid, massive effects, Thackeray in delicate touches and in clear draughtsmanship. What could be better done or more delicately effective than this passage about Bohemia, over which

"there hangs an endless fog occasioned by much tobacco ; a land of billiard rooms, supper rooms, oysters and land of song, a land where soda water flows freely in the morning, a land where men call each other by their Christian names, where most are poor, where almost all are young, and where, if a few old stars enter, it is because they have preserved more tenderly and carefully than others their youthful spirits and the delightful capacity to be idle."

In his pictures of Bohemian life in early Victorian London, Thackeray is wonderfully happy. He knows his Costigans and Fanny Boltons and Harry Fokers, as well as Dickens knew his Codlins and Shortes, his little Marchioness, and his Jungles. His amiable young women are neither better nor worse than Dickens'. Neither novelist excelled in drawing heroines ; but his young men are more convincing, and his old ladies equally effective though less irrepressibly humorous.

As a stylist Thackeray is, at once, both superior and inferior to Dickens. His riper culture, his greater fastidiousness keeps him from the glaring crudities that mar Dickens' writings ; and his eloquence, when he lets himself go, has a tragic beauty that did not lie in Dickens' homelier art to compass. At the same time the intimate loneliness, the contagious zest of Dickens' style, carries with it a wider, a more universal appeal.

Thackeray's style appeals to our critical intelligence, Dickens' to our heart and imagination. Indeed the critic in Thackeray is insistent everywhere. He is always ready to intrude on the story : he is behind every character, and takes no pains, as some novelists do, to keep up the illusion of reality. A few strong prejudices apart, he is a sound, broad-minded critic, there is admirable stuff in The English Humourists and in The Four Georges ; while no one but a genuine critic could have written Edmond, with its intimate knowledge and appraisal of eighteenth-century ways and manners.

From the artistic point of view he never equalled, much less excelled, this picture of Queen Anne's time. There are passages in Pendennis and Vanity Fair, fewer passages in The Newcomes and The Virginians and Dennis Duval, that are as satisfying in conception and execution. But nowhere does he achieve the same easy level of excellence as in Edmond. It is a great historical novel, not in the sense that The Clower and The Hearth is great, but in the sense that Old Mortality is great. Roade gave us a brilliant tour de force, Thackeray a perfectly natural expression of two-thirds of his temperament as well as of his own scholarly knowledge. Mere scholarship, however erudite, will never inspire a great historical novel unless there be some idiosyncratic affinity that gives a man psychological insight into the life of the time.

Edmond is no dexterous piece of Waudour Street craftsmanship ; indeed, Thackeray is not over-scrupulous to reproduce the phraseology of the age, he has done something far better than that, he has reproduced the inmost spirit of the era of Queen Anne. If in his reproduction of actual historical figures he is less satisfying, we must remember that even Scott is not at his best there, and the personal predilection of the reader comes into play as soon as men like Addison and Steele are brought upon the scene. None the less Addison and Steele, Steele especially, are admirably drawn, while Swift at any rate is not unskillfully depicted—once grant Thackeray's hostile point of view.

The greatness of the book, however, lies in its private history, and in such perfect pieces of characterisation as the capricious but lovable Lady Castlewood, Beatrix, "whose eyes are fire, whose look is love," the shifless yet attractive Lord Castlewood, and Esmond himself.

Esmond is Thackeray's greatest book. His other books are great in parts, but lack homogeneity and perspective. They have been abused for their excessive discursiveness: but discursiveness is no fatal bar to a great book, though it may be to a great novel. Tristram Shandy is hopeless as a novel, but it is one of the great books of literature. And it would be impossible to deny the attribute of greatness to Vanity Fair, to Pendennis, and to The Newcomes. Sterne's discursiveness is woven in one pattern, Thackeray's is not. The preaching harmonises ill with the comedy, and obtrudes detrimentally on the illusion of reality created by the characters. This is a real pity, for the characterisation is often admirable, occasionally super-excellent. It is less obtrusive in Vanity Fair and Pendennis, it is more obtrusive in The Newcomes. Consequently these later books afford us less satisfaction than the earlier ones, though in sheer power of characterisation The Newcomes and The Virginians contain some of Thackeray's best work. It is the greater regret, therefore, that the tedious moralising and wearisome rhapsody should distract our attention from such finely drawn figures as Ethel and Barnes Newcome, Lady Kew and the Baroness de Bernstein, or such delightful caricatures as Charles Honeyman, "F. B.," and Sampson.

Thackeray's moralising is the most welcome when he faces us frankly as the discursive essayist. Thus he does in the Roundabout Papers, which are happily blended with genial humour and pleasant whimsicality. Here he is not too serious or too improving. When he is very serious he is unquestionably a bore, unlike George Eliot, who had a really consistent philosophy of life behind her monitory moods.

Looking at Thackeray's work from the point of view of its place in the development of English fiction, we are struck by the more emphatic realism of his stories as compared with that of his predecessors. His instinctive critical faculty revolted against the garish sentiment of Lytton and Ainsworth, the philanthropic romanticism of Dickens, the machine-made morality of G. P. R. James. The criminal, he protested, is not necessarily a picturesque hero—like your Eugene Aram and Jack Sheppard; the aristocrat is not necessarily a scoundrel nor the poor man an angel of light, our political and social institutions are not so inept and infamous as the reforming novelist would have them. Let us face the world we live in with clearer eyes and a more critical discernment. Scoundrels are often excellent company so long as we do not sentimentalise their villainy; but they come from every class in the community. They are peculiar neither to Belgravia nor to the New Cut.

In all this he did good and memorable work in restoring to English fiction a sober actuality and a fairer appraisement of class virtues and class failings than it had received since the time of Fielding. For this reason Thackeray excels as a painter of manners, as an artist of the conventions, as a draughtsman of civilised man with all his merits and limitations. And he did the same service for English fiction as Ben Jonson did for the English drama; and just as Jonson, loving Shakespeare, yet saw his deficiencies and his danger as a model to writers with less genius, so Thackeray realised the imperfections of Dickens and the danger attaching to young writers who should slavishly follow in his wake.

The analogy need not be pressed too close, but it has its instructive side, and is fraught with greater significance, perhaps, than many admirers of Thackeray would care to admit.

In one respect, certainly, Dickens resembled Shakespeare, and that is in the rich, resilient vitality of his creative work, and this it is which makes him triumph over many other writers superior to him in mental adornment and in artistic cunning, and thus it is, I think, which, despite the more fastidious craftsmanship of Thackeray, gives Dickens the more important position to-day. While writers have been wrangling over the respective merits of these great satirists, and while the scholarly critics have relegated Dickens to a decidedly inferior position, Time has calmly taken the matter out of their hands, and few things in literary history are more striking than the continuous and steady hold of Dickens upon the English people and the remarkable decline of Thackeray's influence of late years.

Some will attribute this fact to what they call the coarser strength of Dickens and the more fastidious culture of Thackeray. It is natural, they will say, that Dickens should appeal to the many, Thackeray to the few, adding that Thackeray none-the-less is the finer genius. The more fastidious culture of Thackeray may be conceded readily, but his greater genius is a far more debatable matter, and one may add a barren matter for discussion. Whether Thackeray at his best is better than Dickens at his best is a problem of no great value. It is like asking whether a nectarine is better than an apple. The excellence is a different excellence. Let it go at that. It is another matter, however, whether Thackeray was able to express his genius as easily and amply as his great contemporary. And herein lies the secret, I think, of Thackeray's decline. He was at his best a great artist, a great stylist, and an admirable painter of manners, but his genius did not lie in the way of social regeneration, his irony is not best exhibited in his didactic moods.

In other words, whereas Dickens on the whole knew his limitations and kept within them, Thackeray too often neglected those qualities of ironic portraiture in which he excelled, for sermonisings that did really scant justice to his wide human sympathies. "A beautiful vein of genius lay struggling about in him," as Carlyle so admirably said. Unhappily, we see too much of the struggle in what he has given us.

LADY CASTLEWOOD AND HER YOUNG WORSHIPPER

My Lady had on her side three idols—first and foremost, Jove the supreme ruler, was her lord, Harry's patron, the good Viscount of Castlewood. All wishes of his were laws with her. If he had a headache, she was ill. If he frowned, she trembled. If he joked, she smiled and was charmed. If he went a hunting, she was always at the window to see him ride away, her little son crowing on her arm, or on the watch till his return. She made dishes for his dinner, spiced his wine for him: made the toast for his tankard at breakfast, hushed the house when he slept in his chair, and watched for a look when he woke. If my Lord was not a little proud of his beauty, my Lady adored it. She clung to his arm as he paced the terrace, her two fair little hands clasped round his great one, her eyes were never tired of looking in his face and wondering at its perfection. Her little son was his son, and had his father's look and curly brown hair. Her daughter Beatrice was his daughter, and had his eyes—were there ever such beautiful eyes in the world? All the house was arranged so as to bring him ease and give him pleasure. She liked the small gentry round about to come and pay him court, never caring for admiration for herself, those who wanted to be well with the lady must admire him. Not regarding her dress, she would wear a gown to rags, because he had once liked it, and if he had brought her a brooch or a ribbon, would prefer it to the most costly article of her wardrobe.

My Lord went to London every year for six weeks, and the family being too poor to appear at Court with any figure, he went alone. It was not until he was out of sight that her face showed any sorrow and what a joy when he came back! What preparation before his return! The fond creature had his arm chair at the chimney-side—delighting to put the children in it, and to look at them there. Nobody took his place at the table, but his silver tankard stood there as when my Lord was present.

A pretty sight it was to see, during my Lord's absence, or on those many mornings when sleep or headache kept him a-bed, this fair young lady of Castlewood, her little daughter at her knee, and her domestics gathered round her, reading the Morning Prayer of the English Church. Esmond long remembered how she looked and spoke, kneeling reverently before the sacred book, the sun shining upon her golden hair until it made a halo round about her. A dozen of the servants of the house knelt in a line opposite their mistress. For a while Harry Esmond kept apart from these mysteries, but Doctor Tusher showing him that the prayers read were those of the Church of all ages and the boy's own inclination prompting him to be always as near as he might to his mistress, and to think all things she did right, from listening to the prayers in the ante-chamber, he came presently to kneel down with the rest of the household in the parlour, and before a couple of years my lady had made a thorough convert. Indeed the boy loved his catechism so much that he would have subscribed to anything she bade him, and was never tired of listening to her fond discourse and simple comments upon the book, which she read to him in a voice of which it was difficult to resist the sweet persuasion and tender appealing kindness. This friendly controversy, and the intimacy which it occasioned, bound the lad more fondly than ever to his mistress. The happiest period of his life was thus, and the young mother, with her daughter and son, and the orphan lad whom she protected, read and worked and played, and wore children together. If the lady looked forward—as what fond woman does not?—towards the future, she had no plans from which Harry Esmond was left out, and a thousand and a thousand times, in his passionate and impetuous way, he vowed that no power should separate him from his mistress, and only asked for some chance to happen by which he might show his fidelity to her. Now, at the close of his life, as he sits and recalls in tranquillity the happy and busy scenes of it, he can think, not ungratefully, that he has been grateful to that early vow.¹

THE BATTLE OF WATERLOO

All our friends took their share and fought like men in the great field. All day long, whilst the women were praying ten miles away, the lines of the dauntless English infantry were receiving and repelling the furious charges of the French horsemen. Guns which were heard at Brussels were ploughing up their ranks, and comrades falling, and the resolute survivors closing in. Towards evening, the attack of the French, repeated and resisted so bravely, slackened in its fury. They had other foes besides the British to engage, or were preparing for a final onset. It came at last—the columns of the Imperial Guard marched up the hill of Saint Jean, at length and at once to sweep the English from the height which they had maintained all day, and spite of all unscared by the thunder of the artillery, which hurled death from the English line, the dark rolling column pressed on and up the hill. It seemed almost to create the omniscience, when it began to wave and falter. Then it stopped, still facing the shot. Then at last the English troops rushed from the post from which no enemy had been able to dislodge them, and the Guard turned and fled.²

BENJAMIN DISRAELI (1804–1881), one of the brilliant and forceful personalities of mid-Victorian times, has in his novels—Vivian Grey, Coningsby, Tancred, and Sybil—pictured somewhat flamboyantly, yet with a good deal of humorous insight, the social and political life of the age. There are some neat satirical pictures in his novels, and he was a powerful upholder of the new Tory Democracy. Sybil (1845) dealt with labour conditions subsequent to the first Chartist riots. Though his point of view is that of the satirist, the painter of manners rather than that of the humanitarian story-teller, he yet did no little to prepare the way for such reformers in fiction as Mrs Gaskell and Charles Kingsley.

As a novelist, ANTHONY TROLLOPE (1815–1882) has every qualification save that of genius. His inventive powers, if not brilliant, were certainly striking, he had humour, a sense of tragedy, a nice instinct for characterisation. His literary style is pleasant and attractive, and his craftsmanship invariably sound and conscientious. An output of thirty novels testifies to his productive fertility, and when we recollect that the majority of these were clever and interesting and a few of remarkable merit, it must be admitted that Trollope was a decided force in Victorian fiction.

First and foremost he was a good painter of character. His scope here is not especially diversified, but within certain prescribed limits he was extremely effective. Particularly did he excel in depicting illustrations of the genial worldling type.

² Vanity Fair.

This is best exemplified in his Cathedral stories, and his portraits of the provincial clergy and of the provincial folk that congregate in Cathedral towns have never been excelled. With keen observation and ready humour he differentiates these folk, and in unfolding the comedies of their lives rarely descends into caricature. As a painter of middle-class life he stands midway between Dickens and Thackeray, on the one hand, and George Eliot on the other. Lacking the astounding vitality of Dickens and the sensitive art of Thackeray, he never falls into that vein of fantastic exaggeration that so often accompanies writers of exuberant imagination. He saw less clearly, less sensitively the dominant traits of the men and women about him than they did, but on the other hand he saw round them more surely and more faithfully, and in his work we meet with the beginning of that scientific appraisement of character raised to so fine an art by George Eliot.

Unhappily, the faculty of faithful and judicial observation leads Trollope and his reader into very dull company at times, and we sigh for the idealising whimsicality of Dickens, who took care to make his fools such glorious company. How we should have yawned over Trollope's delineation of Mrs. Nickleby!

To return, however, to the more attractive side of Trollope's power. Not only is he good at character drawing, he is a capital story-teller. This does not mean that he was expert in his plots; in plot he is decidedly inferior to many of his contemporaries, and the dexterity of Wilkie Collins was always a source of good-natured envy to the author of Barchester Towers. But he has a clear, competent, pleasant style, with no irritating mannerisms such as disfigured his greater contemporary (Charles Reade), and could mingle incident and characterisation and description with sufficient skill to please the most experienced novel reader. He is not a great stylist, but he would have scorned producing the shoddy writing that goes to make up so many successes of the season in our own day.

Yet, while critical enough to avoid the mistakes into which his greater contemporaries fell, he had not sufficient integrating power, or, if we will, that touch of genius that would preserve his books for future generations. One character alone among a crowd of admirable but undistinguished creations is worthy to join the gallery of Immortals, and that is Mrs. Proudie, wife of the Bishop of Barchester. She deserves a place along with Aunt Clogg, Mrs. Poyser, Mrs. Ganp, and Becky Sharp.

A fine study of the female bully. A vulgar, overbearing, narrow-minded woman, yet sincere and not wholly so flint-hearted as she seems. Trollope took real joy in her company, and was loth to part with her, introducing her into more than one novel.

All things considered, Trollope is at his happiest in delineating those scenes and those characters that exhibit especially Saxon qualities. He knew his John Bull, appreciating his strong points—had he not much in common with the gentleman?—but fully alive to his weaknesses. No one can sketch for us more sympathetically than he the English middle-class matron, the jog-trot country doctor, the average Member of Parliament, the commonplace yet kind-hearted country clerk. His best characters thrive on roast beef and good beer.

In his methods of presentation he seems to us often a masculine edition of Jane Austen, a shade less delicate in his humour and several shades more vigorous in his mental outlook. Less sensitive to his limitations than she, he is inferior in his artistry, but his novels reflect with equal fidelity the provincial life of the mid-Victorian age as hers do the late Georgian. As a man, a thoroughly good fellow, "as downright as a box on the ear," as a writer, a vigorous, fair-minded, well-informed craftsman. He will not stir the imagination nor titillate the intellect, but he knew his business as a story teller and did it thoroughly. And that, after all, is no mean qualification.

SAMUEL BUTLER (1825-1902). Lacking the sense of artistic form possessed by men like Thackeray, and the diversity of gifts that accentuated the force of Meredith's satirical faculty, his books may be regarded rather as a storehouse of ironic comment and suggestion than works of art. But his influence on some of the ablest writers to-day, Bernard Shaw for instance, has been very profound. No one has more frankly admitted this than Mr. Shaw himself, and to some extent he has done for Butler what Huxley did for Spencer, popularised his methods of thought. For Butler was a distinctive original force, as all admit who have read his Erremon (1872), Erremon Revisited (1901), and The Way of all Flesh (1903).

A scholar, an acute thinker on the problems of modern life, his writings are not easy to construe, but their suggestive wisdom is likely to become far-reaching during the next decade or so. He will never be popular, for he could not throw his thought into clear dramatic form, and the multitude do not take kindly to elaborate irony. But as a satirical critic of modern life he must always be reckoned among the more potent influences of his generation.

II PROSE (a) FICTION. WOMEN NOVELISTS OF THE VICTORIAN ERA. Introduction—M. Russell Mitford—Mrs. Bray—Mrs. Clive—Mrs. Marsh—Mrs. Trollope—The Brontës—Mrs. Gaskell—George Eliot—Mrs. Henry Wood—Mrs. Craik—Charlotte Yonge—Mrs. Oliphant—Mrs. Lynn Lytton—M. E. Braddon—"Ouida"—Rhoda Broughton—Edna Lyall.

THE first chapter in the development of the women novelists practically began with Fanny Burney and ends with Jane Austen. Between Jane Austen and the Brontës there are no names of vital importance. There is charm in Miss Mitford's Our Village, and touches of Harriet Martineau's vigorous intellect in her novel Deerbrook, but neither here nor in the facile romances of Mrs. Bray or in Mrs. CLIVE's Paul Ferroll, is there any striking power. Yet the crowd of women writers is quite respectable.

in its size, and number many story-tellers who enjoyed a good popular vogue in their time, such as Mrs. GORE, Mrs. MARSH, and Mrs. TROLLOPE—all voluminous and facile writers. The case of Mrs. TROLLOPE (1780-1863) is interesting for having essayed fiction at the age of fifty to retrieve her husband's fortunes; she succeeded in restoring those fortunes, and continued with such cheerful rapidity to turn out her volumes like so many sand pies, that in about five-and-twenty years she had a hundred novels to her credit. Her first success was not a novel (though the American of the day would have decidedly classified it among pure fiction), and dealt with her experiences in America. It produced a good deal of sore feeling at the time across the Atlantic by the lack of taste and tact which she showed in this volume. Its success probably was largely owing to this fact.

THE BRONTES

On a chill February day in 1820 a dull procession of heavily-laden wagons made its way across the bleak wind-swept Yorkshire moors, through the little village of Haworth, depositing its burden at the vicarage, these wagons contained the household goods of the "new parson."

The Rev. Patrick Brontë was an Irishman, of peasant stock, with the strong, passionate nature of his countrymen, a morose, impatient, selfish man with ideas of his own on the training and education of children. He had been a schoolmaster in the north of Ireland until he was thirty, and, having saved a little money, proceeded to Cambridge where he took his degree in 1806, eventually we find him at Hartshead in Yorkshire as curate. Here he met and married, in 1812, Maria Branwell, a gentle, loving, delicate little Cornish-woman who invariably looked upon the bright side of every trouble, including her husband's peculiar temperament. "Ought I not to be thankful," she said, "that he never gave me an angry word?"

In 1816 Mr. Brontë, with his wife and two baby girls—Maria and Elizabeth—left Hartshead. He had accepted the charge of the parish of Thornton, near Bradford, and here were born Charlotte (1816), Patrick Branwell (1817), Emily Jane (1818), and Anne (1820). Shortly after the birth of Anne, in the year of the removal to Haworth, Mrs. Brontë died, and her sister came from Penzance to do her part in caring for these motherless children.

There was something untamable and barbaric in the nature of Mr. Brontë. He was fond of his children, but in following out his principles of education he exhorted them to the sternest self-repression from babyhood. Frail and delicate, and bereft of the society of other children, they grew up so unnaturally reserved and silent that "you would never have known there was a child in the house." Maria, at seven years old, would be quite content with a newspaper or periodical, and her father says he "could always converse with her on any topic with pleasure, as with a grown person." After less than a year at school, Maria and Elizabeth both died of consumption in 1825.

The story of the only son is a sad one. Patrick Branwell was the one spoilt member of the family, in whom all their hopes centred, and for whose pleasure, present comfort, and future welfare one and all willingly sacrificed themselves. But their devotion was ill-requited. Showing some talent as an artist, he was sent to London to pursue his studies, yet economise at home as they did, it was found impossible to continue providing him with the necessary funds for his expenses, and he returned to Haworth. After five months as a tutor we find him acting as clerk on the Leeds and Manchester Railway. The disordered state of his accounts necessitated an interview with the directors, and resulted in his dismissal. Again he resorts to teaching. In 1842 he became tutor in the family of a wealthy clergyman named Robinson, where Anne was also a governess. His conduct in this household was unutterably base, though his sisters, while disgusted, were but too ready to accept their brother's view of the matter. To Haworth he returns, to continue his dissolute course of living in spite of loving care and remonstrance, until his death in 1848.

"It is not permitted us to grieve for him who is gone," wrote Charlotte, "as others grieve for those they love. . . . There is such a bitterness of pity for his life and death, such a yearning for the emptiness of his whole existence as I cannot describe."

We now approach Charlotte, who, although Branwell's senior, has been left till now in order to follow her life more in conjunction with that of her sisters—Emily and Anne.

Born on 21st April 1816, when eight years old Charlotte, accompanied by Emily, was sent to Cowan Bridge school for the daughters of clergymen: a grim, insanitary dwelling wherein the children were half-starved. On the death of Maria and Elizabeth, Charlotte and Emily were recalled home, and pursued their studies as best they could under the direction of their aunt.

Even at this early age Charlotte had begun to write, and there still exist twenty-two volumes, in the minutest handwriting, of from sixty to one hundred pages each—the output of less than two years.

Charlotte's second experience of school life was at Roehead, between Leeds and Huddersfield, whither she went in January 1831. Here the principal, Miss Wooler, with her kind motherliness, and two fellow-pupils, Ellen Nussey and Mary Taylor (the "Caroline Helstone" and "Rose Yorke" of Shirley) became her lifelong friends. An omnivorous reader, in which she had been encouraged by her father, she knew her Shakespeare and modern poets well, and, like Dickens, was invaluable as a story-teller, her Irish accent and strong political bias being responsible for much good-natured banter from her schoolfellows.

In Mrs. Gaskell's biography Charlotte Brontë, at the age of fifteen, is described as "a quiet, thoughtful girl, very small in figure, with soft, thick brown hair and peculiar eyes of a reddish brown colour," while "now and then on some just occasion or vivid interest or wholesome indignation, a light would shine out, as if some spiritual lamp had been kindled which glowed behind their expressive orbs . . . the rest of her features were plain, large and ill-set; but, unless you began to catalogue them you were hardly aware of the fact, for the eyes and power of the countenance over-balanced every physical defect, the crooked mouth and the large nose were forgotten and the whole face arrested the attention and presently attracted all those whom she herself would have cared to attract."

In 1832 she left Roehead, but returned in 1835 as a teacher, in order that the money might be utilised for Branwell's art training. At this time she was accompanied by Emily, a tall, striking-looking girl of seventeen.

Reserved as was Charlotte, Emily was still more reserved. She seemed to have absorbed the silence of the gaunt, lonely moors in her aversion to society, and her passion for the moors in all seasons and in all weathers made her almost as one of themselves. "In the bleak solitude she found many and dear delights," wrote Charlotte, "and not the least and best loved was liberty. Liberty was the breath of Emily's nostrils, without it she perished." With the wonderful eyes of the Brontës she had the pallor of disease on her countenance. Homesick, she remained but three months at Roehead, then returned to Haworth, her place in the school being taken by Anne.

Teaching was very uncongenial to the restless Charlotte. she had neither the liking for the society of young people, nor aptitude for the work, and she became dispirited and despondent. Shortly after the school removed to Dewsbury Moor her health and spirits became affected by the change—"So home I went," she said, "and the change at once roused and soothed me."

Literature now attracted her, as it always had, and she sent some of her poetry to Southey, whose view of literature as a calling for women was certainly most discouraging and evoked her reply, "I trust I shall never more feel ambitious to see my name in print."

In 1837 the brother of her friend Ellen Nussey, a young clergyman, wished to marry her, but her strong emotional nature felt the imperative necessity of an "intense attachment which should make me willing to die for him"—this was denied her.

Teaching seemed to be the only means of a livelihood for these girls. They looked forward to keeping a school of their own; so to gain the necessary proficiency Charlotte and Emily entered the Hôger Pensionnat, Brussels. The elder girl was happy in her way, but the younger never settled down. They were studious, and became so proficient in French that at the end of their term, Madame Hôger suggested that they should remain and give English and music lessons in return for German. The illness and death of their aunt at Haworth recalled them home—Anne was already acting as a private governess—and their father's failing sight and Branwell's conduct necessitated that one should remain in the diminished family circle. Emily was chosen to do this, and we may be sure she acquiesced willingly, and Charlotte returned to Brussels alone, the kindly, intellectual interest of Professor Hôger at this period becoming a considerable influence in moulding her literary tastes and work.

At the end of her term in Belgium, an attempt to secure pupils at Haworth failed. "Everyone wishes us well, but there are no pupils to be had." One day Charlotte found a manuscript copy of some verses written by Emily, that "To my ear," said her sister, "had a peculiar music, wild, melancholy, and elevating." Then Anne shyly produced some of hers; which had a "sweet, sincere pathos of their own." Thereupon they agreed to arrange a small collection and if possible get them printed. The little volume appeared in 1845 as Poems by Currer, Ellis, and Acton Bell.

The following year the sisters' endeavours to find a publisher for their three prose volumes were rewarded in so far that Emily's Wuthering Heights and Anne's Agnes Grey were accepted by Mr. Newby "on terms somewhat impoverishing to the authors." Charlotte's volume, The Professor, journeyed from publisher to publisher without success. At length a gleam of hope came with its rejection by Messrs Smith, Elder & Co, who offered to consider favourably the new work which "Currer Bell" informed them he was writing. Jane Eyre was quickly finished, and on its reception took the publisher's readers by storm, was accepted, and issued in three volumes on October 16, 1847, its author receiving £500 for the manuscript. £500 has since been refused by the publishers for the original still in their possession.

Jane Eyre was an immediate success, yet Mr. Brontë was quite in ignorance of his daughter's fame. One day, armed with a copy of the book and a few reviews—not forgetting to include an adverse one—she carried them into his study—

"Papa, I've been writing a book."

"Have you, my dear?"

"Yes, and I want you to read it."

"I am afraid it will try my eyes too much."

"But it is not in manuscript, it is printed."

"My dear, you've never thought of the expense it will be! It will be almost sure to be a loss, for how can you get a book sold? No one knows you or your name."

"But, papa, I don't think it will be a loss. No more will you if you will just let me read a review or two, and tell you more about it."

This she did, and then left him to peruse her work.

The Tenant of Wildfell Hall, Anne's second novel, was published in June 1848, and was advertised by the publisher, Mr. Newby, as the work of the author of Jane Eyre. In consequence of this deception it became necessary for the girls to disclose their identity. Emily's health was rapidly failing, so "Anne and I," writes Charlotte, "packed up a small box, sent it down to Keighley, set ourselves out after tea, walked through a snowstorm to the station, got to Leeds, and whirled up by night train to London, with the view of proving our separate identity to Smith and Elder, and confronting Newby with his lie."

Then came the pleasant interview with Mr. Smith, her publisher, and his astonishment at finding "Currer Bell"—not a man as everyone had supposed, but a shy, sensitive little woman, with meek brown eyes. Explanations ensued, and the sisters spent an enjoyable three days in London.

Wuthering Heights was just published when Emily was taken ill, and died of consumption in December 1849. Anne also drooped and sickened, and on May 28, 1849, died at Scarborough, almost with her last breath exhorting her sister to "Take courage, Charlotte, take courage."

After the publication of Shirley in 1849, Charlotte Brontë paid a visit to London and met several of her literary idols. Thackeray, to whom she dedicated the second edition of Jane Eyre, Harriet Martineau, to whose books she acknowledged "the pleasure and profit derived from them"; John Forster, and also "a party of my critics—seven of them, some of them had been very bitter faces in print, but they were prodigiously civil face to face." Many other notabilities she might have met but for her shyness, and all attempts to lionise her failed.

Villette followed in January 1853. Begun in 1851, before the close of the year she was seriously ill. On regaining health, work was resumed, but had again to be postponed on account of the illness of her father. After it was finished, in October 1852, she paid a round of visits, among them one to Harriet Martineau at Ambleside, another to Mrs. Gaskell at Manchester.

In 1853 Mr Brontë's curate, the Rev. A. B. Nicholls, the fourth to sue for Charlotte's hand in marriage, was refused by her father, so he resigned his curacy. The following year Mr Brontë relented, and the marriage took place at Haworth on June 29, 1854.

Happy in the love of her husband and the prospect of motherhood, Charlotte's joy was to be short-lived, and she died at Haworth on March 31, 1855, the last recorded words to her husband being, "We have been so happy."

THE WORK OF CHARLOTTE BRONTË

There are three characteristics that detach themselves from the writings of Charlotte Brontë—the note of intimacy, the note of passion, the note of revolt.

The Note of Intimacy

That confidential relationship which some writers establish between themselves and their readers is quite a modern note. The elder romances are necessarily impersonal and objective, crystallising as they do tales that have been floating about many countries, having their origin in oral tradition, and continually receiving fresh accretions from diverse sources.

Elizabethan literature is in its broad features essentially objective, it aims at describing life, not talking about it. We learn little about Lyly from Euphues, or about Sidney from the Arcadia, and this objectivity pursues us along the seventeenth and most of the eighteenth century. The great novelists of the time—Defoe, Richardson, Fielding, Sterne, Smollett, Goldsmith—are all of them men of strongly marked personalities and temperaments; but it is only indirectly in their writings that we catch a glimpse of these, they exhibit a certain aloofness from their audience; and the asides of Fielding are the asides of a sensible, broad-minded, matter-of-fact man of the world, that express aptly and clearly the common-sense, prudential morality of the time, but do not when carefully examined throw any intimate light upon Fielding the Man, as apart from Fielding the novelist of a certain type.

The same applies with stronger force to Defoe. In Sterne the attitude is more relaxed, certainly; Sterne makes a great parade of being confidential, but it is the pose of a consummate literary artist. There is little intimacy in Scott, while part of Jane Austen's charm lies, as we have seen, in her sense of gentile self-detachment from the subject-matter of her stories. We think mainly of the art of the story-teller in reading Pride and Prejudice; we think primarily of the personality of the story-teller, in reading Jane Eyre. Indeed she is really the first novelist to bring the note of intimacy, of self-revelation, to the forefront. Dickens is a friendly, easy, and a delightful companion in print; but not intimate. And Thackeray takes special pains to mask his real feelings at times behind a shade of cynicism.

Yet by an interesting paradox of temperament, Charlotte Brontë, reserved and almost inarticulate in ordinary intercourse, lets herself go with frank and eager abandonment directly she takes pen in hand.

It was this that so shocked and disturbed the critic in the Quarterly, it seemed a startling and outrageous thing,—this passionate whispering in the reader's ear. Outrageous it was not, startling it may well have appeared, and Charlotte Brontë was really only applying to fiction what had already been applied with such delightful results by men like Elia and Hazlitt to the Essay. They are our earliest idiosyncratic essayists. "Elia" tells us much more about Charles Lamb, than Charles ever told us about Lamb. Let it be remembered also that Lamb, for all his faculty for comradeship, had a ring of reserve that none broke through. To the modern reader many scenes in Jane Eyre, to a less extent in Villette, seem strained, hysterical, theatrical, but the reader has little discernment if unable to realise while reading, that this excitability is only a surface quality, largely determined by the writer's relief in being at least able to express herself and to unburden her soul. She is in reality neither theatrical nor hysterical, she has self-command, grit, and a stark sincerity that would put to shame the average sentimental writer of to-day. We need not be blind to her technical faults; they are obvious enough. Her experience of life was limited and sometimes she attempts to describe phases with which she was quite unacquainted. She had not, as Jane Austen had, a shrewd tact that made her confine herself to the matter which she knew at first hand. Yet we need not wonder that this ardent intimacy should sometimes lead her into unfamiliar surroundings; it is more to the purpose to wonder how it was that with so slight an experience of the main stream of human life, with so little objective material to work upon, she could achieve such vital result. But so it is: for this poor little woman was alive to her finger-tips, and she wrote her pages with her own life blood.

Some story-tellers write for material advantage; others for fame, she writes simply because it is a necessary condition of her existence. There is no trace of self-consciousness in her self-abandonment. She is far too serious to pose. The turbulent forces that ordinary intercourse and the conventions of life had driven inward, burst out with the greater unreserve so soon as the barrier was removed. She does not really live until she takes up pen and ink. Then she is a woman of genius. Till that moment she is merely the queer-tempered, painfully shy, old fashioned daughter of an obscure country parson.

Indeed the reader feels an almost intolerable sense of intrusion when he comes across so intimate a passage as this:

"Take the matter as you find it, ask no questions, utter no remonstrances, it is your best wisdom. You expected bread, and you have got a stone, break your teeth on it, and don't shriek because your nerves are martyred, do not doubt that your mental stomach—if you have such a thing—is strong as an ostrich's—the stone will digest. You held out your hand for an egg, and fate put into it a scorpion. Show no consternation; close your fingers firmly upon the gift, let it sting through the palm. Never mind in time, after your hand and arm have swelled and quivered long with torture, the squeezed scorpion will die, and you will have learned the great lesson how to endure without a sob. For the whole remnant of your life, if you survive the test,—some, it is said, die under it,—you will be stronger, wiser, less sensitive. Nature is an excellent friend in such cases, soothing the lips, interdicting utterance, commanding a placid dissimulation—a dissimulation often winning an easy and gay union at first, settling down to sorrow and paleness in time, then passing away, and leaving a convenient stoicism, not the less fortifying because it is half bitter."

The Note of Passion

Charlotte Brontë has written of lonely, repressed womanhood with a passion and intensity unsurpassed in English fiction, even among the outspoken fiction of our own day. Until she began to write, no woman had dared to write of life from the woman's point of view, as Fielding had done from the man's. The masculine convention, that whatever a woman may feel it is bad for her to express it; that while the man may do and dare the woman must wait meekly and patiently, had held good in our fiction. This convention Charlotte Brontë utterly broke down. She revealed woman as a human being. Not content, in the words of Mrs. Meynell's poignant verses, "to stand upon the threshold with a face of dumb desire," but proclaiming the rights of her sex to give expression to that desire, impatient with those who thought that woman should meekly await the "not impossible" but highly problematic he. How very real the tragedy of the unloved woman was, none felt more keenly than the large hearted creator of Aurora Leigh when she wrote of

"The unloved lips
And eyes undried, because there's none to ask
The reason they grew moist."

Yet there is no breath of lawlessness in her passion; to us to-day indeed, she seems quaintly puritanical in her outlook on life. We recall Mrs. Carlyle's satirical exclamation when she met George

Eliot: "What! she an improper female!" And if she is volcanic, a primmer volcano never existed than Charlotte Brontë.

And thus we have this curious result: while the agonies of a woman yearning for affection are exhibited—especially in Jane Eyre and Villette—with a poignant feeling, beside which the love troubles of Maggie Tulliver seem half-hearted and conventional; yet the solution of the emotional problem, which seems to her inevitable, strikes many of us as curiously timid and strait-laced, for all its honesty and sincerity.

But the primness of her heroine's conduct serves to increase the intensity with which she depicts the passion. Love was the breath of life to Charlotte Brontë, the be-all and end-all of human life, thus this preoccupation with love in her novels that bored Harriet Martineau and moved George Henry Lewes to mild remonstrance.

But remonstrance was vain with a child of the "stormy sisterhood." Harriet Martineau was framed on other lines, she could not realise the emotional receptivity of a highly wrought nature such as Charlotte Brontë's. And Lewes, when he wrote and advised her to study Jane Austen's novels, might have spared his ink. One might as well have advised Chopin to study Bach's fugues. She needed, of course, to practise the art of restraint and omission, but with that temperament of hers it was merely a matter of concentrating the flame in place of diffusing it.

We know now sufficient of her life story, to realise how frustrated love threw its grey shadow across her path. And even if we had known nothing of the Brussels episode, and only surmised that her interest in M. Héger was something more than intellectual adoration, we might have gathered from the character and temperament of the woman, as exhibited in her writings and the records of friends, that she was moulded for tragic disappointment. For this reason, too much must not be made of the Brontë environment. The moorland and its denizens helped no doubt to emphasize the primal elements in the Brontë temperament and it makes a striking background for such a temperament. But Charlotte and Emily would have been aloof and tragic souls had they been brought up in the most cheerful urban surroundings. Charlotte had the soul of the primitive woman, leashed in by a few early Victorian conventions, and she is always straining against the leash while upbraiding at herself for doing so. All the while that the curates were wooing her she was probably longing for some dashing Lochinvar to ride up and swing her across his saddle. But the gallant lover of her dreams never materialises, and she had to content herself with Mr. Nicholls—a good, worthy soul, assuredly, but not the Fairy Prince. She goes down to posterity as a type of the plain, sensitive woman hungering for a love that will never be hers; not that she was really unattractive—her eyes, her delicate hands, her pleasant voice were not devoid of magic. But it was not the kind of magic to win over the man destined to transfigure her life. Yet, happiness in a measure might have been hers as the wife of Mr. Nicholls, only ironic Destiny, that had made the Brontë history read like a transcript of Æschylus, again stepped in, and silenced her cry for "more life." None perhaps realised in her life and experience the poignancy of Browning's lines more fully than she:

"O the little more and how much it is,
And the little less and what worlds away."

The Note of Revolt

It is hard perhaps to associate with the gospel of insurgency, a woman who cautioned her friends against reading the comedies of Shakespeare, taboed Don Juan, and whose hero in those days of flaming personalities was the Duke of Wellington. And an insurgent in the modern sense of the term, an insurgent of the militant feminist type to-day, she is far from being. She is insurgent just because she is a primal woman: she is insurgent just as a caged thrush is insurgent that beats itself against the bars of its cage. Modern civilisation always provides a cage for primal natures.

Insurgent womanhood! How familiar the phrase to-day! How unfamiliar in those early Victorian days. Yet Charlotte Brontë is the first to sound the note of sex revolt. She is the pioneer of the novel of emancipation. She was a revolutionary, one might say, in spite of herself. And her revolutionary sentiment is expressed in various ways.

She revolted against the accepted convention of the heroines in fiction; she revolted against the accepted convention of woman's place in the routine of life; she revolted against the formalism and hypocrisy, the harshness and cruelty, that she saw around her.

Thus in the first place she accomplished something like a literary revolution. It was, as Mrs. Oliphant once reminded us: "The period of the heroine in white muslin, the immaculate creature who was of sweetness and goodness all compact." Not even Jane Austen with her shrewd humour had been able to dislodge this convention from the pages of fiction. The governess was not unknown to novel readers, but hitherto she had been surrounded with the halo of romance. No one had dared to make her plain and dowdy until Charlotte Brontë came along and proved that dowdy-like Jane could attract the interest and grip the imagination and sympathy as fully as the most beautiful heroine of romance.

"As fully," it were true to say far more fully; for these creatures were airy visions, Jane Eyre was a living, breathing reality. And the revolt went deeper still; it not merely struck at the literary convention but the current social convention of the time. Charlotte was far too sincere, and too clear-visioned to accept this convention. Thus the shocked surprise of contemporary hypocrites when the writer drew a real woman and not a puppet; when she inveighed with furious scorn against the monstrous masculine invention of the "waxwork sex."

Finally, while revolting against this convention, she incidentally ran tilt against many others. She was at heart in spiritual sympathy with those rough, primal natures, so familiar to her and to her sister Emily in the environment of the rugged moors. Her whole nature rose up against the tame-bird view of life.

This bias shows itself again and again in that wonderful description of unhappy school life in the early chapters of Jane Eyre, where she heaps up her scorn on mealy-mouthed religionists; in her characteristic and obvious admiration for the rough, brutal, yet not unattractive Rochester, in the spirited description of the strike in Shirley; in that Rembrandt-like portrait of Rachel in Villette, where the primitive woman in her admires, and the Puritan in her loathes. Even in her scenic pictures it is the elemental fury of Nature that inspires her best as an artist.

Take for instance this vivid little pen sketch from Shirley: "This is an autumn evening wet and mild. There is only one cloud in the sky, but it curtains it from pole to pole. The wind cannot rest. It hurries sobbing over hills of sullen outline and colourless with twilight and mist." Or her fine metaphor of the Yorkshire moors—"washed from the world in whitening sheets of rain."

Yet for all her revolutionary ardour she has nothing of the satirist in her nature. Her passionate seriousness left little room for humour as a literary weapon. I cannot agree with the customary criticism that she lacked humour; for surely no writer who was devoid of humour could ever have penned that interview with Mr. Carus Wilson in Jane Eyre, given us that delightful picture of the curates in Shirley, or have made Paul Emanuel so vital a figure.

But life was so full of tragic pain and misery to Charlotte Brontë, that merely to laugh at and deride the weaknesses of humanity seemed to her pitifully inadequate. This temperamental view she shared with Charles Kingsley, another earnest critic of his time, to whom satire made no appeal. We can perfectly understand her attitude, though we may not sympathise with her inaptitude of Thackeray's jesting methods. She could never hide her feelings under a guise of flippant fun. It is useless to gird at her for this. It was part of her nature, and the work she accomplished was effected by quite other methods. Hence the over-emphasis, the strong high lights in her fiction—the absence of light and shade, hence also the stereoscopic actuality.

Charlotte Brontë's reputation rests on three books: Jane Eyre, Shirley, and Villette. Of these it may be said briefly that whilst Shirley is the least faulty as a work of art, Jane Eyre, inequalities notwithstanding, is the most vital. There is probably no piece of fiction in our language which has, together with such an abundance of crude accentuation, preposterous episodes, and glaring immaturity of outlook, so unequivocal a genius. There are scenes in the book that read like the ineptitudes of a sentimental schoolgirl; there are scenes—especially in the earlier portion—so amazingly actual, so finely imaginative, that only a woman of genius could have written them. And the genius triumphs. It enthralles and holds us captive. We are quite willing to condone the absurdities for the great moments of inspiration. As an illustration take the first meeting of the little governess with Rochester outside the house. There is nothing far-fetched or melodramatic in the episode, it is quite a natural and probable one; yet, that a writer of inexperience should instinctively invest this chance encounter with all the arresting magic of romantic splendour, shows a quality of imagination, and a power of actuality, for which we can find no other term than—great.

There is more cleverness and greater sobriety and artistic reticence in Shirley, also far less genius. Yet it has considerable episodic power and some admirable pieces of characterisation, notably Caroline, the heroine (modelled on her sister Emily), and the curates—from whom poor Charlotte Brontë could never escape either in her life or fiction.

But her highest achievement in characterisation is found in the delightfully vital picture of M. Paul Emanuel—inspired of course by M. Hégér. We may have our doubts as to the reality of St. John Rivers; and remain unmoved by the blustering extravagances of Rochester—who certainly only lives by fits and starts. But Paul Emanuel, with his nervous excitability, his comical vanity, his greatness of heart and childishness of disposition, is unmistakably alive. Her vision of life and character is limited and circumscribed, but where she did see she saw with startling lucidity and insight. She is at heart a poet, a poet who could not express herself in verse, but there is a rich poetical quality about her prose.

Emily was also a poet, though unlike Charlotte she could find satisfying expression in verse. Like Charlotte, she has the soul of the primitive woman without the feminine gentleness and greater plasticity that kept her sister's tumultuous energy in check.

We have glimpses in Charlotte Brontë's writings of the fierce, untamable spirit of the Brontës, its coarse volume of passion. In Emily's character and work it is revealed naked and unashamed—she is like a fine edition of Branwell.

Beyond a few poems, and Wuthering Heights, we have nothing by which to judge Emily's powers. But they suffice. If Charlotte's personality attracts us, Emily's fascinates us. She seems the very embodiment of the wind-swept moors, and moves through Mrs. Gaskell's biography more like an elemental spirit than a woman, shunning society, inscrutable and silent even among her own kin, revelling in all the bleakness, the loneliness, the storm-tossed vicissitudes of that countryside; dogged by relentless disease, yet grimly defiant, desperately self-controlled to the very last—

"Whose soul
Knew no follow for night,
Passion, vehemence, grief,
During, since Byron died."

How Charlotte would have thrilled to these words; how she would have thrilled still more to the noble and eloquent tribute of Swinburne!

Something of this power and intensity of gloom meets us in her verse, but its fullest expression is found in that strange, amazing, and terrible book, Wuthering Heights. Shadowy, incoherent, remote from concrete human existence, oppressive and appalling in its violent imagery, it is lit up and transfigured by a tragic splendour rarely surpassed in English fiction. The chief characters in the story are scarcely human beings at all, and defy all psychological standards: they are the primal forces of Nature, incarnate passions; yet such fierce intensity of feeling has gone into their creation, that we accept them at their creator's unperplexed command. A barbaric fragment if you will, this extraordinary book, but one of the imperishable fragments of imaginative genius,—Titanic in its fierce undisciplined power, with a haunting and poignant beauty underlying all its horror, making us realise as no other story in our language does, the significance of

"Infinite passion
And the pain of finite hearts that yearn."

JANE EYRE

Mrs. Reed occupied her usual seat by the fireside—she made a signal to me to approach. I did so, and she introduced me to the stony stranger with the words: "This is the little girl respecting whom I applied to you."

He, for it was a man, turned his head slowly towards where I stood and having examined me with the two inquisitive-looking grey eyes, which twinkled under a pair of bushy brows, said solemnly and in a hoarse voice: "Her size is small—what is her age?"

"Ten years."

"So much?" was the doubtful answer; and he prolonged his scrutiny for some minutes. Presently he addressed me—

"Your name, little girl?"

"Jane Eyre, sir."

In uttering these words, I looked up—he seemed to me a tall gentleman, but then I was very little—his features were large, and they and all the lines of his frame were equally harsh and prim.

"Well, Jane Eyre, and are you a good child?"

Impossible to reply to this in the affirmative—my little world held a contrary opinion. I was silent. Mrs. Reed answered for me by an expressive shake of the head, adding soon, "Perhaps the less said on that subject the better, Mr. Brocklehurst."

"Sorry indeed to hear it! she and I must have some talk," and bending from the perpendicular, he installed his person in the arm-chair, opposite Mrs. Reed's. "Come here," he said.

I stepped across the rug. He placed me square and straight before him. What a face he had, now that it was almost on a level with mine! what a great nose! and what a mouth! and what large prominent teeth!

"No sight so sad as that of a naughty child," he began, "especially a naughty little girl. Do you know where the wicked go after death?"

"They go to hell," was my ready and orthodox answer.

"And what is hell?" Can you tell me that?"

"A pit full of fire."

"And should you like to fall into that pit, and to be burning there for ever?"

"No, sir."

"What must you do to avoid it?"

I deliberated a moment, my answer, when it did come, was objectionable: "I must keep in good health, and not die."

"How can you keep in good health? Children younger than you die daily. I buried a little child of five years old only a day or two since—a good little child, whose soul is now in heaven. It is to be feared the same could not be said of you, were you to be called hence."

Not being in a condition to remove his doubt, I only cast my eyes down on the two large feet planted on the rug, and sighed, wishing myself far enough away.

"I hope that sigh is from the heart, and that you repent of ever having been the occasion of discomfort to your excellent benefactress."

"Benefactress! benefactress!" said I inwardly "they all call Mrs. Reed my benefactress; if so, a benefactress is a disagreeable thing."

"Do you say your prayers night and morning?" continued my interrogator.

"Yes, sir."

"Do you read your Bible?"

"Sometimes."

"With pleasure? Are you fond of it?"

"I like Revelations, and the book of Daniel, and Genesis and Samuel, and a little bit of Exodus, and some parts of Kings and Chronicles, and Job and Jonah."

"And the Psalms? I hope you like them?"

"No, sir."

"No? oh, shocking! I have a little boy, younger than you, who knows six Psalms by heart, and when you ask him which he would rather have, a ginger-bread nut to eat, or a verse of a Psalm to learn, he says 'Oh! the verse of a Psalm' angels sing Psalms," says he. "I wish to be a little angel here below," he then gets two nuts in recompense for his infant piety."

"Psalms are not interesting," I remarked.

"That proves you have a wicked heart, and you must pray to God to change it, to give you a new and clean one, to take away your heart of stone and give you a heart of flesh."

JANE EYRE'S FIRST MEETING WITH ROCHESTER

The ground was hard, the air was still, my road was lonely. I walked fast till I got warm, and then I walked slowly to enjoy and analyse the species of pleasure brooding for me in the hour and situation. It was three o'clock, the church bell tolled as I passed under the holly, the charm of the hour lay in its approaching duskness, in the low-gliding and pale-beaming sun. I was a mule from Thornfield in a lane noted for wild roses in summer, for nuts and blackberries in autumn, and even now possessing a few coral treasures in hips and haws, but whose best winter delight lay in its utter solitude and leafless repose. If a breath of air stirred, it made no sound here, for there was not a holly, not an evergreen to rustle, and the stripped hawthorn and hazel bushes were as still as the white, worn stones which causewayed the middle of the path. Far and wide, on each side, there were only fields, where no cattle now browsed, and the little brown birds which started occasionally in the hedge, looked like single russet leaves that had forgotten to drop.

This lane inclined up-hill all the way to Hay, having reached the middle, I sat down on a stile which led thence into a field. Gathering my mantle about me, and sheltering my hands in my muff, I did not feel the cold, though it froze keenly, as was attested by a sheet of ice covering the causeway, where a little brooklet, now congealed, had overflowed after a rapid thaw some days since. From my seat I could look down on Thornfield; the grey and battlemented hall was the principal object in the vale below me, its wood and dark rookery rose against the west. I lingered till the sun went down amongst the trees, and sank crimson and clear behind them. I then turned eastward.

On the hill-top above me sat the rising moon, pale yet as a cloud, but brightening momentarily. She looked over Hay, which, half lost in trees, sent up a blue smoke from its few chimneys; it was yet a mile distant, but in the absolute hush I could hear plainly its thin murmurs of life. My ear too felt the flow of currents; in what dales and depths I could not tell, but there were many hills beyond Hay, and doubtless many beckons threatening their passes. That evening calm betrayed alike the tinkle of the nearest stream, the sough of the most remote.

A rude noise broke on these fine ripples and whispings, at once so far away and so clear—a positive tramp, tramp; a metallic clatter which effaced the soft wave wanderings; as, in a picture, the solid mass of a crag, or the rough boles of a great oak, drawn in dark and strong on the foreground, efface the aerial distance of azure hill, sunny horizon, and blended clouds, where tint melts into tint.

The din was on the causeway—a horse was coming; the windings of the lane yet hid it, but it approached. I was just leaving the stile, yet, as the path was narrow, I sat still to let it go by. In those days I was young, and all sorts of fancies bright and dark tenanted my mind—the memories of nursery stories were there amongst other rubbish, and when they recurred, maturing youth added to them a vigour and vividness beyond what childhood could give. As this horse approached, and as I watched for it to appear through the dusk, I remembered certain of Besse's tales, wherein figured a North of England spirit, called a "Gytrash"; which, in the form of a horse, mule, or large dog, haunted solitary ways, and sometimes came upon isolated travellers, as this horse was now coming upon me.

It was very near, but not yet in sight; when, in addition to the tramp, tramp, I heard a rush under the hedge, and close down by the hazel stems glided a great dog, whose black and white colour made him a distinct object against the trees. It was exactly one mask of Besse's Gytrash,—a lion-like creature with long hair and a huge head. It passed me, however, quietly enough, not staying to look up, with strange preternatural eyes, in my face, as I half expected it would. The horse followed,—a tall steed, and on its back a rider. The man, the human being, broke the spell at once. Nothing over rode the Gytrash—it was always alone; and gobhins, to my notions, though they might tenant the dumb carcasses of beasts, could scarce covet shelter in the commonplace human form. No Gytrash was this,—only a traveller taking the short cut to Milcote. He passed, and I went on; a few steps, and I turned—a sliding sound and an exclamation of "What the deuce is to do now?" and a clattering tumble, arrested my attention. Man and horse were down; they had slipped on the sheet of ice which glazed the causeway. The dog came bounding back, and seeing his master in a predicament, and hearing the horse groan, barked till the evening hills echoed the sound, which was deep in proportion to its magnitude. He snuffed round the prostrate group, and then he ran up to me, it was all he could do,—there was no other help at hand to summon. I obeyed him, and walked down to the traveller, by this time struggling himself free of his steed. His efforts were so vigorous, I thought he could not be much hurt, but I asked him the question—

"Are you injured, sir?"

I think he was swearing, but am not certain; however, he was pronouncing some formula which prevented him from replying to me directly.

"Can I do anything?" I asked again.

"You must just stand on one side," he answered as he rose, first to his knees, and then to his feet. I did; whereupon began a heaving, stamping, clattering process, accompanied by a barking and baying which removed me effectually some yards distance, but I would not be driven quite away till I saw the event. This was finally fortunate; the horse was re-established, and the dog was silenced with a "Down, Pilot!" The traveller now, stooping, felt his foot and leg, as if trying whether they were sound; apparently something ailed them, for he halted to the stile whence I had just risen, and sat down.

I was in the mood for being useful, or at least officious, I think, for I now drew near him again.

"If you are hurt, and want help, sir, I can fetch some one from Thornfield Hall or from Hay."

"Thank you, I shall do: I have no broken bones,—only a sprain;" and again he stood up and tried his foot, but the result extorted an involuntary "Ugh!"

Something of daylight still lingered, and the moon was waxing bright: I could see him plainly. His figure was enveloped in a riding cloak, fur collared, and steel clasped, its details were not apparent, but I traced the general points of middle height, and considerable breadth of chest. He had a dark face, with stern features and a heavy brow; his eyes and gathered eyebrows looked ireful and thwarted just now; he was past youth, but had not reached middle age; perhaps he might be thirty-five. I felt no fear of him, and but little shyness. Had he been a handsome, heroic-looking young gentleman, I should not have dared to stand thus questioning him against his will, and offering my services unasked. I had hardly ever seen a handsome youth never in my life spoken to one. I had a theoretical reverence for beauty, elegance, gallantry, fascination, but had I met those qualities incarnate in masculine shape, I should have known instinctively that they neither had nor could have sympathy with anything in me, and should have shunned them as one would fire, lightning, or anything else that is bright but anti-pathetic.

If even this stranger had smiled and been good-humoured to me when I addressed him, if he had put off my offer of assistance gaily and with thanks, I should have gone on my way and not felt any vocation to renew inquiries; but the frown, the roughness of the traveller set me at my ease. I retained my station when he waved to me to go, and announced—

"I cannot think of leaving you, sir, at so late an hour, in this solitary lane, till I see you are fit to mount your horse."

He looked at me when I said this: he had hardly turned his eyes in my direction before

"I should think you ought to be at home yourself," said he, "if you have a home in this neighbourhood: where do you come from?"

"From just below, and I am not at all afraid of being out late when it is moonlight: I will run over to Hay for you with pleasure, if you wish it, indeed, I am going there to post a letter."

"You live just below—do you mean at the house with the battlements?" pointing to Thornfield Hall, on which the moon cast a hoary gleam, bringing it out distinct and pale from the woods, that, by contrast with the eastern sky, now seemed one mass of shadow.

"Yes, sir."

"Whose house is it?"

"Mr Rochester's."

"Do you know Mr Rochester?"

"No, I have never seen him."

"He is not resident, then?"

"No."

"Can you tell me where he is?"

"I cannot."

"You are not a servant at the hall, of course. You are—" He stopped, ran his eye over my dress, which as usual was quite simple: a black merino cloak, a black beaver bonnet, neither of them half fine enough for a lady's maid. He seemed puzzled to decide what I was. I helped him.

"I am the governess."

"Ah, the governess!" he repeated; "deuce take me, if I had not forgotten! The governess!" and again my raiment underwent scrutiny. In two minutes he rose from the stile: his face expressed pain when he tried to move.

"I cannot commission you to fetch help," he said; "but you may help me a little yourself, if you will be so kind."

"Yes, sir."

"You have not an umbrella that I can use as a stick?"

"No."

"Try to get hold of my horse's bridle and lead him to me: you are not afraid?"

I should have been afraid to touch a horse when alone, but when told to do it, I was disposed to obey. I put down my muff on the stile, and went up to the tall steed; I endeavoured to catch the bridle, but it was a spirited thing, and would not let me come near its head. I made effort on effort though in vain: meantime I was mortally afraid of its trampling fore-feet. The traveller waited and watched for some time, and at last he laughed.

"I see," he said, "the mountain will never be brought to Mahomet, so all you can do is to aid Mahomet to go to the mountain, I must beg of you to come here."

I came. "Excuse me," he continued, "necessity compels me to make you useful." He laid a heavy hand on my shoulder, and leaning on me with some stress, leaped to his horse. Having once caught the bridle, he mastered it directly, and sprang to his saddle grinning grimly as he made the effort, for it wrenched his sprain.

"Now," said he, releasing his under lip from a hard bite, "just hand me my whip; it lies there under the hedge."

I sought it and found it.

"Thank you, now make haste with the letter to Hay, and return as fast as you can."

A touch of a spurred heel made his horse first start and rear, and then bound away, the dog rushed in his traces: all three vanished.

"Like hoath that, in the wildomness,
The wild wind whirls away."

SHIRLEY

Caroline Helstone was just eighteen years old, and at eighteen the true narrative of life is yet to be commenced. Before that time, we sit listening to a tale, a marvellous fiction, delightful sometimes, and sad sometimes, almost always unreal. Before that time, our world is heroic, its inhabitants half-divine or semi-demon, its scenes are dream-scenes: darker woods and stranger hills, brighter skies, more dangerous waters, sweeter flowers, more tempting fruits, wider plains, drearier deserts, sunnier fields than are found in nature, overspread our enchanted globe. What a moon we gaze on before that time! How the trembling of our hearts at her aspect bears witness to its unutterable beauty! As to our sun, it is a burning heaven—the world of gods.

At that time—at eighteen, drawing near the confines of illusion, of dreams, Elf-land lies behind us, the shores of Reality rise in front. Those shores are yet distant: they look so blue, soft, gentle we long to reach them. In sunshine we see a greenness beneath the azure, as of spring meadows; we catch glimpses of silver lines, and imagine the roll of living waters. Could we but reach this land, we think to hunger and thirst no more: whereas many a wilderness, and often the flood of Death, or some stream of sorrow as cold and almost as black as Death, is to be crossed ere true bliss can be tasted. Every joy that life gives must be earned: ere it is secured, and how hardly earned, those only know who have wrestled for great prizes. The heart's blood must gorm with red beads the brow of the combatant, before the wreath of victory rustles over it.

At eighteen, we are not aware of this. Hope, when she smiles on us, and promises happiness to-morrow, is implicitly believed—Love, when he comes wandering like a lost angel to our door, is at once admitted, welcomed, embraced: his quiver is not seen, if his arrows penetrate, their wound is like a thrill of new life: there are no fears of poison, none of the barb which no witch's hand can extract: that perilous passion—an agony even in some of its phases, with many an agony throughout—is believed to be an unqualified good, in short, at eighteen, the school of Experience is to be entered and her humbling, crushing, grinding, but yet purifying and invigorating lessons are yet to be learnt.

Alas, Experience! No other mentis has so wasted and frozen a face as yours: none wear a robe so black none bears a rod so heavy, none with hand so inexorable draws the novice so sternly to his task, and forces him with authority so restless to its acquirement. It is by your instructions alone that man or woman can ever find a safe track through life's wilds; without it, how they stumble, how they stray! On what forbidden grounds do they intrude, down what dread delivities are they hurled!

Caroline, having been convoyed home by Robert, had no wish to pass what remained of the evening with her uncle; the room in which he sat was very sacred ground to her; she seldom intruded on it, and to-night she kept aloof till the bell rung for prayers. Part of the evening Church service was the form of worship observed in Mr Holstone's household: he read it in his usual nasal voice, clear, loud, and monotonous. The rite over, his niece, according to her wont, stepped up to him.

"Good-night, uncle"

"Hey! You've been gadding abroad all day—visiting, dining out, and what not!"

"Only at the cottage"

"And have you learnt your lessons?"

"Yes"

"And made a shirt?"

"Only part of one"

"Well, that will do. Stick to the needle—learn shirt-making and gown-making, and pie-crust-making, and you'll be a clever woman some day. Go to bed now; I'm busy with a pamphlet here"

The name of Charlotte Brontë is intimately bound up with that of her friend and biographer, ELIZABETH CLEGHORN GASKELL (1810-1865). She was the daughter of a Unitarian minister, William Stevenson, and married a minister of the same theological school. She and her husband lived for many years at Manchester, and from her experiences of Lancashire life, she found the material at hand for her first novel, Mary Barton (1848), and North and South (1855).

Social politics flash across the pages of Shirley, but industrial and economic problems that were to enter so largely into Victorian fiction, meet us for the first time in feminine fiction in the pages of Mrs Gaskell.

Mrs Gaskell did, in some ways, for the North what Charles Kingsley was already doing for the South. She is not the industrial reformer that Kingsley was, but she knew out of the fulness of her own experiences the bitterness and misery arising from those early conflicts between capital and labour, and she was as fanatical with strikes as was Kingsley with sweating. But Mrs Gaskell's importance as a novelist lies not merely in her spirited and faithful achievement of industrial dramas, but in the method of her story-telling.

Both the Brontës and Dickens were at heart romantics who applied their romanticism to everyday life, and the lesser novelists, the Brays and the Gores, were also romantics though in a more superficial manner. Mrs Gaskell, however, approaches rather to the more realistic methods of Jane Austen—but with a difference. She lays greater stress than Miss Austen on the emotional life, and is less interested in the external history than in the inner history of her characters. In other words, Mrs Gaskell may fairly be regarded as the pioneer of the novel of character, of which George Eliot is the first brilliant exponent.

Despite the fact that both Dickens and Thackeray adopted very largely the old discursive, picaresque framework of the episodic novel, more and more attention was being paid to the delineation of character. One can trace throughout Dickens' writings, a steadily increasing care in this respect; and although it may be doubted whether the nature of his genius did not excel in bold, flamboyant presentments rather than in carefully constructed portrait studies, yet the elaboration of his later characters, say from Black House onwards, is a significant testimony to the artistic drift of his time.

The gradual diffusion of scientific ideas on the subject of education, environment, heredity, contributed largely to foster the psychological novel, and the publication of The Origin of Species and Adam Bede in the same year, is something more than a literary accident.

Mrs Gaskell had neither the intellectual equipment nor the artistic power of George Eliot, but she was a shrewd observer, with a tolerant sympathy and a strong sense of humour. Curiously enough, she never did full justice to her humorous faculty, save in Cranford, which beyond a doubt is her highest achievement in fiction—an entirely fresh and delightful sojourn in a sleepy little country town. There is a pleasant aroma of fresh butter and dried lavender in its pages. The characterisation is rich in happy little touches, reminiscent of Jane Austen's art, yet with a more whimsical play of humorous fancy than she would have tolerated.

If Cranford is a real gem, the other novels are far from being pasto mutations. Mary Barton is a sincere and moving story, which might easily have been spoilt by sentimentality. North and South gives us a thoughtful study of the problems that arise out of the factory system, while there is excellent workmanship in Lives and Daughters, and a tragic power in Ruth. Indeed had Mrs Gaskell never written Cranford we might have been less critical of her other stories. Having achieved a little masterpiece in Cranford, we are naturally more critical about the rest of her work, which is good, thoughtful, workmanlike fiction of the secondary order.

From this criticism we ought to exempt the Life of Charlotte Brontë, which is a fine and worthy study of a difficult yet fascinating subject. This and Cranford should survive when the other tales have long since been buried in oblivion.

OLD LETTERS

I have often noticed that almost every one has his own individual small economies—careful habits of saving fractions of pennies in some one peculiar direction—any disturbance of which annoys him more than spending shillings or pounds on some real extravagance. An old gentleman of my acquaintance, who took the intelligence of the failure of a joint-stock bank, in which some of his money was invested, with stoical indifference, worried his family all through a long summer's day because one of them had torn (instead of cutting) out the written leaves of his now useless bank-book, or, of course, the corresponding pages at the other end came out as well, and this little unnecessary waste of paper (his private economy) elated him more than all the loss of his money. Envelopes fretted his soul terribly when they first came in, the only way in which he could reconcile himself to such waste of his cherished article was by patiently turning inside out all that were sent to him, and so making them serve again. Even now, though tamed by age, I see him casting wistful glances at his daughters when they send a whole inside of a half-sheet of notepaper, with the three lines of acceptance to an invitation, written on only one of the sides. I am not above owning that I have this human weakness myself. String is my foible. My pockets get full of little hanks of it, picked up and twisted together, ready for uses that never come. I am seriously annoyed if any one cuts the string of a parcel instead of patiently and faithfully undoing it fold by fold. How people can bring themselves to use india-rubber rings, which are a sort of deification of string, as lightly as they do, I cannot imagine. To me an india-rubber ring is a precious treasure. I have one which is not new—one that I picked up off the floor nearly six years ago. I have really tried to use it, but my heart failed me, and I could not commit the extravagance.

Small pieces of butter grieve others. They cannot attend to conversation because of the annoyance occasioned by the habit which some people have of invariably taking more butter than they want. Have you not seen the anxious look (almost mesmeric) which such persons fix on the article? They would feel it a relief if they might bury it out of their sight by popping it into their own mouths and swallowing it down, and they are really made happy if the person on whose plate it lies unused suddenly breaks off a piece of toast (which he does not want at all) and eats up his butter. They think that this is not waste.

Now, Miss Matty Jenkyns was chary of candles. We had many devices to use as few as possible. In the winter afternoons she would sit knitting for two or three hours—she could do this in the dark, or by firelight—and when I asked if I might not ring for candles to finish stitching my waistbands, she told me to "keep blind man's holiday." They were usually brought in with tea, but we only burnt one at a time. As we lived in constant preparation for a friend who might come in any evening (but who never did), it required some contrivance to keep our two candles of the same length, ready to be lighted and to look as if we burnt two always. The candles took it in turn, and whatever we might be talking about or doing, Miss Matty's eyes were habitually fixed upon the candle, ready to jump up and extinguish it and to light the other before they had become too uneven in length to be restored to equality in the course of the evening.

One night I remember this candle economy particularly annoyed me. I had been very much tired of my compulsory "blind man's holiday," especially as Miss Matty had fallen asleep and I did not like to stir the fire and run the risk of awaking her; so I could not even sit on the rug, and search myself with sewing by firelight, according to my usual custom. I minded Miss Matty must be dreaming of her early life, for she spoke one or two words in her uneasy sleep bearing reference to persons who were dead long before. When Martha brought in the lighted candle and tea, Miss Matty started into wakefulness with a strange bewildered look around, as if we were not the people she expected to see about her. There was a little sad expression that shadowed her face as she recognised me, but immediately afterwards she tried to give me her usual smile. All through tea-time her talk ran upon the days of her childhood and youth. Perhaps this reminded her of the desirableness of looking over all the family letters and destroying such as ought not to fall into the hands of strangers, for she had often spoken of the necessity of this task, but had always shrunk from it, with a timid dread of something painful. To-night, however, she rose up after tea and went for them in the dark, for she piqued herself on the precise neatness of all her chamber arrangements, and used to look uneasily at me when I lighted a bed candle to go to another room for anything. When she returned there was a faint, pleasant smell of Tongue beans in the room. I had always noticed this scent about any of the things which had belonged to her mother; and many of the letters were addressed to her—yellow bundles of love-letters, sixty or seventy years old.

Miss Matty undid the packet with a sigh, but she stifled it directly, as if it were hardly right to regret the flight of time or of life either. We agreed to look them over separately, each taking a different letter out of the same bundle, and describing its contents to the other before destroying it. I never knew what sad work the reading of old letters was before that evening, though I could hardly tell why. The letters were as happy as letters could be—at least those early letters were. There was in them a vivid and intense sense of the present time, which seemed so strong and full, as if it could never pass away, and as if the warm, living hearts that so expressed themselves could never die and be as nothing to the sunny earth. I should have felt less melancholy, I believe, if the letters had been more so. I saw the tear stealing down the well-worn furrows of Miss Matty's cheeks, and her spectacles often would wiping. I trusted at last that she would light the other candle, for my own eyes were rather dim, and I wanted more light to see the pale, faded ink, but no, even through her tears, she saw and remembered her little economical ways.

The earliest set of letters were two bundles, tied together and ticked (in Miss Jenkyns' handwriting), "Letters interchanged between my ever-honoured father and my dearly-beloved mother prior to their marriage in June 1774." I should guess that the rector of Cranford was about twenty-seven years of age when he wrote those letters, and Miss Matty told me that her mother was just eighteen at the time of her wedding. With my idea of the rector, derived from a picture in the dining-parlour stiff and stately, in a huge full-bottomed wig, with gown, cassock, and bands, and his hand upon a copy of the only sermon he ever published—it was strange to read these letters. They were full of eager, passionate ardour, short homely sentences, right fresh from the heart (very different from the grand Latinised Johnsonian style of the printed sermon preached before some judge at the assize time). His letters were a curious contrast to those of the girl-bride. She was evidently rather annoyed at his demands upon her for expressions of love, and could not quite understand what he meant by repeating the same thing over in so many different ways, but what she was quite clear about was a longing for a white "Paduasoy"—whatever that might be, and six or seven letters were principally occupied in asking her lover to use his influence with her parents (who evidently kept her in good order) to obtain this or that article of dress, more especially the white "Paduasoy." He cared nothing how she was dressed—she was always lovely enough for him, as he took pains to assure her, when she begged him to express in his answer a predilection for particular pieces of finery, in order that she might show what he said to her parents. But at length he seemed to find out that she would not be married till she had a "trousseau" to her mind, and then he sent her a letter which had evidently accompanied a whole box of finery, and in which he requested that she might be dressed in everything her heart desired. This was the first letter ticketed in a frail, delicate hand, "From my dearest John." Shortly afterwards they were married, I suppose, from the intermission in their correspondence.

"We must burn them, I think," said Miss Matty, looking doubtfully at me. "No one will care for them when I am gone." And one by one she dropped them into the middle of the fire, watching each blaze up, die out, and rise away in faint, white, ghostly semblance up the chimney before she gave another to the same fate. The room was light enough now, but I, like her, was fascinated into watching the destruction of those letters, into which the honest warmth of a manly heart had been poured forth.

The next letter, likewise docketed by Miss Jenkyns, was endorsed, "Letter of pious congratulation and exhortation from my venerable grandfather to my beloved mother on the occasion of my birth. Also some practical remarks on the desirability of keeping warm the extremities of infants, from an excellent grandmother."

The first part was, indeed, a severe and forcible picture of the responsibilities of mothers, and a warning against the evils that were in the world, and lying in ghastly wait for the little baby of two days old. His wife did not write, said the old gentleman, because he had forbidden it, she being indisposed with a sprained ankle, which (he said) quite incapacitated her from holding a pen. However, at the foot of the page was a small "T ()," and on turning it over, sure enough, there was a letter to "my dear, dearest Molly," begging her, when she left her room, whatever she did, to go up-stairs before going down, and telling her to wrap her baby's foot up in flannel and keep it warm by the fire, although it was summer, for babies were so tender.

It was pretty to see from the letters, which were evidently exchanged with some frequency between the young mother and the grandmother, how the girlish vanity was being weeded out of her heart by love for her baby. The white "Paduasoy" figured again in the letters, with almost as much vigour as before. In one, it was being made into a christening cloak for the baby. It decked it when it went out with its parents to spend a day or two at Arley Hall. It added to its charms when it was "the prettiest little baby that ever was seen. Dear mother, I wish you could see her! Without any partiality, I do think she will grow up a regular beauty." I thought of Miss Jenkyns, gray, withered, and wrinkled, and I wondered if her mother had known her in the courts of heaven, and then I knew that she had, and that they stood there in angelic guise.

There was a great gap before any of the rector's letters appeared. And then his wife had changed her mode of endorsement. It was no longer from "My dearest John," it was from "My honoured Husband." The letters were written on occasion of the publication of the same sermon which was represented in the picture. The preaching before "My Lord Judge," and the "publishing by request," was evidently the culminating point—the event of his life. It had been necessary for him to go up to London to superintend it through the press. Many friends had to be called upon and consulted before he could decide on any printer fit for so onerous a task; and at length it was arranged that J and J Rivingtons were to have the honourable responsibility. The worthy rector seemed to be strung up by the occasion to a high literary pitch, for he could hardly write a letter to his wife without cropping out into Latin. I remember the end of one of his letters ran thus: "I shall ever hold the virtuous qualities of my Molly in remembrance, dum memoro spac meo dum spiritus regit artus" which, considering that the English of his correspondent was sometimes at fault in grammar, and often in spelling, might be taken as a proof of how much he "idealised" his Molly, and, as Miss Jenkyns used to say, "People talk a great deal about idealising nowadays, whatever that may mean." But this was nothing to a fit of writing classical poetry which soon seized him, in which his Molly figured away as "Maria." The letter containing the carmin was endorsed by her; "Hebrew verses sent me by my honoured husband. I thought to have had a letter about killing the pig, but must wait. Mem, to send the poetry to Sir Peter Arley, as my husband desires." And in a post-scriptum note in his handwriting it was stated that the ode had appeared in the Gentleman's Magazine, December 1782.

Her letters, back to her husband (treasured as fondly by him as if they had been "M. T. Cicero's Epistole") were more satisfactory to an absent husband and father than his could ever have been to her. She told him how Deborah sewed her seam very neatly every day and read to her in the books he had set her; how she was a very "farrard," good child, but would ask questions her mother could not answer, but how she did not let herself down by saying she did not know, but took to stirring the fire or sending the "farrard" child on an errand. Matty was now the mother's darling, and promised (like her sister at her age) to be a great beauty. I was reading this aloud to Miss Matty, who smiled and sighed a little at the hope, so fondly expressed, that "little Matty might not be vain, even if she were a beauty."

"I had very pretty hair, my dear," said Miss Matilda, "and not a bad mouth." And I saw her soon afterwards adjust her cap and draw herself up.¹

GEORGE ELIOT (1819-1880)

HER LIFE

Mary Ann Evans (George Eliot) was born at South Farm, Arbury, in Warwickshire, on November 22, 1819. Her father, Robert Evans, was agent to Sir Roger Newdigate of Arbury Hall, her grandfather a builder and carpenter in Derbyshire. Robert Evans was a well-seasoned Tory with the firm belief that anyone with the revolutionary strain in his blood was a scoundrel of the deepest dye. "I was accustomed," remarks his daughter with dry humour, "to hear him utter the word 'Government' in a tone that charged it with awe and made it part of my effective religion, in contrast with the word 'rebel,' which seemed to carry the stamp of evil in its syllables, and lit by the fact that Satan was the first rebel made an argument dispensing with more detailed inquiry." It was a neighbourhood that made for Toryism, a sleepy, prosperous, well-watered district, where life ambled along in a pleasant jog-trot fashion. In this region George Eliot spent the first thirty-two years of her life, and the life of the place passed into her nature and became a rich inspiration in which to draw in her wonderful pictures of provincial life.

At first, of course, she accepted with docility her father's views, and though thoughtful and imaginative even as a young child, there was a certain reflective diffidence about her that made her mental development proceed slowly. But in the early forties she came under the influence of the Brays, and the acquaintanceship proved a crisis in her intellectual life.

Charles Bray was a ribbon manufacturer by trade, and a philanthropist by inclination. He was interested in Socialism and turned his energies in the direction of social reform.

In 1836 Bray married Caroline Hennell, who came of a Unitarian family. Bray himself was a sceptic, and his brother-in-law, Charles Hennell, in endeavouring to convince him of the error of his ways, became a sceptic himself. Hennell's book An Enquiry concerning the Origin of Christianity (1838) made a deep impression on George Eliot. "My only desire is," she wrote to a friend, "to know the truth, my only fear to cling to error."

But she was not prepared to give up revealed religion as yet, though insensibly it affected her attitude towards her father's rigid Puritanism. She gave up church-going, and this naturally led to strained family relationships. Meanwhile she had acknowledged obligations to a mentor, whose association with rationalism may seem somewhat startling. I allude to her references to Sir Walter Scott, whom in later life she declared had materially helped to unsettle her orthodoxy.

As a matter of fact it seems to have been Scott the artist, not Scott the man, that wrought this astonishing change. For Scott's broad and tolerant treatment of conflicting religious opinions appealed very naturally to George Eliot's essentially judicial attitude. She was too far-minded not to see how dynamic an influence religion had proved in moulding human life, she was too clear-headed to attribute this influence to any particular set of doctrines.

She was always maintaining, even when quite a girl, that the great lesson of life was tolerance, and this made her out of touch on one side with the school of militant sceptics, and on the other with militant religionists.

After her father's death she settled in London, and became assistant editor of the Westminster Review, to whose columns she had already contributed. Fresh and potent influences now came into her life, the two Martincaus, James and Harriet, James one of the most powerful Theistic writers that the century had produced, his sister a keen intellectual writer on social and political subjects, above all, Herbert Spencer and George Henry Lewes.

Meanwhile she boarded with the Chapmans in the Strand, Chapman being the proprietor of the Westminster Review. Herbert Spencer she found "a good, delightful creature", and the brilliant and volatile George Henry Lewes, who at first rather repelled her by his flippancy, finally won her affections—"being 'like a few other people in the world'—much better than he seems,—a man of heart and conscience."

Lewes was already married, though living apart from his wife, unable to get a divorce through some technicality in the existing law. George Eliot, though disapproving of "light and easily broken ties," felt very strongly that the law binding Lewes to his wife was not a moral law, and she determined deliberately to throw in her lot with him, declaring that no one "acquainted with the realities of life" could prove such a union "immoral." The union proved in many ways not only a happy one, but a fortunate one in determining George Eliot's literary career. She was already well known as a singularly able critic and translator, but it was due to Lewes' discernment and encouragement that she now turned to essay fiction. She was thirty-eight when she wrote her first Scenes from Clerical Life for Blackwood's Magazine. It is characteristic of her peculiar diffidence as to her own powers that the impulse to write a story came not from some sudden kindling of the creative imagination, but from the suggestion of her friend Lewes. The result was dramatic in the phenomenal success that attended this departure; and so long as she drew upon her own memories and impressions, her power was unquestionable. When she left this fount of inspiration, she proved far more uncertain in her touch, and less satisfying as a literary artist.

In 1878 Mr Lewes died, and some two years later she married a young London banker, Mr John Walter Cross, about twenty years her junior. To some this step may have reflected on the passionate devotion she had always expressed for Lewes; but all who knew her intimately felt that it was merely a natural expression of that curious dependency in her otherwise strong and decisive nature—a dependency which she refers to in her letters, the need of someone always upon whom she may lean for support.

This is her own statement on the matter:

"Deep down below there is a river of sadness, but this must always be with those who have lived long—and I am able to enjoy my newly opened life. I shall be a better, more loving creature than I could have been in solitude. To be constantly, lovingly grateful for the gift of a perfect love is the best illumination of one's mind to all the possible good there may be in store for man on this troublesome 'little planet.'"

Shortly after her marriage her health failed, and in December 1880 she died suddenly, after a short illness.

HER WORK

The amazing contrast between the subject of Cross's biography and the creator of Adam Bede and The Mill on the Floss has always perplexed literary students. George Eliot, the moralist and idealist, was well known from her novels, but this anxious, self-analytical woman, with her strained intellectual pose, proved an unpleasant surprise to them. In point of fact, Cross's Life is a one-sided presentation of a many-sided personality. Undoubtedly it represented a side, and the side most familiar to him, but it was the staid George Eliot of the seventies, rather than the woman with strong passions, with the Maggie Tulliver-like waywardness,—one of the brilliant Bohemians that circled round the old Westminster Review. What trace is there in the biography of the writer of those polished, ironical essays in criticism, written from Mr Chapman's boarding-house in the Strand? What indication in the bulky correspondence that looms out so prominently in the Life, of the wit, the humour, the restless vitality of the George Eliot endeared to such a wide circle of friends.

In those severely analytical letters, she seems to be perpetually in a state of intellectual tip-toe. The biography of Cross is unsatisfactory in the way that all biographies written by devotees must necessarily be. Through the obscuring mist of "good, thick, strong, stupefying incense smoke," the woman is partly lost to sight. And it is the essential womanliness of George Eliot that gives vitality to her best work. Her delicate intuition, her tact, her woman's power of sympathy, these are the qualities that give greatness to Adam Bede, The Mill on the Floss, Silas Marner. Her intellectual gifts, splendid as they were and invaluable in her critical work, are positive drawbacks to her as an artist. The best part of Romola lies in the subtle delineation of the young Greek hedonist, Tito; the scholarship shown in the book is sheer dead weight from the artistic point of view. Similarly in Daniel Deronda, when she writes as a woman she makes the pages live, when as a follower of Comte and as a student of racial problems, then the wheels of her chariot drive very heavily.

At the present time, however, she is almost ludicrously under-rated, and her literary reputation is certainly under a cloud, thus it is more serviceable to point out the solid worth of her writings than to dilate on her shortcomings.

The influence of that clever, lively though superficial man, George Henry Lewes, has been severely criticised, yet surely his influence was on the whole a sound and stimulating one. The one mistake he made was to safeguard her too anxiously from hostile criticism, after she had made her name, when a wholesome course of frank criticism would have done her good. But it was after all through him that she took to writing. He saw in her a woman of keen observation and of unusual reflective power, and knew that she had humour and imagination. "Use your own experience and feelings in fiction," he had said with admirable point; "don't be afraid of yourself." In this way he encouraged her, when nearly forty, to essay fiction, and without his encouragement it is improbable she would ever have tried. As it was, her earliest efforts justified Lewes' prophecy, and she was rightly heralded as a new force in fiction.

What kind of force?

She was the first novelist to lay the stress wholly upon character rather than incident, to make her stories spiritual rather than physical dramas. It is true that Charlotte Brontë had drawn attention to the emotional life, but she had lacked the knowledge of men and women, the mental detachment necessary for giving actuality to many of her characters. Within her own limited range she depicted character with force and insight, but the range was narrow and the high lights were over-strong. She flung the emotional life of her heroine at you in a seething ferment and did not, as did George Eliot, trace its source and confluence with patient care.

Essentially a critic of life, George Eliot, keenly observant, richly humorous as she is, was never content with merely chronicling the result of her observations. I'm good or ill, you never forgot the philosopher in the story-teller. It has been urged that heretofore lies her great defect as a novelist. But such an assertion is too sweeping.

That a philosophic tendency may serve artistic ends, is sufficiently obvious from the verse of Browning and the prose and verse of Meredith. A writer is not disqualified because he or she may happen to be a thinker, though unfortunately the absence of thought is held to be a justification for story-telling in many cases. George Eliot thought deeply on human life, and she has embodied the result of her thought in many fine aphorisms and apothegms scattered through her stories, and many a scene of purely dramatic humour has gained a distinctive flavour of its own by reason of it, as for instance the Harvest Supper scene in Adam Bede and the famous discourse on Ghosts in the "Rainbow" scene of Silas Marner.

George Eliot's critical method of narration may be clearly discerned if we contrast it with that of two famous predecessors—Jane Austen and Dickens.

Here is Jane Austen, essentially the close, detailed observer:

"Oh, my dear sir, how are you this morning?—My dear Miss Woodhouse—I come quite overpowered. Such a beautiful hind quarter of pork! You are too beautiful! Have you heard the news? . . . Mr Elton is going to be married."

"But where could you hear it? . . . Where could you possibly hear it? For it is not five minutes since I received Mrs. Cole's note—No, it cannot be more than five—or at least ten—for I had got my bonnet and Spencer on, just ready to come out—I was only gone down to speak to Patty again about the pork. Jane was standing in the passage—were not you, Jane? For my mother was so afraid that we had not any salting pan large enough. So I said I would go down and see and Jane said, "Shall I go down instead?—for I think you have a little cold, and Patty has been washing the kitchen"—Oh my dear, said I,—well and just came the note. A Miss Hawkins—that's all I know—a Miss Hawkins of Bath. . . . But Mr Knightley, how could you possibly have heard of it?—for the very moment Mr Cole told Mrs Cole of it, she sat down and wrote to me—A Miss Hawkins—"

Here is Dickens dealing with inconsequential femininity:

"Kate, my dear," said Mrs. Nickleby—"I don't know how it is, but a fine warm summer day like this, with the birds singing in every direction, always puts me in mind of roast pig, with sage and onion sauce, and made gravy."

"A curious association of ideas, is it not, Mama?"

"Upon my word, my dear, I don't know," replied Mrs. Nickleby. "Roast pig—let me see—On the day five weeks after you were christened we had a roast—no, that could not have been a pig, either, because I recollect there was a pair of them to carve, and you poor Papa and I could never have thought of sitting down to two pigs—they must have been partridges. Roast pig! I hardly think we could even have had one, now I come to remember, for your Papa could never bear the sight of them in the shops, and used to say they always put him in mind of very little babies, only the babies had much fairer complexions, and he had a horror of little babies too. . . . I recollect dining once at Mrs. Bevan's, in that broad street round the corner by the coach-maker's, where the tipsy man fell through the cellar flap of an empty house nearly a day before the Quarter day and wasn't found till the next morning went in—and we had roast pig there. It must be that, I think, that reminds me of it, especially as there was a little bird in the room that would keep on singing all the time of dinner—at least not a little bird, for it was a parrot, and he didn't sing exactly, for he talked and swore dreadfully, but I think it must be that. Indeed, I am sure it must. Shouldn't you say so, my dear?"

The difference between Dickens and Jane Austen is not that one is more observant than the other. Each is a marvellously acute observer, but whereas Jane Austen leaves the result of her observation to achieve its own effect, Dickens is so delighted with the type he is depicting that he cannot resist heightening the absurdity of the picture. Just as a raconteur in telling a good story, puts in little touches of extravagance to intensify the humour, Mrs. Nickleby is more irresistible in her fatuous inconsequentiality than Miss Bates. But Miss Bates may be met any day of the week, Mrs. Nickleby (unhappily for our delectation), equally true in conception, belongs to the world of delicious fantasy.

Here is George Eliot:

"Mrs. Tulliver looked all round in silence for some moments and then said emphatically

"Well, sister, I'll never speak against the full crowns again!"

"It was a great concession, and Mrs. Pullet felt it. She felt something was due to it."

"You'd like to see it on sister?" she said sadly:

"I'll open the shutter a bit further."

"Well if you don't mind taking off your cap, sister," said Mrs. Tulliver.

"Mrs. Pullet took off her cap, displaying the brown silk scalp with a jutting promontory of curls which was common to the more mature and judicious women of those times, and placing the bonnet on her head, turned slowly round, like a draper's lay figure, that Miss Tulliver might miss no point of view."

"I've sometimes thought there's a loop too much ribbon on this left side, sister; what do you think?" said Mrs. Pullet.

"Mrs Tulliver looked earnestly at the point indicated, and turned her head on one side

"Well, I think it's best as it is. If you meddle with it, sister, you might repent."

"That's true, sister," said Aunt Pulot, taking off the bonnet and looking at it contemplatively. "Ah! she said at last, 'I may never wear it twice, sister; who knows?'"

"Don't talk of that, sister," answered Mrs Tulliver. "I hope you'll have your health this summer."

"Ah, but there may come a death in the family, as there did soon after I got my green silk satin bonnet. Cousin Abbot may go, and we can't think of wearing crapes less nor half a year for him."

"That would be unlucky," said Mrs Tulliver, entering thoroughly into the possibility of an inopportune decease. "There's never so much pleasure in wearing a bonnet the second year—especially when the crowns are so changeable, never two summers alike."

"Ah! it's the way of this world," said Mrs Pulot, returning the bonnet to the wardrobe and locking it up."

Unlike Dickens, George Eliot can detach herself completely from her creations, and her appreciation of them never tempts her to extravagance. Unlike Jane Austen, she acts as chorus to her characters, throwing in by way of occasional parenthesis her appreciation of their values. Jane Austen would never have added "entering thoroughly into the possibility of an inopportune decease," or "it was a great concession", but it is quite possible to admire and enjoy all these methods, and it seems a great pity that some of Jane Austen's admirers can never praise that delightful artist without seeking to vilify poor George Eliot.

The scene just quoted is a good illustration of her dramatic humour, but though she could do this sort of thing excellently, her real strength lies in reflective humour. There she has no peer save Meredith. From the ample storehouse of wise and shrewd sayings, here are a few examples:

"There are answers which in turning away wrath only send it to the other end of the room."

"We sit up at night to read about St Francis or Oliver Cromwell, but whether we should be glad for anyone like them to call on us next morning still more to reveal himself as a new relation, is quite another affair."

"I often think it's wiser the old folks as wiser the babies—they're satisfied wiser looking, no matter what they're looking at. It's God Almighty's way of quieting them before they go to sleep."

"It's poor work allus setting the dead up above the living. We shall all on us be dead some time, I reckon. It'd be better if folks'd make much on us beforehand, instead o' beginning when we're gone. It's but little good you'll do watering the last year's crop."

"Animals are such agreeable friends, they ask no questions, they pass no criticisms."

"Some folks' tongues are like the clocks as run on strikin', not to tell you the time of day, but because there is summat wrong in their inside."

"What a man wants in a wife mostly is to make sure of one fool as'll tell him he's wise."

"I'm not denyin' the women are foolish. . . . God Almighty made 'em to match the men."

"I have nothing to say against Craig—only it's a pity he couldn't be hatched over again—and hatched different."

"Always the way with them weak-faced people . . . as well pelt a bag of feathers as talk to them."

"I'm not one of those who can see the Cat in the dairy and wonder what she's come after."

"Easy finding reasons why other folks should be patient."

"Mrs Poyser's a terrible woman, don't say the apple isn't sound at the core, but it sets my teeth on edge."

George Eliot is at her happiest in characterisation; here we find both subtlety and variety. The most casual inspection will reveal the variety. Florentine scholars, half-witted rustics, cultured free-thinkers, wayward, passionate natures, shallow, insincere characters, mystics, men of the world. Her wide range of observation, her generous sympathies, and the power of detachment, trained by scientific study, all helped to give breadth and variety to her canvas.

The writer who could vitalise for us the hedonistic Tito, the fine old Puritan Dr Lyons; the erratic Gwendolen Harleth, the steadfast Mary Garth, the commonplace Fred Vinney and the brilliant Lydgate, the rough, uncultured Bob Wakem and the polished scholar Casaubon; dealing justice to each, fairly appraising their merits and no less keenly exposing their weaknesses, was a writer with no ordinary power of psychological portrayal.

Not is she a whit inferior in the subtlety of her method. Note the delicate nuances in the characterisation of Mary Garth and Rosamund Vinney, and Romola. An unassuming yet sweet-natured girl, a shallow pater, and a young inexperienced woman of cultured tastes. Here there are no dramatic elements, no striking contradictions of character that make characterisation easy and effective. It is easier to draw a Maggie Tulliver than to draw a Rosamund Vinney, for unless the scales of justice are scrupulously held the latter portrait inevitably becomes a merely repellent sketch. Her shortcomings are neatly epitomised in the remark that "in poor Rosamund's mind was not room enough for luxuries to look small in", yet the physical charm of the girl is no less admirably suggested, you may despise her personality but it is never negligible, and Lydgate's early passion for her is readily comprehended.

Can you not read Mary Garth's character at once from fine touches such as the following scrap of dialogue shows:

Fred: I don't see how a man is to be good for much unless he has some one woman to love him dearly.

Mary: I think the goodness should come before he expects that.

Fred: You know better, Mary, women don't love men for their goodness.

Mary: Perhaps not, but if they love them they never thank them bad.

Equally well is Romola's character revealed in the scene with Tito from which the following fragment is taken:

"Romola sat silent and motionless. She could not blind herself to the direction in which Tito's words pointed. He wanted to persuade her that they might get the library (her father's) deposited in some monastery, or take some other means to rid themselves of a task and of a tie to Florence, and she was determined never to submit her mind to his judgment on this question of duty to her father. She was inwardly prepared to encounter any sort of pain in resistance. But this determination was kept latent in these first moments by this heart-crushing sense that now at last she and Tito must be confessedly divided in their wishes. He was glad of her silence, for, much as he had feared the strength of her feeling, it was impossible for him, shut up in the narrowness that hedges in all merely clever unimpassioned men, not to over-estimate the persuasiveness of his own judgment. His conduct did not look ugly to himself, and his imagination did not suffice to show him exactly how it would look to Romola . . .

"As that fluent talk fell on her ears, there was a rising contempt within her, which only made her more conscious of her bruised, despairing love, her love for the Tito she had married and beloved in."

Compare these two illustrations of widely different types of humanity. Is it possible to give either the preference for truth and insight?

(1) From the Rainbow Inn discourse on Ghosts:

"Ay, but there's this in it, Dowlais," said the landlord, speaking in a tone of much candour and tolerance. "There's folks, I'm my opinion, they can't see ghos'es, not if they stood as plain as a pikestaff before 'em. And there's reason I' that. For there's my wife, now, can't smell, not if she'd the strongest o' cheese under her nose. I never see'd a ghost myself, but then I says to myself—Very like I haven't got the smell for 'em. I mean, putting a ghost for a smell or else contrariwise. And so, I'm for holding with both sides, for, as I say, the truth lies between 'em. And if Dowlais was to go and stand and say he'd never seen a wink o' Cliff's Holiday all the night through, I'd back him, and if anybody said as Cliff's Holiday was certain sure for all that, I'd back him too. For the smell, what I go by."

"The landlord's analogical argument was not well received by the farmer—a man intensely opposed to compromise."

"Tut, tut," he said, setting down his glass with refreshed irritation, "what's the smell got to do with it? Did over a ghost give a man a blackeye? That's what I should like to know. If ghos'es want me to believe in 'em, let 'em leave off skulking in the dark and I' lone places—let 'em come where there's company and candles."

"As if ghos'es 'ud want to be believed in by anybody so ignorant," said Mr. Macey, in deep disgust at the farmer's crass incompetence to apprehend the conditions of ghostly phenomena.¹

(2) From the work-a-day philosophy of Adam Bede:

"There's nothing but what is bearable, as long as a man can work. The nature of things doesn't change, though it seems as if one's own life was nothing but change. The square of four is sixteen, and you must lengthen your lever in proportion to your weight, is as true when a man's miserable as when he's happy, and the best of working is, it gives you a grip-hold of things outside your own lot."

Just as in Paul, David, and Pip, Dickens had portrayed, partly of deliberation, partly no doubt unconsciously, his own self, so in Maggie, Romola, and Dorothea, has George Eliot described her own mental and spiritual growth; and in reading these studies we are reminded of the complex personality of the novelist. Maggie's cry was for fuller life, Romola's for ampler knowledge, Dorothea's for larger opportunity for doing good, and we can trace here the friend of Lewes, the admirer of Spencer, the follower of Comte. Truth to tell, George Eliot was half pagan and half Puritan, and the two sides never blended. She was a woman of a strong, passionate temperament, swept by tidal impulses, with a rich, full nature, keenly sensitive to the sensuous side of life. On this side she reminds one of Thomas Hardy's striking presentation of Eustacia Vye in The Return of the Native. This is the passionate, emotional woman, who hungered all her life for affection, craved, like a sensitive child, for the sympathy of friends; the woman who was ready to brave social convention for the man she loved, for whom no human being was too weak, too sinful, for her pitiful and affectionate compassion. This is the George Eliot who gave us Maggie Tulliver, Gwendolen Harloth, Tina, Janet.

But there was another side to George Eliot's nature. She discarded early the narrow exclusiveness in which she had been brought up. Intellectually, she was in touch with the most extreme of the Rationalist critics, but she never outgrew her Puritanism. It was too deeply ingrained in her character. Like Carlyle, she retained the austere ethical idealism of the Puritan long after she had thrown away the dogmatic expression of her faith.

In her life the Puritan side is always warring against the pagan side. She threw in her lot with Lewes while his wife was yet alive, but she was never easy about the step she had taken, though never regretting it. Radical and revolutionary in her outlook on life, she yet shrunk from revolt. Agnostic in her views, she is none the less mystical in her sympathies. Sensitive and dependent on others, yet associated in many minds with the oracular sibyl who presided over those famous Sunday "At Homes" in North London, this medley of psychological contradictions gave her additional insight as a writer; but it spoiled her life as a woman.

Yet her work expresses a clear and definite outlook on life.

Full as George Eliot's stories are of the tragedy of life, it is not surely the tragedy of circumstance so much as the tragedy of lost opportunities.

In Adam Bede, Romola, and Daniel Deronda, to mention none other of her books, there are opoclis in the lives of the characters which, taken at the flood, had led on to moral fortune. There were occasions—not merely one but several—when a stronger resolve would have changed the entire complexion of the future. Did Gwendolen Harloth enter upon her marriage with Grandcourt unwarned? Could any woman's eyes have been opened more convincingly with Lydia Glasher's impressive warning, than were Gwendolen's as to Grandcourt's character? Might not Tito time after time have repaired the injury done to his foster-father? No writer indeed more unswervingly upheld the trustworthiness of the moral instincts than did our author: even poor bewildered Dorothea exclaimed at a time of great difficulty:

"While desiring what is perfectly good, even though we don't quite know what it is, and cannot do what we would, we are part of the Divine power against the evil, widening the skirts of light, and making the struggle with darkness narrower."

"I can't argue any longer; I don't know what is wise, but my heart will not let me do it," cried Maggie.

" 'It's the will of them above,' observed Dolly Winthrop, 'as many things should be dark to us, but there are some things as I never feel in the dark about, and they are mostly what comes in the day's work.' "

At her worst George Eliot is laboured, self-conscious, and didactic, never trivial nor shallow. At her best she is rich in mellow wisdom and in sympathetic insight; and whatever her shortcomings as a story-teller, she has no rival and few peers in the power and poignancy of her psychology.

George Eliot is the last great name among the women writers of Victorian fiction, but there are many writers of the second and third rank, who achieved considerable popularity in their day. Among these may be mentioned that ingenious sentimentalist Mrs HENRY WOOD, who sometimes showed, as in East Lynne, a genius for big emotional situations, and one may add a genius for reducing them to the commonplace by her saccharine treatment of them.

Less sensational in her devices, though no less sentimental, is Mrs CRAIK, whose John Halifax, Gentleman, proved only second to East Lynne in its tear-compelling quality. Miss CHARLOTTE YONGE was once a name to conjure with, and her blend of Tractarianism and sentimental portraiture proved vastly to the taste of many, but the Heir of Redcliffe, despite numbering Rossetti among its admirers, is not among the novels that count.

Mrs OLIPHANT was a writer of great promise, whose commercial necessities spoiled, for undeniably she wrote far too much. That she did not do justice to herself in her plentiful and for the most part commonplace output, is evident, I think, from such a work of striking imagination as The Belton House. Among her other volumes, the best is The Chronicles of Carlingford, which has an agreeable Trollope-like flavour.

Mrs Oliphant's critical work is sound but undistinguished, but there is a good deal of merit in her posthumous book—The House of Blackwood.

Another woman with less artistic power than Mrs Oliphant, but with a real sense of letters, is Mrs E LYNN LINTON (1822-1898). Her essays in fiction by no means do justice to her gifts, but her power of incisive portraiture may be judged from her literary reminiscences and her trenchant, clever, though acrimonious article on George Eliot which she wrote for a volume dealing with some of the women novelists of the time. She was a bitter opponent of the feminist movement.

Two very popular writers of the later Victorian era deserve more than bare mention. These are M E BRADDON (Mrs Maxwell, 1837-1915) and OUIDA (1840-1908) (Miss Louise de la Ramée). Miss Braddon wrote a great deal of frankly sensational fiction, that makes little claim beyond that of pleasantly whiling away a railway journey. But among her many novels there are a few, Vixen and Ishmael, for example, that exhibit a more than average gift of delineating character, and real imaginative power; while in the art of constructing a story she has always proved a skilful adopter. Equally facile, but more unequal as a craftswoman, the lady who called herself "Ouida," is none the less a far more important figure. Despite the garishness that informs her fictions, and the grotesque extravagance that made her an easy prey for the parodist, she shows, especially in her stories of Italian life, an intensity of imagination, and a power of pathos, denied to all but the great story-tellers. Had she only been possessed of the "art to blot," and with a sense of humour, she might have ranked among the great novelists of the time. Some of her books, for example Two Little Wooden Shoes, Pascarel, Tricorin, have a fresh, picturesque charm of a high order. Her stories of Society life, e.g. Moths, though lacking the charm of her peasant studies, are often remarkably clever; and although she can rarely resist tearing a passion to tatters, the passions she tears are real passions. Indeed, her skill in depicting certain moods of sexual emotion can only be equalled in the pages of George Sand. With no humour, little power of self-criticism, little insight into character, poor as a story-teller, and inordinately fond of the loud pedal, she has produced a vast amount of fiction of the most tawdry kind, yet among the tinsel are considerable patches of unquestionable beauty and power. Her love of nature and power of visualising this may be matched in many contemporary story-tellers, but her love of art and the art atmosphere that she can create, is very rarely found among English novelists. To find its peer we must turn to the poets and artists of the Pre-Raphaelite school.

There are many other novelists of varying secondary merit, like RUONA BROUGHTON and EDNA LYALL, who proved pleasant and wholesome story-tellers for their generation, but whose work is undistinguished and lacking in staying power. With these, in an age of such enormous fecundity of production, it is impossible to deal in this necessarily restricted record.

II PROSE: (a) FICTION GEORGE MEREDITH His Life—His Work—The Poetic Impressionist—As a Critic of Life—His Courage—His Altruism

GEORGE MEREDITH (1828-1909)

HIS LIFE

Almost the last link connecting the present generation with mid-Victorian literature is George Meredith, and of few distinguished men is less known personally. We may, to quote Thackeray, do our best "to find out under what schoolmaster's ferule he was educated, where his grandmother was vaccinated, and so forth," but the natural reserve of the man precluded all possibility of gleaning personal details, in his whimsical way, he once threatened "to haunt" anyone who attempted to write his biography.

Born at Portsmouth on February 12, 1828, George Meredith was of Welsh and Irish descent, and was naturally very proud of his double Celtic origin—a fact that is noticeable throughout his work.

When quite a small boy he had the misfortune to lose his mother, and for some years he attended a day-school in Portsmouth, but on being made a ward in Chancery he was sent, at the age of fourteen, to the Moravian School at Neuwied-on-the-Rhine, which he left when sixteen. On returning to England he turned his unwilling attention to the law, which he soon abandoned for literature.

In 1849 Meredith's first poem, to commemorate the battle of Chillianwallah, was published in Chambers's Edinburgh Journal on July 7, and in the same year he married Mrs Nicholls, the young widow of a naval officer and daughter of Thomas Love Peacock, "a singularly brilliant and witty woman," who died in 1860. After their marriage, which proved an unhappy one, the young couple lived much on the Continent, eventually they took rooms at Weybridge, near Peacock's house in Lower Hallford, where a son, Arthur Gryffydd, was born in 1853, to whom his father was devotedly attached, and who died in 1880 after a tedious illness. In 1862 Meredith furnished a room in the house where Rossetti and Swinburne were living in Chelsea, but he used it little and left off going there altogether after a short time. Two years later a second marriage, with Miss Vulliamy, a lady of French Huguenot descent on her father's side, brought with it twenty-one years of unclouded happiness, and another son and a daughter. When Meredith refused to adopt the law as a profession he turned to journalistic work, and for a period contributed regularly to, and for a short while edited, the Ipswich Gazette. During the late fifties and early sixties he was also contributing articles to the Morning Post. Nothing but dire necessity, however, kept him at journalism. "I detest the writing for money," he said. "Journalism for money is Egyptian bondage." In 1866, on the outbreak of the war between Austria and Italy, he became war correspondent for the Morning Post, and made good use of this experience in Vittoria, a novel dealing with the Italian rising of 1848.

Towards the end of 1867, on the departure for America of Mr John Morley, then editor of the Fortnightly Review, Meredith was asked to undertake, and accepted, the editorship pro tem. He had succeeded John Forster as reader and literary advisor to the publishers Messrs Chapman & Hall, and was known as a sympathetic and painstaking if exacting reader. The encouragement that he so generously gave to promising young writers was in no way accorded himself. The first volume he published was a book of Poems (1851), which included Love in a Valley, dedicated to his father-in-law, Thomas Love Peacock. The Athenaeum reviewed these first-fruits as indicating "an artistic tendency in the singer, and to a certain extent a pledge, that one day he may be a poet." Then came the fantastic Shaving of Shagpat (1855), more kindly appreciated by George Eliot in the Westminster Review, as "a work of genius . . . an apple tree among the trees of the wood", yet it was nearly eleven years before a second edition was called for. Two years later came Farina.

The Ordeal of Richard Feverel (1859) met with a cold reception generally, and took twenty years to pass into a second edition, notwithstanding that the Tunes devoted three columns to an appreciative review. His next volume, Evan Harrington (1861), was all but ignored by the critics. Then came Modern Love (1862), that brought forth the Spectator's scathing criticism, and Swinburne's memorable protest in which he estimated Meredith as "one of the three or four poets now alive whose work, perfect or imperfect, is always as noble in design as it is often faultless in result." Emilia in England (now known as Sandra Belloni) followed in 1864, Rhoda Fleming (1865), Vittoria (1867), all of which had a poor sale, and Harry Richmond, one of the longest of his novels, in 1871. With Beauchamp's Career (1875) we find Meredith received almost with enthusiasm, and in this book we have one of Meredith's favourite characters, Renée de Croisnel: "I should certainly follow Nevil Beauchamp's example," he once said, "and challenge anyone who dared to make love to her."

With the publication of The Egoist came fame, in 1879. That forceful literary organ the Athenaeum, which had reviewed Farina as "a full-blooded specimen of the nonsense of genius," now generously praises The Egoist as "a piece of imaginative work as solid and rich as anything that the century has seen,—one of the strongest and most original productions of modern literature."

Thus has George Meredith won recognition of his genius. He had suffered neglect, but never lowered his standard to court the approval of the man in the street. "The first time or two I minded," he once said to a friend, "then I determined to disregard what people said altogether, and since then I have written only to please myself."

Following The Tragic Comedians (1880) came Diana of the Crossways (1885), an instant success, with yet another favourite in the Irish heroine—"She is one of the women dear to me," was the comment of the author.

Meredith now collected some of his poems and two volumes were issued—Poems of Tragic Life (1887) and A Reading of Earth (1888)—then returned to the novel with One of Our Conquerors (1890), and Lord Ormont and his Ancestress that ran serially in the Pall Mall Magazine in 1894. His last work, and one of the most popular, was The Amazing Marriage (1895) (Celt and Saxon, issued posthumously, but written at a much earlier date, was left unfinished).

Up to the end Meredith took an active interest in political and public affairs, and when unable to walk was carried into the polling station to record his vote at the last election. In early years he had worked on the Conservative side of political journalism, but eventually became an ardent Radical and Home Ruler, proudly quoting Gladstone as an instance of what a young man might become who started life as a Conservative. He had always a firm belief in the mission of woman; on his eightieth birthday he wrote to a correspondent, "We will hope that the days of the parasite woman are passing, however much they may delight a certain body of your sex and the greater number of mine."

A lover of all bodily exercise, walking was his favourite recreation, and he indulged in long "spins" across the Surrey downs that he loved so well and likened to greyhounds in full career, until the accident that brought his walking days to a close.

In 1892, on the death of Tennyson, Meredith was chosen to succeed the Laureate as President of the Incorporated Society of Authors; to commemorate his seventieth birthday he was presented with an address signed by a representative body of literary men and women, and to his eminent satisfaction he received the Order of Merit in 1905.

Young at heart, the aged novelist never felt he was growing old. "People talk about me as if I were an old man," he said when seventy-six; "I still look on life with a young man's eye." Although an invalid for the last few years of his life, Meredith kept in touch with the world and its doings, and to Flint Cottage, Boxhill, where he had lived for forty years, most of the prominent men and women in literature, art, politics, and society found their way. He was not fond of strangers, but his intimates he welcomed with delight, and was quite ready to talk with them in his clear, penetrating voice.

On May 18, 1909, came the end, painlessly and quietly, just as the dawn was breaking, five weeks subsequent to the death of Swinburne. After cremation, all that was mortal of George Meredith was laid to rest in Dorking churchyard.

HIS WORK

Meredith's early poems were published contemporarily with In Memoriam, and his early fiction mingles with the mature work of Dickens and the novels of George Eliot. The Ordeal of Richard Feverel, one of Meredith's finest books, was published in the same year as saw Adam Bede. Yet whereas the latter book was an overwhelming success, Meredith's book passed with scant notice. Indeed he had to wait thirty years for full recognition of his powers. Why was this?

It was due mainly to the eccentricities of the writer's style, that discouraged many at the outset from discovering the vigour and freshness of the thought or the bold imagination that would amply have compensated (had they but known it) for the close and patient attention demanded. It was due to a lesser extent also to an outlook on life which in no way repels the modern reader, but which failed to harmonise with some cherished Victorian ideals.

But the chief reason for the tardiness of recognition and the limited appeal lay in the style, and it must be frankly admitted that much of the difficulty here was gratuitous and wilful, since Meredith can be as musical as Tennyson, and as clear and straightforward as Fielding when he is so disposed. We must make full allowance, therefore, for a reading public that failed to recognise the great new force in fiction that had come among them. Meredith has written of Carlyle, what might well be applied to himself:

"A wind in the orchard style that tumbled down here and there an appreciable fruit with uncouth bluster sentences without commencements running to abrupt endings and smoke—all the pages in a breeze, the whole book producing a kind of electrical agitation in the mind and the joints."¹

The ordinary reader had to accustom himself to the electrical agitation before he could be grateful to the stimulating battery that produced it.

In considering the works of Meredith it will be useful to regard him from three points of view: as the satiric observer, as the poetic impressionist, and as a critic of life.

The Satiric Observer

There never has been a nimbler, shrewder observer of human nature than Meredith. His humour lacks the jolly geniality of Dickens, and the easy breadth of Fielding, but there is a keener intellectual vision behind. Less universal in his appeal as a humorist, he has no rival as a satirist, for his satire is keen, subtle, incisive; and never blunted as Dickens' occasionally was by over-emphasis, or as Thackeray's was by sentimentality. No Victorian novelist has a wider range of sympathy, or a shrewder vision. And in his Essay on Comedy we shall find a key to this satiric outlook:

"Folly is the natural prey of the Comic Spirit, known to it in all her transformations, in every disguise; and it is with the springing delight of hound after fox, that it gives her chase, never fretting, never tiring, sure of having her, allowing her no rest."

As a painter of contemporary English manners he has no peer. Inferior to his great contemporary, Hardy, in his treatment of the more elemental aspects of human nature, he transcends him, and indeed any other writer of his time, in the mixture of convention and primal instinct that go to make up the average civilised man. No one has given a more faithful picture of the Englishman with his merits and defects. The English, he said in one of his flashes of comic insight, are people requiring to be studied, who "mean well and who are warm somewhere below as chimney-pots are, though they are so stiff." He knew his aristocrats and "young barbarians," as Arnold called them, and saw clearly enough why and where they are found wanting.

"Grandmotherly laws—

Giving rivers of gold to our young
In the days of their hungers impure
To furnish them bread and claws,
And make them a banquet's lure."²

In the criticism of the democratic German Professor in Harry Richmond, Meredith puts the case excellently:

"The Professor would invite me to his room, after the 'sleep well' of the ladies, and I sat with him much like his pipe-bowl, which burned bright a moment at one sturdy puff, but generally gave out smoke in fantastical wreaths. He told me frankly he had a poor idea of my erudition. . . . One night he asked me what my scheme of life was. . . . Have you no aim? You have, or I am told you are to have, fabulous wealth—a dragon's heap. You are one of the main drain-pipes of English gold. What is your object? To spend it?"
"I shall hope to do good with it."

"To do good? There is hardly a prince or millionaire, in history or alive, who has not in his young days hugged that notion. Pleasure swarms, he has the pick of his market. You English live for pleasure!

"We are the hardest workers in the world!"

"That you may live for pleasure! Deny it!"

"He puffed his tobacco-smoke zealously, and resumed: 'Yes, you work hard for money. You eat and drink, and boast of your exercises; they sharpen your appetites. So goes the round. We strive, we fail, you are our frog-chorus of critics, and you suppose that your brek-ek-koax affects us. I say we strive and fail, but we strive on, while you remain in a past age, and are proud of it. You reprove us with the lack of common sense, as if the belly were its seat. Now I ask you whether you have a scheme of life, that I may know whether you are to be another of those huge human pumpkins called rich men, who cover your country and drain its blood and intellect—those impoverishers of nature! Here we have our princes, but they are rulers, they are responsible, they have their tasks, and if they also run to gounds, the scandal punishes them and their order, all in seasonable time. . . had enough!—had enough!—but they are not protected by laws in their right to do nothing for what they receive. That system is an invention of the commercial genius and the English!'"

Harry Richmond, in defence, cited our House of Lords

"We have our aristocracy, Herr Professor!"

But this only leads to another onslaught

"Your nobles are nothing but rich men inflated with empty traditions of insufferable, because unwarrantable, pride, and drawing substance from alliances with the merchant class. Are they your leaders? Do they lead you in letters? In the Arts? Ay, or in Government? No, not, I am informed, not even in military service! and there our titled wittings do manage to hold up their brainless pates. You are all in one mass, struggling in the stream to get out and he and wallow and belch on the banks. You work so hard that you have all but one aim, and that is fatness and ease!"

Yet no one is kinder to youth or more tolerant of its failings than he. His best men are neither prigs nor sentimentalists, they are strong, self-reliant, and reserved. Richard Feverel is limned with no less sympathy than discernment. He is an attractive young fellow in many ways, but selfish as headstrong youth is apt to be, and regardless of others. He means to enjoy life at all costs.

"When we have gone out and seized it in the highways, certain inscrutable laws are sure to be at work to bring us to the criminal bar sooner or later. . . . Richard Turpin wanted both—singing 'Money or life' to the world. Richard Feverel has done the same, substituting 'happiness' for money, frequently synonyms. He was just as much a highway robber as his fellow Dick, so that those who have failed to recognise him as a hero, may now regard him in that light. Meanwhile the world he has squeezed, looks exceedingly patient and beautiful!"

Naturally poor innocent Lucy suffers: for there is always a Lucy somewhere to suffer, when thoughtless young Dicks go their own sweet way.

In Sir Willoughby Patterno we have another, a subtler and more dangerous type of egotist held up to our notice. For his selfishness is not transparent as is Feverel's; and at first sight he seems as attractive as he is prosperous. But a brief acquaintance discloses the portentous insincerity of the man.

He is the sort of man who is always for purity in womanhood, and he is unhappy because his Clara has not come to him straight out of a cloister, unsullied by contact with the world, but he tries to comfort himself with the thought that she never (as he prays) will wed again. He loves to think of her as "My Widow." A chaste soul, say the foolish, not so, remarks Meredith. "This is not the cry of a noble austerity but the shriek of a gross voluptuousness." And Clara Middleton comes to see this, his overbearing vanity grates on her nerves; and she resolves to avoid the servitude so clearly marked out for her.

Through his mellow urbanity of manner she can see the tyrant, and she shivers.

"You are cold, my love!"

"I am not cold," said Clara. "Someone, I suppose, was walking over my grave." The gulf of a career hove in view like an enormous billow, hollowing under the curled wave. She stooped to a buttercup, the monster swept by."¹

An admirable passage. How better describe the engulfing waters of Sir Willoughby's egotism than by the term "the gulf of a career!"

Meredith is singularly happy in hitting off some character or quality in an epigrammatic phrase. How illuminating are such touches as these:

"Neat, insignificant and nervously cheerful, with the eyes of a bird that let you into no interior!"

"Algernon, the genius of champagne luncheons incarnate!"²

"It will be found a common case, that when we have yielded to our instincts and then have to soothe conscience, we must slaughter somebody as a sacrificial offering to our own comfort!"³

One of the most important tasks of Meredith as a satirist has been the de-sentimentalising of men and women. And just as he strips the prig and the sensualist of his tinsel, so with his women does he remove the conventional rose-pink that early Victorian writers particularly loved to cloak woman-kind in. What Fielding did for men, Charlotte Brontë did for women, drawing them frankly and sincerely from the life—and not from the conventions. Yet it is questionable whether many readers did not prefer the sentimental artificiality of Richardson and the literary Lowther Arcade of pink and white dolls, that most of the early Victorians, and mid-Victorians too, for that matter, provided for their readers' delectation. Neither Dickens nor Thackeray could escape from this absurd attitude towards woman—it needed another woman writer like George Eliot to lead back most story-tellers to a sound feminine psychology. Meredith, however, needed no leading. He was sound from the start. Admiring and reverencing passion; he had nothing but contempt for the washy sentimentality that so often did duty for passion, and for the unreal simpering puppets that passed for women. There is no better feminine company in English fiction than we may find in Meredith's women: some of Hardy's women are more fascinating, but they are also more wayward. Meredith's best women are both reliable and attractive, not a whit less feminine and desirable for being clear-headed and sound-hearted. Indeed Meredith's view of human nature is essentially a sane one :

"Philosophy bids us to see that we are not so pretty as rose-pink, not so repulsive as dirty drab, and that instead of overlastingly shifting those barren aspects, the sight of ourselves is wholesome, bearable, fructifying, finally a delight . . . And imagine the celestial refreshment of having a pure decency in the place of sham ; real flesh, a soul born active, wind-beaten, but ascending. Honourable will fiction then appear, honourable, a taint of life, an aid to life, quick with our blood . . . Worse than that alternative dirty drab, your recurring rose-pink is rebuked by hideous revelations of the filthy foul, for nature will force her way, and if you try to stifle her by drowning, she comes up, not the fairest part of her uppermost !" ¹

Meredith had a hearty belief in the beneficent antiseptic of humour

"Comedy hits women to a station offering them free play for their wit, as they usually show it, when they have it, on the side of sound sense. The higher the Comedy, the more prominent the part they enjoy in it . . . The heroines of Comedy are like women of the world, not necessarily heartless from being clear-sighted. They seem so to the sentimentally reared only for the reason that they use their wits, and are not wandering vessels crying for a captain or a pilot. Comedy is an exhibition of their battle with men, and that of men with them ; and as the two, however divergent, both look on one object, namely, life, the gradual similarity of their impressions must bring them to some resemblance. The comic poet dares to show us men and women coming to this mutual likeness, he is for saying that when they draw together in social life their minds grow liker, just as the philosopher discerns the similarity of boy and girl, until the girl is marched away to the nursery" ²

The Poetic Impressionist

Meredith's strength as a poet lies in his luxuriant imagination. Sometimes it proves too luxuriant for us, its crowded opulence fatigues while it delights ; and the multiplicity of its beauties detract in place of impressing. "There are more ways of killing a cat than by choking it with cream," runs an old adage, and there are more ways of wearying a reader than by inundating him with beauties. But after all the end is the same, and it is small consolation to the drowning man to be told that he is being drowned in the choicest Malmsey wine. With this small grumble, let us offer an ample mood of praise to the extraordinary beauty and fresh suggestiveness of much of Meredith's poetry, to that Spring melody, Love in a Valley ; to the fine tragic complexities of Modern Love ; to the glorious Hymn to Colour ; to the fresh vigour of Juggling Jerry ; to the simple yet deep wisdom of The Woods of Westermain ; to the inspiring Reading of Life, and to the technical brilliance of The Spirit of Earth in Autumn. Intellectual preoccupations do not mar his music in the same way as Browning's were sometimes wont to do, but the obscurities that baffle and worry the reader in certain poems are due no less to the recondit character of his images than to the rapidity with which he utters them. It is not his insistent intellectuality (that is part of the man's temperament, and if you object to that you will get little good from Meredith) but his unhappy syntax, crushed and breathless under the beauties he crowds so unpitying into it, that makes him no easy poet to construe. As Mr. Trevelyan aptly says in his admirable study of Meredith, "Metaphor is both his strength and his undoing." Browning baffles us because he tells us too little of what is in his mind, Meredith because he tells us too much, and it is quite possible to have too much of a good thing despite the whimsical Elia. But we must not be unmindful of the quality of the profusion ; and the tangled growth contains sweet and precious things. Meredith was certainly a great poet ; though he is too often not a great artist. No one but a great poet could have written "As lovers to whom Time is whispering," or "Maiden still the Morn is," and

"Strange she is, and secret,
Strange her eyes ;
Her cheeks are cold as cold sea-shells" ³

or

"So royal, unuttered, is Youth's dream
Of power within to strike without." ²

No one but a great poet could have given us so fine a sonnet as the following

"An inspiration caught from dubious hues,
Filled him, and mystic wrappings he chased,
For they lead farther than the single-faced,
Wave snibler promise when desire pursues,
The moon of cloud discoloured was his Muse,
His pipe the rind of the old moaning waste
Love was to him with anguish fast enlaced,
And Beauty where she walked blood-shot the dew,
Men railed at such a singer, women thrilled
Responsively, he sang not Nature's own
Divinest, but his lyric had a tone,
As 'twere a forest-echo of her voice :
What barrenly they yearn for seemed distilled
From what they dread, who do through tears rejoice," ³

and none but a wilful artist the chaotic Ode to the Comic Spirit

Sometimes the poet and the critic in Meredith might have exchanged media, with advantage. The Shaving of Shagpat would have made an even better verse than prose romance, and The Empty Purse would have gained in effectiveness considerably by being written in prose.

Mention of The Shaving of Shagpat, with its luscious romanticism—just sharpened sufficiently by Meredith's keen humour, to prevent it from cloying—reminds us of the value of Meredith's poetic impressionism in his prose writings. With certain reservations, indeed, Meredith's imagination moves more easily and effectively in prose than in verse.

Romanticism and wit lie cheek by jowl in Meredith's nature. His keen satire is saved from cynicism by the warmth of his imagination. The poetic beauty of his novels is no less insistent than the wit. Indeed they serve as excellent foils the one for the other. Just as his romanticism keeps him human and largely sympathetic, so does his wit save him from sentimentality.

He uttered no more characteristic saying than this :

"You may estimate your capacity for comle perception by being able to detect the ridicule of them you love without loving them less."¹

Meredith chides those he loves and scorns a passion that will not bear the breath of humour. Yet though he will laugh at his lovers he never laughs at love. Even adolescent passion is sacred to him. Take for instance this delightful passage from Lord Ormont and his Auntie.

"She had a nice mouth, ready for a smile at the corners, or so it was before Matey let her see that she was his mark. Now she kept her mouth asleep and her eyes half down, up to the moment of her hearing to pass, when the girl opened on him, as if lifting her eyelids from sleep to the window, a full side-look, like a throb, and no disguise—no slyness or boldness either, not a bit of languishing. You might think her heart came quietly out.

"The look was like the fall of light on the hulls from the first of morning. It lasted half a minute, and left a ruffle for a good half-hour."

Pitched in a more lyric key is the famous scene in Feverel.

"Lucy was simply dressed, befitting decency and the season. This blooming young person was regaling on dewberries. They grew between the bank and the water . . . The little skylark went up above her, all song, to the smooth southern cloud lying along the blue from a dewy copse standing dark over her nodding hat the blackbird fluted, calling to her with thrice mellow note the kingfisher flashed oncrad out of green osiers, a bow-winged heron travelled aloft, seeking solitude. a boat slipped toward her, containing a dreamy youth; and still she plucked the fruit, and ate, and mused, as if no fairy prince were invading her territories, and as if she wished not for one, or knew not her wishes . . . Still and stiler grew nature, as at the meeting of two electric clouds . . . To-morrow this place will have a memory—the river and the meadow, and the white falling weir, his heart will build a temple here, and the skylark will be its high priest, and the old blackbird its glossy-gowned chorister, and there will be a sacred repast of dewberries."²

In his feminine characterisations, the wit and poet often blend with happiest results, as in the picture of Renée in Venice:

"She was like a delicate cup of crystal brimming with the beauty of the place . . . Her features had the soft irregularities which run to rarities of beauty, as the ripple rocks the light, mouth, eyes, brow, nostrils, and lilooiny cheek played into one another liquidly, thought flew, tongue followed, and the flash of meaning quivered over them like night lightning. Her age was but newly sevonteen and she was French."³

Meredith excels especially in the delineation of women, uniting strong affection with nuble intelligence. His heroines have nothing of the early Victorian "Dolly" flavour about them. They are the true comrades and co-equals of men. Yet no one disliked the masculine type of woman more than he did. His contempt for the "waxwork sex" was only equalled by his dislike for the "pamphlet in petticoats"; of one of this kind he declared "that after a probationary term in the character of man she had become woman"; of another, "that she had relapsed upon religion and little dogs."

Meredith's romanticism is better expressed in prose than in verse. His ebullient and vital imagination moves more easily in the ampler margin of prose than when bound by rhyme and metre. Yet over intellectualised as is his verse, and more disturbed than his prose by distressing mannerisms, there is a wealth of power and beauty in his poetry. Nothing is more interesting here than his attitude towards nature. There is nothing of the transcendentalism in Meredith that we find in most poets of Nature. It were better to call it Earth worship than Nature worship. Nature for him was not a brooding spirit of peace as for Wordsworth, nor the swift-winged spirit of Love as with Shelley, nor on the other hand was it more an exquisite mechanism, unmoral if not immoral, as with Tennyson—nor a cheery, amusing, joyful comrade as to Browning.

The Earth to Meredith is a kind, though Spartan mother—who attracts us to her by those elemental bonds that tell us that we came from her, yet repels us because she has nothing but silence or grim rebuffs for our desperate hopes and high aspirations. Man

"May entreat, aspire,
He may despair, and she has never heed
She drinking his warm sweat will soothe his need—
Not his desire."¹

Man cannot do without the rough, yet needful education of this great Mother. Something of what we may learn from her Meredith gives us in Melampus (the physician naturalist).

"For him the woods were a home
And gave him the Key of Knowledge"

Meredith's joy in earth, however, as a source of inspiration and strength, will be noted more fully later, here we may watch his joy in the sheer sensuous beauty of Earth. Fresh charms appear, now graces even to those familiar with Earth.

"A wonder edges the familiar face, . . .
Half strange seems Earth and sweeter than her Flowers."²

In such poems as The Thrush in February, The South-Wester, The Lark Ascending, the splendour and rapture of the physical world find eloquent speech.

Of the lark :

"He rises and begins to round :
He drops the silver chain of sound
Of many links without a break,
In churru, whistle, slur, and shake :

All interwolved and spreading wide,
Like water-dimples down a tide,
Where ripple, ripple overours
And eddy into eddy whirls."³

Then there is the magic of Spring—perhaps a shade too studied at times—in Love in a Valley; and the delicate and suggestive beauty of The Orchard and the Heath.

Of the longer poems, perhaps the fine and opulent

Hymn to Colour is the most remarkable for its artistic workmanship

As a Critic of Life

In the first place we note his sense of Individuality. Meredith is full of life, ebullient life. A born fighter, and a lover of conflict, he holds:

"Nothing the body suffers, the soul may not profit by"

"Resolution is a form of light; our native light is thus darkened world."

Yet self-confidence he distrusted; there you have the mere drum and the trumpet. Reliance should be moderate and quiet. A respect for nature is the beginning of wisdom.

"Our life is but a little holding Lent to do a mighty labour"¹

"In tragic life God wot, no villain need be!
Passions spin the plot;
We are betrayed by what is false within"²

"Fools run jabbering of the irony of fate, to escape the annoyance of tracing the cause"

With this Individuality comes Power to contend. There is no sentimental blindness about Meredith. Life to him is a hard business, but, as with Browning, its very hardness yields a joy to the brave heart.

Meredith is a born fighter. No maundorings for him. Laugh, he says,—Honest laughter purifies and uplifts, but the laughter must be with your fellows, not merely at them. Unlike Ibsen and Tolstoy, he does not despair of his age—or content himself with noting the "bad potatoes," or denying the physical side of life.

The third quality on which he insists is the Greek quality of Temperance. Asceticism and sensuality are extremes to be avoided. Thus he parts way with the modern hedonist on the one hand and Tolstoy on the other.

Body and soul. Each is desirable: each has its place in the scheme of life. "We do not get to any heaven by renouncing the Mother we sprang from, and when there is an eternal secret for us, it is best to believe that Earth knows, to keep near her even in our utmost aspiration."

"Enter these enchanted woods, you who dare!" This is his cry. We must experience the harshness of Earth before we can understand her. She is both cruel and kind. Do not let us sentimentalise on the one hand, or make of her a monster on the other. We need her discipline: "Through Nature only can we ascend. St. Simon saw the Hog in Nature, and took Nature for the Hog." In Meredith's Earth worship we see happily illustrated the temperate outlook. He would neither bid us like the elder Nature poets, find our chief inspiration and consolation in Nature; nor, like the town-lovers, plunge us into the stimulus of crowds. He deplours the life in great cities under existing conditions, but does not on that account sigh for the rural solitudes of the past.

"Not solitarily in fields we find
Earth's secret open, though one page is there;
Her plainest, such as children spill, and share
With bird and beast; raised letters for the blind,

¹ Victoria.

² Modern Love.

Not where the troubled passions toss the mind,
In turbid cities, can the key be bare.
It hangs for those who hither thither fare,
Close interthreading nature with our kind."¹

Each is man's heritage, from both may we learn wisdom and find strength. Nor need we shun evil as the ascetic does; we must seek out the polluted spring and understand the source of the pollution. Not otherwise can we contend against it. If you want to defeat your enemy you must study his ways and habits first of all. But do not moan over the dark side of life. Fight it when necessity calls; for the rest, enjoy the good and sweet things of life, and keep your face in the sunshine.

Life depends not on self-satisfaction but on service to others. Without altruism we decay and rot. To live selfishly is not merely wrong, it is foolish, for the higher our aim the richer our power. There are insoluble problems to be faced; do not let us maundor over them. After all, the most tragic thing is not death nor pain, but "an unteachable spirit." What man needs is—blood, brain, and spirit; each acting in co-operation.

"Blood and brain and spirit—three . . .
Join for true felicity—
Are they parted, then expect
Someone sailing will be wrecked"²

That is the test—we need the triad. Do not let us part them. Life is a mingled warp of good and bad—and if you would do your part, you must train your eye with every function of body and soul.

"Intellect and reverence," he once wrote, "must clash to the end of time if we persist in regarding the spirit of Life as a remote existence, who plays the human figures to bring about this or that issue, instead of being beside us, within us, our breath, if we will, marking in us where at each step we sink to the animal and mount to the divine, we and ours who follow, offspring of body or mind."

Possess in yourself, says Meredith in effect, a love of the light, and you shall be enabled to read the secret of the darkness.

"Overhead, overhead
Rushes life in a race
As the clouds the clouds chase;
And we go,
And we drop like the fruits of the tree
Even we—Even so"³

It may be so, but our work does not drop, nor our influence.

Finally, Meredith admonishes us to combine cheerfulness with our courage. Let us fight grimly, look the world laughingly in the face. He believed profoundly in the beneficence of laughter.

"O thou reviver of sick Earth:
Good for the spirit, good for the body.
Thou to both art wine and bread"⁴

Fate is cruel, you say; well, face the wind and take its keen edge without repriming.

A gullant personality lie, a stimulating novelist, an arresting poet certainly, but above all, a spiritual tonic influence in English life and letters.

AND THIS IS THE TRUE STORY OF BHANAVAR
THE BEAUTIFUL

Know that at the foot of a lofty mountain of the Caucasus there lieth a deep blue lake; near to this lake a nest of serpents, wise and ancient. Now it was the habit of a damsel to pass by the lake early at morn, on her way from the tents of her tribe to the pastures of the flocks. As she pressed the white arch of her feet on the soft green-mossed grasses by the shore of the lake she would let loose her hair, looking over into the water, and bind the braid again round her temples and behind her ears, as it had been in a lucid mirror—so doing she would laugh. Her laughter was like the falls of water at moon-rise; her loveliness like the very moonrise, and she was stately as a palm-tree standing before the moon.

This was Bhanavar the Beautiful

Now, the damsel was betrothed to the son of a neighbouring Emir, a youth comely, well-fashioned, skilled with the bow, apt in all exercises, one that sat his mare firm as the trained falcon that fixeth on the plunging hull of the plains, fair and terrible in combat as the lightning that strideth the rolling storm, and it is sung by the poet

When on his desert mare I see
My prince of men,
I think him then
As high above humanity
As he shines radiant over me

Lo! like a torrent he doth bound,
Breasting the shock
From rock to rock

A pillar of storm, he shakes the ground,
His turban on his temples wound

Match mo for worth to be adored
A youth like him
In heart and limb!

Swift as his anger is his sword,
Softer than woman his true word.

Now, the love of this youth for the damsel Bhanavar was a consuming passion, and the father of the damsel and the father of the youth looked fairly on the prospect of their union, which was near, and was plighted as the union of the two tribes. So they met, and there was no voice against their meeting, and all the love that was in them they were free to pour forth far from the hearing of men, even where they would. Before the rising of the sun, and ere his setting, the youth rode swiftly from the green tents of the Emir his father, to waylay her by the waters of the lake, and Bhanavar was there, bonding over the lake, her image in the lake glowing like the fair fulness of the moon, and the youth leaned to her from his steed, and sang to her verses of her great loveliness ere she was wistful of him. Then she turned to him and laughed lightly a welcome of sweetness, and shook the falls of her hair across the blushes of her face and her bosom, and he folded her to him, and those two would fondle together in the fashion of the betrothed ones (the blessing of Allah be on them all), gazing on each other till their eyes swam with tears, and they were nigh swooning with the fulness of their bliss. Surely it was an innocent and tender dalliance and their prattle was that of lovers till the time of parting, he showing her how she looked best—she him; and they were forgetful of all else that is, in their sweet interchange of flatteries, and the world was a wilderness to them both when the youth parted with Bhanavar by the brook which bounded the tents of her tribe.

It was on a night when they were so together, the damsel leaning on his arm, her eyes towards the lake, and lo! what seemed the reflection of a large star in the water, and there was darkness in the sky above it, thick clouds, and no sign of the heavens; so she held her face to him, sideways, and said, "What meaneth this, O my betrothed? for there is reflected in yonder lake a light as of a star, and there is no star visible this night."

The youth trembled as one in trouble of spirit, and exclaimed, "Look not on it, O my soul! It is of evil omen."

But Bhanavar kept her gaze constantly on the light, and the light increased in lustre, and the light became, from a pale sad splendour, dazzling in its brilliancy. Listening, they heard presently a gurgling noise as of one deeply drinking. Then the youth sighed a heavy sigh and said, "This is the Serpent of the Lake drinking of its waters, as is her wont once every moon, and whose hearth her drink by the sheening of that light is under a destiny dark and imminent, so know I my days are numbered, and it was foretold of me, thus!" Now the youth sought to dissuade Bhanavar from gazing on the light, and he flung his whole body before her eyes, and clasped her head upon his breast, and clung about her, caressing her, yet she slipped from him, and she cried, "Toll me of this serpent, and of this light!"

So he said, "Seek not to hear of it, O my betrothed!" Then she gazed at the light a moment more intently, and turned her fair shape towards him, and put up her long white fingers to his chin, and smoothed him with their softness, whispering, "Toll me of it, my life!"

And so it was that her winningness melted him, and he said, "O Bhanavar! the serpent is the Serpent of the Lake; old, wise, powerful; of the brood of the sacred mountain, that lieth by day a peak of gold, and by night a point of solitary silver. In her head, upon her forehead, between her eyes, there is a Jewel, and it is this light."

Then she said, "How came the Jewel there, in such a place?"

He answered, "'Tis the growth of one thousand years in the head of the serpent."

She cried, "Surely precious?"

He answered, "Beyond price!"

As he spoke the tears streamed from him, and he was shaken with grief, but she noted nought of this, and watched the wonder of the light, and its increasing, and quivering, and lengthening, and the light was as an arrow of beams and as a globe of radiance. Desire for the Jewel waxed in her, and she had no sight but for it alone crying, "'Tis a Jewel exceeding in preciousness all jewels that are, and for the possessing it would I forfeit all that is."

So he said sorrowfully, "Our love, O Bhanavar! and our hopes of espousal!"

But she cried, "No question of that! Prove now thy passion for me, O warrior! and win for me that Jewel!"

Then he pleaded with her, and exclaimed, "Urgo not this! The winning of the Jewel is worth my life, and my life, O Bhanavar—surely its breath is but the love of thee!"

So she said, "Thou fearest the risk?"

And he replied, "Little fear I, my life is thine to cast away. This Jewel it is evil to have, and evil followeth the soul that hath it."

Upon that she cried, "A trick to cheat me of the Jewel! Thy love is wanting at the proof!"

And she taunted the youth, her betrothed, and turned from him, and hardened at his tenderness, and made her sweet shape as a thorn to his caressing, and his heart was charged with anguish for her. So at the last, when he had wept a space in silence, he cried, "Thou hast willed it, the Jewel shall be thine, O my soul!"

Then said he, "Thou hast willed it, O Bhanavar! and my life is as a grain of sand weighed against thy wishes, Allah is my witness! Meet me therefore here, O my beloved, at the end of one quarter-moon, even beneath the shadow of this palm-tree, by the lake, and at this hour, and I will deliver into thy hands the Jewel. So farewell! Wind me once more about with thine arms that I may take comfort from thee."

When their kiss was over the youth led her silently to the brook of their parting—the clear, cold, bubbling brook—and passed from her sight; and the damsel was exulting, and leapt and made circles in her glee, and she danced and rioted and sang, and clasped her hands, crying, "If I am now Bhanavar the Beautiful, how shall I be when the Jewel is upon me, the bright light which beameth in the darkness, and needeth to light it no other light? Surely there will be envy among the maidens and the widows, and my name and the odour of my beauty will travel to the courts of far kings."

So was she jubilant; and her sisters that met her marvelled at her and the deep glow that was upon her, even as the glow of the Great Desert when the sun has fallen; and they said among themselves, "She is covered all over with the blush of one that is a bride, and the bridegroom's kiss yet burneth upon Bhanavar!"

So, they undressed her and she lay among them, and was all night even as a bursting rose in a vase filled with drooping lilies, and one of the maidens that put her hand on the left breast of Bhanavar felt it full, and the heart beneath it panting and beating swifter than the ground struck by hooves of the chosen steed sent by the Chieftain to the city of his people with news of victory and the summons for rejoicing.¹

THOMAS HARDY. His Life His Work—The Interpreter of Nature—The Interpreter of Character—The Interpreter of Life.

THOMAS HARDY

HIS LIFE

MR THOMAS HARDY was born on June 2, 1840, at Upper Bockhampton near Dorchester, in the neighbourhood of which he has lived a retired and secluded life, averse to the public gaze, for practically the whole of his long and busy life; and it is to him we are indebted for the revival of the old name of Wessex for that part of beautiful southern England.

Though destined by his parents for the Church, his own thoughts turned into a different channel. In 1857 he was articled to Mr Hicks of Dorchester, an ecclesiastical architect, and his daily work entailed many professional jaunts to remote country churches. How characters and scenes accumulated in the notebook of his brain, to bear fruitful transcription in the future, can be readily traced throughout his writings.

A studious reader from boyhood of all that is best in our literature, in 1860 Mr Hardy went up to London, became a student of modern languages at King's College, and at the same time pursued the study of modern Gothic architecture under Sir Arthur Blomfield. In 1863 he gained the prize and medal of the Institute of British Architects for an essay on Coloured Brick and Terra Cotta Architecture, and the Tite prize for architectural design. His first appearance in print, however, seems to have been an unsigned article, How I Built Myself a House, published on March 18, 1865, in Chambers' Magazine.

It is hoped we may be pardoned for recalling an interesting incident in connection with Mr Hardy's first essay in novel writing.

In the late Mr George Meredith's capacity as a publisher's reader a manuscript, entitled The Poor Man and the Lady, fell into his hands. He at once recognised its merit, but its general tone, in Meredith's opinion, was likely to militate against a successful future for an unfledged novelist, and a meeting took place between the two men who were to do so much for modern English fiction. Meredith's friendly criticism and advice, with the refusal of the manuscript, were taken in good part, and Mr Hardy gave us Desperate Remedies (1871) in its stead. How interesting it would be to read that earlier effort to-day

Mr Hardy has given us a considerable amount of both prose and poetry, since Desperate Remedies, perhaps a classified rather than a chronological list may be found both interesting and helpful.

(1) Pastoral Tragedies: The Return of the Native (1878), The Mayor of Casterbridge (1886), Tess of the D'Urbervilles (1891), The Symptom and Hearts Insurgent, published serially in 1894 and 1895, revised and issued as Jude the Obscure (1896).

(2) Pastoral Comedies: The Hand of Ethelberta (1875), A Laodicean (1881), Two on a Tower (1882).

(3) Pastoral Romances: Under the Greenwood Tree (1872), Far from the Madding Crowd (1874), A Pair of Blue Eyes (1875), The Trumpet Major (1880), The Woodlanders (1887).

(4) Pastoral Extravaganza: The Well-Beloved (1897), published serially as The Pursuit of the Well-Beloved in 1892.

(5) The volumes of short stories uniting the above classifications: Wessex Tales (1883), A Group of Noble Dames (1891), Lily's Little Ironies (1894), and A Changed Man (1913), the last volume includes The Romantic Adventures of a Milkmaid, which first appeared in the Graphic in 1883.

Between 1894 and 1913 Mr Hardy turned his attention to poetry, and gave us Wessex Poems (1898), Poems of the Past and Present (1901), an epic-drama, The Dynasts, in three parts (1903, 1906, 1908), Time's Laughing Stocks (1909), and Satires of Circumstances (1914).

HIS WORK

The key to Hardy's attitude as a literary artist may be found in an essay published by him in 1888:

"The conduct of the upper classes is screened by conventions and thus the real character is not easily seen, if it is seen it must be portrayed subjectively, whereas in the lower walks conduct is a direct expression of the inner life, and thus character can be directly portrayed through the act. In one case the author's word has to be taken as to the nerves and muscles of his figures, in the other they can be seen."

Reading this we realise at once how it is that he moves with such ease and sureness over the canvas when he is dealing with simple, primal natures, how it is that a certain awkwardness and theatricality show themselves whenever he has to deal with the more complex character of the highly civilised man and woman.

It is precisely here that he is at the opposite pole from Meredith. It was these complexities, this wavering between "Adam and Macadam," that delighted Meredith, and evoked his best work. To Meredith, and for the matter of that to Henry James too, character begins to be really interesting only when it is "not easily seen." Hardy's strength, as well as his inclination, lay in tracing the elemental things of life, and this is why he has annexed Wessex as his province and left London and town society, for the most part, severely alone.

Hitherto the West Country had been the special province of the Romancers, and as a rule—Jane Austen being the most notable exception—the writer of fiction, when he elected for incident, chose the country districts as his milieu, when he desired to emphasize character, he placed his story in a town setting. Was not the return to Nature itself a step towards the upsetting of many conventions and a restoration of the simpler, more primal, less artificial life of the open spaces? Hardy's great distinction lies in his putting on one side the romantic point of view, and adopting a deliberating and scientific observant method of treating the life of the country-side.

Interesting as Hardy's stories always are, arresting, even exciting as they are sometimes, the appeal to the reader does not lie in any skilful manipulation for incident. It lies in a treatment of character—as the inevitable outcome of a special environment. It is here that Hardy differs from George Eliot, with whose psychological methods his work shows certain affinities.

No English novelist of our age has been more affected by science than Hardy. The immutability of Nature, the mutability of human life, the hugeness of Nature, the littleness of man, the inexorable character of natural laws, the puny struggles of human personalities trying to evade them. What Buckle did in history, Hardy has done in fiction, taken for his themes the unimportance of the individual man.

Now all this might conceivably have proved very unattractive in a story teller, whatever criticism may be passed on it from a philosophic standpoint, if Mr Hardy shows himself to be nothing more than a scientific observer. But he is also, and quite as emphatically, a poetic observer. He has a sensitive, brooding imagination, that loves to play over the past, and see in the mouldering relics of a bygone age symbols of a pomp and power that still can unconsciously affect the imagination and lives of men, he is for ever noticing those transmitted impulses of pagan feeling and religious sentiment that run through generations, watching with intense pre-occupation the mingling of the finer elemental qualities, sexual devotion, pity, courage, endurance, with the coarser "ape and tiger" instincts, showing a marked affinity as an observer of peasant life with the naturalism of writers like Zola, he suffuses his naturalism with a rarer delicacy and beauty.

Hardy's work may be considered under three aspects: as an interpreter of Nature—the descriptive artist; as an interpreter of Character—the analytical artist; as an interpreter of Life—the philosophic artist.

The Interpreter of Nature

Hardy's love of the earth is an intensely personal and local one. What Scott felt for the Tweed and Morris for the scenery of the Thames, Hardy feels for the heaths and pastures of Wessex. It has little in common with the transcendental love of nature felt by poets like Wordsworth and Shelley; though in its concrete expression it reminds us often of Wordsworth's brooding spirit, it is the reverse of Wordsworthian in its note of sadness and fatality.

But in sensitive tactility, he is supreme. Without overwhelming you with his intimate knowledge of natural phenomena, he can make you feel, by his delicate and multifold allusiveness, the significance of the country's life. The individuality of the damp and fragrant woods; the meaning of the wind's voice, whether for storm or peace; the premonition of the tempest, the spirit of the heath at every hour of the day and night, above all, the mystic relation between the toiling peasants and the hills and valleys where they live and move and have their being.

"Gusts in innumerable series followed each other from the north-west, and when each one of them raced past, the sound of its progress resolved into three treble, tenor, and bass notes were to be found therein. The general ricochet of the whole over pits and prominences had the gravest pitch of the chime. Next there could be heard the baritone buzz of a holly-tree. Below those in force, above them in pitch, a dwindled voice strove hard at a husky tune, which was the peculiar local sound alluded to"—that is, the sound of the wind in the heather—"like the ruins of human song which remain to the throat of fourscore and ten. It was a worn whisper, dry and papery, and it brushed so distinctly across the ear that, by the accustomed, the material minutiae in which it originated could be realised as by touch. One inwardly saw the infinity of those combined multitudes, and perceived that each of the tiny trumpets was seized on, entered, scoured, and emerged from the wind as thoroughly as if it were as vast as a crater.

"The spirit moved them."

In fact, his interpretation of nature gives us the clue to his outlook on men and women. To understand the self-sacrificing love of Marty South we must realise the spell of the brooding woods, the magic of the quiet, enduring trees, whose life she knew so well. To understand the attraction of the Reddleman, with his vagrant aloofness, we must first be made to feel the fascination of Egdon Heath in all its moods.

Everywhere the life of the earth and of its denizens is subtly and inextricably interwoven. Take, for instance, this passage, where naturalistic knowledge is charged with poetic feeling, and ask yourself whether after reading it you do not see more intensely into the nature of the woodlander—Winterbourne.

Winterbourne's work sums up and explains the men—yet there are subtleties in tree-planting that Marty South's feminine nature seizes upon more readily.

"The holes were already dug, and they set to work. Winterbourne's fingers were endowed with a gentle conjuror's touch in spreading the roots of each little tree, resulting in a sort of caress under which the delicate fibres all laid themselves out in their proper directions for growth. He put most of these roots towards the south-west; for, he said, in forty years' time, when some great gale is blowing from that quarter, the trees will require the strongest holdfast on that side to stand against it and not fall.

"How they sigh directly we put 'em upright, though while they are lying down they don't sigh at all," said Marty.

"Do they?" said Giles. "I've never noticed it."

"She erected one of the young pines into its hole, and held up her finger, the soft musical breathing instantly set in, which was not to cease night or day till the grown tree should be felled—probably long after the two planters had been felled themselves."

"It seems to me," the girl continued, "as if they sigh because they are very sorry to begin life in earnest—just as we be."

"Just as we be?" He looked critically at her. "You ought not to feel like that, Marty."

"Her only reply was turning to take up the next; and they planted on through a great part of the day, almost without another word."

The merest snatch of dialogue while the two are at work, yet, how it reveals their natures and how bound up it all is with the larger love of the earth.

Again, if we enter intimately into the human aspects of The Return of the Native, we must first know our Egdon. This passage helps us in the understanding "The sombre stretch of rounds and hollows seemed to rise and meet the evening gloom in pure sympathy, the heath exhaling darkness as rapidly as the heavens precipitated it. . . The place became full of a watchful intentness now, for when other things sank brooding to sleep, the heath appeared slowly to awake and listen. Every night its titanic form seemed to await something, but it had waited thus unmoved during so many centuries, through the crises of so many things, that it could only be imagined to await one last crisis—the final overthrow. Twilight combined with the scenery of Egdon Heath to evolve a thing majestic without severity, impressive without showiness, emphatic in its admonitions, grand in its simplicity."

As an Interpreter of Character

In his loving knowledge of the earth, we have the key to the Kingdom of Hardy. Possessing it, we may see more clearly into the character of the dramatic personae. His figures are elemental forces on a background of vaster elemental forces; they are the natural expression of sleepy woodland places, gaunt, austere hills, purling streams, lonely open spaces.

And if this be the case we are prepared to find that their creator insists especially upon the emotional life of his characters. His very choice of types leads him away from those intellectual complexities that delight some novelists.

It has been said, "His greatest successes are with subtle characters." Is this so? Surely his men and women are the most vividly actualised when they are simple, primal characters. Rustics such as Poorgrass and Dewey; sturdy young countrymen like Winterbourne; passionate wayward women such as Eustacia Vye; plausible scamps like Sergeant Troy.

Admirable as many of his male characters are, they yield both in clarity and intensity of interest to his women, and since woman is more elemental than man, swayed far more by the instinctive life, their superiority is another illustration of Hardy's peculiar skill in dealing with the primal type.

The outstanding characters in Hardy's fiction are incalculable if you like, but that does not make them subtle. He is at his very best in dealing with what Charlotte Brontë so well called "The Stormy Sisterhood." But a thunderstorm is not subtle.

Subtle characters, it is true, he did essay at times, and he was too fine a psychologist to fail entirely in portraying them, but they are vastly inferior to his simple and more primal types. Fitzpiers is a shadow beside Winterbourne; Paula and Mrs. Charmond are certainly less real and vital than Bathsheba or Tess.

But if his best characters are not subtle and complex, the art that depicts his characters assuredly is; for he can record the minutest fluctuations of emotional experience, and make them real and actual, it is this power which brings home to us with sureness the vital, full-blooded, and essentially fine-hearted Tess. I am not sure, however, that Eustacia Vye is not drawn with even greater power than Tess—for the philosopher obtrudes less often here than he does with the later creation.

The following pen picture of Eustacia Vye, in The Return of the Native, has no rival in Hardy's pages, for its convincing touches:

"Eustacia Vye was the raw material of a divinity. On Olympus she would have done well with a little preparation. She has the passions and instincts which make a model goddess—that is, those which make not quite a model woman. Had it been possible for the earth and mankind to be entirely in her grasp for a while, had she handled the distaff, the spindle, and the shears at her own free will, few in the world would have noticed the change of government. There would have been the same inequality of lot, the same heaping up of favours here, of contumely there, the same generosity before justice, the same dilemmas, the same capacious alternation of caresses and blows that we endure now.

"She was in person full-limbed and somewhat heavy; without ruddiness, as without pallor, and soft to the touch as a cloud. To see her hair was to fancy that a whole winter did not contain darkness enough to form its shadow. . .

"She had Pagan eyes, full of nocturnal mysteries. Their light, as it came and went, and came again, was partially hampered by their oppressive lids and lashes; and of these the under lid was much fuller than it usually is with Englishwomen. This enabled her to indulge in reverie without seeming to do so, she might have been believed capable of sleeping without closing them up. Assuming that the souls of men and women were visible essences, you could fancy the colour of Eustacia's soul to be flame-like. The sparks from it that rose into her dark pupils gave the same impression.

"Her presence brought memories of such things as Bourbon roses, rubies, and tropical midnight, her moods recalled lotus-eaters and the march in Athalie, her motions, theebb and flow of the sea; her voice, the viola. In a dim light, and with a slight rearrangement of her hair, her general figure might have stood for that of either of the higher female deities. The new moon behind her head, an old helmet upon it, a diadem of accidental dewdrops round her brow, would have been adjuncts sufficient to strike the note of Artemis, Athena, or Hera respectively, with as close an approximation to the antique as that which passes muster on many respected canvases. . .

"To be loved to madness—such was her great desire. Love was to her the one cordial which could drive away the eating loneliness of her days. And she seemed to long for the abstraction called passionate love more than for any particular lover. . . .

"Her high gods were William the Conqueror, Strafford, and Napoleon Buonaparte, as they had appeared in the Lady's History used at the establishment in which she was educated. Had she been a mother she would have christened her boys such names as Saul or Sisera in preference to Jacob or David, neither of whom she admired."

Somewhat less clearly—the multiplicity of detail is a shade overwhelming—but with fine art none the less, is Farmer Oak limned for us in Far from the Madding Crowd:

"When Farmer Oak smiled, the corners of his mouth spread till they were within an unimportant distance of his ears, his eyes were reduced to mere ohinks, and diverging wrinkles appeared round them, extending upon his countenance like the rays in a rudimentary sketch of the rising sun.

"His Christian name was Gabriel, and on working days he was a young man of sound judgment, easy motions, proper dress, and general good character. On Sundays he was a man of misty views, rather given to postponing, and hampered by his best clothes and umbrella, upon the whole, one who felt himself to occupy morally that vast middle space of Laodicean neutrality which lay between the Communion people of the parish and the drunken section. . . .

"Since he lived six times as many working days as Sundays, Oak's appearance in his old clothes was most peculiarly his own—the mental picture formed by his neighbours in imagining him being always dressed that way. He wore a low-crowned felt hat, spread out at the base by tight jamming upon the head for security in high winds, and a coat like Dr Johnson's; his lower extremities being encased in ordinary leather leggings and boots emphatically large, affording to each foot a roomy apartment so constructed that any wearer might stand in a river all day long and know nothing about it—their maker being a conscientious man who always endeavoured to compensate for any weakness in his cut by unstinting dimension and solidity. . . .

"But some thoughtful persons, who had seen him walking across one of his fields on a certain December morning—sunny and exceedingly mild—might have regarded Gabriel Oak in other aspects than these. In his face one might notice that many of the hues and curves of youth had turned on to manhood; there even remained in his remotest crannies some relics of the boy. His height and breadth would have been sufficient to make his presence imposing, had they been exhibited with due consideration. But there in a way some men have, rural and urban alike, for which the mind is more responsible than flesh and sinew; it is a way of curtailing their dimensions by their manner of showing them. And from a quiet modesty that would have become a vestal, which seemed continually to impress upon him that he had no great claim on the world's room, Oak walked unassumingly, and with a faintly perceptible bend, quite distinct from a bowing of the shoulders. This may be said to be a defect in an individual if he depends for his valuation more upon his appearance than upon his capacity to wear well, which Oak did not.

"He had just reached the time of life at which 'young' is ceasing to be the prefix of 'man' in speaking of one. He was at the brightest period of masculine growth, for his intellect and his emotions were clearly separated, he had passed the time during which the influence of youth indiscriminately mingles them in the character of impulse, and he had not yet arrived at the stage wherein they become united again, in the character of prejudice, by the influence of a wife and family. In short, he was twenty-eight, and a bachelor."

Hardy's style is deliberate and characteristic. He impresses his scenes and characters upon us by the accentuation of a hundred little touches and details, not by any impressionistic gift. But although his narrative as a rule sweeps along in an orderly, progressive way, he has a real dramatic instinct that enables him at times to seize upon some crisis, and present in terms of subtle dynamic conflict the characters he has been gradually unfolding for us.

One of the best illustrations of this may be found in that chapter in The Mayor of Casterbridge where Henchard sells his wife. Presuming he has made us realise the natures of the husband and wife, and the lacerating exasperation that misfortune has effected, until the man, influenced by drink, becomes for the moment a brute, and the woman apathetic and indifferent through sheer despair: this is at the outset of the story. The rest of the tale deals with the man's gradual expiation of his mad act of drunken folly.

To turn to some lighter aspects of Hardy's characterisation.

Pre-occupied as the novelist is with the tragic aspects of life, yet he illustrates once again the truth of Carlyle's saying, that "Humour is a sympathy with the seamy side of things." As a rule the sympathy is too acute for laughter, but it often finds expression in irony—that half-way house between comedy and tragedy, but in his earlier books especially, where the vital joy of youth proves too strong at times for melancholy fatalism, the merely ridiculous aspects of the life about him are recorded with delightful particularity. What better material for this than the rustic type that Hardy knew so well. Here, he reminds us strongly at times of George Eliot's methods in The Mill on the Floss and Silas Marner, but Hardy's rustics are truer to nature, they are less intellectualised. We recall such flashes of humorous insight as "Nater requires her swearing regular at times."

"Poor Charlotte! I wonder whether if she had the good fortune to get into heaven when she a'died? But she was never much in luck's way, and perhaps a'went down a'ris after all, poor soul!"

"And she was as white as marble stone," said Mrs. Cuxsom. "And likewise such a thoughtful woman, too—ah, poor soul—that a'minded every little thing that wanted tending." "Yes, says she, 'when I'm gone, and my last breath's blowed, look in the top drawer o' the chest in the back room by the window, and you'll find all my coffin clothes, a piece of flannel—that's to put under me, and the little piece is to put under my head, and my new stockings for my feet—they are folded alongside, and all my other things. And there's four ounce pennies, the heaviest I could find, e'tied up in bits of lichen for weights—two for my right eye and two for my left," she said. "And when you've used 'em, and my eyes don't open no more, bury the pennies, good souls, and don't yo go spending 'em, for I shouldn't like it. And open the windows as soon as I am carried out, and make it as cheerful as you can for Elizabeth-Jane."

"Ah, poor heart!"

The stolid reserve of the rustic, misinterpreted by his sharper town brother for stupidity, is deliciously depicted.

This from Under the Greenwood Tree—a fragment of peasant chatter:

"'Yes, Geoffrey Day is a clever man if ever there was one. Never says anything: not he.'

"Never"
"You might live w^t that man, my sonnies, a hundred years, and never know there was anything in him"

"Ay; one o' these up-country ink-bottle fellows would call Geoffrey a fool"

"Ye would never find out what's in that man, never. Silent? Ah, he is silent! He can keep silence well. That man's silence is wonderful to listen to."

As a rule, Hardy is content to observe and record, without probably, more than a bowdlerising touch here and there, but sometimes the grotesqueries of these rustic folk suggest, in their premonition, a little dressing-up by the literary artist. We wonder whether any Poorgrass put the matter of the "multiplying eye" really so neatly as this—

"A multiplying eye is a vory bad thing," says Mark Clark

"It always comes on when I have been in a public-house a little time," says Joseph Poorgrass meekly

But whatever doctoring some of these humours may have, most of them impress us with a sense of delicious fidelity to the muddle-headed but not bad-hearted men they depict; who, for all their childishness and fatuousness, like children let fall many a word of sound wisdom at times

Save when dealing with his rustic characters, Hardy's humour usually takes the form of irony; he is too much of a realist to take pleasure in caricature, too little of the moralist to make effective use of satire, and his natural reserve tends to make him, even when dealing with tragic issues, grimly ironical. His books abound in the irony of circumstance—e.g. the double pledging under the tree in A Pair of Blue Eyes, the proposal scene in The Hand of Ethelberta with the lovers in different rooms; the Power behind things wears always a mocking smile to Hardy; and finely devised as many of these ironies are, especially in his shorter stories, the note is somewhat too insistent. The author reversing the procedure of Mark Tapley, is too determined to be miserable in all possible circumstances especially in his later books. But at its best the irony is very fine, and sometimes, as in Two on a Tower, it has a light, exquisite flavour that Anatole France himself could not have bettered

As a story-teller he allies rich inventive power with a sense of symmetrical development, which as a rule characterises our lesser not our greater men. Scott, Dickens, Thackeray, so productively fertile in invention, show often little perspective on their constructive side. For all his minuteness of method, Hardy never loses sight of the harmonious whole; his detailed touches have ever their special significance in unfolding the burden of the story; here he shows the economy of the great artist. We shall find no loose ends in his work. He is almost equally great as a stylist—not quite, perhaps, for some of his writing shows a curious stiffness and lack of plasticity. But on the whole it is an admirable style, clear, straightforward, unpretentious, yet capable of carrying subtle implications, and always instinct with a simple dignity, and compelling sincerity. There is no straining after effect; no self-conscious attitudinising

The Interpreter of Life

In reading Hardy's prose and verse one is inevitably reminded of Andersen's whimsical tale of The Princess and the Pea. No matter how many soft mattresses were piled upon that couch, the sensitive princess developed bruises

Thus with Hardy. He is made sleepless by the pea, and the soft mattresses of comedy add no whit to his comfort. His own position he has frankly stated in the general preface to his collected works.

"Differing natures find their tongue in the presence of differing spectacles. Some natures become vocal by tragedy, some are made vocal by comedy, and it seems to me that to whichever of these aspects of life a writer's instinct for expression the more readily responds, to that he should allow it to respond."

In other words, Mr Hardy's temperament has conditioned his pessimistic outlook on life. A man's philosophy of life is, when you probe it deep enough, an instinctive, temperamental thing. Optimism, morbidism, pessimism, are but endeavours to express in intellectual form the temperamental bias

Now, in Hardy's outlook on life, there are two points especially insistent—his sense of law, and his sense of pity. The first gives him that conviction, that a spiritual logic governs men's lives, and the Greeks call it Nemesis; but we, affected by scientific formulae, attribute it to law

There is only one other novelist who has touched the logic of life with the same persistency as Hardy, that is George Eliot, but whereas she considers it rather from the standpoint of retribution, and treats it as a moralist, Hardy is affected rather by the injustice of its workings. He admits, as she does, the dreadful vitality of our deeds, but he dwells far longer on the disproportionate punishment

"Our evil actions do not remain isolated in the past, waiting only to be reversed—like locomotive plants they spread and re-root, till to destroy the original stem has no material effect in killing them"¹

"There are disappointments which wring us, and there are those which inflict a wound whose mark we bear to our graves. Such are so keen that no future gratification of the same desire can ever obliterate them; they become registered as a permanent loss of happiness"²

"A sensation of being profoundly experienced serves as a sort of consolation to people who are conscious of having taken wrong turnings. Contradictory as it seems, there is nothing truer than that people who have always gone right do not know half as much about the nature and ways of going right as those do who have gone wrong."³

His sense of pity is perhaps more acute than that of any modern writer. Realising as he does the terrible handicaps of life, he treats with gentle tolerance the passionate misdoings of men and women; and is better disposed to the sinner than to the saint.

He has no liking for what he calls the "well-proportioned mind"

"A well-proportioned mind is one which shows no particular bias, one of which we may safely say that

³ Ibid

It will never cause its owner to be confined as a madman, tortured as an heretic, or crucified as a blasphemer. Also, on the other hand, that it will never cause him to be applauded as a prophet, revered as a priest, or exalted as a king. Its usual blessings are happiness and mediocrity."¹

There is a wholesome bitterness in these sayings, yet one cannot but feel that, at times, he shows too much bitterness of feeling. It is not that what he urges is not true, but there is another side to his picture which is equally true, and upon which he is silent. In his earlier writings the mingled sweetness and bitterness of life are admirably contrasted, but in the later novels—in Tess, and Jude, especially, rich in power and insight as these books are—the gloom is needlessly intensified.

They are expansions in prose, of Arnold's deeply melancholy lines—

"We are here as on a darkling plain
Swept by confused alarms of struggle and flight
Where ignorant armies clash by night."

Few who have thought at all about life can help moods like these when the littleness and sordidness of life, and the great empire of pain and suffering, overshadow all else. But it is not merely a mood with Mr Hardy, it is the mood—his prevalent way of looking at things, and he practically excludes from his writings any sense of the splendour and beauty of human life that visits us at other times, just as the sunrise chases away the gloom of night. The sublimities of life are as much a matter of human experience as its abysses. To take an example. Mr Hardy sees clearly enough the hypocrisies and cruelties practised in the guise of religion, but he never notes the large integrating power (as George Eliot did) that springs from genuine emotion. Not content with picturing a tragic household, he ascribes the tragedy to "an unsympathetic First Cause"; and assures us that "the President of the Immortals had ended his sport with Tess."

This tenacious and bitter preoccupation with the futilities of life is even more evident in Mr. Hardy's verse than in his prose. He is too genuine an artist, too sincere and high-minded a man, not to touch his readers again and again with the imaginative subtleties and delicate insight that often distinguish his verse. But while mindful of passages of power and beauty in his Dynasts, and of the haunting charm and freshness of many vagrant lyrics, I cannot but feel that Mr. Hardy's genius is far better expressed in his prose; for the spacious background of prose allows for those qualities of rich comedy (quite other than the satiric humour of his verse), of characterisation and of description, that find, necessarily, little outlet in poetry.

Yet it would be churlish to leave so great a writer upon a note of dissatisfaction. All qualifications notwithstanding, there is a dignity and beauty about Mr Hardy's best work, for which all lovers of literature may be grateful; to accuse him, as some have done, of lax morality in his presentment of life, is ludicrously beside the mark. Errors of taste there are no doubt; he has the blunt outspokenness of the countryman, and there is about his works something of the coarseness of Nature herself; but though sometimes coarse, he is never trivial or debasing. The furtive prurience that mars some fiction, the juggling with moral values that mars other fiction to-day, is absolutely alien to his stern and austere noble attitude towards human life. Differences of opinion must naturally be held of Hardy as a critic of life; but as an artist—as a painter of certain concrete aspects of that life, he is among the greatest in English Literature.

(a) THE ROMANCERS

AMONG Scott's immediate successors was WILLIAM AINSWORTH (1805–1882), beloved by Victorian youth, though little read to-day. He had a real though crude sense of historical colour, and a vigorous and spirited style, tending to the two-toned coloured, yet effective enough in a rough-and-ready way. His best tales are The Tower of London (dealing with Tudor times), Old St Paul's (dealing with the period of the Plague and Fire), and Jack Sheppard (dealing with the eighteenth century). The idealism of the criminal in the latter book is quite in the eighteenth century spirit, and most boys vastly preferred it because of its cleverly devised excitements, to the more wholesome but less enthralling Oliver Twist. The present writer recalls the delight and absorbed attention with which he devoured, as a boy, all of Ainsworth's fiction, but on turning to them recently he found—as no doubt many old admirers have found—what an astonishing amount of tawdry writing and mechanical melodrama they contain.

A writer of greater literary merit is WILLIAM CARLETON (1794–1869), whose Autobiography gives us an admirable picture of Irish life in the early century. As a writer of Irish sketches for the Examiner, Carleton made his first entrance into literature. These sketches were afterwards published in volume form: Father Butler and The Lough Derg Pilgrims (1829), Tracts and Stories of the Irish Peasantry (1830). In longer and more elaborate tales of Irish life, such as Valentine M'Clutchy and the History of Paddy-go-lang and his wife Nancy (1845), Carleton is somewhat less successful, though here his work contains lively and pathetic writing. If the liveliness becomes too broad and farcical at times, it never lacks "go," and is full of racy touches of the nation's ways and oddities.

Together with Carleton may be mentioned two other Irishmen—GERALD GRIFFIN (1803-1840), whose novel, The Collegians, obtained posthumous fame in the dramatic version of the story made by Dion Boucicault, and re-named by him The Colleen Bawn, and that versatile vagrant man of letters WILLIAM MAGINN (1793-1842), befriended by Thackeray, and embalmed by him in literary form as Captain Shandon.

The fiction of that humorous improviser, THEODORE HOOK (1789-1841), is of small account, but is interesting for the fact that his character Keke-wich is clearly the prototype of Alfred Jingle, and some of his speeches, though less amusing than Jingle's, are in the same hurried, staccato style, while in another of his characters there is a clear suggestion of Mrs. Bardell.

In SAMUEL LOVER (1797-1868) and CHARLES LEVER (1806-1872) we have two Irish writers who enjoyed a good vogue in their day. Lover was the more versatile man, being a painter and something of a poet and musician as well as a storyteller. But Lover is certainly the better novelist. Both of them did well in light comic verse, and both of them are inclined to caricature in their stories. But whereas Lover relies mainly on caricature, as in Rory O'More (1837) and Handy Andy (1842), Lever relieves his burlesque flourishes by his nimble faculty of inventive imagination. Lover's best works are Harry Lorrequer, Charles O'Malley (1840), and Jack Hinton (1842). Neither Lover nor Lever show any sense of form, and even Lever's better written stories are more like good-humoured, happy improvisations than deliberately devised stories.

Where Lever celebrates the Irish soldier, JAMES GRANT (1822-1887) celebrates the Scottish, in his historical novel The Romance of War (1845), dealing with the Peninsular War. He was a careful and thorough craftsman, but is rather over-burdened by his historical material.

Captain FREDERICK MARRYAT (1792-1848) in his turn glorifies the British sailor. Marryat is a capital story-teller, thoroughly at home in his subject, and thus writes with greater success than either Grant, who worked up his subject, or Lover and Lever, who knew their characters merely on the surface.

Marryat has an easy, effective style, and in such excellent yarns as Peter Simple and Jacob Faithful (1834), Midshipman Easy (1836) and Masterman Ready (1841), he is hard to beat on his own lines, of good, straightforward, genial story-telling. He is less successful when he tries to deal with the mysterious side of things, as in The Phantom Ship. His imagination is neither subtle nor profound;

but it is quite adequate for the task he usually sets before him. If he does not make us realise the poetry and mystery of the sea, he gives us effective insight into the life of the average sailor. He is graphic and arresting without being tensely dramatic as Keade could be, and without being so crudely melodramatic as are many romancers. He has a hearty and healthy sense of fun, which for the most part shows itself in farce, but gives happy touches also to a number of his best characters: Mr Chucks, Equality Jack, Terence O'Brien. One of the best story-tellers for boys, he can be read also with pleasure by all who like a good yarn, adequately told by a man who knows what he is talking about.

Inferior in breadth and narrative power was MICHAEL SCOTT (1789-1835), one of "Blackwood's" men. Yet his Tom Cringle's Log (1829-1833) and The Cruise of the Midge are excellently written stories of sea life.

The glamour of the East had attracted, as we have seen, many of the romantic school, both verse and prose men; but one of the very few who has an inside knowledge of the subject was JAMES MORIER (c. 1780-1849), who in his Haji Baha of Ispahan (1824-1828) gave us a novel of the old picaresque type, and showed that the Orient has its "comedy" as well as its more conventionally romantic side. The book is written in a pleasant, lively, and genuinely informing manner.

Another romance of the comedy type, and more frankly farcical, is SAMUEL WARREN'S (1807-1877) Ten Thousand a Year (1839-1841), a book which was amazingly popular in its day, but has no outstanding merit.

EDWARD GEORGE BULWER, first Lord LYTON, was born in London in 1803. He was the son of General Earle Bulwer and Elizabeth Lyton, heiress of Knebworth, whose name he added when he succeeded to her estate in 1813. After various tutors he went up to Trinity Hall, Cambridge, in 1822, where he won the Chancellor's medal for a poem upon "Sculpture." In 1827 his disastrous marriage to a penniless Irish beauty, against the wishes of his mother, resulted in the withdrawal of his allowance. For years the young couple endeavoured to make two hundred a year cover the expenditure of as many thousands, with its inevitable unhappy consequence. In 1836 they separated, but the intervening years were productive of much work, and were the period of the novels. After this he turned to the drama. The Lady of Lyons produced in 1838, and Money in 1840, still hold the stage to-day.

Entering Parliament as a Liberal member for St Ives in 1831, Lyton gradually drifted to the Opposition, and in 1852 was representing Herefordshire as a Conservative, and in 1858-1859 was Colonial Secretary during Lord Derby's ministry.

A voluminous and rapid writer, Lyton is said to have written regularly from four to five thousand words a day, and has published some sixty works. Good-natured, and with a ready smile, he was, says a contemporary of his early years, "gay, quick, half-satirical, and always fresh and different from everybody else."

He died on January 18, 1873, and is buried in Westminster Abbey.

Lytton had one of those plastic imaginations ready to receive every impress of the age, each succeeding literary fashion finds its echo in his work. While romances were the vogue, Lytton did excellent work of the secondary order, and a measure of vitality lingers even to-day in his Last Days of Pompeii, Rienzi, and Zanoni. But from the time of The Caxtons (1849) he was conscious of a change in the drift of current tastes, and leaving the historical novel and the mystical fantasy alone, he turned his attention to English country life, describing its rural phases in The Caxtons and My Novel, its urban fashion in Pelham and Paul Clifford.

His work is distinctly imitative; but it is dexterous and showy, and exhibits a versatile if not a profound mind. He is most original when he gives his imagination rein, but, lacking humour, he is always overstepping the border-line between the sublime and the ridiculous.

An interesting figure to the literary student as a mirror of his time, but apart from this, it may be questioned whether, save to the young and unsophisticated (if any such exist to-day!), he has any vital force at the present time.

During the mid-years of the century, the novels of domestic life proved a serious rival to the romance in popularity, and skilled literary opportunists like Lytton, had, as we see, to trim their sails to suit the new demand. Kingsley and Reade are among the ablest romancers. On a somewhat lower level are HENRY KINGSLEY (1830-1876), whose Ravenshoe (1861), however, is not greatly inferior to Westward Ho, but who had little staying power as a novelist; and JOHN WYTHE MELVILLE (1821-1878), a soldier and a country squire of literary tastes, whose Gladiators is a clever and interesting story of Roman life.

Another writer belonging to the turn of the mid-century is WILKIE COLLINS (1824-1889), a writer of remarkable power at his best, though his later writings, partly owing to a mistaken choice of subject-matter, but largely owing to physical reasons, show an almost tragic decline of merit.

Collins was the son of the artist and Royal Academician, William Collins, the friend of David Wilkie. At twelve years old he was taken by his parents to Italy, where they resided for three years, and on their return the lad was, for a time, engaged in a city tea warehouse. Later he entered Lincoln's Inn, and was called to the Bar in 1851, but was drifting into literature.

In 1848 he published a Life of his father, and two years afterwards appeared his first novel, Antonina. A considerable friendship then sprang up between its author and Charles Dickens, and the two henceforth were more or less associated.

Collins produced two dramas, The Lighthouse (1855) and The Frozen Deep (1874), in both of which Dickens appeared as an actor. In 1860, The Woman in White was running as a serial in All the Year Round, of which Dickens was editor, and in collaboration they published No Thoroughfare in the same paper.

Wilkie Collins is so persistently underrated to-day, that it may prove interesting to inquire with some closeness into the quality of his work.

At its best, his work is distinguished by:

- (a) Exceptional skill in the art of plot construction
- (b) A remarkable gift of dramatic suggestion
- (c) Pictorial power of high order

His technical skill is most happily shown in The Moonstone, where all the parts fit into one another with the neatness of those puzzle-pictures that were at once the agony and delight of our childhood, from the impressive opening scene, where the gem is shown in its splendid Eastern setting, through all the mazes of the story down to its final recapture by the Indians, there is not a scene which does not carry forward the tale, not a character that has not a part to play in the solution of the mystery.

The faculty of dramatic suggestion is a much rarer quality than is usually allowed. The expectant interest which Collins arouses so keenly in the reader is created not by incidental thrills—these, indeed, are singularly few—but because of the atmosphere of suspense that he creates, by cunning hints and suggestions. Murder looms seldom in his stories, of fighting there is next to nothing, hairbreadth escapes interest him but slightly, and out-of-the-way occurrences are few and far between. Eschewing these things on the one hand and the psychological interest of the character novel on the other it is surely a signal testimony to his power as a literary artist that he should hold us with such unmistakable enthralment. He is a master of dramatic innuendo, the Sterne of sensationalism. He can thrill you more by the posting of a letter than most of his school can by a lurid murder.

His pictorial power again, is badly underestimated by many critics. Wilkie Collins was the son of a painter, he exhibited in 1849 a landscape of his own at the Royal Academy, and always retained a fine critical appreciation of the painter's art. His scenic backgrounds are an integral part of his stories. Thus the supernaturalism in Armadale (1866) revolves round a series of dream-pictures; and even a sunset on the Norfolk Broads and the slanting rain of a passing storm are organic elements in the plot. The most dramatic scene in No Name (1862), where the heroine, Magdalen, meditates suicide, is presented in pictorial form—and peculiarly vivid pictorial form.

"She removed the cork, and lifted the bottle to her mouth.

"At the first cold touch of the glass on her lips, her strong young life leaped up in her leaping blood, and fought with the whole frenzy of its longing against the close terror of Death.

"Her cheeks flushed deep, her breath came thick and fast. With the poison still in her hand, with the sense that she might faint in another moment, she made for the window, and threw back the curtain that covered it.

"The new day had risen. The broad grey dawn flowed in on her over the quiet eastern sea.

"She saw the waters, heaving large and silent in the misty calm; she felt the fresh breath of the morning flutter cool on her face. Her strength returned, her mind cleared a little. . . . She resolved to end the struggle by setting her life or death on the hazard of a chance.

"On what chance?"

"The sea showed it to her. Dimly distinguishable through the mist, she saw a little fleet of coasting vessels slowly drifting towards the house, all following the same direction with the favouring set of the tide. In half an hour—perhaps in less—the fleet would have passed her window. The hands of her watch pointed to four o'clock. She seated herself close at the side of the window, with her back towards the quarter from which the vessels were drifting down to her—with the poison placed on the window-sill, and the watch on her lap. For one half-hour to come, she determined to wait there, and count the vessels as they went by. If, in that time, an even number passed by—the sign given should be a sign to live. If the uneven number prevailed—the end should be death.

"With that final resolution, she rested her head against the window, and waited for the ships to pass.

• Nineteen minutes, and five ships. Twenty minutes. Twenty-one, two, three—and no sixth vessel. Twenty-four, and the sixth came by. Twenty-five, twenty-six, twenty-seven, twenty-eight, and the next uneven number—the fatal seven—glided into view. Two minutes to the end of the half-hour. And seven ships.

"Twenty-nine, and nothing followed in the wake of the seventh ship. The minute-hand of the watch moved on half-way to thirty—and still the white hoary sea was a misty blank. Without moving her head from the window, she took the poison in one hand, and raised the watch in the other. As the quick seconds counted each other out her eyes, as quick as thou, looked from the watch to the sea, from the sea to the watch—looked for the last time at the sea—and saw the EIGHTH ship.

"She never moved, she never spoke. The death of thought, the death of feeling seemed to have come to her already. She put back the poison mechanically on the ledge of the window, and watched, as in a dream, the ship gliding smoothly on its silent way—gliding till it melted dimly into shadow—gliding till it was lost in the mist.

"Her eyes closed, and her head fell back. When the sense of life returned to her, the morning sun was warm on her face—the blue heaven looked down on her—and the sea was a sea of gold."

Whatever the subject, rarely does Collins fail to paint his scene without the telling economy of the genuine artist. Thus, for instance, from The Woman in White:

'A white fog hung over the lake. The dense brown hue of the trees on the opposite bank appeared above it like a dwarf forest floating in the sky. The sandy ground, shelving downwards from where we sat, was lost mysteriously in the outward layer of the fog.'

And undoubtedly it was through this pictorial power that Collins was able to make so many of his characters vivid and striking—e.g. Count Fosco, Lydia Gwilt, "The Dream Woman," Captain Vraggo, Marion Halcombe—no easy matter in a form of fiction where the characters exist for the story, and not the story for the characters, as in the novels of Meredith and Hardy.

And here limitations of space remind me that this apology for Collins must draw to a close. At his best he had Poe's power to kindle the emotions of horror and suspense. Yet, despite his insistent interest in pathological types, there is a wholesome sanity about his outlook; and something of the man's own sensitive and kindly nature expresses itself in everything he wrote.

Certainly not the least tribute to Collins' powers is to be found in the countless imitations his writings have evoked. One has only to compare the best contemporary work of this kind with the work of Collins to realise that whatever his limitations may have been, he was, along his own lines, a vital and original force in English fiction.

In Wilkie Collins the novel of domesticity and the novel of romantic adventure are pleasantly blended. In GEORGE MACDONALD (1824-1905) the two are kept apart. His verse has already been noticed elsewhere. His novels deal with Scottish life, and show considerable humour, actuality, and deep religious feeling. Among the best are Alce Forbster (1865) and Robert Falconer (1868). In the art of story-telling, however, he is not an adept; constructively his tales are weak, and live by virtue of their imaginative strength and insight into character. The fine touches of romantic feeling that make themselves felt prepare us for the more exclusively romantic work of Macdonald. This may be studied in the delightful books he wrote for children: On the Back of the North Wind, The Princess and the Goblin, The Princess and Curdie, Cross Purposes, and in those books where his Gaelic mysticism found its richest expression. The Portent, Phantastes, The Cruel Painter, and other stories.

It is here rather than in the novels that the genius of the man is best exhibited. In all of these tales there are touches of eerie suggestion that Poe himself has never bettered, and they are blended with a delicate sense of beauty, a strength of passion, and a fine humanitarian feeling that place them in the very front rank as works of the romantic genre.

The werewolf has been greatly in evidence of late years in fiction, but not one of the many tales dealing with this psychic myth are equal in artistic skill and delicate impressionism to Macdonald's story of "The Grey Wolf" that appears in the volume of tales entitled The Cruel Painter. Mr Algernon Blackwood, whose spiritual borderland studies are so deservedly popular to-day, and who has no serious rival in tales of psychic influences, is in the line of descent from the author of Phantastes. The machinery of Phantastes is more old-fashioned, but the author of Pan's Garden is not more steeped in the magic of natural things than is the creator of The Maiden of the Beech Tree.

No less truly imaginative are those tales of Macdonald's more deliberately adapted for children. The Shadows is not unworthy of Hawthorne, The Light Princess is a happy fancy, more Teutonic perhaps than Celtic in its treatment, while the stories dealing with Curdie, The Princess, and the Goblin have no peer save in the pages of Grimm.

More limited in their art, but with the same mystic suggestion, are the Gaelic romances of "Fiona Macleod" (WILLIAM SHARP, 1856-1905).

Turning to a robust type of romancer, we have

RICHARD D. BLACKMORE (1825-1900) a story-

toller who in Lorna Doone (1869) wrote a romance that for breadth, imaginative beauty, and virile freshness cannot be equalled in modern fiction, save by Reado or Stevenson. He wrote other tales, but he is essentially the man of one book.

WILLIAM BLACK (1841-1898) achieved success as a writer of romance about the same time as Lorna Doone had captured the reading public. A more versatile story-teller than Blackmore, he never wrote anything that could be put beside Lorna Doone. None the less he proved himself a spirited and picturesque writer, who excelled in descriptions of Scottish life and scenery.

The most considerable romantic force of the later half of the century is ROBERT LOUIS STEVENSON, who was born in Edinburgh on November 13, 1850. He was the son of Thomas Stevenson, one of the family of famous lighthouse engineers. On leaving school the youth endeavoured to carry on the traditions of his family, and gave some attention to engineering at Edinburgh University, indeed going so far as to gain a prize from the Society of Arts for improvements in lighthouse mechanism, but neither inclination nor physical strength fitted him for the profession, and in 1871 he abandoned it with a view to letters, though not without regret for his father's disappointment.

"Say not of me that weakly I declined
The labours of my sire, and fled the sea,
The towers we founded and the lamps we lit,
To play at home with paper like a child."

At six years old we are told that Stevenson dictated a History of Moses, and while at the University he contributed to, and for a time edited, the Collego Magazine; he also published essays in other journals, and to literature he wished to devote his life.

As something to fall back upon if literature failed, his father persuaded him to read for the Scottish Bar, to which he was called in 1875. But Stevenson's temperament was too unconventional, too saturated with the vagabond spirit, to settle down to a life of routine, and after a short time the law was also abandoned. He then threw what physical strength he possessed into an arduous apprenticeship to literature, writing a number of short stories and essays for the Cornhill Magazine. "I slugged at it night and day," he wrote to a friend in 1887.

Stevenson's many journeys in search of health contributed to his literary resources. An Inland Voyage (1878) was the result of a canoe journey in Belgium, and Through the Cevennes with a Donkey (1879) tells its own story. But the public did not take kindly to Stevenson's work at this time, and partly owing to financial reasons, as an emigrant he set out for California in search of health. A certain measure of health was regained, and his marriage with an American lady, Mrs. Osbourne, whom he had previously met in France, added also to his happiness and future comfort.

In 1880, with his wife and her two children, Stevenson returned to Europe, and the following year published Virginibus Puerisque. He also made an unsuccessful application for the Chair of Constitutional Law and History at the University of Edinburgh.

To please his little stepson he had written Treasure Island, published in 1882; with this event the tide of prosperity for Stevenson may be said to have turned. Kidnapped, Dr Jekyll, Prince Otto, The Silverado Squatters, and the immortal Child's Garden of Verse followed. Stevenson was becoming a more than popular writer when the growing disease of the lungs necessitated his seeking a warmer climate. In 1887, with his family, he left England never to return. For a time the little party travelled among the islands of the Southern Pacific, and at length settled in Samoa. Stevenson built himself a house and worked industriously until the end, dictating on his fingers in sign language when he found it too painful to speak for any length of time.

In the life of the Samoans, Stevenson took the keenest interest. Noting the cruelties and hardships to which the natives were subjected by the Governor and others, he did not rest until an inquiry was held; this resulted in the dismissal of more than one of the authorities.

On December 3, 1896, a day of intense heat, Stevenson died quite suddenly, and is buried among his friends of Samoa. Two fragments, St Ives and Wear of Hermiston, left unfinished, were published in 1897.

Stevenson differs from other romancers of the Victorian era in two respects. He is a fastidious stylist, while the majority trouble themselves not a whit about their style, and he has an elusive and frolicsome humour, which again is alien to the usual temperament of the romancer. Both of these qualities impart a unique distinction to his work, though they carry with them also certain drawbacks. This sense of style gives Stevenson's best romantic work, whether in the more boyish moods of Treasure Island and Kidnapped, or in the graver vein of The Master of Ballantrae and Weir of Hermiston, a splendour of workmanship and artistic appeal, fully counterbalancing the obvious indebtedness to masters like Scott and Dumas. But it affects a portion of his work with a sense of effort and artificiality that to some extent spoils our pleasure. The spacious ease and spontaneity of Lorna Doone are not to be found in his work, nor indeed has he the prodigal invention of Reade. On the other hand, there is a delicacy and finish in his best work that neither Blackmore nor Reade could reach.

Stevenson's humour, moreover, keeps him not merely from the pathetic pitfalls of the ordinary romancer, but from such gaucheries and crudities as we find in Reade, while in The New Arabian Nights the blend of gay humour and romantic feeling provides us with a work that has a delightfully bitter-sweet flavour about it. Yet this freakish humour is not wholly an advantage to the romancer. It makes him too self-conscious, too afraid to let himself go in some of his stories; and his fine style, with its fun, its fancy, its subtlety of light and shade, finds its happiest medium in those discursive essays where he can display all his moods to his heart's content.

Perhaps the neatest critical impression of Stevenson's complex personality is to be found in Honley's well-known lines :

'. . . In his face
There shines a brilliant and romantic grace,
A spirit intense and rare, with trace on trace
Of passion and impudence and energy.
Valiant in velvet, light in ragged luck,
Most vain, most generous, sternly critical,
Buffoon and poet, lover and sensualist.
A deal of Ariel, just a streak of Puck,
Much Antony, of Hamlet most of all,
And something of the Shorter Catechist "

Certainly, Ariel, Hamlet, and the Shorter Catechist cross and recross his pages as we read them. Probably each reader of Stevenson retains most clearly one special place. It is the Ariel in Stevenson that outlasts for me the other moods. If any one phase can be said to strike the keynote of his temperament, it is the whimsical, freakish, but kindly Ariel—an Ariel bound in service to the Prospero of fiction—never quite happy, longing for his freedom, yet knowing that he must for a while serve his master. One can well understand why John Addington Symonds dubbed Stevenson "sprite." This elfish element in Stevenson is most apparent in his letters and stories.

The figures in his stories are less flesh-and-blood persons than the shapes—some gracious, some terrifying—that the Ariel world invoke. It is not that Stevenson had no grip on reality, his grip-hold on life was very firm and real. Beneath the light badinage, the airy, graceful wit that plays over his correspondence, there is a steel-like tenacity. But in his stories he leaves the solid earth for a fantastic world of his own. He does so deliberately, he turns his back on reality, has dealings with phantom passions. His historical romances are like ghostly editions of Scott. There is light, but little heat in his fictions. They charm our fancy, but do not seize upon our imagination.

Borrow's characters do not speak. Borrow so emphatically as do Stevenson's characters speak. Stevenson. And with Stevenson it matters more. Borrow's picturesque, vivid, but loose, loquacious style, fits his subject-matter on the whole very well. But Stevenson's delicate, nervous, mannered style suits but ill some of the scenes he is describing. If it suits, it suits by a happy accident, as in the delightful sentiment in Providence and the Guitar.

To appraise Stevenson's merits as a Romantic one has to read him after Scott, Dumas, Victor Hugo; or, better still, to peruse these giants after dallying with Ariel.

We realise then what it is that we had vaguely missed in Stevenson—the human touch. These men believe in the figments of their imagination, and make us believe in them.

Stevenson is obviously sceptical as to their reality; we can almost see a furtive smile upon his lip as he writes. But there is nothing unreal about the man, whatever we feel of the artist.

In his critical comments on men and matters, especially when Hamlet and the Shorter Catechist come into view, we shall find a vigorous sanity, a shrewd yet genial outlook, that seems to say there is no make-believe here, here I am not merely amusing myself here, honestly and heartily admitted, you may find the things that life has taught me.

Perhaps it is that in the letters alone do we find the vagabond temperament of Stevenson fully asserting itself. Elsewhere it is held in check. As Sir Sidney Colvin justly says—

"In his letters—excepting a few written in youth, and having more or less the character of exercises, and a few in after years which were intended for the public eye—Stevenson, the deliberate artist, is scarcely forthcoming at all. He does not care a fig for order, or logical sequence, or congruity, or for striking a key of expression and keeping it, but becomes simply the most spontaneous and unstudied of human beings. He will write with the most distinguished eloquence on one day, with simple good sense and good feeling on the second, with flat triviality on another, and with the most slashing, often ultra-colloquial vehemency on the fourth, or will vary through all these moods, and more, in one and the same letter."

Fresh and spontaneous his letters invariably appear, with a touch of the invalid's nervous haste, but never lacking in courage, and with nothing of the querulousness which we connect with chronic ill-health. Weak and ailing, shadowed by death for many years before the end, Stevenson showed a fine fortitude, which will remain in the memory of his friends as his most admirable character. With the consistency of Mark Twain (and with less talk about it), he determined to be jolly in all possible circumstances. Right to the end his wonderful spirits, his courageous gaiety, attended him, the frail body grew frailer, but the buoyant intellect never failed him, or if it did so the failure was momentary, and in a moment he was recovered.

No little of his popularity is due to the desperate valour with which he contested the ground with death, inch by inch, and died, as Buckle and John Richard Green had done, in the midst of the work that he would not quit. Romance was by him to the last, gladdening his tired body with her presence, and if towards the end weariness and heart-sickness seized him for a spell, yet the mind soon resumed its mastery over weakness. In a prayer which he had written shortly before his death, he had petitioned: Give us to awake with smiles, give us to labour smiling, as the sun lightens the world, so let our loving kindness make bright this house of our habitation." Assuredly in his case this characteristic petition had been realised, the prevalent sunshine of his disposition attended him to the last.

Another stylist in romantic fiction—though of inferior talent—is JOHN HENRY SHORTHOUSE (1834-1903), whose John Ingham (1881) created quite a furore in certain circles when first it appeared. It is an able, thoughtful, and painstaking historical romance, steeped in Tractarian thought, and the "Oxford" atmosphere accounted largely for its cordial reception in certain directions.

(b) THE NOVELISTS OF SOCIAL AND DOMESTIC LIFE

IN the title of one of his books, Annals of the Parish, JOHN GALT (1770–1839) exactly described his métier as a novelist. Precise and intinate as his pictures of Scottish life are, they serve rather as the raw material of fiction than as works of literary art. Yet they abound in admirable vignettes of character, and Laird Guppy is worthy of Scott himself. His books Annals of the Parish, The Ayrshire Legaters (1821), and The Entail (1823) have points of resemblance with those of Susan Ferrier, but deal with a less affluent class. She is a better story-teller, but perhaps Galt has the keener insight into the life that he describes.

Galt's work, strictly speaking, is outside of the Victorian era, yet he is one of the pioneers of the domestic novel that played so important a part in Victorian fiction. The work of the greater novelists of the time has already been considered in dealing with the humanitarian novel and the novel of satire; it remains for us to notice some of the later writers of fiction.

JOHN WATSON ("Ian Maclaren") (1850–1907), and others of the "kailyard" school, produced sentimental pictures of Scottish life, more agreeable and artistic than Galt, but far less true to life. They are as much one-sided in their facile sentiment and humour on the one side as was GEORGE DOUGLAS BROWN'S (1869–1902) grim and dour House with the Green Shutters on the other.

One of the ablest of the non-romantic school was GEORGE GISSING (1857–1903). If we could imagine Dickens without a sense of humour, we should have no bad notion of the character of Gissing's work. It abounds in shrewd and close observation; it vibrates with the struggle for life in a great city, but on the whole, it is an arid, dusty, and cheerless world that the novelist describes. There is no geniality, no light-hearted extravagances, or, on the other hand, such intensity of imagination as may compensate for the pull of gloom that hangs over its demizens. Mr Hardy's pessimistic outlook on life is chastened by his humour and his passion. Gissing is gloomy and dry-eyed. Yet the power and actuality (up to a point) of many of his books—for instance, Demos (1886), New Grub Street (1891), and The Town Traveller (1898)—is unquestionable. Had we not read Thyrza (1887), Beside the Ionian Sea, and The Private Papers of Henry Ryecroft, we might imagine he was untouched by art and by the beauty of life, and that he was lacking in tenderness.

But he had, deep down, a poetic imagination, though he kept it imprisoned and confined. A man of sensitive culture, he had for many years to fight against adverse circumstances, and the iron went into his soul. Privation and suffering mellow some natures, it embitters others—and Gissing was among these. Yet he was a fine artist, and never sought facile short cuts to popularity by insincerities and cheap sentimentalities.

Judging the man, as we may fairly do, through the obvious self-revelation of Ryecroft, we feel that, under happier conditions, Gissing would have given a far better account of his considerable talents. But he lacked that elemental sturdiness that, in the case of some men, triumphs over adverse fates; he was too great a man to become a literary opportunist, too small a man to shake himself free of the meanness, the pottness, the drab horrors that he saw in the life about him. It obsessed him and at times overwhelmed him.

No mention of Gissing, however, can pass unnoticed the critical genius (for it is criticism of the highest quality) of his book on Dickens. It may seem strange that this artist in grey, this coolly deliberate and ironic exponent of the seamy-side of life, should not only have admired Dickens so immensely, but have analysed so powerfully and eloquently his essential greatness. But there is the fact for those who read his critical study. And the insight and beauty of this criticism gave us a higher opinion of Gissing's potential gifts, and make us the surer that he is only partially revealed in his harsh, realistic studies of contemporary life.

Gissing is at his best in such passages as the following, where the imagination of the man, touched by some familiar sight, loses for the moment its cold rigidity of outlook, and glows with warmth.

"Do you know that music of the obscure ways, to which children dance? Not if you have only heard it ground to your ears' affliction beneath your windows in the square. To hear it aught you must stand in the darkness of such a by street as this, and for the moment be at one with those who dwell around, in the hear-eyed house, in the dim burrows of poverty, in the unmapped haunts of the semi-human. Then you will know the significance of that vulgar clanging of melody, a pathos of which you did not dream will touch you, and therein the secret of hidden London will be half-revealed. The life of men who toil without hope, yet with the hunger of an unshaped desire, of women in whom the sweetness of their sex is perishing under labour and misery, the laugh, the song of the girl who strives to enjoy her year or two of youthful vigour, knowing the darkness of the years to come, the careless defiance of the youth who feels his blood and revolts against the lot which would tame it, all that is purely human in these darkened multitudes speaks to you as you listen. It is the half-conscious striving of a nature which knows not what it would attain, which deforms a true thought by gross expression, which clutches at the beautiful and soils it with foul hands."¹

(c) THE VAGRANT NOTE IN VICTORIAN PROSE

The literary student who follows faithfully the well-beaten track of literature may happily find an occasional means of escape by turning off the high road into those adventurous bypaths where no sign posts are visible, and the journey is an agreeably strange and unfamiliar one.

The romantic writer, be he poet or proseman, has usually furnished this way of escape, for romanticism always implies the annexing of fresh territory, new scenes, strange experiences. But just as the traveller finds the one time grassy solitudes in the hands of the estate agent, cog-railways on the mountains, and extended hotel luxuries on the sea, so does the literary wanderer find the romantic standpoint tending to become merely a literary track, its novelties stereotyped, and its thrills and excitements standardised. It is here that the true vagabond of letters may be hailed as a welcome intruder. He redresses the balance of an over-civilised literature, bringing with him that touch of wildness, that pleasant air of irresponsible discursiveness, that flavour of sun-tan and the open air, that we all of us need at times.

Modern American letters, with its plethora of culture, found a welcome corrective in such men as Thoreau and Whitman, while in Victorian letters we can hail thoroughlygoing vagrants like Borrow and Joffries, Laurence Oliphant and Sir Richard Burton.

Although three of these men happened to be more or less extensive travellers, the vagrant spirit is not to be construed in terms of geography, it is an attitude of mind, not a capacity for globe-trotting. The literary vagabond is born with a gipsy strain in the blood, and the ever-infallible sign of his spiritual heritage is an ingrained distaste for the routine of ordinary life and the conventions of civilisation. Thoreau turned his back on society, and found a new joy of living in the woods at Maine; Whitman sought his ideal companions in rough and primal natures, Borrow's nature expands only when tramping along the open road and in the company of the gipsy alien.

For Jefferies, not the delights of the town, but the quiet joys of the Sussex hedges and the Wiltshire lanes. Burton is all his life warring with the civilised "official," kicking against routine, and it is this untractable restlessness that spoiled the brilliant promise of his life. Laurence Oliphant, a man of splendid parts, was constitutionally unable to fit into any civilised scheme of life, hence the interest of his career and its failure from the worldly point of view.

This vagrant quality is not confined to the men just mentioned, most men of genius have a touch of this attractive madness in their blood. Indeed, without the touch of wildness, the great writer comes perilously near being a dull dog. Most of the greater men of the Romantic Revival had their "vagabond" moods: indeed, it gives the flavour and relish to the table-talk of Hazlitt, the day-dreaming of De Quincey, the fancies of Elia. Southey and Wordsworth suffer from lack of it; it proves both a curse and a blessing to Byron; and sets fire to the genius of the Brontës. In Victorian letters, sentiment and domesticity exorcise the vagabond spirit for a while. But he can always find his way back again into literary art through the gateway of romanticism. And thus it is that Browning, in many ways so thoroughly conventional and English, is never more attractive than in the vagrant mood that prompted Time's

Revenge, The Flight of the Duchess, and Fifine at the Fair, while in Meredith, and Hardy also, there are touches of the "wild wise beast."

In dealing, however, with the men who more emphatically sound the vagrant note, we at once think of GEORGE HENRY BORROW, that strong, assertive, prize-fighting, and bright-eyed Norfolk giant. Born at East Dereham on July 5, 1803, he was the younger son of an army recruiting officer who had risen from the ranks, on his mother's side he came of Norman-Huguenot stock. The wandering life in search of recruits necessarily restricted educational advantages, and it was not till the captain retired and settled down in Norwich that any regular teaching was possible, he was then thirteen, and sent to Norwich Grammar School. Here among many notable contemporaries were James Martineau and Rajah Brooke of Sarawak.

At school Borrow was not an idler. "Mere idleness," he has said, "is the most disagreeable state of existence," but even education should be made congenial. The restraint and discipline of school did not suit him, so he ran away; the ordinary curriculum not appealing to him, he put it aside and substituted languages, for which he had a peculiar talent. Eventually he was able to translate in thirty-five languages and dialects. He was also fond of fishing and shooting and as a boxer was coached by the well known "bruiser" James Thurtell, who was afterwards hanged for the murder of Mr Weare.

On leaving school Borrow was articled to a solicitor, but the law troubled him very little, and at the end of his time he knew more about Arminian, or the shoeing of a horse, than he did of jurisprudence. His love for horses brought him into touch with another considerable phase of his life, his friendship with Mr Petulengro and the gypsies.

Captain Borrow died in 1821, and London now becomes the goal of his son's ambition. "I intend to live in London," he wrote to a friend, "write plays, poetry &c, abuse religion and get myself prosecuted." So to London he wended his way, though he does not appear to have carried out the remainder of his programme. With a letter of introduction he called on Sir Richard Phillips, a publisher who readily employed him, but at starvation rates. For a record of four hundred Celebrated Trials, in six volumes, containing four thousand pages, he received £50, and even this sum had to be drawn upon for many out-of-pocket expenses. At length Borrow left London to ramble with the gypsies throughout the country, and of "the veiled period," as it has been called, Javengro furnishes an interesting account.

In 1832 Borrow returned to Norwich. Here he made the acquaintance of the Rev. Francis Cunningham, who introduced him to the British and Foreign Bible Society, as "a person without university education who has read the Bible in thirteen languages of no very defined denomination of Christians but I think of certain Christian principles. I could wish you should see him, he is of the middle order in Society, and a very producible person." Upon this recommendation Borrow was invited to London walking the whole distance of 112 miles. The Society, he tells us, were satisfied as to his "philological capabilities" and voted him ten pounds for immediate expenses.

Borrow's independent and self-confident manner produced some consternation among certain members of the Society, and their quiet admonition he seems to have taken in good part. In 1833 he was sent to Russia to "enlarge his acquaintance with the Manchu language" with a view to a translation of the New Testament, which he eventually accomplished. In 1835 his services were required in Spain and Portugal, "to direct his attention to schools, and to be liberal in giving New Testaments." After a year of struggle with the authorities, he was recalled to England. A later and longer visit saw his imprisonment in Madrid in 1838, and the renewal of his friendship with a widow lady, Mrs. Clarke, whom he had known at Oulton, where she possessed some property. In 1840 he left Lisbon for London with Mrs. Clarke, who was accompanied by her daughter, and on April 23rd they were married at St. Peter's, Cornhill. He then settled down to literary work at Oulton.

In 1869 Mrs. Borrow died in London, and for years afterwards Borrow was also believed to be dead, however, in 1874, he returned to Oulton, where he died in 1881.

Reading Lavengro (1851) and The Romany Rye (1857), the reader is no less struck by the remarkable interest that Borrow takes in the people—especially the rough, uncultured people—whom he comes across, than by the cheerful indifference with which he loses sight of them and passes on to fresh characters. There is very little objective feeling in his friendships, as flesh-and-blood personages with individualities of their own—loves, hopes, faiths of their own—he seems to regard them scarcely at all. They exist chiefly as material for his curiosity and inquisitiveness. Hence there is a curious selfishness about him, not the selfishness of a passionate, capricious nature, but the selfishness of a self-absorbed and self-contained nature. Perhaps there was hidden away somewhere in his nature a strain of tenderness, of altruistic affection, which was reserved for a few chosen souls. But the warm human touch is markedly absent from his writings, despite their undeniable charm.

Take the Isopel Berners episode. Whether Isopel Berners was a fiction of the imagination or a character in real life matters not. At any rate, his friendship with this Anglo-Saxon girl of the road is one of the distinctive features of both Lavengro and The Romany Rye. The attitude of Borrow towards her may safely be regarded as a clear indication of the man's character. She was a girl of fine physical presence and many engaging qualities such as were bound to attract a man of Borrow's type, who had forsaken her friends to throw in her lot with this fellow-wanderer on the road.

And what does he do?

He accepts her companionship just as he might have accepted the companionship of one of his landlords or ostlers; spends the time he lived with her in the Dingle in teaching her Armenian, and when at last, driven to desperation by his calculating coldness, she comes to take farewell of him, he makes her a perfunctory offer of marriage, which she, being a girl of fine mettle as well as of strong affection, naturally declines. She leaves him, and after a few passages of philosophic regret, he passes on to the next adventure.

Now Borrow, as we know, was not physically drawn towards the ordinary gipsy type—the dark, beautiful Celtic women; and it was in girls of the fair Saxon order, such as Isopel Berners, that he sought a natural mate.

Certainly, if any woman was calculated by physique and by disposition to attract Borrow, Isopel Berners was that woman. And when we find that the utmost extent of his passion is to make tea for her and instruct her in Armenian, it is impossible not to be disagreeably impressed by the unnatural chilliness of such a disposition. Not even Isopel could break down the barrier of intense egotism that fenced him off from any profound intimacy with his fellow-creatures.

I think it less a case, as Dr. Jessop seems to think, of want of passion as of a tyrannous egotism that excluded any element likely to prove troublesome. He would not admit a disturbing factor, such as the presence of the self-reliant Isopel, into his life.

No doubt he liked Isopel well enough in his fashion. Otherwise certainly he would not have made up his mind to marry her. But his own feelings, his own tastes, his own fancies, came first. He would marry her—oh yes!—there was plenty of time later on. For the present he could study her character, amuse himself with her idiosyncrasies, and as a return for her devotion and faithful affection, teach her Armenian. A touching picture!

But the episode of Isopel Berners is only one illustration, albeit a very significant one, of Borrow's calculating selfishness. No man could prove a more interesting companion than he, but one cannot help feeling that he was a sorry kind of friend.

It may seem strange at first sight finding this wanderer of the road in the pay of the Bible Society, and a zealous servant in the cause of militant Protestantism. But the violent "anti-Popery" side of Borrow is only another instance of his love of independence. The brooding egotism that chafed at the least control was not likely to show any sympathy with sacerdotalism.

There was no trace of philosophy in Borrow's frankly expressed views on religious subjects. They were honest and straightforward enough, with all the vigorous unreflective narrowness of ultra-Protestantism.

It says much for the amazing charm of Borrow's writing that The Bible in Spain is very much better than a glorified tract. It must have come as a surprise to many a grave, pious reader of the Bible Society's publications.

And the Bible Society made the Vagabond from the literary point of view. Borrow's book, The Zincahi, or an account of the gypsies of Spain, published in 1841, had brought his name before the public; but The Bible in Spain (1843) made him famous, doubtless to the relief of "glorious John Murray," the publisher, who was doubtful about the book's reception.

It is a fascinating book, and if lacking the unique flavour of the romantic autobiographies, Lavengro and The Romany Rye, has none the less many of the characteristics that give all his writings their distinctive attraction.

Can we analyse the charm that Borrow's books and Borrow's personality exercise over us, despite the presence of those unpleasing traits which repel?

In the first place, he had the faculty for seizing upon the picturesque elements in the world about him. He had the ready instinct of the discursive writer for what was dramatically telling. Present his characters in dramatic form he could not; one and all pass through the crucible of his temperament before we see them. We feel that they are genuinely observed, but they are Borrowized. They speak the language of Borrow. While this is quite true, it is equally true that he knows exactly how to impress and interest the reader with the personages.

Perhaps his power in this direction is more fully appreciated when he deals with material that promises no such wealth of colour as do gipsy scenes and wanderings in the romantic South. Cicupside and London Bridge suit him fully as well as do Spanish forests or Welsh mountains. True romancer as he is, he is not dependent on conventionally picturesque externals for arresting attention, since he will discover the stuff of adventure wherever his steps may lead him. The streets of Bagdad in the 'golden prime' of Haroun Alraschid are no more mysterious, more enthralling, than the well-known thoroughfares of modern London. No ancient sorceress of Eastern story can touch his imagination more deeply than can an old gipsy woman. A skirmish with a publisher is fully as exciting as a tilt in a mediæval tourney, while the stories told him by a rural landlord promise as much relish as any of the tales recounted by Oriental barbers and one-eyed Calenders.

Thus it is that while the pervasive egotism of the man bewitches us, we yield readily to the spell of his splendid garrulity. It is of no great moment that he should take an occasional drink to quench his thirst when passing along the London streets; but he continues to make even these little details interesting:

"Notwithstanding the excellence of the London pavement, I began, about nine o'clock, to feel myself thoroughly tired—painfully and slowly did I drag my feet along. I also felt very much in want of some refreshment, and I remembered that since breakfast I had taken nothing. I was in the Strand, and glancing about I perceived that I was close by an hotel which bore over the door, the somewhat remarkable name of 'Holy Lands.' Without a moment's hesitation I entered a well-lighted passage, and turning to the left I found myself in a well-lighted coffee room, with a well-dressed and frizzled waiter before me. 'Bring me some claret,' said I, for I was rather faint than hungry, and I felt ashamed to give a humble order to so well-dressed an individual. The waiter looked at me for a moment, then making a low bow he bustled off, and I sat myself down in the box nearest to the window. Presently the waiter returned, bearing beneath his left arm a long bottle, and between the fingers of his right hand two purple glasses—placing the latter on the table . . . he set the bottle down before me with a bang, and then standing still appeared to watch my movements. You think I don't know how to drink a glass of claret, thought I to myself. I'll soon show you how we drink claret where I come from, and filling one of the glasses to the brim, I flickered it for a moment between my eyes and the lustre, and then held it to my nose—having given that organ full time to test the bouquet of the wine, I applied the glass to my lips, taking a large mouthful of the wine, which I swallowed slowly and by degrees that the palate might otherwise have an opportunity of performing its functions. A second mouthful I disposed of more summarily—then placing the empty glass upon the table, I fixed my eyes upon the bottle and said nothing—whereupon the waiter, who had been observing the whole process with considerable attention, made me a bow yet more low than before, and turning on his heel retired with a smart chuck of the head, as much as to say, 'It is all right, the young man is used to claret.'"

A slight enough incident, but, like every line which Borrow wrote, intensely temperamental. How characteristic this of the man's attitude: 'You think I don't know how to drink a glass of claret, thought I to myself.' Then with what deliberate pleasure does he record the theatrical posing for the benefit of the waiter. How he loves to impress! You are conscious of this in every scene which he describes, and it is quite useless to resent it. The only way to escape it is by leaving Borrow unread, and this no wise man can do willingly.

One of his best character sketches is that of the delightful ostler in The Romany Rye, whose talk exhales what Borrow would call "the wholesome smell of the stable." His wonderful harangues (Borrowized to a less extent than usual) have all the fine, breathless garrulity of this breed of man, and his unique discourse on 'How to manage a horse on a journey' occupies a delightful chapter. Here are the opening sentences.

"When you are a gentleman," said he, "should you ever wish to take a journey on a horse of your own, and you could not have a much better than the one you have here eating its fill in the box-yonder—I wonder, by the by, how you ever came by it—you can't do better than follow the advice I am about to give you, both with respect to your animal and yourself. Before you start merely give your horse a couple of handfuls of corn, and a little water somewhat under a quart, and if you drink a pint of water yourself out of the pail, you will feel all the better during the whole day; then you may walk and trot your animal for about ten miles, till you come to some nice inn, where you may get down and see your horse led into a nice stall, telling the ostler not to feed him till you come. If the ostler happens to be a dog-fancier, and has an English terrier dog like that of mine there, say what a nice dog it is, and praise its black and tan, and if he does not happen to be a dog-fancier ask him how he's getting on, and whether he ever knew worse times—that kind of thing will please the ostler, and he will let you do just what you please with your own horse, and when your back is turned he'll say to his comrades what a nice gentleman you are, . . . then go and sit down to breakfast, and before you have finished breakfast, get up and go and give your horse a feed of corn; chat with the ostler two or three minutes till your horse has taken the shine out of his corn, which will prevent the ostler taking any of it away when your back is turned, for such things are sometimes done—not that I ever did such a thing myself when I was at the inn at Hounslow. Oh, dear me, no!

Borrow is emphatically an original force in letters. We may not always like him; never can we ignore him. Provocative, unsatisfying, fascinating—such is George Borrow. And most fascinating of all is his love of night, day, sun, moon, and stars, "all sweet things." Herein lies the spell of Borrow, for in his company there is always "a wind on the heath."

SIR RICHARD FRANCIS BURTON was born in 1821, and Swinburne's comparison of him with Raleigh is a suggestive one, for each man was a tireless adventurer—both in the physical and imaginative sense, but Burton had nothing of the courtier in him.

The son of an Army officer, Burton began to travel when he was a few months old, and his desultory and un-English education was carried on for the first few years in France and Italy; he was then sent to a school at Richmond in preparation for Oxford. From babyhood his temper was an ungoverned one, and at school he "was in one perpetual scene of fights." In 1841 he went up to Oxford, but here his obstinate defiance of all lawful authority quickly resulted in rustication. Of his want of veracity Burton made no secret. He admits to being "a resolute and unblushing liar," and at any time would go out of his way to spread unfounded reports of his own enormities.

On leaving Oxford in 1842, he entered the East India Service, and thereafter took the keenest interest in the different languages, manners, and customs of the Orientals. His mastery of Arabic was so complete that, unhindered and unharmed, he wandered in disguise through many parts of Arabia, where it would have been death to him had he been discovered to be an European. The outcome of this exploit was the famous Pilgrimage to El Medinah and Mecca (1855-1856). Shortly after its publication he accompanied Captain Spoko to Central Africa, and to this journey we owe his discovery of Lake Tanganyika in 1858.

As British consul, Burton served in many countries, for his wonderful power as a linguist made him a valuable officer, despite a temper and originality that were continually bringing him into conflict with his superiors.

Both in physique and personality, Burton was a mass of contradictions. Of fine stature, his hands and feet wore of the smallest, and his dark, piercing eyes separated a calm, dignified brow from a mouth and chin of saturnine expression. In temperament he was inordinately proud without a tinge of conceit, courageous, yet keenly sensitive to emotion, of stoical calmness in the big things of life, yet with an uncontrollable rage under the smallest provocation. He was an indefatigable worker, and on his death in 1890 left a large amount of unpublished manuscripts, a considerable portion of which, with his private diaries, Lady Burton, from conscientious reasons, caused to be destroyed. After 1861 Lady Burton accompanied her husband on his travels, and between 1875-1879 published some interesting books on Syria, Palestine, Arabia, Egypt, and India, and an expurgated edition of The Arabian Nights in 1886. She died in 1896.

Burton had no great literary gifts; he has not Borrow's gift of self-expression and self-revelation; and the fragmentary records of friends and companions give us a far more striking and modest expression of the man's remarkable personality than anything he ever wrote. Even his famous Arabian Nights (1885-1888) owes its fame far more to the audacious frankness of the traveller than to the literary beauty of the translation. Burton was a fine scholar, and a wonderful linguist, but in sheer artistic merit Lane's translation is preferable to Burton's, and what is best in Burton is largely inspired by Lane.

He is the author of some fifty volumes, including travels, translations, and novels.

LAURENCE OLIPIANT (1829-1888) is another case of a man whose arresting personality never found adequate expression in his writings. Educated for the Bar, for many years he lived a life of adventure, but in 1854 entered the diplomatic service as private secretary to the Earl of Elgin, with whom he travelled to China. In 1861, while acting as Secretary of Legation in Japan, Oliphant narrowly escaped assassination. He then returned to England. After a short spell in Parliament where he showed considerable ability, he came under the influence of a mystic and adventurer named Harris, with whom he crossed to America. When at length he broke away from Harris and the "Brotherhood of the New Life," it was to found a community of Jewish immigrants in Palestine.

Oliphant was a voluminous writer, his more important works include The Russian Shores of the Black Sea (1853), Narrative of a Mission to China and Japan (1857-1859), Piccadilly (1866), Athora Peto (1883), and Manollam (1886).

Oliphant's travel books scintillate with satirical sallies, but they have not the intimate charm of Borrow's, nor the scholarly interest attaching to Burton's. He is far more of a visionary than Burton, and has nothing of Borrow's solid common-sense, this visionary element predominating in Sympneumata (1885) and Scientific Religion (1888). As philosophical works they are of little value; though their psychological interest, by the light they throw on Oliphant's temperament, is remarkable.

RICHARD JEFFERIES, born in 1848 at Choate Farm, Swindon, was the son of a Wiltshire farmer. His education was fitful, and at fifteen, when he left school, showed neither genius nor promise. He was a quiet, shy, dreamy boy, no talker, and "not particularly amiable"—to whom a sunrise or the flight of a bird appealed far more than cricket or any other game. The lonely walks he loved were regarded as idleness, and the gun he carried was viewed with particular disfavour. "That young Jefferies," the old squire would say, "is not the sort of fellow you want hanging about in your covers." Indeed, little sympathy was shown, even by his parents, with the sensitive youth who found his companions in books and the teeming life of Nature.

Jefferies began his literary career at seventeen, as reporter for the North Wiltshire Herald, a new Conservative paper, but it was not until 1872 that his work attracted attention, when his letters to the Times on the condition of the Wiltshire labourer brought him into notice; after this he had little difficulty in finding a publisher to take his work, though financially he never reaped a big harvest.

Never robust, for six years before his death he suffered intensely, yet he never ceased working, and in 1887, a few weeks before he died, he wrote a preface to a new edition of White's Natural History of Selborne, regretting that he had no time to make it longer.

In many respects, obviously, Richard Jefferies differs very widely from the men just discussed. As a personality he had nothing of the challenging and cryptic quality that give special interest to them. His one link with them is as a literary vagrant. He is something more than a lover of Nature or a naturalist. He is a genuine earth-man with a passionate primal strain, and that quality of aloofness from his civilised brethren that characterises all these literary vagabonds. His love of the open differs from Borrow's open-air delight in being more sensuous in its intensity. Borrow's joy in the earth is more like Byron's. Jefferies reminds us of Keats; he responds to the pageant of summer with every nerve in his body.

Take, for instance, the opening to Wild Life in a Southern Country:

"The inner slope of the green fosse is inclined at an angle pleasant to recline on, with the head just below the edge, in the summer sunshine. A faint sound as of a sea heard in a dream—a sibilant 'sish-sish'—passes along outside, dying and coming again as a fresh wave of the wind rushes through the bennets and the dry grass. There is the happy hum of bees—who love the hills—as they speed by laden with their golden harvest, a drowsy warmth, and the delicious odour of wild thyme. Behind, the fosse sinks and the rampart rises high and steep—two butterflies are wheeling in uncertain flight over the summit. It is only necessary to raise the head a little way, and the cool breeze refreshes the cheek—cool at this height, while the plains beneath glow under the heat."

Thus, too, from The Life of the Fields:

"Green rushes, long and thick, standing up above the edge of the ditch, told the hour of the year, as distinctly as the shadow on the dial the hour of the day. Green and thick and supple to the touch, they felt like summer, soft and elastic, as if full of life, mere rushes though they were. On the fingers they left a green scent, rushes have a separate scent of green, so, too, have ferns very different to that of grass or leaves. Rising from brown sheaths, the tall stems, enlarged a little in the middle like classical columns, and heavy with their sap and freshness, leaned against the hawthorn sprays. From the earth they had drawn its moisture, and made the ditch dry, some of the sweetness of the air had entered into their fibres, and the rushes—the common rushes—were full of beautiful summer."

Jefferies' writings are studies in tactile sensation. This is what brings him into affinity with Keats, and this is what differentiates him from Thoreau, with whom he had much in common. Of both Jefferies and Thoreau it might be said what Emerson said of his friend, that they "saw as with a microscope, heard as with an ear-trumpet." As lovers of the open air and of the life of the open air, every sense was preternaturally quickened. But though both observed acutely, Jefferies alone felt acutely.

"To me," he says, "colour is a sort of food; every spot of colour is a drop of wine to the spirit."

It took many years for him to realise where exactly his strength as a writer lay. In early and later life he again and again essayed the novel form, but, superior as were his later fictions—Amaryllis at the Fair, for instance, to such crude stuff as The Scarlet Shawl—it is as a prose Nature poet that he will be remembered.

He knew and loved the earth, the atmosphere of the country brought into play all the faculties of his nature. Lacking in social gifts, reserved and shy to an extreme, he neither knew much about men and women, nor cared to know much. With a few exceptions—for the most part studies of his own kind and kin—the personages of his stories are shadow people, less vital realities than the trees, the flowers, the birds, of whom he has to speak. But where he writes of what he has felt, what he has realised, then, like every fine artist he transmits his enthusiasm to others. Sometimes, maybe, he is so full of his subject, so engrossed with the wonders of the earth, that the words come forth in a torrent, impetuous, overwhelming. He writes like a man beside himself with sheer joy. The Life of the Fields gives more than physical pleasure, more than an imaginative delight, it is a religion—the old religion of paganism.

The points of affinity between Thoreau and Jefferies are sufficiently obvious, and yet no two writers who have loved the earth, and found their greatest happiness in the life of the woods and fields, as did these two men, have expressed this feeling so variously. Thoreau, quiet, passive, self-contained, has seized upon the large tranquillity of Nature, the coolness and the calm, "the central peace subsisting at the heart of endless agitation."

Jefferies, feverish, excitable, passionate, alive to the glorious plenitude of the earth, has seized upon the exceeding beauty of natural things. No scholar like Thoreau, he brings no system of thought, as did the American, for Nature to put into shape. Outside of Nature all is arid and profitless to him. He comes to her with empty hands and seeks for what she may give him. To Thoreau the earth was a kind and gracious sister, to Jefferies an all-sufficing mistress.

The reader who passes from Thoreau to Jefferies need have no fear that he will be wearied with the same point of view. On the contrary, he will realise with pleasure how differently two genuine lovers of the earth can express their affection.

In Jefferies' song of praise, his song of desire—praise and desire alternate continually in his writings—there are two aspects of the earth upon which he dwells continually: the exceeding beauty of the earth, and the exceeding plenitude of the earth. Apostrophes to the beauty have been quoted already; let this serve as an illustration of the other aspect:

"Everything," he exclaims, "on a scale of splendid waste. Such noble, broadcast, open-armed waste is delicious to behold. Never was there such a lying proverb as 'Enough is as good as a feast'¹ Give me the feast, give me squandered millions of seeds, luxurious carpets of petals, green mountains of oak leaves. The greater the waste the greater the enjoyment—the nearer the approach to real life. Casuistry is of no avail, the fact is obvious, Nature flings treasures abroad, puffs them with open lips along on every breeze; piles up lavish layers of them in the free, open air, packs countless numbers together in the needles of a fir tree. Prodigality and superfluity are stamped on everything she does"²

This is no chance passage, no casual thought. Again and again Jefferies returns to the richness and plenty of the earth. And his style, suiting itself to the man's temperament, is rich and overflowing, splendidly diffuse, riotously exulting, until at times there is the very incoherence of passion about it.

Ardent, shy, unimpressionable, proud, pagan and idealist, he is one of the interesting figures in later Victorian Literature.

II. PROSE CRITICISM AND THE ESSAY: (a) Art and Life. Introduction—Benjamin Haydon—John Ruskin—Walter Pater—J. A. Symonds—Oscar Wilde.

(a) ART AND LIFE

LITERATURE being an art, it is natural that writers who had special knowledge of the fine arts should not only express that knowledge in the art of letters, but should attempt to trace the connection between art and life, as others had done between letters and life

Lamb's essay on Hogarth, Hazlitt's Conversations of Northcote, are among the earliest essays in this broader kind of art criticism, while that unhappy man of genius BENJAMIN HAYDON (1786–1846), did for the Elgin Marbles what Ruskin in a later age did for the painting of the Italian Medicevals, in trying to reveal their beauty and vital significance

The Romantic Movement had one of its springs of sustenance in the art of the Middle Ages, another in Greek art, while both music, sculpture, and painting affected the poetic outlook of men like Byron, Shelley, Keats, Landor, and Hunt. But the first great art-critic is JOHN RUSKIN

JOHN RUSKIN (1819–1900)

HIS LIFE

John Ruskin was the son of John James Ruskin, head of a firm of wine merchants, a Scot whose ancestress had once custody of the National Covenant. His mother was a strict Evangelical and disciplinarian who hoped one day to see her son as an Evangelical clergyman. Toys were regarded askance, and all entertainments, save a mild conviviality in connection with the local chapel, were tabooed. There was an even more Evangelical and Spartan aunt, who reminds us of the terrible Miss Emerson, the terror of the youthful Ralph Waldo. Like her spiritual comrade, Ruskin's aunt believed in austerities, and on one occasion gave him cold mutton for his Sunday dinner, which, remarked the victim, as "I much preferred it hot—greatly diminished the influence of the Pilgrim's Progress"

Mrs Ruskin's method of Bible teaching might well have turned her son into a defiant infidel, for ¹ Curious similarity of thought here with Elia's Popular Fallacy, though probably quite uninspired by Lamb. Jefferies was no great reader. It is said that he knew little or nothing of Thoreau.

² The Life of the Fields.

she pushed him steadily through the whole course of Biblical history again and again, giving him to learn whole portions by heart. Yet he always spoke with enthusiasm of this drilling, considering it the most precious part of his education; and there was certainly some responsive chord in the boy's own heart that enabled him to turn this hazardous method of Bible teaching to good literary account. For in no writer of our age is the influence of the English Bible more pronounced than in Ruskin, it gave dignity to his rhetoric and body to his thought.

What his home life was like, with all its conventionalities and gloomy discipline, Ruskin himself has told us in his delightful Præterita—delightful because of the whimsical humour of his confidences and the visualising power of reminiscence which enabled him to reproduce for us those early formative years. Such power reminds us again and again of Dickens in David Copperfield, until we cannot help wishing that Ruskin had turned his hand to fiction—fiction inspired by autobiographical memories. Plainly much whipping was certainly an early rule of his existence, and when at last he was allowed the privilege of coming down to dessert it was to "crack other people's nuts for them and never to have any himself"

The paternal influence was less oppressive. He was a man of artistic tastes and broad literary sympathies. An admirer of Scott and Byron, Shakespeare and Cervantes, he was an excellent reader, and by his readings aloud stimulated his young son's literary tastes. Ruskin's knowledge of Scott, while yet a lad, was almost as thorough as that of Morris. The father had literary ambitions for his son, being desirous that he some day should "write poetry as good as Byron's, only purer." The "purer" touch is characteristic, for the older Ruskin, though by no means so rigid a Protestant as his wife, was a sound Evangelical in theory, whatever he may have been in practice.

If the child regards his parents with awe rather than with affection, they on the other side were entirely wrapped up in their boy; he was diligent, even precocious; showed considerable power of memory, and the unusual combination of genuine artistic feeling with an exactitude of observation and absorption in scientific subjects.

And if he proved also a self-centred child, what else could have been expected in those surroundings. In any case he was a credit to his various tutors, and certainly had some excuse for being what he sternly designates himself at the time, as "a conceited and troublesome little monkey." The wonder of it is that he did not become a hopeless young prig instead of an attractively egotistical youth, with abundant nervous energy, and a lively disposition.

On his thirteenth birthday, Henry Talfourd—his father's partner—gave him Rogers' Italy, with illustrations by Turner. This determined, he tells us, "the main tenour of his life." A year later Prout's Sketches in Flanders and Germany served as a prolude to the first of many delightful journeys abroad. Then his innate love of art and nature was encouraged and stimulated by familiarity in these Continental tours.

In January 1837 Ruskin was entered as a Gentleman Commoner at Christ Church, Oxford; hoping that in due course he would develop into a bishop of the approved Evangelical type. He proved an excellent student, developed a fine taste in sherry, and attracted many friends by his wit and hospitality. He won, moreover, the Newdigate Prize—but he showed no signs of budding clericalism, and when he left the university, though hazy as to what he precisely wished to become, he was quite clear in deciding both against an episcopal future and a future in the wine trade.

Oxford, as he himself frankly admitted, did nothing for him, save to afford him opportunities of academic distinction. She was no inspiration in his life as she was in the life of Matthew Arnold or of John Henry Newman.

Shortly after he left Oxford the first-fruits of his tours abroad and artistic tastes at home came in the shape of the first of the five volumes given to Modern Painters. Nobody cared for Turner, he had said, but "a retired coachmaker of Tottenham and I."

Although for the first twenty years of his literary life it is the art critic that occupies the stage, while the first of his explicit social strictures was not published until the early sixties, yet the social reformer was latent almost from the start, and so far back as 1849 his attitude towards social matters was explicit enough, as a passage from The Seven Lamps of Architecture will show:

"We have just spent, for instance, a hundred and fifty millions, with which we have paid men for digging ground from one place and depositing it in another. We have formed a large class of men, the railway navvies, especially reckless, unmanageable, and dangerous. We have maintained besides (let us state the benefits as fairly as possible) a number of ironfounders in an unhealthy and painful employment; we have developed (this at least is good) a very large amount of mechanical ingenuity, and we have, in fine, attained the power of going fast from one place to another. Meantime we have had no mental interest or concern ourselves in the operations we have set on foot, but have been left to the usual vanities and cares of our existence. Suppose, on the other hand, that we had employed the same sums in building beautiful houses and churches. We should have maintained the same number of men, not in driving wheelbarrows, but in a distinctly technical, if not intellectual employment; and those who were more intelligent among them would have been especially happy in that employment, as having room in it for the development of their fancy, and being directed by it to that observation of beauty which, associated with the pursuit of natural science, at present forms the enjoyment of many of the more intelligent manufacturing operatives. Of mechanical ingenuity, there is, I imagine, at least as much required to build a cathedral as to cut a tunnel or contrive a locomotive. We should, therefore, have developed as much science, while the artistic element of intellect would have been added to the gain. Meantime we should ourselves have been made happier and wiser by the interest we should have taken in the work with which we were personally concerned; and when all was done, instead of the very doubtful advantage of the power of going fast from place to place, we should have had the certain advantage of increased pleasure in stopping at home."¹

While in The Stones of Venice the art criticism is really subsidiary to the larger matters of life and conduct suggested by those eloquent stones.

Despite these clear indications, there was great dismay and indignation when the vigorous indictment of modern political economy appeared—and the papers which Thackeray was publishing then in the Cornhill Magazine aroused such opposition that the editor had to put an end to them. In 1869 Ruskin was elected Slade Professor of Art at Oxford, and Oxford never had a more provocative or stimulating lecturer. After a break, in 1877, Ruskin resumed his lectures, and continued his association with Oxford until 1884. Bad health clouded his later years, and obscured his fine genius, but he lingered on, a wreck of his old self, till 1900.

Throughout his life he had been subject to severe break-downs in health, and these became more frequent and more severe in his later years.

An abnormally sensitive organisation, coupled with a fierce enthusiasm and absorbing devotion to the work he loved, brought on grave symptoms of brain trouble. Despite the material advantages that he enjoyed, his life was by no means a happy one. Too noble and high minded, too deeply sympathetic to pass on one side the darker problems of modern life from which he had been so carefully shielded in his youth, he was yet too highly strung, too feminine in temperament, too impatient for the arduous work he had mapped out for himself. In his own character he combined an astonishing medley of contradictory qualities—arbitrary, tolerant, savage, gentile-hearted, a visionary of the visionaries, yet often intensely practical and clear-headed, broad in many of his sympathies, intensely narrow in others, now speaking with the illuminating inspiration of genius, again with the wilful one-sidedness of the ordinary crank, reminding us at one moment of St. Francis, at the next of the absurd White Knight in Alice through the Looking-Glass, these things, if they added to the interest of his complex personality, added also to his troubles as a critic and a reformer. Yet, at bottom, he is one of the most beautiful, great-hearted characters in modern life, and physical infirmities are responsible for the erratic course he often pursued. The final impression left upon our mind is that of a modern St. Francis, with a strong dash of Cromwell and a milder dash of Don Quixote in his composition. Certainly a highly interesting blend.

HIS WORK

Tolstoy once declared that Ruskin was one of the greatest men of the age, and he was pained to note that the English were of a different opinion. Now, while it is often unhappily true that a prophet is not without honour save in his own country, yet the uncertainty in the public attitude towards Ruskin is in a measure accountable on other grounds than those of moral blindness. Few great personalities of the age have been so bewildering as was Ruskin. He has been art critic, literary critic, social reformer, educationist, revolutionary, reactionary, all in turns, and he has been those things with a pontifical assertiveness that has roused opposition. He has never troubled to explain himself or sought to reconcile inconsistencies in his attitude, and has persisted in treating us like spoiled, ignorant children who were to be scolded into right thinking and good behaviour.

Yet the genius of the man is beyond question, just as his essential loveliness is; but it lay far less in any one of the various rôles he assumed during his long life, than in a superb suggestiveness that he brought to bear on a host of subjects, apparently disconnected. Having acclaimed him as a master of rhetoric, they questioned his right to lay down the law on manual labour, having recognised him as an authority on Botticelli, they were affronted when he posed as an expert on a living wage. They failed to see that his real strength lay less in art criticism as such, or economics criticism as such, or literary criticism as such, but in the brilliant discursive comments on the multifarious aspects of life as a whole. But it was this suggestiveness that most people resented.

Ruskin is often referred to as if he had been a great art critic who spoiled himself by meddling with social problems. Nothing could be wider of the mark than this. Indeed it would be less extravagant to call him a great social critic who wastes his time over art criticism. Certainly it is quite an arguable matter how far Ruskin may be called a great art critic. He was, without doubt, a brilliant one, though his idiosyncratic nature made him blind to some forms of art, unduly enthusiastic of others. What is not arguable, however, is the amazing versatility and suggestiveness of the man. He was neither pre-eminently a deep thinker, nor a man of supreme excellence in any one department of literature, but a man of high moral principles, of splendid though ill-coordinated intellectual power, of luxuriant imagination, all of which qualities he turned on to a rich variety of subject-matter.

Regarding the man's stock and upbringing, it is really amazing what he became. The spoiled child of narrow-minded well-to-do parents, he might, with his sensitive artistic temperament, have become a dreamer and dilettante. There was nothing, as there had been in Carlyle's case, to make him realise the ugly, crude things of life. Nonetheless, Carlyle had no abler or more whole-hearted follower than he, while he excelled his master in penetrating insight into the complex conditions of modern life. He never deserted art for sociology, as has been said of him. He took up sociology because of his love for art. His life was all a piece. His social teaching is a corollary of his art criticism—that "ideas of Truth are the foundation, ideas of imitation the destruction of all Art." For art meant to him the outward expression of the inward beauty that haunts the imagination of every great artist. And how could this beauty be realised while modern conditions of living were so ugly and deadening?

RUSKIN AS AN ART CRITIC

Ruskin's value as an art critic lay chiefly in the impulse he gave to his generation to appreciate the beauty of natural phenomena; he showed them the absurdity of confounding the grandeur of Nature merely with her big scenic effects, when a blade of grass or an ordinary cloud can reveal as richly the possibilities of beauty. To this extent he supplemented the implicit teaching of Wordsworth and Shelley.

Approaching art with this underlying thought, he postulates that painting should be something more than an ingenious arrangement of pigments. Without undervaluing technique, he emphasizes passionately the importance of sincerity and truthfulness. "In these books of mine," he declared, "their distinctive character as essays on Art is bringing everything to a root in human passion or human hope."

From 1843 to 1860 he concerned himself with the fine arts generally, especially painting, sculpture, and architecture; from 1860 onwards he carried the principles underlying this criticism into social life, and just as Turner inspired his earlier work, so does Carlyle inspire his later.

Ruskin has summed up for us clearly and concisely the trend of his teaching in his Fors Clavigera:

"Modern Painters," he declares, "taught the claims of all lower nature in the hearts of men, of the rock, and wave, and hut, as a part of their necessary life, in all that I now bid you to do, to dress the earth and keep it, I am fulfilling what I then began. The Stones of Venice taught the laws of constructive Art, and the dependence of all human work on edifice for its beauty, or the happy life of the workman. Unto this Last taught the laws of that life itself, and its dependence on the sun of justice—the Oxford Lectures the necessity that it should be led, and the gracious laws of beauty and labour recognised by the upper, no less than the lower classes of England; and lastly, Fors Clavigera has declared the relation of these to each other, and the only possible conditions of peace and honour for low and high, rich and poor."

Hence we are fully prepared for the thesis maintained by Ruskin that a lack of feeling for beauty means more than blunted art sensibility, it means "a contempt for right sense—beauty is the concrete final expression of rightness."

The jerry builder symbolises for Ruskin the defective idealism that he found in the life of our day. In a corrupt age, he argued, you have corrupt art, in an age of noble aims and endeavours, great art. As stated by him, the generalisation seems too sweeping. The history of art can show periods of splendour when there was abundant moral depravity. Ruskin over-emphasizes the correspondence between art and morality. Beauty may be the concrete final expression of rightness. But rightness of what? Not necessarily of conduct surely, but of feeling. High and enduring beauty cannot be the expression of a debased and low nature. But it may well be that the artist expresses here merely his feeling for what is good and great, although the evil influences in his nature conspire to prevent him expressing this feeling in action as a man. Few men are so vicious and rotten throughout as to have no gleam of rightness (to adhere to Ruskin's terminology), but they may be too poor and weakly to let the rightness dominate their lives.

The vision of beauty is by no means confined to the virtuous soul, any more than is spiritual intuition. The crafty and scheming Jacob sees a ladder ascending from earth to heaven, where his robust moral brother sees only a heap of stones in a desert place. Even "the devils believe and tremble."

Ruskin therefore circumscribes his argument too narrowly, in identifying great art with the outward expression of a healthy conscience.

RUSKIN AS THE CRITIC OF SOCIETY

Mr J. A. Hobson, in his admirable study of John Ruskin¹ as social reformer, has well pointed out the fallacy of the prevalent notion that Mr Ruskin abandoned his proper work as an art teacher in order rashly to embark in political economy, for which he had neither aptitude nor the requisite training and knowledge. On the contrary, Ruskin possessed

"special qualifications for social and economic criticism, for he was a skilled specialist in the finer qualities of work which men put into the raw material supplied by Nature in order to furnish the necessities of human consumption. His technical knowledge went far beyond a knowledge of the fine arts in architecture, and he was thoroughly acquainted with the practical bearing of weaving, wood and metal work, pottery and other handicrafts; moreover, he had made a lifelong study of animal and vegetable life and of the structure and composition of the earth, thus gaining an intimate acquaintance with the nature of the raw materials of that wealth which formed the chief subject-matter of commercial economy."

In regarding Ruskin's work as a social critic, it is well to bear in mind his thorough qualification for the rôle of reformer. Whatever may be the defects of his teaching, they are not due to any ignorance about the subject-matter he is discussing. Ruskin had, indeed, approached social economics with none of the vague sentimentalities so often and so unjustly placed to his credit, but with a logical power and dialectical skill denied to many of his hostile critics.

What he has done, roughly speaking, is to humanise political economy, to express the jargon of the economist about "cost" and "utility" in terms of human life, and to do this not as an emotional moralist but as a keen scientific inquirer. He takes the term "utility" and weighs its significance. The ordinary economist, as he points out, interprets "utility" with reference entirely to the finished product, overlooking the far more important process of production.

In this way wealth is estimated by the economist as a question of material welfare only, whereas, as Ruskin truly maintains, material welfare must be balanced by the character of the labour that goes to produce it, its duration, monotony, wholesomeness or unwholesomeness. Work that debilitates a people, drawing away its best energies, can produce only a sorry kind of wealth. The only true wealth in fact is life. That is Ruskin's conclusion, and his entire social theory concerns itself with the relation between labour and life. He examines the doctrine of Wages, contesting the point that they are "universally or even generally determined by the exclusive action of competition." Other considerations enter in, such as custom and good feeling.

"Cheap labour is not merely bad from the standpoint of morality, it is bad even from the lower standpoint of economy. For cheap labour means impoverished lives, and impoverished lives mean inefficient work. The consumer gains at the outset but loses ultimately, for if you squeeze wages to starvation point you get inferior work and shoddy goods."

One other illustration from Ruskin's social theory:

"Specialisation is good up to a point, but over-specialisation is bad, for it deadens the worker. A man whose labour consists, say, in making a fractional part of a pin becomes a mere machine. Division of labour you call it, it is division of human beings—dividing men into segments."

Labour should be made healthy and pleasurable. From the failure to recognise this he maintained that the great evil of our civilisation to-day lay not in the fact (incontestable as that is) that men are half-starved, but that they take no pleasure in the work by which they earn their living, looking to the acquisition of money as the only means of pleasure. And they cannot possibly take pleasure while there is this over-specialisation and this worship of supply and demand.

"Nor must we blame the employer only for this state of things, the public—the consumer—are also at fault. They demand cheap things, not good things. Were they longer-sighted they would realise that in the long run the good thing is the cheap thing."

Passing from Ruskin's criticism of modern economics, let us see how he views the educational fallacies prevalent to-day.

The great fault here, in his opinion, lies in our insistence on quantity of information rather than quality of knowledge. "You do not educate a man by telling him what he knew not, but in making him what he was not."

Ruskin insists on the dominance of moral ideas in teaching in order to form character, and upon a greater adherence to the facts of nature and human life. The defect to-day lies in the fact that commercial considerations rise uppermost. We wish merely to "get on" in the world, meaning by getting on, making money. Education, therefore, is vitiated by the money taint, and æsthetic considerations are undervalued. Ruskin would certainly endorse Herbert Spencer's dictum, that "To prepare us for complete living is the function which Education has to discharge."

So far as children are concerned, he points to the great value of field excursions and country rambles (a value that is now receiving serious attention in our elementary schools); and shows the advantage that a gracious and beautiful environment has upon impressionable youth. In short, Ruskin's whole aim is to justify as sober fact Wordsworth's poetic exclamation: "We live by admiration, hope, and love."

RUSKIN AND THE POSITION OF WOMEN

Ruskin's views on the "Woman's Movement" would meet with scant respect in many quarters to-day. The conservative element in his nature is more clearly discernible here than anywhere. Not only is he opposed to the suffrage but he is opposed to women entering industrial life, and his domestic ideal has some of the sentimental weaknesses characteristic of the Mid-Victorian age. Whether industrial competition is bad or good for women need not be discussed. Under present-day conditions of life, women are compelled to enter the industrial arena, and the domestic virtues clearly cannot exhaust all the potential qualities of womanhood to-day.

So even if we sympathise with Ruskin's preferences we are bound to acknowledge that they fail to take into consideration existing conditions of life.

Yet while there are elements in Ruskin's views about women that seem narrow and somewhat absurd, there are elements also, especially in his psychological analysis, that are well worth the consideration of even the advanced modernist.

Nothing could be wiser than his advice as to her reading:

"Turn her loose into the old library and let her alone . . . let her loose in the library, I say, as you do the fawn in the fields. It knows the bad weeds twenty times better than you, and the good ones too, and will eat some bitter and prickly ones, good for it, which you had not the slightest idea were good."

These are words of excellent wisdom.

Then, again, in differentiating the sexes, he points out what is too often forgotten by extremists to-day, that with man and woman each has what the other lacks and that the happiness of both lies in each asking and receiving from the other what that other alone can give. Or as Tompkinson put it more briefly, "Woman is not undeveloped man but diverse!"

THE SUM AND SUBSTANCE OF RUSKIN'S TEACHING

Ruskin is as emphatic as Carlyle upon the Gospel of Work, but he promises that work should not be mechanical and uninspiring, but interesting and pleasurable, so far as is possible.

He is no enemy to manufacturing life, as some think; all he contends is that manufacturing life does not necessarily mean an ugly and sordid life. He would have an English city as beautiful as a mediæval town, without the scientific defects of the mediæval town. What we have to learn the most diligently is the art of wise and noble living; and to this end Ruskin has lent all the power of his eloquence and logic to show us exactly what constitutes wisdom and nobility. Recognising with Spencer that the State is a living organism, he would have the parts mutually dependent. The good of the whole, that is the burden of his cry: and to attain the good of the whole, public enterprise should supersede private endeavour.

No writer in Victorian times did more than Ruskin to draw attention to the terrible wastage going on in the social organism—under present economic conditions,—and to stir the individual to more serious effort in the cause of human brotherhood, not in the spirit of condescending charity, but in the saner and ampler spirit of common justice.

In order to appraise the content of Ruskin's work as a critic on art and social problems, we must always bear in mind that he was essentially a mediævalist. His mediævalism it is that gave him his passion for the Gothic; that led him to underrate Greek art, that attracted him to Pro-Raphaelitism, that coloured the eclectic Catholicism into which he finally drifted as a religious thinker, this mediævalism it is, moreover, which brought him into line with Carlyle's love of the Middle Ages and that made him with Carlyle (though more explicitly and elaborately) adopt a kind of aristocratic Socialism as his economic creed, and lend authority and obedience. With his successor, Morris, he disclaims the art for art's sake theory, but whereas with Morris it was art for life's sake, with Ruskin it is ultimately art for God's sake. For him all great art is praise.

An understanding of this strong mediævalist spirit in Ruskin will probably help to explain many of the strange inconsistencies and arbitrary pronouncements that often mar not only his immensely valuable art and social criticism, but his literary criticism also.

Judging his work as a whole it may be said that he is a highly brilliant and suggestive rather than a safe critic, where his sympathies are held as in the case of Turner and the Victorian painters, he is splendid; where his sympathies are not engaged, whether in dealing with an old-world master like Michael Angelo, or a modern genius like Whistler, he is erratic and unfair. And we might pursue the point through his economics and literary preferences. There will always be a difference of opinion as to whether his essential greatness lay in his æsthetic or his social criticism. Probably we are too near him to-day to get the right perspective. All we can say is that at the present time he is best remembered and valued on the whole as a critic of modern social conditions. Posterity must judge. Meanwhile let us bear in mind the intellectual force, the imaginative insight, the fundamental sincerity that—inconsistencies and extravagances notwithstanding—he has brought to bear upon every side of life.

THE TREASURES HIDDEN IN BOOKS

But granting that we had both the will and the sense to choose our friends well, how few of us have the power! or, at least, how limited, for most, is the sphere of choice! Nearly all our associations are determined by chance or necessity, and restricted within a narrow circle. We cannot know whom we would, and those whom we know, we cannot have at our side when we most need them. All the higher circles of human intelligence are, to those beneath, only momentarily and partially open. We may, by good fortune, obtain a glimpse of a great poet, and hear the sound of his voice; or put a question to a man of science, and be answered good-humouredly. We may intrude ten minutes' talk on a cabinet minister, answered probably with words worse than silence, being deceptive; or snatch, once or twice in our lives, the privilege of throwing a bouquet in the path of a princess, or arresting the kind glance of a queen. And yet these momentary chances we covet, and spend our years, and passions, and powers, in pursuit of little more than those, while, meantime, there is a society continually open to us, of people who will talk to us as long as we like, whatever our rank or occupation,—talk to us in the best words they can choose, and of the things nearest their hearts. And this society, because it is so numerous and so gentle, and can be kept waiting round us all day long—kings and statesmen lingering patiently, not to grant audience, but to gain it!—in those plainly furnished and narrow ante-rooms, our bookcase shelves,—we make no account of that company,—perhaps never listen to a word they would say, all day long!

You may tell me, perhaps, or think within yourselves, that the apathy with which we regard this company of the noble, who are prying us to listen to them, and the passion with which we pursue the company, probably of the ignoble, who despise us, or who have nothing to teach us, are grounded in this,—that we can see the faces of the living men, and it is themselves, and not their sayings, with which we desire to become familiar. But it is not so. Suppose you never were to see their faces,—suppose you could be put behind a screen in the statesman's cabinet, or the prince's chamber, would you not be glad to listen to their words, though you were forbidden to advance beyond the screen? And when the screen is only a little less, folded in two instead of four, and you can be hidden behind the cover of the two boards that bind a book, and listen all day long, not to the casual talk but to the studied, determined, chosen addresses of the wisest of men,—this station of audience, and honourable privy council, you despise!

But perhaps you will say that it is because the living people talk of things that are passing, and are of immediate interest to you, that you desire to hear them. Nay; that cannot be so, for the living people will themselves tell you about passing matters much better in their writings than in their careless talk. But I admit that this motive does influence you, so far as you prefer those rapid and ephemeral writings to slow and enduring writings—books, properly so called. For all books are divisible into two classes: the books of the hour, and the books of all time. Mark this distinction—it is not one of quality only. It is not merely the bad book that does not last, and the good one that does. It is a distinction of species. There are good books for the hour, and good ones for all time; bad books for the hour, and bad ones for all time. I must define the two kinds before I go farther.

The good book of the hour, then—I do not speak of the bad one—is simply the useful or pleasant talk of some person whom you cannot otherwise converse with, printed for you. Very useful often, telling you what you need to know, very pleasant often as a sensible friend's present talk would be. These bright accounts of travels; good-humoured and witty discussions of question; lively or pathetic story-telling in the form of novel; firm fact-telling, by the real agents concerned in the events of passing history;—all these books of the hour, multiplying among us as education becomes more general, are a peculiar possession of the present age; we ought to be entirely thankful for them, and entirely ashamed of ourselves if we make no good use of them. But we make the worst possible use if we allow them to usurp the place of true books: for, strictly speaking, they are not books at all, but merely letters or newspapers in good print. Our friend's letter may be delightful, or necessary, to day; whether worth keeping or not, is to be considered. The newspaper may be entirely proper at breakfast time, but assuredly it is not reading for all day. So, though bound up in a volume, the long letter which gives you so pleasant an account of the inns, and roads, and weather, last year at such a place, or which tells you that amusing story, or gives you the real circumstances of such and such events, however valuable for occasional reference, may not be, in the real sense of the word, a "book" at all, nor, in the real sense, to be "read." A book is essentially not a talked thing, but a written thing, and written, not with a view of mere communication, but of permanence. The book of talk is printed only because its author cannot speak to thousands of people at once, if he could, he would—the volume is mere multiplication of his voice. You cannot talk to your friend in India, if you could, you would, you write instead, that is mere conveyance of voice. But a book is written, not to multiply the voice merely, not to carry it merely, but to perpetuate it. The author has something to say which he perceives to be true and useful or helpfully beautiful. So far as he knows, no one has yet said it, so far as he knows, no one else can say it. He is bound to say it, clearly and melodiously if he may, clearly at all events. In the sum of his life he finds this to be the thing, or group of things, manifest to him,—this, this piece of true knowledge, or sight, which his share of sunshine and earth has permitted him to seize. He would fain set it down for ever, engrave it on rock, if he could, saying, "This is the best of me; for the rest, I ate, and drank, and slept, loved, and hated, like another, my life was as the vapour, and is not, but thus I saw and knew, this, if anything of mine, is worth your memory." That is his "writing"; it is, in his small human way, and with whatever degree of true inspiration is in him, his inscription or scripture. That is a "Book"!

The broad, human significance of art is revealed also in some of the writings of the Pre-Raphaelites, especially by Dante Rossetti in his lovely allegory, Hand and Soul, and by Browning in his poems and painting and music. But the lineal successor of Ruskin, though a man of more limited genius, is Pater.

WALTER HORATIO PATER, the son of a doctor of Dutch extraction, was born in London in 1839. With an exhibition won at King's School, Canterbury, he went up to Queen's College, Oxford, in 1858, where he was coached by Jowett, and took his degree in 1862. After acting as a private tutor for two years, he was elected to a Fellowship at Brasenose.

Under the influence of Keble and the Tractarians, Pater at first thought of taking orders in the Church of England; he then became attracted towards Martineau and Unitarianism; but with Ruskin and the Pre-Raphaelite Brotherhood, Pater was more akin temperamentally, and with them he definitely joined hands. He also became a member of the "Old Mortality" essay club founded by John Nichol, to which Swinburne, A. V. Dicey, Nettleship, and Card belonged.

In 1866 Pater paid his first visit to Italy, and on his return "Winckelmann" appeared in the West- minster Review, to be included in Studies in the Renaissance, published in 1873. Two years later, at Birmingham, he delivered some lectures on Demeter and Persephone, that appeared in Greek Studies in 1895. After the publication of Marius in 1885, upon which he had been engaged four years, Pater left Oxford, and from 1886 to 1893 was living in London and doing a considerable amount of critical work for the Athenæum, Guardian, and Pall Mall. In November 1891 he reviewed Dorian Gray for the Bookman, and began a course of lectures on Plato and Platonism that were published in 1893.

In 1894 Glasgow conferred upon him the degree of LL.D., which he valued very highly, and shortly afterwards Pater was taken ill with rheumatic fever, his recovery was thought to be complete, but he died quite suddenly from heart failure on July 30th.

Like Ruskin, Pater is intensely subjective in his writings, and eclectic in his style. But he owes much less to Italian influence, far more to Greek culture, than Ruskin, and is untouched by the wide social interests of the author of Fora Clavigera. Essentially a scholarly recluse, his prevalent mood is introspective and brooding, and he is at his best when dealing with temperaments akin to his own. In his fastidious culture he reminds us of Arnold; but in his outlook on life his Epicurean philosophy is in striking variance with Arnold's stoicism. Arnold is always a moralist; there is nothing of the moralist in Pater.

Pater delights in art for its own sake, and without any ulterior reference this differentiates him from art lovers and critics like Ruskin and William Morris, to whom art must connote some social service, otherwise it is of little account.

Pater's point of view is wholly alien to this; and Pater's delight in the voluptuous sensation arising from a work of beauty struck the ordinary Englishman as unhealthy. Thus we can appreciate the point of the amusing parody of Pater in Mr. W. H. Mallock's lively satire, The New Republic (1877), where he appears as Mr. Rose. "What an odd man Mr. Rose is," says one of the characters. "He always seems to talk of everybody as if they had no clothes on."

The parody is rather cruel at times; for it suggests that Pater is little better than a refined sensualist, and this is to do him an injustice. Whatever might be inferred from detached passages in Pater's writings away from their context, his æsthetic theory is clear enough. Art exists to afford us intense and noble pleasure, and the highest pleasure necessarily furnishes an ethical impulse.

So much for the main theory. In one of its amplifications he contends that the norm to which the best art tends is music, lyric verse being the highest form of literature, while even architecture and sculpture are but harmonies and rhythm in stone—music, statically expressed. This theory has been strenuously attacked, and strictly interpreted, an arbitrary exaltation of music over letters would be to maintain that music is the most "spiritual," because it is emotionally suggestive; and that literature, for instance, is less spiritual, because it is more definite and intellectual.

Pater did not push his theory thus far. It is for him a suggestive idea rather than a dogma; and as a suggestive idea it is surely valuable and illuminating. Keats unconsciously implied the same when he wrote "Heard melodies are sweet, but those unheard are sweeter"; and there is no doubt that the appeal of any supreme form of beauty can never be categorically expressed, but is always something felt; none the less powerfully because it is vague and atmospheric. It is this vague and atmospheric magic that surrounds great art which fascinated Pater; and although he knew it could not be expressed in a formula, he bent all his powers to the minute analysis of this complex appeal so far as it could be expressed in words. No one has gone further than he in what may be called the logic of emotion. The function of the critic is clearly expressed by Pater, and the following passage gives us clearly and unmistakably what is his aim:

"The function of the æsthetic critic is to distinguish, analyse, and separate from its adjuncts the virtue by which a picture, a landscape, a fair personality in life or in a book produces the special impression of beauty or pleasure to indicate what the source of the impression is, and under what conditions it is experienced."

Now turn for a concrete illustration of this to his minute and subtle analysis of the attraction of Da Vinci's "La Gioconda":

"La Gioconda is, in the truest sense, Leonardo's masterpiece, the revealing instance of his mode of thought and work. In suggestiveness, only the Melancholia of Dürer is comparable to it; and no crude symbolism disturbs the effect of its subdued and graceful mystery. We all know the face and hands of the figure, set in its marble chair, in that circle of fantastic rocks, as in some faint light under sea. Perhaps of all ancient pictures time has chilled it least. As often happens with works in which invitation seems to reach its limit, there is an element in it given to, not invented by, the master . . .

"The presence that thus rose so strangely beside the waters is expressive of what in the ways of a thousand years men had come to desire. Here is the head upon which all the ends of the world are come and the eyelids are a little weary. It is a beauty wrought out from within upon the flesh, the deposit, little cell by cell, of strange thoughts and fantastic reveries and exquisite passions. Set it for a moment beside one of those white Greek goddesses or beautiful women of antiquity, and how would they be troubled by this beauty, into which the soul with all its maladies has passed! All the thoughts and experience of the world have etched and moulded there, in that which they have of power to refine and make expressive the outward form, the animalism of Greece, the lust of Rome, the reverie of the middle age with its spiritual ambition and imaginative loves, the return of the Pagan world, the sins of the Borgias. She is older than the rocks among which she sits, like the vampire she has been dead many times, and learned the secrets of the grave; and has been a divorcée in deep seas and keeps their fallen day about her, and trafficked for strange webs with Eastern merchants; and, as Leda, was the mother of Helen of Troy, and, as Saint Anne, the mother of Mary, and all this has been to her but as the sound of lyres and flutes, and lives only in the delicacy with which it has moulded the changing lineaments, and tinged the eyelids and the hands. The fancy of a perpetual life, sweeping together ten thousand experiences, is an old one; and modern thought has conceived the idea of humanity as wrought upon by a summing up in itself all modes of thought and life. Certainly Lady Lisa might stand as the embodiment of the old fancy, the symbol of the modern idea."

As a stylist, we may regard, in the first place, Pater's theories; in the second place, his practice.

The theories may be read in the "Essay on Style" which appears in the volume entitled Appreciations. The end, in his view, was beauty of expression and to achieve this end he advocated a consciously artistic prose, where all superfluous should be eliminated, and where the words should be chosen with jealous and loving care, so as to express clearly and precisely the underlying thought. Words for him were not merely connections of thought, but carried with them an aroma that might create the fitting mood for appreciating the drift of the writer's mind.

No man more conscientiously tried to put into practice his precepts than he. No essayist has been more sensitive to the colour and gradation of shade in words than he; and there is an amazing delicacy and subtlety in the critical nuances by which he endeavoured to actualise for the reader the object of his criticism. One has only to read the Essays on Lamb and Rossetti to appreciate this. His best critical work is happily expressed in the words which he applied to one of his volumes—Appreciations. They are, in the exact sense of the word, Appreciations—a subtly reasoned statement of the grounds for delighting in certain authors.

Pater treats artistic pleasure as Hawthorne treats ethical problems, by putting them under a microscope. It is a fascinating pursuit, but apt to become wearisome if pursued too long. Thus Pater is best enjoyed in modest snatches and instalments; to read him thus is both a joy and a discipline.

JOHN ADDINGTON SYMONDS (1840-1893) is another representative of the same school of thought; but is inferior to Pater both as a critic and as a stylist. There is force and suggestive criticism in his big work The Renaissance of Italy, though the artistic side of his subject is developed out of all proportion to other aspects.

As a stylist he is attractive and picturesque, but over-ornate, and his diffuseness and lack of method compare unfavourably with Pater's concentrative lucidity. None the less he is often suggestive, and there is admirable matter in his Shakespeare's Predecessors in the English Drama—the criticism of Marlowe being particularly fine—and in his Essays Speculative and Suggestive (1890).

This survey of æsthetic criticism may conclude with the name of OSCAR WILDE (1854-1900).

There is no wittier or more insolent upholder of the "Art for art's sake" theory than Wilde. In Pater there is always the under-note of reserve. Wilde swept morality out of view altogether, and there is no grimmer comment upon his æsthetic creed than is supplied by his own tragic life.

His imitativeness, his wit, have given special prominence to his fantastic novel, The Picture of Dorian Gray (1890), and to his plays. Their cleverness cannot be disputed; but—with the exception of The Importance of Being Earnest—their merits are wholly superficial and derivative.

The structure of Lady Windermere's Fan, A Woman of No Importance, and The Ideal Husband is a skilful melody of Scribe and Sardou. Shorn of the brilliant talk (it is scarcely dialogue, for most of it could be transposed to other characters without causing the least feeling of incongruity), the characters reveal themselves as familiar figures of stageland—the stageland of domestic melodrama, and the comedy and pathos do not blend, but are superimposed the one on the other like the slabs of a Neapolitan ice. Dorian Gray is Balzac and Huysmans, sharpened by Wilde's wit. Of course it is clever, Wilde is always clever, but there is no originality or creative imagination about it.

Similarly, Wilde's verse, graceful, scholarly, melodious, is essentially the work of a sensitive and intensely imitative mind. There is no authentic note—nothing but echoes, echoes of Hood, Tennyson, Arnold, Rossetti, Swinburne.

Yet with all this imitativeness, this witty posing, this barefaced borrowing, the reader cannot help feeling that it is the work of a man of real power and imagination, who does not take the trouble to express himself. He played so long with affection, cultivated so strenuously an insincerity of speech, that he found it easier and more agreeable to treat letters as he was treating life. Yet genius will out, and in one department the greatness of the writer is certainly exhibited—that is, in his criticism. His little volume, Intentions (1891), is a monument of sane and subtle criticism, expressed with admirable ease and pungency.

Wilde might have become a great playwright—certainly a great maker of artificial comedy. The Importance of Being Earnest (produced February 14, 1895) bears witness to that; for there he is himself, his witty paradoxes expressed with a fine sense of dramatic form, and not flung into the play as brilliant irrelevances.

But he certainly is a great critic, whose extravagant sallies conceal a level-headed sagacity. He can be both wise and entertaining—an admirable blend, though we English so often think it seemly to link wisdom with dull sententiousness.

How far Wilde's punishment and sufferings affected his character and conduct we cannot say; but their effect upon his literary work admits of no question. In its sincerity, its simple emotional power, its stern seriousness, The Ballad of Reading Gaol is in startling contrast with Wilde's earlier verse. No posing here, no facile imitativeness, no playing with sensation. Wilde has been brought face to face with the hard, brutal realities of life, and as an artist he is incomparably the better for his awful experience. This is shown not only in the Ballad but in the De Profundis—a personal document, as intimate as De Quincey's Confessions, more sincere, and fully as effective as a piece of fine imaginative prose. Had he been merely the clever charlatan some people imagined him to be, he could never have written these things. That behind the flippancy and cynical exterior there lay a strain of real greatness, is unquestionable. This makes the tragedy of his wasted and broken life the greater.

(b) LETTERS AND LIFE

LEIGH HUNT was in direct lineal descent from the great critics of the Romantic Revival. With less imagination than Coleridge, less intellectual power than Hazlitt, he has the faculty of the great critic, the faculty of fine appreciation. His literary palate is as sure and delicate as that of the best. As a critic of poetry he ranks little below Coleridge, and is more reliable than Hazlitt. What he has to say of Dryden, Milton, Keats, and Coleridge is altogether admirable.

An agreeable and lucid writer, his critical essays are all worth reading, and of greater moment than his original work. A pleasant and graceful poet, a diverting trifler in literary chit-chat, and a fine critic, more especially in the art of just appraisement.

The greatest personality in criticism and the essay during the earlier part of the era was Thomas Carlyle. No one related letters more closely to life than he, and while he is excelled as a literary critic by many inferior to him in genius, there is no greater critic of life and letters, in the broader sense, than he.

THOMAS CARLYLE (1795-1881)

HIS LIFE

In the little village of Ecclefechan in Dumfriesshire, Thomas Carlyle was born on December 4, 1795, and after many years of conflict with poverty, physical pain and mental toil, he found a resting-place in the little churchyard.

His father, a hard-working stone-mason, was one of five brothers described as "a curious sample of folks, pithy, bitter-speaking bodies, an' awfu' fighters." His mother an affectionate, prudent, God-fearing woman, and proud of her son, it was her great ambition to see him a minister. From the village school he passed to Annan Grammar School, at fourteen entering Edinburgh University, and, probably from thriftiness, walked the intervening eighty miles.

Although destined by his parents for the Scottish ministry, mathematics rather than theology seems to have claimed his attention; in 1814 he left the University, without a degree, to become a teacher of mathematics first at Annan, then at Kirkcaldy, but decided "it were better to perish than continue schoolmastering."

In 1818 he returned to Edinburgh to study law, but with no happier result, and, having contributed a number of short biographies to Brewster's Encyclopædia, aspired to literature, began to learn German, became a devoted disciple of Goethe and Fichte, and greatly fascinated by German philosophy that quickly moulded his thought and work. A translation of the Wilhelm Meister appeared in 1824, and a Life of Schiller the following year.

An early love affair with Margaret Gordon had ended in this lady, in a farewell letter, bidding him "cultivate the milder disposition of the heart" and "subdue the more extravagant visions of the brain,"—but soon a fresh interest enters his life. Miss Jane Welsh, a lineal descendant of John Knox, to whom he had been attached for some time, agreed to marry him in 1826; she had inherited a small farm at Craigenputtock, "the dreariest spot in all the British Dominions," says Carlyle. Here, for six years he threw himself heart and soul into literary work, and gave us Sartor Resartus, and some of his best Essays. Himself a dyspeptic suffering from sleeplessness, his wife a clever, intellectual woman unused to domestic affairs, this, coupled with the lack of congenial friends, and the constant grind of poverty, makes it small wonder that in so depressing an environment Carlyle should become the irascible individual presented to us in Froude's Life.

In 1834 he turned his face toward the Mecca of all workers, London, and became a well known figure in Chelsea, his home the resort of every distinguished man and woman worth knowing.

When his famous French Revolution was begun, the manuscript of the first volume was lent to his friend John Stuart Mill, whose servant used all but a few pages to light the fire. Reluctantly he accepted a sum of £100 from Mill, and set to work again, the two first volumes appearing in 1837, with these he won recognition. The following year, at the suggestion of Miss Martineau, he gave the first of several courses of lectures "I hate lecturing," he wrote to Emerson in 1839, "I can only gasp and writho, and stuttor, a spectacle to gods and fashionables—being forced to it by want of money." The following year Mrs. Welsh died, leaving her daughter about £250 a year, and all fear of poverty was now at an end.

An indefatigable worker, it was not in Carlyle's nature to rest: The Letters and Speeches of Oliver Cromwell (1845), Latter-Day Pamphlets (1850), Life of John Sterling (1851), his Lectures revised and published, and his monumental Frederick the Great (1858-65), came in steady succession from his pen. In 1866, just as he had fought his way to the front and was honoured by being made Lord Rector of Edinburgh University, his life became clouded by the death of Mrs. Carlyle. While driving in Hyde Park she left her carriage, to walk with a favourite little dog, but on crossing the road it was nearly run over; Mrs. Carlyle at once returned, and on getting into the carriage told the coachman to drive round the park; receiving no further instruction, he spoke to her and was horrified to find she was dead. Carlyle never recovered from this blow: "All of sunshine that remained in my life went out in that moment; all of strength too, seems to have gone." For fifteen years he lived on, the lonely, furrow-lined figure haunting Chelsea Embankment and Battersea Park, and writing the Reminiscences so blunderingly edited by Froude. In 1874 Disraeli offered him a baronetcy and the Grand Cross of the Bath, both of which he refused, and on 5th February 1881 he died; Westminster Abbey wished to honour him by burial within its walls, but by his own desire he was taken to Ecclefechan.

HIS WORK

Although Carlyle lived to feel the influence of the Scientific Movement of the mid-century, he remained in spirit and attitude a Revolutionary of the elder period. Not an abstract Revolutionary like Shelley, not a mere literary radical like Lamb, but one thoroughly imbued with the revolutionary spirit, dissatisfied with modern commercialism, a champion of the simplicities of life, with keen admiration for the qualities of courage and endurance, a fighter rather than a critic, while in spirit he was far more attuned to the transcendentalism of Wordsworth than to the utilitarianism of Mill. Yet, like his friend Ruskin, he was a man of moods and of wild inconsistencies. Consequently he has been claimed as the friend of widely divergent schools of thought, and abused by all the political parties in turn.

The Liberals of the day were offended by his sarcastic gibes on Liberty, his contempt for the notion of Equality, and his contemptuous attitude towards the extension of the Franchise.

On the other hand, the Tories loved him no better. He was too furiously in earnest for them, too keenly sensitive to the social misery of the day.

A champion of the poor and an upholder of slavery, a despiser of the Franchise and a keen advocate of the organisation of Labour, a scoffer of Poetry and an admirer of Burns, a theological sceptic whose writings are none the less imbued with a fervent religious spirit; a distaste for literature as literature, and an admirer of Goethe. These and other paradoxes one might mention, till one might question, as indeed some have, whether there is any clear, intelligible outlook at the bottom of his strictures and criticisms. Yet the confusion, though real, is far less fundamental than one would imagine at a first survey. And there is a very real unity of purpose and of view underneath Carlyle's writings, when allowance has been made for the irascible temperament of the man, and his tendency to dot his i's and cross his t's.

Looking at his work as a whole, we are struck by the burning ethical enthusiasm that lights up every utterance. Literature is to him as chaff unless it be the medium of conveying some direct moral truth. History has no meaning save as the life experience of great personalities, and as a serial illustration of the prevalence of Might.

Whatever the subject, he always interpolated a few of his favourite precepts, and here we can get some definite outline of his teaching. Don't cant—Don't whine—Don't gush! On these he is always ringing the changes. Like many preachers, he was doubtful at times what we ought to do, but never doubtful about what we ought not to do.

Carlyle did not mince his words, and he gave his advice at the top of his voice. This has offended sensitive ears. But the shouting prophet has his advantages. A suggestion, a whisper, sufficient for some people; but for the majority, exaggeration is helpful.

Indeed, as a writer he is not merely great, but very great; less imposing than Ruskin, less perspicuous, but with an incisive force, an illuminating brilliance of phrase, that Meredith himself might have envied. The difference indeed between Carlyle and (the earlier) Ruskin as stylists is as considerable as that between Whistler and Burne-Jones. Ruskin's later style is less stately, less rhetorical, more flexible and idiosyncratic, and to that extent he approximates to the intensely idiosyncratic style of his friend and, in certain respects, mentor, Carlyle. But even then they are sufficiently distinctive and original to make an agreeable and lively contrast; Ruskin excelling in swift satire, Carlyle in elaborate irony.

THE DEVELOPMENT OF CARLYLE'S GENUIS

When Carlyle came up to London with Sartor Resartus in his pocket and the determination to harass the "terrified owls" of publishers, Coleridge was the dominant spiritual force among those of the younger generation, and although Carlyle seized, with his customary satiric humour, on the weakness in Coleridge's transcendental philosophy, his own spiritual standpoint was much the same. Both he and Coleridge were impatient with the "cause and effect" philosophy of the eighteenth century, and both of them valued German idealists as providing the basis of a vital and practical religion. But whereas Coleridge sought to re-vitalise with his metaphysics the old forms of faith, Carlyle took away from them, seeking to construct a fresh ethic rather than to galvanise an old metaphysics.

"It is a chronic malady," he exclaimed, "that of metaphysics . . . in action alone we have certainty. Nay properly Doubt is the indispensable, indispensable material wherein action works, which action has to fashion into certainty, and Reality; only on a canvas of Darkness, such as Man's way of being, could the many-coloured picture of our life paint itself and shine."

In his German studies, therefore, he fixes upon Goethe as his hero. At first sight the choice is surprising and unaccountable, for Goethe was essentially an artist, and Carlyle's contempt for art was deeply ingrained.

But it was Goethe as philosopher that attracted Carlyle—Goethe's natural mysticism, his untheological transcendentalism, if I may use such a contradictory term, that appealed especially to one who was always a Calvinist without dogma. And Sartor Resartus is Carlyle's first and most elaborate attempt to state this position.

Carlyle's spiritual standpoint and his psychological standpoint were both formulated and emphasized in this first book of his, and it is scarcely any exaggeration to say that it supplies the text for all his future writings. His gospel of work, of action, is here—here also is his belief in personality, which he elucidates in more concrete form in his Hero Worship and later writings. "Great men," he wrote in Sartor, "are the inspired (speaking and acting) Texts of the Divine Book of Revelation whereof a chapter is compiled from epoch to epoch and by some named History." What are the French Revolution, Cromwell, Frederick, but elaborate studies of the dynamic influence of men like Robespierre, Mirabeau, Carlyle, and Frederick? What are his Critical Essays but attempts to get at the Man beneath his literary trappings, whether it be Richter or Burns, or Scott or Johnson? Why did he extol the Middle Ages at the expense of his own age as he does in Past and Present?—because in the Middle Ages, in his opinion, a finer and more forceful expression of the personal equation was possible. Why does he laud the strong man?—because of his belief in his personality. And if we ask why this insistence on the dynamic, we come back to his religion, his belief that in genuine men the Divine Idea is expressed; or, in theological terminology, that in Man, God (the spirit of the universe) is made flesh.

Sartor Resartus, with its explosive transcendentalism, met with no friendly reception save by a few like Emerson, who welcomed its anti-materialistic standpoint. Very different was the reception of the French Revolution, where he gives a concrete illustration of the thesis in Sartor. The French Revolution is not a history, indeed Carlyle had not the makings of an historian, for his vision is not panoramic, he never seeks to re-tell the story of the past, but to explain the significance of the past, and this he does in a series of pictures, externalized spiritual forces, rather than physical appearances.

But if he does this it is due to no intellectual indifference on his side to the historical detail—for even to-day, when so much has been discovered about that time that was hidden from Carlyle, the essential truth of his picture is untouched. It is due rather to that, that he gives us the Revolution in terms of poetry and not of prose. And a wonderful prose-poem the book remains—a dramatic poem that no student of history can afford to pass by. He will not learn the story of the Revolution from this book, but, having mastered the story, and the great sequence of events in any reliable text-book, he will understand the Revolution the better for reading Carlyle's poem.

The French Revolution appeared in 1837, then came his little book on Chartism, and Heroes and Hero Worship (1841). Of the latter book we have already spoken; Carlyle's historical standpoint is here illustrated in brief samples, in a pointed, lucid, and attractive manner. Chartism is best considered along with Past and Present and Latter-Day Pamphlets, for in these three volumes his social creed is fully expressed in its curious yet characteristic blend of radicalism and conservatism; its idealism of the past; its poen on the strong man whom the people should obey its contempt for legislative forms; its denunciation of laissez faire. Amidst much extravagance, as, for instance, in the unrestrained denunciation of Political Machinery; amidst much wilful wrong-headedness, as, for instance, his defence of Slavery, there are many luminous suggestions on social politics that subsequent reformers have seized upon.

His condemnation of the drones of modern life; his insistence on the necessity for the "organisation of labour"; his clear perception that the privilege to vote is an empty enough one unless the Demos be educated to use this privilege wisely, his diatribes on the Cash-nexus that binds men together under modern capitalist conditions, in all such matters Carlyle spoke like a seer to his generation. Many of his phrases have become watchwords to-day for the worker—phrases such as "Justice before Charity"—"Permanence of Employment"—"A fair day's wage for a fair day's work."

Meanwhile, in 1845, came the big book on Cromwell and the re-discovery of the greatness of Puritanism, for that it was great is practically assented to. In its way the book is fully as fine from the intellectual point of view as the French Revolution; and when we consider the drabber nature of the material, the absence of those picturesque dramatic episodes that help any man who writes of the age of Robespierre, it is then that we appreciate the patient industry, the artistic skill, the imaginative homogeneity of the performance.

The Life of Sterling (1851) that followed Cromwell and the Social Essays, has a distinctive place among Carlyle's writings, there is no thunder here, nothing of the fierce worship and hot intensity that inform most of Carlyle's works. There is an atmosphere of spiritual calm curiously unlike the prevalent mood of the writer, while those who find Carlyle's usual style an irritant rather than a stimulant may find here a clear, tranquil, and subdued prose that cannot upset their susceptibilities.

This tribute from a friend, charitable yet just, ranks among the best pieces of biographical writing in our language.

Then came a longish interval during which Carlyle was passing through, as his wife humorously called it, "the Valley of the Shadow of Frederick." Less attractive than the French Revolution, less direct in its appeal to most English readers than the Cromwell, Frederick the Great is the greatest intellectual feat performed by Carlyle. Indeed in its treatment of Frederick's military carplings, it is regarded as a classic in Germany, and his industry, dexterity, and power of characterisation have never been shown to better advantage; none-the-less, Carlyle's admiration for his hero cannot command the same assent as other studies in hero worship have done, and special pleading in this class of work is often unconvincing. The book severely taxed Carlyle's powers, as we may believe when we consider its scope and content, and it is one of the hardest to construe of the author's writings, largely because Carlyle's mannerisms of style are nowhere more abundant.

There are two ways of regarding Carlyle's significance. We may regard him merely as a force in letters, or we may look at him as a prophet to his age. In both capacities he deserves the attention of the literary student.

Let us consider these two aspects more fully than we have hitherto done. And first of all take Carlyle as a literary artist.

Even those who condemn his thought as confused, and esteem his ethical influence as over-rated, concede him greatness as an artist. His books abound in brilliantly vivid pictures. Whatever he touches, whether a bit of landscape, an historical character, a biographical detail, even a date, is made alive and significant. His style has serious defects, but actuality and intensity are not among them. With a few strokes of the pen he can vitalise the landscape.

"Waving, blooming country of the brightest green; dotted all over with handsome villas, handsome groves: crossed by roads and human traffic, here inaudible or heard only as a musical hum; and behind all a swarm, under olive-tinted haze, the illimitable, luminary ocean of London."

Equally well can he paint the human element, as in this sketch of Coleridge's interminable monologues:

"He began anywhere—you put some question to him, made some suggestive observation; instead of answering this, or decidedly setting out towards an answer of it, he would accumulate formidable apparatus, logical swim-bladders, transcendental life-preservers, and other precautionary and voluculatory gear for sitting out; perhaps did at last get under way—but was swiftly solenized, turned aside by the flame of some radiant new game on this hand or on that into new courses, and ever into new, and before long into all the universe, where it was uncertain what game you would catch, or whether any."

In the case of Coleridge the blame exceeds the praise; if we turn to his picture of Cromwell, where his moral sympathies were more actually engaged, we may see how well he can penetrate the peculiarities of the man and get at the core of his greatness.

"And withal this hypochondria, what was it but the very greatness of the man, the depth and tenderness of his ideal affections, the quantity of sympathy he had with things? The quantity of insight he could get over things—this was his hypochondria. The man's misery, as men's misery always does, came of his greatness. Samuel Johnson is that kind of man. Sorrow-stricken, half-distracted, the wide element of mournful black enveloping him—wide as the world. It is the character of a prophetic man; a man with his whole soul seeing and struggling to see."

Carlyle's imagination is, as Emerson truly observed, of the stereoscopic order. He can give substance and perspective to his pictures. His figures are not embroidered decorations on flat surfaces. No writer of our time can more happily sum up the character of a man in a phrase. Take, for instance, the following felicities. "Bacon sees—Shakespeare sees through," Swift carried "sarcasm to an epic pitch"—Mazzini, "merciful and fierce, true as steel, the word and thought of him limpid as water; by nature a little lyrical poet." With what humorous insight he has referred to Dean Stanley as "knocking holes in the Church of England"; satirised the arguments of the imitative

Tractarians as "spectral Puseyisms," and Coleridge's failure of will power as "a steam engine of a hundred horse-power with the boiler burst."

Small wonder that Emerson said of him, "Nothing seems hid from those wonderful eyes of yours; those devouring, those thirsty eyes; those portrait-eating, portrait painting eyes of thine."

No two writers of divergent temperament better appreciated each other's greatness than Carlyle and Emerson. The opposite of Emerson in temperament and in method, no one has better appraised his style than Carlyle, in the following sentence:

"Brevity, simplicity, softness, homely grace, with such a penetrating meaning, soft enough, but irresistible, going down to the depths and up to the heights as silent electricity goes."

This brilliant intensity of style is occasionally blinding and leads the writer into violent contrasts that lack proportion; but this is only the defect of his virtue as a writer. For the writing is always individual and forceful, never dull, insincere, nor trivial.

Passing from the manner to the matter of his criticism, it may be noted how that he reduces every subject to a common moral denomination. His best criticisms are something much more than literary estimates, they are spiritual appreciations. Take, for instance, his admirable essay on Burns. Here he goes to the root of the matter at once:

"The excellence of Burns is, indeed, among the rarest, whether in poetry or prose; but, at the same time, it is plain and easily recognised; his directness, his indisputable run of Truth. Here are no fabulous woes or joys; no hollow fantastic sentimentalities; no wire-drawn refinings, either in thought or feeling: the passion that is traced before us has glowed in a living heart; the opinion he utters has risen in his own understanding, and been a light to his own steps. He does not write from hearsay, but from sight and experience; it is the scenes that he has lived and laboured amidst, that he describes; those scenes, rude and humble as they are, have kindled beautiful emotions in his soul, noble thoughts, and definite resolves; and he speaks forth what is in him, not from any outward call of vanity or interest, but because his heart is too full to be silent. He speaks it with such melody and modulation as he can 'in homely rustic jingle'; but it is his own, and genuine. This is the grand secret for finding readers and retaining them: let him who would move and convince others be first moved and convinced himself."

The same applies to his finely suggestive essays on German literature. He had little of Coleridge's subtle metaphysical power, but had a ready instinct for expressing German thought in terms of human worth.

As a literary critic Carlyle has none of the lighter graces, for he is too stern a wayfarer to care to saunter along the highways of literature, his imagination, intense and concrete, finds no sustenance in the exquisite abstractions of a Shelley on the one hand, or the clear, logical presentment of a John Stuart Mill on the other. There must be passion, or pronounced ethical bias in a writer for Carlyle to value him. He valued the teacher in Goethe rather than the artist; the genial man in Scott rather than the story-teller, and where he could detect no distinct moral purpose, nor gripping emotional power, he was frankly uninterested and did less than justice.

to his subject. Personality is everything to him. This supplies him with his motive as an historian. History to him is "the essence of innumerable biographies"—so he makes it his purpose to find out what the distinctive qualities are of the great man. With the anatomy of history he is not concerned, and if he is unduly contemptuous of the externals, at any rate few men have striven more earnestly to probe its soul. If blind to the fascination of its pageantry, he is fully alive to its drama.

History for him, therefore, is one long battle between the forces within and the forces without, and he is at his best in dealing with the fierce dramatic crises of history, such as the French Revolution or the Puritan revolt. He can forgive brutality; he will never condone weakness. The great man for him is the strong man: "It is the property of the hero that in every time in every place he comes back to reality."

Carlyle is at his happiest when the historical drama he is painting centres round a moral ideal—as in the case of Cromwell. There is much of Cromwell in Carlyle—and he brought the present generation face to face with the great Puritan, we have his words, we can hear the tone of his voice, we see him in his tent, in council; every detail, the most minute, is here.

He has done much to rescue the Puritans from obliquity; popular modern sentiment had decided they were half hypocrites, half fanatics. The hypocritical idea he quite exploded, and if he did not attempt to explain away the fanaticism he made of it a much more glorious thing than we had accounted it. Cromwell's fine conception of Justice, his noble ideal of Duty, his splendid Honesty; the grit, the patience, the compelling personality of the man are made manifest.

In reproaching England for her sloth, her Godlessness, and in sighing for the return of the Puritan ideals, one feels that Carlyle, just as he constitutionally exaggerated the evils of the day, exaggerates the value of his remedy. Extremes produce extremes. The Puritan despotism, excellent in many ways, produced the Restoration. The Middle Ages he so idealised in Past and Present had evils of their own quite as oppressive as those we have to-day, and the return of mediævalism sighed for by Carlyle can scarcely be considered seriously. He seized on certain features which he admired, the defects he never noticed.

The word Liberty had for him none of the glamour, the inspiration which it signified to the poet Shelley, nor even the more qualified political value which Mill attached to it. Revolutionary though he was in his preaching, he had not escaped the strong wave of reaction against the Revolution which swept over England after the Napoleonic war. That great banner of the Revolution, Liberty, was too blood stained; he recoiled from it.

"In freedom for itself," he says, "there is nothing to raise a man above the fly: the first duty of a people is to find their chief, the second and last to obey him: we see to what men have been brought by liberty, equality and fraternity."

I think in his heart that Carlyle realised that the strong man is the wise man; the man who sees that the collective usefulness of a community lies in every part yielding up its quota. Force will not effect this. Persuasion and Sympathy may. But he was carried away by his love of Strength, and did not see that for a few to whom Might was the symbol of Right, there were many for whom no moral claim could be preferred.

Give them centuries to try it, he says, and Might and Right will be found to be identical. The strong thing will prove itself the just thing. But this is begging the question. A Might that dominates for centuries and then is "found out" does not cease to be Might: else we must approve the Spanish Inquisition. Mazzini failed at first, who would decry him as unjust? Carlyle sneered at him, but was obliged ultimately to admit his greatness.

No: Carlyle's doctrine carried out logically leads to an oligarchy subversive of mental and moral growth. It is useful in certain stages of a nation's history, but it is not for grown-up men and women.

Carlyle safeguards his claim for obedience by maintaining that we hold no obedience to tyranny but obedience to enlightened despotism.

"Of all 'rights of men' this right of the ignorant to be guided by the wiser, gently or forcibly, is the indisputablest. . . . Cannot one discern, across all democratic turbulence, clattering of ballot-boxes, and infinite sorrowful jangle, that this is at bottom the wish and prayer of all human hearts everywhere, 'Give us a leader'?"

"A leader" certainly, but may not the leader come from the very democracy of which Carlyle is so scornful?

Certainly, some of the strong men Carlyle admired were not just men, for he approved the Czar, unduly glorified Frederick, grievously idealised Governor Eyre.

Now it is not hard to see what is in Carlyle's mind when he applauds Force, especially the force of some potent personality, for strength, even when tyrannous, is better than weakness. It is better to do ill than to do nothing. Weakness, vacillation, indifference, timidity, these things make for anarchy and stagnation. In times of confusion the strong man is wanted. England needs a Tudor despot—and thrives. France requires a Napoleon—and order is restored. But what then?

The Stuarts failed—since England had ceased to need a despot. Despotism at best is a negative mood. It has no constructive power. It does not make the best of a race, it keeps them under. Napoleon accomplished a needful work—but in attempting to perpetuate force as a rule of statecraft, failed.

Carlyle's famous remark that the people of England consisted of thirty millions, mostly fools, certainly harmonises—whatever allowance be made for humorous exaggeration—with his distaste for "the divine right of democracy"; yet we must not overlook the fact that no one more warmly espoused the cause of the poor or more bitterly denounced the wealthy drones that abound in society.

"Oh, if you could dethrone that brute, god Mammon, and put a spirit God in his place!" he cries "One way or other he must and will have to be dethroned. Supply and demand is not the one law of nature. Deep, far deeper, are law's obligations, sacred as man's life itself . . . To make some human hearts a little wiser, manfully happier, more blessed, less accused, it is work for a God."

He preached the doctrine of a moral change in society. He looks to the ruling classes for the initiative, and fails to understand the real significance of the democratic appeal. Far clearer in insight on this point was his contemporary, John Stuart Mill.

"The idea of rational democracy," said Mill, "is not that people themselves govern, but that they have security for good government. This security they can have only by retaining in their own hands the ultimate control. The people ought to be masters employing servants more skilful than themselves."

That surely is a sounder political ideal than Carlyle's onlightened despotism.

Obedience is good: so also is loyalty and hero-worship. But the sense of individual responsibility is, after all, the most important; as Emerson said, "It is a low benefit to give something; it is a high benefit to enable me to do somewhat of myself." George Eliot expressed it even more pitifully when she said, "Those who trust us, educate us."

Carlyle's social philosophy is vitiated therefore by its extravagant dependence on authority. Apart from this, there are many admirable points in his dicta on political and social subjects.

Yet it is as an ethical force that Carlyle will be best remembered. Here scarcely ever is he at fault. Sincere and honourable in all his dealings, he preached a practical workaday creed that is as much a living force to-day as in the time when it was first delivered. If his hatred of compromise led him at times into intemperance of speech, the feeling at the bottom was uncontrollable enough. By a little trimming, and toning down, he might at more than one juncture in his career have secured a material position that would have saved him many a year of hard struggle. But he never compromised, never abated a jot of what he held to be right. And if he proved impervious to the blandishments of money, he was equally impervious to the seduction of praise. Success spoiled many a good man: it never affected Carlyle.

I believe that the glowing sincerity of his Sartor Resartus, the moral suggestiveness of his Hero Worship and his Cromwell, and the large poetic imagination of certain of his Essays will exercise a more commanding and permanent influence than even the brilliancy of the French Revolution and Frederick, and that because, as Leigh Hunt said of him

"What Mr. Carlyle loves better than his fault-finding, with all its eloquence, is the face of any human creature that looks suffering, and loving, and sincere."

In concluding this rough survey of his work, something may be said of Carlyle-ese that has troubled and will continue to trouble many readers.

Carlyle's style is, save with a few exceptions, notably in the Life of Sterling, a disturbing, bewildering, and often exasperating style. It is at the same time a perfectly sincere and natural expression of the writer's temper of mind. The style is the man. Its defects are bound up with its virtues (for Sterling only exhibits one side of Carlyle's nature), and though we may regret its extravagances and contortions, they are part of the price we pay for his peculiar humour, satire, and tempestuous eloquence. The style, just as in Meredith's case, will necessarily limit his appeal, and in an age like ours of hurry and bustle, the writers who express themselves clearly and simply will have, undoubtedly, the wider influence. As a figure in our social literary history Carlyle will always loom a large and important figure, but as a maker of letters he will probably survive to the reading world at large rather in suggestive fragments.

GEORGE FOX

Perhaps the most remarkable incident in Modern History, says Tolstoy, is not the Diet of Worms, still less the Battle of Austerlitz, Waterloo, Peterloo, or any other battle, but an incident passed carelessly over by most historians, and treated with some degree of ridicule by others, namely, George Fox's making to himself a suit of leather. This man, the first of the Quakers, and by trade a shoemaker, was one of those to whom, under ruder or purer form, the Divine Idea of the Universe is pleased to manifest itself, and, across all the hulls of Ignorance and earthly Degradation, shine through, in unspeakable Awfulness, unspeakable Beauty, on their souls who therefore are rightly accounted Prophets, God-possessed, or even Gods, as in some periods it has appeared. Sitting in his stall; working on tanned hides, amid piners, paste horns, resin, swine-bristles, and a nameless flood of rubbish, this youth had, nevertheless, a Living Spirit belonging to him, also an antique Inspired Volume through which as through a window, it could look upwards, and discern its colossal Home. The task of a daily pan of shoes, coupled even with some prospect of virtuous, and an honourable Mastership in Cordwainery, and perhaps the post of Thirdborough in his hundred, as the crown of long faithful sewing, was no more satisfaction enough to such a mind. But even amid the boring and hammering came tones from that far country, came Splendours and Terrors, for this poor Cordwainer, as we said, was a Man; and the Temple of Immanency, wherein as Man he had been sent to minister, was full of holy mystery to him.

The Clergy of the neighbourhood, the ordained Watchers and Interpreters of that same holy mystery, listened with unaffected tedium to his consultations and advised him, as the solution of such doubts "to drink beer and dance with the girls." Blind leaders of the blind! For what end were their titles levied and eaten, for what were their shovel-hats scooped out and their surplices and cassock aprons girt on, and such a church-repairing, and chaffering, and organing, and other racketing, held over that spot of God's earth—if man were but a Patent Digester, and the belly with its adjuncts the grand Reality? Fox turned from them, with tears and sacred scorn, back to his Leather-pinnings and his Bible. Mountains of encumbrance, higher than Ætna, had been heaped over that Spirit: but it was a Spirit and would not be buried there. Through long days and nights of silent agony, it struggled and wrestled with a man's force, to be free, how its prison mountains heaved and swayed tumultuously, as the giant spirit shook them to this hand and that, and emerged into the light of Heaven! That Leicester shoe-shop had none known it, was a holier place than any Vatican or Loretto-Shrine. "So bandaged, and hampered, and hemmed in," groaned he, "with thousand requisitions, obligations, straps, tatters, and tagrags, I can neither see nor move: not my own am I, but the World's; and time flies fast, and Heaven is high, and Hell is deep: Man! belink thee, if thou hast power of Thought! Why not; what binds me here? Want, want!—Ha, of what? Will all the shoe-wages under the moon ferry me across into that far Land of Light? Only Meditation can, and devout prayer to God. I will to the woods: the hollow of a tree will lodge me, wild-berries feed me; and for clothes, cannot I stitch myself one perennual suit of Leather!"

Historical oil-painting, continues Teufelsdröckh, is one of the Arts I never practised; therefore shall I not decide whether this subject were easy of execution on the canvas. Yet often as it seemed to me as if such first outflashing of man's Freewill, to lighten, more and more into Day, the Chaotic Night that threatened to engulf him in its lundrances and its horrors were properly the only grandeur there is in History. Let some living Angelo or Rosa, with seeing eye and understanding heart, picture George Fox on that morning, when he spread out his cutting-board for the last time, and cuts cowhides by unwonted patterns, and stitches them together into one continuous all-including Case, the farewell service of his awl! Stitch away, thou noble Fox: every prick of that little instrument is pricking into the heart of Slavery, and world-worship and the Mammon-god. Thy elbows jerk as in strong swimmer-strokes, and every stroke is bearing thee across the Prison-ditch within which Vanity holds her Workhouse and Ragfair into lands of true Liberty; were the work done, there is in broad Europe one Free Man, and thou art he!

Thus from the lowest depth there is a path to the loftest height: and for the Poor also a Gospel has been published. Surely if, as D'Alembert asserts, my illustrious namesake, Diogenes, was the greatest man of Antiquity, only that he wanted Decease, then by stronger reason is George Fox the greatest of the Moderns, and greater than Diogenes himself for he too stands on the adamantine basis of his Manhood, casting aside all props and shores; yet not, in half-savage Pride, under-valuing the Earth; valuing it rather, as a place to yield him warmth and food, he looks Heavenward from his Earth, and dwells in an element of Merry and Worship, with a still Strength, such as the Cynic's tub did nowise witness. Great, truly, was the Tub, a temple from which man's dignity and divinity was scornfully preached abroad: but greater is the Leather Hull, for the same sermon was preached there, and not in Scorn but in Love.¹

One has only to glance at any Victorian library to see what a popular figure the didactic essayist used to be, and yet how uninspiring and commonplace many of these writers turn out to be if we look at their pages to-day. Among the more notable of the crowd are the two HARES (Julius, 1795–1855, Augustus, 1792–1834), whose aphoristic Gucases at Truth was once so eagerly read. Neither they nor Sir ARTHUR HELPS (1813–1876), author of Friends in Council (1847–1859) and Companions of my Solitude (1851), show any depth or originality; and their popularity was due probably to the fact that they expressed sensibly, and with mild literary ability, sentiments held to be improving.

WILLIAM RATHBONE GREG (1809–1881) is a decidedly more interesting figure. He was a clear, vigorous writer on social and religious problems from a Radical standpoint. His Creed of Christendom is practically a Unitarian manifesto, and its chief merit lies in the forcible lucidity with which he states his case. Of greater interest to day is the volume Enigmas of Life, which is more varied in its scope, and gives a good picture of the various social and ethical problems troubling his generation.

More interesting still, from the literary point of view, is WILLIAM BRIGHTY RANDS (1823–1882), of whom Professor Walker has justly said he was "as much under-rated as Helps has been over-rated." His delightful verso is treated elsewhere. Of his prose, the two volumes, Henry Holbeach. Student in Life and Philosophy (1865) and Views and Opinions (1866), give us of his best in wise, witty, and trenchant sayings on the life of his day.

But he was not merely a maker of aphoristic apothegms, he had the power of visualising certain types of character with a dry humour that reminds the reader of Oliver Wendell Holmes.

More concerned with letters, less with contemporary life, are Sir JOHN SKELTON (1831–1897), with his agreeable and sprightly Nugæ Criticæ (1882) and Table-Talk (1894), and A. K. H. BOYD (1825–1899), whose Recreations of a Country Parson (1859–1861), and other volumes of miscellaneous essay work, contain a good deal of pleasant chatter.

The next critic of importance is MATTHEW ARNOLD; he has greater versatility and more body than Hunt, and although he is far less sympathetic and discerning in his appreciation of romantic poetry, his more considerable scholarship and accomplishment make him a figure of the first importance.

At first sight, Arnold's critical essays may disappoint the student. He has no aptitude for logical arrangement, cares little about presenting a live and definite portrait of the subject of the criticism, and makes no attempt to look round his subject, indeed, when his sympathies are "imperfect" (to use Eliot's phrase), he does not try even to present the writer's own point of view. He doesn't like him, that is sufficient. He dismisses Shelley just as in another direction he dismisses miracles, with a shrug of the shoulders.

These are drawbacks which cannot be lightly passed over. None the less they are outweighed by the positive merits of Arnold's critical accomplishment.

To begin with, no one, with the exception of Mr Watts-Dunton, proved so happy as he in the art of comparative criticism. His wide scholarship, reinforced by a delicate literary palate, make his remarks on foreign literature and his comparison of English and continental literature especially valuable. If he failed to do justice to some great romantic writers, he at any rate did much to restore a proper appreciation of classicism that the great outburst of romantic literature had tended to obscure and belittle. Then even his most fragmentary and disconnected critical work abounds in luminous flashes of insight. His work is never negligible, and what is almost as important, it is never dull.

To consider his critical work in greater detail. Arnold's plea for classicism as opposed to romanticism may first be considered. Although he ignored or belittled much that was valuable in romanticism, he has pointed out very clearly its defects and weaknesses as a movement. He exposed the exaggerated importance attached to the Middle Ages, and the "grotesqueness" and "irrationality" of much literary mediævalism. He saw just as clearly, yet with more sympathy, the tendency toward eccentricity, formlessness, and lack of balance encouraged by romanticism, and held that, in the case of the English people, the excessive devotion to romanticism was especially harmful, since England was "the native home of intellectual eccentricity of all kinds." The defect of the Pre-Raphaelite movement, he held, was to imagine "that the peculiar effect of nature resides in the whole and not in the parts." What is the cure for this? Arnold gives it not only once (it first appears in the Preface to the Poems of 1853), but again and again in his writings. A return to the classical spirit is "calm cheerfulness, disinterested objectivity." If we wished to regain this, we must not only study the classics themselves, but pay less attention to German and more attention to French literature. Why? In his Literary Influence of Academies he gives the reason: "Openness of mind and flexibility of intelligence were very signal characteristics of the Athenian people in ancient times; everybody will feel that openness of mind and flexibility of intelligence are remarkable characteristics of the French people in modern times." Not that French literature is essentially greater than German or English literature. France for him was "famed in all great arts, in none supreme"; there is greater genius to be found in the land that produced Shakespeare and Milton, greater genius in the country that gave us Goethe. But we have so much natural affinity with the Teutonic peoples, we need a corrective. We don't need more ideas, more provocative thought, we need greater lucidity, harmony of presentment, these we shall find in French literature. Homer's greatness lay in the fact that he applied French methods to Teutonic thought.

One of the most important legacies of this classical spirit for the critic was the spirit of disinterestedness, of self-detachment. This is the spirit indeed that animates all Arnold's work, whether critical or creative. Suavity, as we saw, was a dominant note of his verse, the absence of violence—whether in laudation or disapprobation. Arnold is always in kid gloves, and if kid gloves are not exciting adornment for a poet, there is much to be said for the kid glove in criticism. You can be quite as deadly with the kid glove as with the naked fist if you know how to hit. Arnold certainly knew how to hit, and whether in prose letters or in social satire he proved a controversialist of remarkable power. In his Essays in Criticism, his Culture and Anarchy, his Friendship's Garland, his breeding is perfect, his voice is never raised; but the light banter, the courteous irony, the searching analysis, are of the highest quality.

There is a consistent point of view underlying all Arnold's writings. It may be seen in his well-known dictum on Culture:

"Culture seeks to do away with classes and sects to make the best that has been thought and known in the world current everywhere; to make all men live in an atmosphere of sweetness and light, where they may use ideas as it uses them itself, freely, unmasked, and not bound by them. This is the social idea, and the men of culture are the true apostles of equality."

Again

"The grand power of poetry is its interpretative power, by which I mean, not a power of drawing out in black and white an explanation of the mystery of the universe, but the power of so dealing with things as to awaken in us a wonderfully full, new, and intimate sense of them, and of our relations with them. When this sense is awakened in us, as to objects without us, we feel ourselves to be in contact with the essential nature of those objects, to be no longer bewildered and oppressed by them, but to have their secret, and to be in harmony with them, and this feeling calms and satisfies us as no other can."

Hence the famous remark that "poetry is a criticism of life" is an epigrammatic summing up of all that he contends for as a writer both of life and letters. It means that poetry is more than a matter of externals; more than the utterances of certain moods, it is an expression of the moral and intellectual attitude of the literary artist. Arnold's opinion of the high function of culture and anarchy, as supplied by poetry, is even more clearly seen if we turn to Culture and Anarchy, where he condemns the narrow restriction of culture to a smattering of the classics, and says he wishes to show what culture really is, what good it can do, and what is our especial need of it.

In the opening chapter he premises that culture, in part, is "A desire after the things of the mind for their own sakes and for the pleasure of seeing them as they are," but "there is another view," he says, "in which the love of our neighbours, the impulses towards action help, and beneficence, the desire for removing human error, clearing human confusion, and diminishing human misery, the noble aspiration to leave the world better and happier than we found it—motives eminently such as are called social—come in as parts of the ground of culture, and the main and pre-eminent part."

Culture, therefore, is nothing more nor less than the study of perfection. It moves by the force not only of pure knowledge, but of the moral and social passion for doing good.

In a later chapter he points out how that

"To walk staunchly by the best light one has, to be strict and sincere with oneself—not to be of the number of those who say and do not, to be in earnest—this is the discipline by which alone man can be enabled to rescue his life, to make it eternal. The intense and convinced energy with which the Hebrew threw himself upon his ideal of righteousness, and which inspired the incomparable definition of the great Christian virtue Faith—the substance of things hoped for, the evidence of things not seen—this energy of devotion to its ideal has belonged to Hebraism alone."

Hellenism he defines as "the intelligence driving out those ideas which are, after all, the basis of right practices, the indomitable impulse to know and adjust them perfectly." Hellenism aims at right seeing, Hebraism at right doing. Our aim should be to combine these, and not, as pantheism has done, emphasize conduct only.

Elsewhere Arnold applies this line of criticism to the various divisions of English society. He condemns the "aristocratic" classes for their indifference to ideas, the middle classes for their preoccupation with money-making.

"Your middle-class men," he says with cutting scorn, "think it the highest pitch of development and civilisation, when their letters are carried twelve times a day from Islington to Camberwell, and from Camberwell to Islington, and if railway trains run to and fro between them every quarter of an hour."

Yet while condemning the attention of the average man to what he calls "practical considerations," Arnold is, in the higher sense of the term, a lover of practicality. Whether he is just to the "mystic" is a debatable point that need not be discussed here. But his dislike of any spiritual attitude that could not be expressed in definite, concrete usefulness is certainly to the point. No one has more admirably disengaged from its pantheistic setting the shrewd practicality of Emerson than he, or appraised more clearly the peculiar genius of Keats, or the healing power of Wordsworth. The great idealist in his view was always practical. His dream-castles have solid foundations, though their towers may be in the clouds.

One of the best proofs of Arnold's practicality lies in the sagacity of his educational proposals. He was broad-minded, without being in the least cranky in his views as to elementary education. He would have the elements of French as well as of Latin taught in the schools, and also the beginning of natural sciences.

"We are all coming to be agreed," he wrote, "that an entire ignorance of the system of nature is as grave a defect in our children's education as not to know there was ever such a person as Charles the First."

He pointed out how that no one in England was taught to teach, while in France the State took over with greater thoroughness every kind of education, and exacted a higher standard of efficiency from their teachers. He particularised L'École Normale training college for teachers' methods, for its excellence. At the same time, though he compared gently to its disadvantage the methodical and desultory character of English University teaching with the ordinary methods of the French University, he was not blind to the defects in some of the French schools.

Most of us have come to believe now in the necessity of systematic State education, and Arnold did much to convert us by his writings. He admired especially the methods of German education. The French Universities he considered needed liberty, the English needed sciences, German Universities had both. The University Extension Movement owed its primary inspiration to Arnold, and while many of the reforms he advocated still remain to be carried out, much has now been accomplished for which he contended. There were no more liberal-minded, clear-sighted educational reformers in the Victorian era than he and Thomas Henry Huxley.

In conclusion, something may be said of Arnold's philosophical position.

His most important point in theological controversy was the emphasis he laid upon a literary interpretation of the Bible, as opposed to a scientific interpretation. He has been criticised for encroaching as a layman upon the domain of the professional philosopher, but if lack of specialised scholarship rendered of doubtful value some of his conclusions, he was sufficiently equipped in the main for the end he had in view—that of disengaging ethics from religion, and from freeing current religion from its narrow dogmatic basis, its gloom, and its vulgarity. Arnold's treatment of controversial subjects is not free from flippancy, or from a certain cock-sureness. But in his final conclusions, which are best described as pantheistic, he arrived at a position which has many distinguished votaries to-day.

Of more practical importance perhaps is the earnest, sincere, and essentially spiritual interpretation of the Scriptures—destructive criticism notwithstanding—and the striking moral beauty of many passages in Literature and Dogma and God and the Bible.

Of ROBERT LOUIS STEVENSON's work as a romancer and as a poet mention has been made elsewhere. There is not the same original force and intellectual body in his critical work that we find in the great critics of the Romantic movement, but in freshness, grace, and individuality he has few rivals. Especially attractive is the personal, idiosyncratic note. He does not lack either originality or depth, but these things are not the main things that compel our attention in Stevenson. What holds us most is his engaging manner. Examine his agreeable essays, Virginibus Puerisque and Familiar Studies of Men and Books, and this quality will manifest itself. Frequently we are reminded of Hazlitt, Lamb, and Montaigne. Yet despite his obvious indebtedness to these greater writers, there is an individual flavour about Stevenson's work—the flavour of an attractive personality. This is sufficient compensation.

As a critic of books his originality is perhaps more pronounced, but wise and large though many of his utterances are, here again it is the pleasant distinction of personality that gives salt and flavour to them. There are many critics less brilliant, less attractive in their speech, on whose judgment we should place greater reliance. Sometimes, as in the essay on Victor Hugo's Romances, his own temperament stands in the way, at other times, as in his Thoreau article, there is a vein of wilful capriciousness, even of impish malice, that distorts his judgment. Neither essays can be passed over, and both are extremely interesting. One cannot say they are satisfying. Stevenson does scant justice to the extraordinary passion, the Titanic strength of Hugo; and in the case of Thoreau, he dwells too harshly upon the less gracious aspects of the "poet-naturalist."

It is only fair to say, however, that in the case of Thoreau he made generous amends in the preface to the Collected Essays. Both the reconsidered verdict and the original essay are highly characteristic of the man. Other men have said equally harsh things of Thoreau. Stevenson alone had the fairness, the childlike frank spirit, to go back upon himself. These are the things that endear us to Stevenson, and make it impossible to be angry with any of his paradoxes and extravagant capers. Who but Stevenson would have written thus.

"The most temperate of living critics once marked a passage of my own with a cross and the words, 'This seems nonsense.' It not only seemed, it was so. It was a private bravado of my own which I had so often repeated to keep up my spirits that I had grown at last wholly to believe it, and had ended by setting down as a contribution to the theory of life."

Touched by this confidence, one reads Stevenson—especially the letters—with a more discerning eye, a more compassionate understanding, and if at times one feels the presence of the Ariel too strong and longs for a more human, less elfin personality, then the thought that we are dealing with deliberate "bravado" may well check our impatience.

Men who suffer much are wont to keep up a brave front by an appearance of indifference.

The stylist sometimes is an embarrassment to Stevenson's romances, we feel he is so careful about his literary appearances that the subject-matter suffers. But his niceties of speech are all to the advantage of the essayist. Some readers lament the "Shorter Catechist" note in some of Stevenson's prose writings. I cannot share this feeling of disfavour. In the Lay Morals and Christian Sermons, the moralist is perhaps a shade tiresome, but the Fables are wholly delightful; and Jekyll and Hyde, if somewhat overvalued as a work of art, assuredly loses none of its interest and appeal because it happens to be a morality in thin disguise. It seems to me that the "Shorter Catechist" element in Stevenson is just the quality that gave him so fine a grasp of life, and reinforced his art by imparting a strain of idealism to his work that gave it a body and power which otherwise it would have lacked.

Among the critics in the closing years of the Victorian era are several names of considerable interest.

GEORGE HENRY LEWES (1817-1878) was a gifted and versatile man of letters, who wrote an excellent Life of Goethe, and touched with grace and distinction, if with fitful power, philosophy, fiction, and criticism.

HARRIET MARTINEAU (1802-1876) proved a keen and incisive critic of social politics. Of greater importance was WALTER BAGEHOT (1826-1877), a fine economist who never lost sight of the human equation; and a fresh and stimulating literary critic, RICHARD HOLT HUTTON (1826-1897) of the Spectator.

As literary editor of the Spectator, Hutton wrote criticism on most of the important tendencies of his day and his criticisms are wide and diverse. Many of these have been reprinted, and although there is a certain journalistic scrappiness about the papers in Contemporary Thought and Thinkers (1894), there are no few luminous suggestions, and a high seriousness of treatment. He excelled especially in ethical estimates. With genuine, if somewhat restricted artistic sympathies, and a deeply religious nature, he was particularly successful in detaching the thought and general attitude from a writer's work. Consequently, when the writer had a more or less definite philosophy of life, none happier than Hutton in estimating and appraising it. One of his best volumes of criticism is his Modern Guides of English Thought in Matters of Faith (1887), where he reviews in turn the work and influence of Carlyle, J. H. Newman, Matthew Arnold, George Eliot, and Frederick Donison Maurice.

It is not in the least necessary to agree with the theological affinities in his nature that drew him to men like Newman and Maurice, in order to appreciate the psychological skill with which he visualises and presents those personalities to us; especially is this the case with the Newman Essay, which for its insight into the unquestionable and perplexing genius of the man, is unexcelled by any other critical estimate of this Oxford thinker.

The strength and weakness of Carlyle's religious position again is most admirably and fairly analysed and presented.

In his more purely literary essays, those on Wordsworth, Tennyson, Hawthorne, and Browning are perhaps the best. Much has been written on these great Victorians by other critics, more finely sensitive to their artistic qualities, but no critique with which I am familiar seizes with greater power on what may be called the moral dynamics than Hutton. No doubt his weakness is to see life and letters too much through a stained-glass window, and constitutional peculiarities stood in the way of his doing full justice to such different writers as Shelley and Dickens.

But allowing for a certain rigidity of outlook, he is a broad and discerning critic.

As a religious thinker, he was an Anglican of the Maurician type. Starting as a Unitarian, he came under the influence of Maurice and became a Churchman. The influence of Maurice was not so strong in later years, and Newman's influence to an extent took its place, but though fascinated by Newman's personality, and immensely impressed by his spiritual standpoint, he could never reconcile himself to Newman's ecclesiasticism. Hutton's theological essays are remarkably suggestive and thoughtful.

If not one of our great critics, he is certainly one of our most interesting, for despite a rather disconcerting style, he rarely fails to arrest attention by the brainwork which he put into his articles, and to a high seriousness which never becomes portentous or merely didactic, and as an ethical force in weekly journalism he accomplished a fine and notable work.

There is nothing of the stained-glass window about Sir LESLIE STEPHEN'S (1834-1904) critical writings. Hutton wrote primarily as a religious moralist, Stephen as a thoughtful man of the world. Hutton was peculiarly in sympathy with the Victorian ideal in letters, Stephen's temperament is more akin to the eighteenth century, and some of his best critical work treats of eighteenth century writers. His studies of Johnson, of Swift, and of Pope in the "English Men of Letters" series, his articles on Sterne, Rousseau, Godwin and Shelley, Gray and his school, are unsurpassed in modern critical literature for their consciousness, their rationality, and their judicial urbanity. In two respects, however, Stephen resembled Hutton. He had little sympathy with the æsthetic school of criticism, distrusted literary impressionism, and always argues his case thoroughly. If we do not agree with him, he at any rate gives us chapter and verse for his likes and dislikes in literature.

In the second place, he is more interested in the quality of a man's thought than in his form of expression. He was admirably fitted for his editorial management of the Dictionary of National Biography, which he supervised from 1882 to 1891, when owing to failing health he shared the control with Sir Sidney Lee. The interest he invariably took in the man behind his writings, his taste for history, and his excellent scholarship, made him especially fitted for the task of biographer. A dry and pleasantly caustic humour added materially to the agreeable quality of his essay work. The same qualities that inform his essay work, characterize his more elaborate books: English Thought in the Eighteenth Century (1876-1878), and The English Utilitarians (1900), where the greatness as well as the littleness of the age, finds clear and convincing expression.

A word must be said also for his personal apologia—An Agnostic's Apology (1893); one of the frankest, fairest, and most touching documents of its kind in the language.

A critic of equal scholarship and insight, but lesser performance, is H. D. TRAILL (1842-1900). As a critic he excelled in satire, as, for instance, in The New Lucian (1884), and in The New Humour, and Other Essays. But even here he scarcely did justice to the breadth of his powers. A more solid piece of work is his Coleridge in the "English Men of Letters" series, where he is especially good in dealing with Coleridge as a proseman and as a thinker.

ANDREW LANG (1844-1913) is a literary D'Arctagnan in literature; he would edit a volume of fairy stories or loquaciously attack an historical myth, write on "Spooks," Mary Queen of Scots, or turn a neat Ballad, with equal ease and equal gusto. Probably the extent of his adventurous ranges in literature, and the time given to journalistic exigencies, will tell against the value of his work in any particular direction. Many of his critical essays make good reading; they are written with knowledge and enthusiasm, but they bear the marks of hasty writing, and give us little more than the efflorescence of the writer's culture.

RICHARD GARNETT (1835-1906) has neither the versatility of Lang, nor the philosophic power of Hutton or Stephen. He was more essentially a scholarly man of letters like Traill, but differs from him in having a more sensitive, poetic temperament. As with Ruskin and many another writer, he found better expression in prose than in verse, though some of his lyrics are agreeable enough. His criticism of Coleridge, for instance, is a beautiful piece of work finely sensitive to the imaginative greatness of his subject. No man had a finer literary palate than he where poetry was concerned.

Excelling especially in the historical side of literary development, are Stopford Brooke, George Saintsbury, William Courthope, and Edmund Gosse.

Dr STOPFORD BROOKE (1812), like Garnett, has a strongly poetic imagination, and is at his best when dealing with poetry. No one has written with more insight and sympathy than he on the pre-Chaucerian period of English verse, and on the poets of the Romantic Revival, while his primer on English Literature is a model of its kind. His critical writings are many and various, being marked always by enthusiasm for his subject. In his work dealing with modern literary developments, his essay on Blake, his various essays on Shelley, that on Rossetti, and his elaborate study of Tennyson merit particular attention.

Dr WILLIAM COURTHOPE (1842) is best remembered for his fine scholarly History of English Poetry (1895-1901). His own temperamental taste makes him especially happy when dealing with the eighteenth century; and he is as happy when dealing with the Augustans as is Stopford Brooke when dealing with the Romans.

Prof GEORGE E. B. SAINTSBURY (1845) is an invaluable writer for the literary student; unapproachable in his extensive and exhaustive knowledge of the general development of English Literature. If his critical writings lack the charm and the lucidity that we find in other literary historians, he has no peer, far less any rival, in the extent of his learning and in the catholicity of his taste. No student can afford to ignore his masterly Short History of English Literature, his History of Criticism and Literary Taste in Europe, or his less ambitious but equally penetrating work on Elizabethan Literature. In tracing the historical development of various schools, in dealing with matters of prosody, he is peculiarly happy. When he leaves the historical background for the lighter texture of the Essay, his marked preferences and prejudices are indulged to a much greater extent, and the dogmatic way with which he lays about him is naturally irritating to those whose idols he ruthlessly tumbles from their pedestals. Yet, even here, he is stimulating, and the greater liveliness of style, flashes of humour, and out of the way knowledge make his critical essays always worth reading. Among these may be mentioned his Corrected Impressions; and his Essays in English Literature (1780-1880).

His delightful essay on Cobbett, for instance, is quite the best thing on that provocative yet attractive man that has been written.

Grace, wit, and distinction are the prevailing qualities in the work of EDMUND GOSSE (1849). He is a critic of flexible sympathies, as the personal estimates in his Modern English Literature, and his sympathetic Study of Ibsen (one of the first of its kind) testify, and he has a remarkable gift for psychological portraiture. This gift is the most happily expressed in his noteworthy fiction Father and Son. Mention must be made also of his agreeable and accomplished verse.

Other critics, of more modest and restricted accomplishment, are HENRY MORLEY (1822-1894), a painstaking literary historian; WILLIAM SHARP, whose best work lies in his imaginative prose; WILLIAM MINTO (1845-1893); Canon AINGER (1837-1904), who deserves the affection and respect of all lovers of Lamb and Crabbe; JOHN CURTON COLLINS (1848-1908); and FREDERICK FURNIVALL (1825-1913), especially noteworthy for his scholarly studies of Early and Middle-English literature.

On the philological side, the names of Professor W. W. SKEAT (1835-1912), and EDWARD ARBER, deserve special remembrance. Among classical scholars who have done much to kindle enthusiasm for the masterpieces of Greek and Roman literature are H. A. J. MUNRO, with his Lucretius, JOHN CONINGTON (1825-1869), with his prose translation of the Aeneid, Sir JOHN RHYNS (1840), whose Celtic Heathendom (1886) is a worthy supplement to Lady Charlotte Guest's Mabinogion (1849); Professor MACKAIL (1859), who has done much to make us appreciate the intimate spirit of Latin literature, and Professor GILBERT MURRAY (1866), who has done the same for Greek letters. The name of Professor JOHN PENTLAND MAHAFFY (1839-1915), is more particularly associated with the social aspect of Greek life.

In an age of specialisation, it is natural that critics with marked temperamental affinities should mark out special fields for their labours:

EDWARD DOWDEN (1843-1913), one of our best analytical critics of romanticism; Lord MORLEY (1838), unexcelled for his studies in French literature, and always a fine and distinguished commentator on anything pertaining to life and letters; Professor RALEIGH (1861), with his imaginative insight into the adventurous spirit of the Elizabethan age, and AUSTIN DOBSON (1840), who has revealed the manners of the eighteenth century, while Leslie Stephen has revealed its morals.

W. E. HENTLEY (1819-1903) specialises in critical portraiture and in his power of visualising is akin to Gosse, though in tone and temper he is more like Jeffrey and the earlier reviewers. He had flashes of brilliant insight, and wrote with force and vitality, but much of his work is unsatisfactory by reason of its hard, superficial brilliance and ungenerous temper.

As a last illustration from the notable gallery of Victorian critics, we may take THEODORE WATTS-DUNTON (1832-1914). As a personality he does not belong to the primary men, he is inferior to Ruskin and Carlyle in driving force; and lacks that arresting distinction that draws us to Matthew Arnold and Stevenson, and, to a lesser extent, to Walter Pater. But for a keen sagacity into comparative values, he has no rival and few peers. As an illustration of his analytical cunning, take the passage on Absolute and Relative Humour:

"That an apprehension of incongruity is the basis of both relative and absolute humour is no doubt true enough, but while in the case of relative humour it is the incongruity of some departure from the normal, in the case of absolute humour it is the sweet incongruity of the normal itself. Relative humour laughs at the breach of the accustomed laws of nature and the conventional laws of man, which laws it accepts as final. Absolute humour (comparing them unconsciously with some ideal standard of its own, or with that ideal or noumenal or spiritual world behind the cosmic show) sees the incongruity of those very laws themselves—laws which are the relative humourist's standard. Absolute humour, in a word, is based on metaphysics—relative humour on experience. A child can become a relative humourist by adding a line or two to the nose of Wellington, or by reversing the nose of the Venus de Medici. The absolute humourist has so long been saying to himself, 'What a whimsical idea is the human nose!' that he smiles the smile of Anacharsis at the child's laughter on seeing it turned upside down. So with convention and its codes of etiquette—from the pompous harlequinade of royalty—the ineffable gingerbread of an aristocracy of names without office or culture, down to the Draconian laws of Philistia and bourgeois respectability; whatever is a breach of the local laws of the game of social life, whether the laws be those of a village pothouse or of Mayfair, whether it displays an ignorance of matters of familiar knowledge, those are the quarry of the relative humourist. The absolute humourist, on the other hand, as we see in the greatest masters of absolute humour, is so perpetually overwhelmed with the irony of the entire game, cosmic and human, from the droll little conventions of the village pothouse to those of London, of Paris, of New York, of Peking—up to the apparently meaningless dance of the planets round the sun—up again to that greater and more meaningless waltz of suns round the centre—he is so delighted with the delicious foolishness of wisdom, the concerted ignorance of knowledge, the grotesqueness even of the standard of beauty itself, above all, with the whim of the absolute humourist Nature, amusing herself, not merely with her monkeys, her flamingoes, her penguins, her dromedaries, but with these more whimsical creatures still—these 'bipeds' which, though 'featherless', are proved to be not 'plucked fowls', these proud, high-thinking organisms—stomachs with heads, arms, and legs as useful appendages—these countless little 'me's', so all alike and yet so unlike, each one feeling, knowing itself to be the me, the only true original me, round whom all other me's revolve—so overwhelmed is the absolute humourist with the whim of all this—with the incongruity, that is, of the normal itself—with the 'almighty joke' of the Cosmos as it is—that he sees nothing 'funny' in departures from laws which to him are in themselves the very quintessence of fun . . . With Charles Lamb he feels, in short, that humour 'does not go out with life'; and in answer to Elia's question, 'Can a ghost laugh?' he says, 'Assuredly, if there be ghosts at all,' for he is as unable as Soams Jenyns himself to imagine that even the seraphim can be perfectly happy without a perception of the ludicrous."

What relation does Mr Watts-Dunton's original work, his verse and his fiction, bear to his critical essays? They are, to a considerable extent, concrete illustrations of the author's abstract theorising. Aylwin is an elaborate and lengthy footnote to the critic's happy generalisation in The Renaissance of Wonder. The Coming of Love is a metrical and concrete version of the speculative ideas that underlie Aylwin. It is not given to every thinker to thus annotate his own felicities, and, having preached, to proceed to practice. Even as it stands (and Aylwin was originally far longer), the book suffers from superabundance of matter. But despite its excessive length and a consequent occasional failure of grip, it is a fine performance, full of cultured thought and an astonishing insight into gypsy life.

Freshness, technical skill, and alert mentality distinguish all his verse, and occasionally in one or two of his sonnets there are touches of high beauty. But, curiously enough, there is less of the romantic magic in his poetry than there is in his prose romance, Aylwin, and less in his fiction than in his criticism.

It is as a critic that Watts-Dunton will be best remembered; in other departments he has many competitors, and it is impossible to adjudge him a place in the front rank. As a critic he has few superiors in English Literature.

INTRODUCTION

THE general drift and particular fluctuations of speculative thought in the nineteenth century, can be gathered by all thoughtful students of English letters from the poetry, the fiction, and the critical essay work of the age. Calvinistic evangelism, for instance, that flourished in its earlier years, is reflected in the poetry of Burns and the hymns of Cowper, while its influence is clearly apparent in the earlier novels of Dickens and George Eliot, more faintly so in the outlook of Macaulay, and insistently so in Carlyle's view of life. Ruskin's strict evangelical training left ineffaceable impressions upon his mode of thought—although, like Carlyle, he shook off its dogmatic trappings—while Browning's religious poetry owes more to evangelism than to any other theological school. The effect of the so-called "Oxford Movement" and of neo-Catholicism, found also remarkable though less wide expression in letters, it coloured the writings of Froude, and is closely interwoven with the poetry of the pre-Raphaelite school—indifferent as many of the singers were to its theological implications—while in fiction it bore fruit in the novels of Charlotte Yonge and the mystical fiction of J. H. Shorthouse. A third development of philosophic speculation—rationalism, may be traced in the historical work of men like Seeley and Lecky, in the later novels of George Eliot, and in the work of modern men of letters such as Meredith and Hardy.

So much roughly for the influence of speculative thought on letters. What of its influence on other expressions of our life?

The practical tendency of Evangelicalism is to find expression in moral reform, of Tractarianism in art, of Rationalism in social politics.

The Church in the late eighteenth century had been roused from its apathy by those fiery souls, the two Wesleys and their co-worker, Whitfield. And in the opening years of the nineteenth century the most vigorous personalities in the religious world were men of the same type. To speak of the speculative thought of the Evangelicals is like the contents of that famous chapter "Snakes in Iceland—There are no snakes in Iceland."

There is practically no speculative thought in Evangelicalism, for the human reason was considered incapable of dealing with these high matters. There was the Infallible Book—with the rule of life set forth clearly, for all who cared to see, and the Evangelicals found sufficient emotional expression along moral and social channels. Here, indeed, notable work was accomplished, as the names of Wilberforce and Clarkson and Elizabeth Fry bear eloquent witness. In social history the Evangelicals did much, but in intellectual history their place is an insignificant one, and their contempt for culture and art, the narrowness of their outlook, put them out of sympathy with a body of refined and intelligent men and women.

They never lacked great preachers, and in Scotland especially, the names of the fervid Robert Hall and that fine administrative genius, Thomas Chalmers, remind us of the best traditions of the elder Puritans that moulded English life in the seventeenth century. But historical and philosophical problems and their bearing upon theology concerned them little.

Speculative thought in current theology began to stir now in two directions. On the one hand we have the so-called "Noetic School" headed by Whately, a hard-headed thinker of the matter-of-fact type, who did vigorous work in destructive criticism, exposing the narrowness of the Evangelical and turning attention to historical methods. His weakness and those of his followers lay in the lack of that spiritual fervour which the great Evangelicals undoubtedly possessed. Yet he was a remarkable personality with a clear brain, and a trenchant wit, and certainly helped to bring about the reaction against the Evangelical supremacy.

A more potent and far-reaching influence was that of Coleridge and his Scots allies, Thomas Erskine and Edward Irving, who brought back mysticism into English theology, and assisted in pouring the wine of German philosophy into the worn-out wine-skins of orthodox Anglicanism; often, it must be admitted, with the result of bursting the wine skins.

Coleridge's influence, then, was two-fold; on his mystical and poetical side he favoured the growth of the High Church or Tractarian movement; on his dialectical side he brought about the birth of the Broad Church movement.

In dealing with both these movements, it will be necessary to confine ourselves to those sides that touched most closely life and letters. Already we have seen in treating of Romanticism how important a part Mediævalism played both in verse and fiction, and a modern historian—Professor Gates of New York—has significantly said that "the Oxford Movement was in its essence an attempt to reconstruct the English Church in harmony with this romantic (mediæval) ideal."

Scott tried to recapture the external splendour of the Middle Ages; Coleridge its mystical beauty; Newman its ecclesiastical hierarchy.

The great names connected with the new Catholic movement are John Henry Newman, John Keble, W. G. Ward, Edward Bouverie Pusey. As Newman has traced the beginning of the movement to John Keble, who he said had made the English Church poetical—upon Keble and his influence we may dwell at this juncture.

JOHN KEBLE (1792-1866) was Professor of Poetry at Oxford, and an Anglican preacher. In his capacity as pastor he gave his famous discourse on National Apostasy (1833), which, in Newman's view, started the movement of the "Thirties."

Keble was a simple, sweet-natured soul, with no great power of thought and little originality; and his influence was almost entirely a personal one. His sensitive and pious mind absorbed eagerly floating ideas as to the authority of the Church in pre-Reformation times; and in his Christian Year we have a poetical expression of his saintly ideals, which appeal so strongly to men like Newman.

Keble gives us the emotional atmosphere of the movement, for its dialectics we must turn to others—and in the first place to JOHN HENRY NEWMAN.

JOHN HENRY, Cardinal NEWMAN (1801-1890) was the eldest son of a London banker, whose fortunes seriously declined during the financial crisis of 1815, and his mother, of French Protestant descent, brought up her family to revere the work of such men as Scott and Newton, as well as to love their Bible.

From a school at Ealing, Newman went up to Trinity College, Oxford, took his degree in 1820, and in 1823 was elected to an Oriel fellowship. Of his life at this time the late W. E. Gladstone thus records: "When I was an undergraduate of Oxford, Dr. Newman was looked upon rather with prejudice as, what is termed, a low churchman, but was very much respected for his character and his known ability," and "without ostentation or effort, but by simple excellence, he was constantly drawing undergraduates more and more around him." In 1824 Newman was ordained to the curacy of St. Clement's, Oxford, and four years later appointed vicar of St. Mary's.

But Newman was fast breaking away from the old evangelical traditions, and a tour with Hurrell Froude to the south of Europe in 1832 helped to fix more firmly the growing idea that his mission was to revive a more Catholic spirit in the Church of England. The well-known hymn, Lead, kindly Light, was written in 1833, while journeying back to England from this tour. On his return he threw himself into the Tractarian movement, inaugurated by Keble, and set to work upon the Tracts for the Times—his own Tract XC appearing in 1841.

With the mental and spiritual forces now in conflict, Newman decided that he could not conscientiously remain at St. Mary's, so in 1843 he resigned his cure and retired to Littlemore. In 1845, "I was hard at work," he tells us, "on the Essay of Doctrinal Development. As I advanced, my view cleared. . . . Before I got to the end I resolved to be received, and the book remains in the state in which it was then, unfinished." Thus in October 1845, Newman found a haven in the Roman Catholic Church, "after many storms." After his reception he spent some time in Rome, and returned to Birmingham during the cholera epidemic of 1848, and at once devoted himself to the sick poor of that city. As founder and first superior of the Community of St. Philip Neri, he settled in Edgbaston, where he passed the remainder of his life, and died in 1890.

Newman's imagination was more deeply poetic than was Keble's, and in addition he had a power of speculative thought alien to the author of the Christian Year.

Newman, says one of his severest critics,¹ is like Mill, a lover of clear, definite, tangible statements. There is no danger with him of losing ourselves in that mystical haze which irritates and bewilders the ordinary common sense of mankind. Indeed, his own admissions support his critic's contention. From the age of fifteen, he tells us, dogma had been the fundamental principle of his religion. Literature was his enemy, because by literature he meant the anti-dogmatic principle—the principle which would convert religion into a sentiment, and therefore for him into a dream, a mockery. No one, of course, could be more sensitive to the mysterious element in theology, but in his view dogma is not the less definite for being mysterious.

Let us notice some special points about Newman's personality as revealed in literature, which may serve to explain his remarkable influence.

In the first place, his literary style expressed most admirably the temper and tone of the writer. It was a beautiful style—not beautiful with the rhythmic opulence of Ruskin, nor with the graceful urbanity of Arnold, nor with the fantastic suggestiveness of De Quincey; but beautiful with a limpid lucidity, a chastened eloquence, a gentle persuasiveness.

None have written more happily about his style than Hutton.

"He never said anything more characteristic than when he expressed his conviction that though there are a hundred difficulties in faith, into all of which he could enter, the hundred difficulties are not equal to a single doubt. That saying is most characteristic of his style, which seems to be sensitive in the highest degree to a multitude of hostile influences which are at once appreciated and resisted, while one predominant and over-ruling power moves steadily on."

Reading Newman's temperament through his delightfully pellucid style, we are struck by certain personal characteristics which help to explain the deep and far-reaching influence of the man.

First, I think, a peculiar power of sensitive sympathy.

His was not a dominating personality that sweeps everything before it. There are men—poets, social reformers—who are possessed by a few vital ideas, see those ideas under the brilliant light of enthusiasm to the exclusion of others, and make their mark in the world through their superb one-sidedness.

There is need of such men always. The great reformer is ever such an one, and much of the practical and constructive work of the world is done by such men.

There are others, critical by nature, who are keenly sensitive to the pros and cons, and whose subtle intellects expose them to difficulties of which the average man knows nothing. Newman was a man of this kind. None knew better than he that some kind of active faith was essential to a man who wishes to do some genuine work in life. He appreciated the paralysing effect of doubt: he was alive to the criticism of the scoffer, that religion makes little difference to many men's lives. He knew the seductive power of the senses, for he was an artist in his own way, and the possibilities of human nature for good and evil appalled him.

And a good deal that he wrote which seemed hesitating and casuistical, which provoked men of simpler, rougher natures, was due to his sensitiveness to every form of intellectual difficulty and to subtle moral temptations, and to his desire to meet them as far as possible.

And this brings me to the second characteristic of Newman: his passionate sincerity.

In stating this I am aware that I am on a highly controversial ground. He is held by some to have justified his theological and ecclesiastical position at the expense of his intellectual honesty. Many excellent men have held thus—men so far apart as Charles Kingsley and Leslie Stephen. Therefore the charge cannot be met by mere denial or evasion.

Let us briefly examine the scope and character of Newman's important works. That will help us to understand his character better.

First of all there are the Tracts, by which he endeavoured to fix a via media between Romanism and Protestantism and to vindicate the Anglo-Catholic position. That he attempted to read into the "Thirty-nine Articles" more than they could fairly bear he would have admitted. Enthusiasm often leads a man to defend an indefensible position, but it does not follow that he is not perfectly sincere in his defence. He would have failed in sincerity if, on finding the weakness of his position, he had remained in the Anglican Church. This he did not do, and it cost him a bitter pang to follow the logical results of his own reasoning.

After his conversion, Newman published some remarkable books. The first, his Autobiography—his spiritual autobiography—Apologia pro Vita Sua (1865), perhaps the most significant of his writings. The keynote of the truth may be found in this statement.

"From the age of fifteen, dogma has been the fundamental principle of my religion. I know no other religion. I cannot enter into the idea of any other sort of religion. Religion as a mere sentiment is to me a dream and a mockery."

Here we have a very distinct point of view, and one that must be thoroughly grasped before we proceed further. There are three types of mind to which dogma appeals in a quite different way.

The first may be called the passionate, the second the contemplative, the third, the critical temperament.

The passionate temperament is an impulsive one. Feeling here is intense and predominant, where the overpowering need is felt of some great co-ordinating power outside ourselves to leash the impulses together and to give directing force to the character. St Augustine, St Francis d'Assisi, John Knox, John Bunyan, and Newman are examples of this type.

To such natures religion, when it appeals, must appeal as some external authority. Faith must express itself in a ritual belief crystallised into a dogma. Knowing the weaknesses of human nature, having gauged the cross-currents which deflect the will first this way and then that, conscious of the passion of inward effort to decide first hand in the great problems of life, they turn with a sigh of relief and aspiration towards some great Church that has continued down the ages, or towards some great Book that shall decide the questions that have bewildered and amazed them.

Obedience is one of the first duties they strive after. Those who trust to a Church rather than to a Book are Catholic, the Protestant turns to the Book as the external authority needed. In Newman's case, of course, it was "the Church" that appealed as an authority that quieted all questionings as the reputed medium of supernatural grace. With all his powerful intellect, with all his critical appreciation, he felt the necessity in his religious life for some external authority on which he could depend. Self-reliance in spiritual matters looked to him like puerile cocksureness.

The contemplative temperament is that of the Oriental mystic, whose instinct for the things that are unseen is so strong that he feels no need to resolve it into terms of logic. To the onlooker his attitude may seem incomprehensible, because of its essential subjectivity. But to the man himself his religion is as real and vital as the processes of his own body. No pontifical Church appeals to him, no special Sacraments claim his attention; for the whole Universe for him glows with spiritual fire, and Nature herself is his high-priest.

"The science of the Sufis," says a Persian philosopher of the eleventh century, "aims at detaching the heart from all that is not God, and at giving to it for sole occupation the meditation of the divine being. Just as the understanding is a stage of human life in which an eye opens to discuss various intellectual objects uncomprehended by sensation, just so in the prophetic the sight is illumined by a light which uncovers hidden things and objects which the intellect fails to reach. The chief properties of prophetism are perceptible only during the transport by those who embrace the Sufi life. The prophet is endowed with qualities to which you possess nothing analogous, and which consequently you cannot possibly understand. How should you know their true nature?—what one can comprehend? But the transport which one attains by the method of the Sufis is like an immediate perception, as if one touched the objects with one's hand."

The third temperament—the critical one—is obviously that of the scientific mind, that rejects dogma because it holds it superfluous, not since it accounts it mischievous. Clear intellectual comprehension is at once its test and its ideal. What cannot be verified by human experience is untrustworthy to such a mind. In such temperaments mentality is strong, emotionalism weak.

"The contemplation of God and nothing but it," wrote Newman, "is able to open and relieve the mind; to unlock, occupy and fix our affections. It is this feeling of simple and absolute confidence and communion which soothes and satisfies those to whom it is vouchsafed. We know that even our nearest friends enter into us but partially, and hold intercourse with us only at times, whereas the consciousness of a perfect and enduring presence, and it alone, keeps our heart open. If it be not bold to say it—He who is infinite alone can be its measure. He alone can answer to that mysterious assemblage of feelings and thoughts which it has within it."

This may have been written by a fanatic: by a sceptic—no. The dogmatic principle which he asserts so passionately in his Apologia is worked out with brilliant elaboration in two books—The Development of Christian Doctrine (1845), and A Grammar of Assent (1870).

The Development of Christian Doctrine takes as its main thesis the familiar principle of the gradual development that accompanies necessarily the growth of every doctrine or institution. Such development is hinted at indeed in such parables as the grain of mustard seed, and makes justifiable havoc of certain popular Protestant arguments.

This historical use made of the evolutionary idea anticipates to some extent Spencer's work. Newman's argument, however, that, in order to distinguish correct development from false, an infallible authority outside the development is required, stands on quite another footing, and no one has dealt more trenchantly with it than the German theologian, Dr Pfleiderer:

"If Christianity is, as a whole, a revelation, the results of its development must share the guarantee of its credentials. Revealed religion is distinguished from Natural by the very fact that it substitutes the voice of a Law-giver—an objective authority, Apostle, Pope, or Church—for the voice of conscience. In Protestantism this authority is the Bible, but as it can be proved that this authority is insufficient, we must conclude that this required living and present source of revelation can only be the infallible arbiter of all true doctrines—the Church. Nor is personal judgment precluded by this infallible authority, but is only limited to its proper range and preserved from error. We must allow that this defence (following in the footsteps of the German Catholic theologian Möhler) of the principle of Catholic tradition and authority is conducted very cleverly. It rests, all the same, upon a great fallacy. The fact is overlooked that the alleged infallible authority is itself a product of the general development, and that it participates in its changes, and is therefore subject, like every historical phenomenon, to the law of relativity. Moreover, the false traditional idea of development is throughout taken for granted—namely, that development consists solely in positive growth, in an extension and more complete definition of older truth; we hear nothing of the great fact, that development has also a negative aspect, that new truth does not come merely as an addition to the old, but often abrogates the old, so that in reality there is accomplished in it the continuous criticism of mind in the process of its development. We readily grant that this process does not go on without obedience to an inner law of rationality, but precisely because reason is realised in the process of historic development, it does not require a special infallible institution to guide it, which can only become an impediment to the living spirit."¹

But, criticism apart, Newman's essay is an extremely instructive one, raising many questions of practical interest, such as how far Christianity as taught to-day is the genuine outcome of primitive customs, how far our preservative additions, our doctrines, and our losses are corruptions, how far fairly derived.

In A Grammar of Assent Newman elaborated a principle derived probably from Kabbala, that religious conviction rests on emotional, not on intellectual grounds. That, further, these grounds cannot be theoretically proved, or logically justified, probability being converted into certainty by a voluntary assent.

The doctrine of probability is borrowed and developed from Butler, and Newman certainly has much to say that is stimulating and suggestive. There is a profound psychological truth in his contention that our opinions are so largely affected by instinctive prepossessions, temperamental likes and dislikes, and that, estimating our view, these peculiarities of our mental constitution, which no arguments can alter, must be taken into consideration.

"I do not like thee, Dr Fell,
The reason why I cannot tell."

The subjective and idiosyncratic character of emotional certainty is, however, insufficient on which to build a theology. It may serve as a rule of faith to its possessor, but it holds no validity for others, unless it can appeal also to historical data or logical argument.

What was there about Kingsley's charge of dishonesty, and Huxley's suggestion of moral jugglery?

If Newman's position was a faithful expression of his own—the passionate temperament!—how can he have provoked such wide-spread distrust? The reason for this will appear if we scrutinise his dialectics. When he argues that it is by imagination rather than by reason that we reach the truth, and that our deepest convictions cannot find adequate intellectual symbols, most of us will admit the force of his pleading, and warmly assent. We may even assent to the high importance with which he rates the dogmatic principle, taking temperaments such as his into account. But the dogmatic principle is one thing, the truth of specific dogmas quite another. These are matters, surely, for historical criticism. Imagination may transcend reason—but that is not to say it can dispense with it. Here comes in the weakness of Newman's position. He did not say. The Athanasian Creed appeals irresistibly to my imagination, to discuss it as an intellectual statement, therefore, seems to be superfluous. If so, the issue would have been a simple one. That is what the mystic does. But Newman's intellect was a subtle and restless one, he was for ever trying to justify on logical grounds what he had always accepted on intuitive grounds. He was not consciously dishonest in this, there was no deliberate insincerity. Otherwise he would not have shown his cards so ingenuously, he would not have so frankly provided us with the weapons with which to confute him. But a reasoner who, having arrived at certain conclusions without the aid of logic, suddenly invokes logic to justify these conclusions, should not complain if this tortuous method arouses suspicion in plain, straightforward minds as to his bona fides.

The fact is that Newman's emotional appetite constantly desired every manner of external assistance, whether of creed or ritual, to satisfy it. And he confounded a matter of idiosyncrasy with a matter of conscience.

Yet there is much in Newman's writings that is both true and profound, much that gives a pleasant pasturage to the fancy, and a noble stimulus to the imagination. He is an agreeable and fascinating companion by the way so long as we do not trust him as a guide.

EDWARD BOUVERIE PUSEY (1800-1882) is no more reliable than Newman in theological controversy, for, despite his even more extensive learning, he makes no real use of it whenever his arguments lead up to Church authority and tradition. Lacking Newman's probing intellect, he did not even go so far as to try to reconcile faith and reason. His imagination was far less sensitive, and although he, like Newman, was honest and sincere enough, he is even more of the special pleader. In almost every way he is inferior to Newman, he is far less attractive as a personality, more questionable in his methods, and immeasurably inferior as a literary craftsman.

Other interesting figures of lesser note in the Tractarian movement, but none the less of genuine interest, are RICHARD HURRELL FROUDE, Dean of Church, Canon LIDON, and W. G. WARD.

HURRELL FROUDE (1803-1886) was a man of brilliant parts who survives rather as a memory, for he died early, leaving nothing by which he could be fairly judged. He was a great friend of Newman's, wrote two of the Tracts for the Times, and some fair verse. But his personal influence far transcends his literary.

WILLIAM GEORGE WARD (1812-1882) was another personality with great intellectual gifts, personal charm, and indifferent literary parts. He was one of the most influential English Catholics after Newman.

RICHARD WILLIAM CHURCH (1815-1890), the friend of Newman, is second only to him in literary skill and charm. Certainly he is the most distinguished literary figure of the High Church party. He has written a clear and succinct account of the Oxford Movement and some monographs of the first order on Dante, Spenser, and Bacon. Here he shows the fullest appreciation of those diverse personalities. While never indiscriminate in praise, he can be both delicately sympathetic and coolly judicial—a combination of qualities as rare as it is welcome.

The last notable figure of the movement is that of HENRY PARRY LIDON (1829-1890), who was a fine orator, a cultured scholar, but negligible as a thinker, for he simply ignored in his writings—for instance, his Bampton Lectures on The Divinity of Jesus (1867)—other lines of speculative thought outside of the High Church position.

Among the English Catholics who were affected by, but were not of, the Tractarian movement, are Cardinal MANNING (1808-1892) and Cardinal WISEMAN (1802-1865)—the original of Bishop Blougram—whose novel Fabiola (1854), a story of the Church of the Catacombs, enjoyed a European popularity. Wiseman was an able and genial man, but a poor literary craftsman. Manning was one of the High Anglicans who passed over to Rome, though he did not belong to the Tractarian group. He is better known as a man of affairs than as a thinker or writer.

SAMUEL WILBERFORCE (1805-1873), the famous Bishop of Oxford, was a moderate High Churchman, less by reason of any reasoned position than by force of a temperament that was practical and prone to compromise. He was an effective preacher, a good administrator, and a witty conversationalist, and in writing is most notable for his controversial articles in the Quarterly Review. As a thinker he is a clever, versatile, shallow man, and the part he played in the Darwin controversy is neither creditable to his taste nor his fair-mindedness.

There is no theological movement comparable with the Tractarian or neo-Catholic movement in its far reaching influence on Art and Letters and the Life of the day. But the "Broad Church" movement can claim many distinguished adherents, and certainly ranks second.

Strictly speaking, this movement is composed of two sections, the first of which concentrated rather on social activities and centred round Maurice and Kingsley; the second, being more strictly intellectual, centring round Mark Pattison and Jowett. In the social wing may be numbered F. D. Maurice, C. Kingsley, and F. W. Robertson.

FREDERICK DENISON MAURICE (1805-1872) was a man of considerable personal charm and beauty of character, and a thinker whose intellectual power was far in excess of his clarity of presentment. Maurice's fundamental contention is that mysticism and rationalism are not incompatible, and his life is evidence to the harmony of a deep, living faith with a fair and candid examination of facts, illustrated by much that is profoundly suggestive, if never wholly satisfying. His indebtedness to Coleridge is obvious, and he has both the weakness and strength of his master. But his passionate attachment to the English Church does lead him into many ambiguities, and we are conscious, as we are in Newman, of the special pleader.

With slighter intellectual equipment is FREDERICK WILLIAM ROBERTSON (1816-1853), the great Brighton preacher, a much clearer exponent of the Broad Church position, especially in its social implications. His spiritual feeling is not a whit less inferior to Maurice's, but he is not disturbed by those subtleties which Maurice tried faithfully but unsuccessfully to unravel, and he gets to the root of the subject with admirable precision and definiteness.

Both Kingsley and Robertson, though inferior in original power to Maurice, excelled him as direct forces. Maurice is the leader of the Christian Social movement, but Kingsley was its populariser, and proved the more potent personality, while Robertson presented with supreme clarity the intimate connection between poetry and life, which Maurice felt and suggested but was never able to actualise.

The somewhat vague phrase "Christian Socialist," first identified with Maurice and his school, was in point of fact an attempt to realise in economic terms the contention of Coleridge that Christianity is a life and not a creed. If Christianity was to be a force in modern life, it must concern itself with the pressing problems brought about by the unequal distribution of wealth, it must, in short, inspire the conditions of this life, and not merely talk at large about another life. Economically it sympathises with the Collectivist theory that in the mid century was displacing the old Utilitarian Individualism. But its exponents were not committed to any particular school of economic thought, and were essentially eclectic.

Passing now to the more exclusively intellectual wing of the Broad Church movement, we note the names of Dean Stanley, Mark Pattison, Benjamin Jowett, and Bishop Colenso.

ARTHUR PENRHYN STANLEY (1815-1881), whom Carlyle once referred to as "knocking holes in the Church of England," showed his broad mindedness by his treatment of ecclesiastical history. He was a picturesque and vigorous writer, and a man of wide sympathies, who, like so many of his school, never pressed his rationalistic methods to their logical conclusion. Huxley's description of him, despite its humorous exaggeration, undoubtedly hit off happily this failing:

"Stanley could believe in anything of which he had seen the supposed site, but was sceptical where he had not seen. At a breakfast at Monckton Milnes', just at the time of the Colenso row, Milnes asked me my views on the Pentateuch, and I gave them. Stanley differed from us. The account of creation in Genesis he dismissed at once as unhistorical, but the call of Abraham and the historical narrative of the Pentateuch he accepted. This was because he had seen Palestine, but he wasn't present at the creation."

MARK PATTISON (1813-1884), Rector of Lincoln College, was essentially a scholar with a marked taste for philosophy. A man of great learning, he was a clear and dispassionate thinker, and it is extraordinary that his essentially analytical and non-controversial treatment of Deism, in the essay he contributed to the famous Essays and Reviews, should have been so violently attacked. In addition to this he wrote a biography of the great humanist Isaac Casaubon, his most learned work, and an admirable little monograph on Milton.

BENJAMIN JOWETT (1817-1893) proved the most fearless and uncompromising of the ecclesiastical rationalists, and his attack on the popular doctrine of the Atonement in Essays and Reviews, as well as his treatment of many points of Biblical exegesis, brought him naturally into high disfavour with the orthodox. To day his position seems inoffensive enough, and fully compatible with a genuine religious spirit, though whether such an attitude is reconcilable with a position in the Anglican Church is a more arguable matter.

Jowett recognised the storm of disapprobation by turning his attention from theological matters, and undoubtedly his name in literature will rest upon the wonderful translation of Plato which occupied the later years of his life. He was an interesting and remarkable figure in the intellectual world, and the friend of many Victorians; one whose influence in these days is personal and stimulating rather than deeply philosophical.

So far the theologians and philosophers treated belong either to the Anglican Church or the Church of Rome. We may turn now to those outside the Church.

Those remarkable Scotsmen, David Hume and Adam Smith, did much for philosophic thought in the late eighteenth century. Then came a period of mediocrities, though DUGALD STEWART (1753-1828), if little of a force in speculation, affected living contemporaries by his attractive personality and oratorical power.

But the first important name in the history of modern thought is that of Sir WILLIAM HAMILTON (1788-1856), Professor of Logic and Metaphysics in Edinburgh University.

As in Jowett's case, however, the personal equation counted for much more in Hamilton's case than originality or profundity. His enormous appetite for reading led him to bolt his food without properly assimilating it, and this did not make for intellectual eupeptics. Though a wide reader of German philosophy, he seems to have derived no benefit from it, and his philosophy of common sense, set up to combat Hume's, is a very fragile concern. The most serious defect (from one who wishes to defend orthodoxy) in Hamilton's philosophy, however, is its pervading, underlying scepticism. That this is so will be more apparent if we turn to the work of an acute disciple of Hamilton's—Dean MANSEL (1820-1871), particularly in his Limits of Religious Thought.

Mansel's position may be made clear by the following passages from the preface to his third edition:

"It has been objected by reviewers of very opposite schools, that to deny a man a knowledge of the infinite, is to make Revelation itself impossible, and to leave no room for evidences on which reason can be legitimately employed. The objection would be pertinent, if I had ever maintained that Revelation is, or can be, a direct manifestation of the infinite nature of God. But I have constantly asserted the very reverse. In Revelation, as in Natural Religion, God is represented under finite conceptions, adapted to finite minds, and the evidences on which the authority of Revelation rests are finite and comprehensible also. It is true that in Revelation, no less than in the exercise of our natural faculties, there is indirectly indicated the existence of a higher truth which, as it cannot be grasped by any effort of human thought, cannot be made the vehicle of any valid philosophical criticism. But the comprehension of this higher truth is no more necessary either to a belief in the contents of Revelation, or to a reasonable examination of its evidences, than a conception of the infinite divisibility of matter is necessary to the child before it can learn to walk."

Thus, as one of his critics has well said, "he believes in the veil even more intensely than in the revelation." Revelation according to Mansel, can give us a conception of Deity true enough for ordinary practical purposes, but "how far that knowledge represents God as He is, we know not and have no need to know." Thus, Mansel holds to be a useful regulation truth, but the more we examine the more shadowy it seems, for he suggests that the morality of God is not merely higher than Man's, but different. Surely, beside this mockery of a Revelation, Arnold's "something not ourselves that makes for Righteousness," seems delightfully definite and comforting.

The book shows great acuteness of thought, and the Agnostic will find within it an armoury of weapons. But as a guide to faith, nothing could well be more unsatisfactory. The best critical examination of it from the religious point of view will be found in the writings of James Martineau and F. D. Maurice, and from a more detached standpoint we may turn to John Stuart Mill. Hutton also has an able and lucid essay on the subject. There is no better criticism, however, than is implied in Huxley's terse and witty comparison of Mansel to the drunken man in Hogarth's

Contested Election, who is sawing through the sap post on the outer edge of which he is himself sitting.

The influence of the Scottish school of theologians, despite Mansel's intellectual power, is not comparable with that of the Utilitarians, who owed their inspiration to the teaching of Jeremy Bentham. The influence of Bentham and of his friend James Mill, in morals, would have been greatly limited had it not been for the wider culture and far more considerable literary power of John Stuart Mill.

II PROSE PHILOSOPHY AND ECONOMICS. Utilitarianism and Positivism.

JOHN STUART MILL (1806-1873)

HIS LIFE AND WORK

JOHN STUART MILL (1806-1873) is often referred to as if he had been a mere logic-chopping machine like his father, James Mill. It was quite otherwise, with his father's clear intellectual power he combined a power of imagination and an emotional intensity alien to his parent. Yet it was not till nearly middle life that he realised the potentiality of his powers. Schooled by his father to check the imagination and repress emotions, he had done so, until he realised that he was starving his nature and stultifying his powers.

Valuable as Mill's writings are to the student of politics and economics, his Autobiography is far more valuable to the literary student and general reader. In it he lays bare the whole tragedy of a one-sided education. It is a notable human document that should be scanned by every young man and woman, and supplies us with a psychological key to the man's writings.

In some ways his bringing up was admirable. If James Mill was too grudging in allowing his youthful son books of amusement, there is much to be said for the literature of forceful personalities overcoming difficulties which he impressed upon him. The father's habit of discussing these books with his son, and obliging him to give some account of them himself, was undeniably helpful. Sometimes he tested John's receptiveness indirectly. He obliged him to impart his knowledge of Latin to a young sister, and to ensure accuracy the father tested the sister's knowledge from time to time. The boy disliked this method but admitted its utility.

"It was a part," says Mill. "I greatly disliked the more so, as I was held responsible for the lessons of my pupils, in almost as full a sense as for my own. I, however, derived from this discipline the great advantage of learning more thoroughly and retaining more lastingly the things which I was set to teach: perhaps, too, the practice it afforded in explaining difficulties to others may even at that age have been useful."

As a logician the father compelled the son to study logic at an early age, helped him to analyse a bad argument, discover a fallacy, use exact and definite in place of ambiguous terms. He taught him also the Socratic method, and the son became acquainted at an impressionable age with the Dialogues of Plato.

Poetry was little in James Mill's line, nor indeed did the son show any leaning for it, but Milton, Burns, and Cowper were tolerated. More serious than the comparative neglect of the poets was the neglect of concrete teaching and the exclusive reliance on abstract rules. For instance, in teaching elocution James Mill taught the boy by rules how to read, but never once thought of the superior utility of showing him by example how to read. Thus his education, with many good points about it, was too academic, too arid, too rigid, insufficient emphasis being placed on the human element that alone gives life.

The education was good in so far as it encouraged the student to think for himself, bad in so far as it narrowed the scope of his thinking and exaggerated the importance of logic. James Mill symbolised the strength and weakness of the anti-Romantic position. He was cautious in his judgments, cool in his opinions, temperate in his tastes, fair and just in his dealings with others. But the utter absence of enthusiasm in his nature nullified much of his power, and his lack of plasticity made him necessarily one-sided in his outlook. From the outset the son exhibited a warmer emotional nature. Early in life he was enamoured with the idea of becoming a reformer and improving the social conditions of his countrymen. Then, suddenly, at the age of twenty, an emotional crisis overtook him.

"I was in a dull state of nerves, such as everybody is occasionally liable to: unsusceptible to enjoyments or pleasurable excitement, one of those moods when what is pleasant at other times becomes insipid or indifferent: the state I should think in which converts to Methodism usually are when smitten by their first conviction of Sin." In this frame of mind he asked himself: "Suppose that all your objects in life were realised; that all the changes, and institutions, and opinions which you are looking forward to, could be completely effected at this very instant: would this be a great joy and happiness to you? And an irrefragable self-consciousness distinctly answered—No!"

"At this my heart sank within me: the whole foundation on which my life was constructed fell down. All my happiness was to have been found in the continual pursuit of this end. The end had ceased to charm and how could there ever again be any interest in the means. I seemed to have nothing left to live for. At first I hoped this feeling was due to a passing mood—but continued week after week, month after month."

In later life, when he became acquainted with Coleridge's work, the lines on Dejection struck him as exactly describing his case:

"A grief without a pang, void, dark and drear:
A drowsy, stifled, unimpassioned grief,
Which finds no natural outlet or relief,
In word, or sigh, or tear."

He turned to his favourite books for cheer, but found none. His "enthusiasm of humanity" had suddenly and inexplicably cooled down. To turn to his father was, he knew, futile. James Mill would have little patience with such feelings. He worked on, but without pleasure, at his literary work. It was a case of "Work without hope draws nectar in a sieve,

And hope without an object cannot live."

It was a remarkable state of mind for any son of the practical, stoical James Mill to undergo—and the more remarkable as it took no definite shape. Religion he had already settled in his own mind as a pious fiction: the only object in life worth pursuit, he had agreed with his father, was happiness—personal happiness in seeking the happiness of the greatest number. His mind had been occupied with literature—the reverse of emotional or depressing: his physique was healthy; his method of living healthy—or healthy at any rate for a literary man. And here he was almost as tempest-tossed as Carleyle in the Edinburgh days. Something was wanting in his life—What was it? He had sought happiness, but it had eluded him. And so, gradually, two effects upon his mind and character made themselves felt.

He still held that happiness was the test of all rules of conduct and the end of life. But he now thought this end was only to be attained by not making it the direct end. Those are only happy, he reflected, who have their minds fixed on some subject other than their own happiness, on the happiness of others, on the improvement of mankind, even on some art or pursuit, followed not as a means, but as itself an ideal end. Aiming thus at something else, they find happiness by the way. Ask yourself whether you are happy and you cease to be so. The only chance is to treat, not happiness but some end external to it, as the purpose of life. "Let your self-consciousness, your scrutiny, your self-interrogation exhaust themselves on that; and if otherwise fortunately circumstanced you will inhale happiness with the air you breathe, without dwelling on it, without either forestalling it in imagination or putting it to flight by fatal questioning." This theory now became the basis of his philosophy of life.

The other change which his opinions at this time underwent was, that he for the first time gave its proper place among the prime necessities of human well-being, to the internal culture of the individual. He attached less importance to the ordering of outward circumstances. He had learnt by experience that the passive susceptibilities needed to be cultivated as well as the active capacities, and required to be nourished and enriched as well as guided. And so, the cultivation of the emotions became one of the cardinal points in his ethical and philosophical creed. Hitherto, poetry and the fine arts had been practically neglected. Now he turned to them, with his imagination, hungering for inspiration and solace. Music had indeed furnished him some sort of pleasure in the past—but poetry, except as embodying some historical fact or ethical truth, seems to have bored him.

It is very characteristic of the youthful Mill, that much of the pleasure he derived from music was spoiled by the thought that the octave consists only of five tones and two semi tones which can be put together in only a limited number of ways, of which but a small proportion are beautiful. Most of them, he concluded, must have been already discovered. Here is a ludicrous example of the perils of devoting your mind exclusively to analytical work. The mind cannot passively enjoy without wishing to probe and analyse, and torture itself with the scientific basis for the enjoyment. Small wonder that he afterwards compared his anxiety at this time to the philosophers of Laputa, who feared lest the sun should be burnt up: though it reminds me rather of a child taking a rose to pieces, to discover where the fragrance came from.

But the real solace and comfort came not from music but from the poetry of Wordsworth.

Byron he had essayed, but Byron's passionate discontent had depressed rather than cheered. Manfred and Don Juan are not exhilarating companions, if you are suffering from spiritual depression.

The passage in which he described the effect of Wordsworth's poetry upon him—though well known—is so significant and remarkable, that it seems worth while quoting.

"These poems addressed themselves powerfully to one of the strongest of my pleasurable susceptibilities, the love of rural objects and natural scenery, to which I had been indebted not only for much of the pleasure of my life but quite recently for relief from one of my longest relapses into depression. In this power of rural beauty over me, there was a foundation laid for taking pleasure in Wordsworth's poetry, the more so, as his scenery lies mostly among mountains, which, owing to my early Pyrenean excursion, wore my ideal of natural beauty. But Wordsworth would never have had any great effect on me, if he had merely placed before me beautiful pictures of natural scenery. Scott does this still better than Wordsworth, and a very second-rate landscape does it more effectually than any poet. What made Wordsworth's poems a medicine for my state of mind was that they expressed, not mere outward beauty but state of feeling and of thought coloured by feeling under the excitement of beauty. They seemed to be the very culture of the feelings which I was in quest of. In them I seemed to draw from a source of inward joy, of sympathetic and imaginative pleasure, which could be shared in by all human beings; which had no connection with struggle or imperfection, but would be made richer by every improvement in the physical or social condition of mankind. From them I seemed to learn what would be the perennial sources of happiness when all the greater evils of life shall have been removed. And I felt myself at once better and happier as I came under their influence. I needed to be made to feel that there was real permanent happiness in tranquil meditation. Wordsworth taught me this not only without turning away from, but with a greatly increased interest in the common feelings and common destiny of human beings."

With the philosophy in the famous Intimations of Immortality Mill had no sympathy, but the imagery of this famous Ode thrilled him, and he was particularly drawn to the passages describing the first freshness of youthful enjoyment of life and the compensations of later life that come to take the place of this early exhilaration of feeling. It so exactly described his own experience and showed him a way out of his mental depression.

Shortly after this Mill came into contact with two enthusiastic disciples of Coleridge: F. D. Maurice and John Sterling (immortalised by Carlyle). Thence he was drawn into studying Coleridge. The comradeship of a mystic like Maurice did much to modify the hard and somewhat uncompromising rationalism of Mill. He approached religious problems now in a more sympathetic spirit, and although he could never understand what he thought to be the moral timidity of Maurice in trying to square all the great problems of faith with the Thirty-Nine Articles, the great driving power of some kind of religion was brought home to him, and he realised the inadequacy of the old utilitarianism in which he had been brought up.

The early writings of Carlyle interested him at this time, although James Mill saw in them nothing but "insane rhapsody", but though he approved of much that Carlyle said, he deprecated the manner in which it was said.

To his more analytical nature, the condition of society, though it seemed to him highly unsatisfactory, demanded not so much fierce denunciation as a calm investigation into the Source of the evil.

"Logic be hanged," was Carlyle's attitude—"let us have a drastic moral revolution. Let us be more serious minded, more responsive to the dictates of the conscience—let us reform ourselves, and then outward reformation will be of some value."

"Until Society is better constituted—grievances less pressing—inequalities less glaring—we cannot hope for any great reform of the individual"—that was Mill's attitude—"Little use to abuse a man for stealing—or lying—unless we make his circumstances such that the incentive is vastly diminished." And in this respect the social teaching of Dickens is much the same, "Feed before you moralise."

The weakness of Mill lay in expecting too much from external reform: of Carlyle in expecting too little.

Little surprise that neither Mill nor Carlyle—friendly though for some years they were—really appreciated one another. Of the two, Mill was the fairer—he was more receptive to other men's ideas, more just in his appraisement than Carlyle. And yet, there were several points in which they viewed life in the same way. John Mill responded in a surprising way to the imaginative fervour of mystics like Coleridge and Maurice, and Carlyle, with all his impatient contempt for Coleridge, was a mystic at heart himself.

But Mill, though his writings have little of the rich ethical inspiration of Carlyle, and are obviously inferior in literary art, was more satisfying as a political thinker. Carlyle, as we have seen, seemed to confuse liberty with licence—and in his passion for the strong man, was led into espousing the retrogressive elements in society, and carping at those reforms which would enable people at large to take a share in the government. Mill took an interest in all forward movements, and never flinched from an inconsistency or a change about, if he thought he had been in error.

As a political thinker Mill's reputation rests largely upon his sane little treatise On Liberty, and that store-house of common-sense, Representative Government.

As a social thinker Mill exhibits the cleavage with the old Benthamite individualism. Note for instance this passage:

"Our ideal of ultimate improvement woult far beyond democracy, and would class us decidedly under the general designation of socialists. While we repudiated with the greatest energy that tyranny of society over the individual which most socialistic systems are supposed to involve, we yet look forward to a time when society will no longer be divided into the idle and the industrious, when the rule that they who do not work shall not eat, will be applied not to paupers only, but impartially to all, when the division of the produce of labour, instead of depending, as in so great a degree it now does, on the accident of birth, will be made by concert on an acknowledged principle of justice. . . . The social problem of the future we considered to be, how to unite the greatest individual liberty of action with a common ownership in the raw material of the globe, and an equal participation of all in the benefits of combined labour."¹

No wonder that the dry bones of the old political economy were shaken by a mind that could speculate like this. That his treatise on the subject should include a chapter like that on the "Probable Future of the Labouring Classes", and that that treatise should also contain passages like the following:

"If the choice were to be made between communism with all its dangers, and the present state of society with all its sufferings and injustices, if the institution of private property necessarily carried with it as a consequence, that the produce of labour should be apportioned as we now see it, almost in an inverse ratio to the labour—the largest portions to those who have never worked at all, the next largest to those whose work is almost nominal, and so in a descending scale, the remuneration dwindling as the work grows harder and more disagreeable, until the most fatiguing and exhausting bodily labour cannot count with certainty on being able to earn even the necessities of life, if this or communism were the alternative, all the difficulties, great or small, of communism would be but as dust in the balance."²

Mill's sympathies with the working classes brought him into collision with the capitalist, but there was nothing of the violent demagogue in his nature. He is always the patient and just observer, trying to hold the scales impartially between the various classes of the community. There is little to differentiate Mill's economic views from the socialistic opinions of the more moderate reformer to-day. Essentially his position is that of the modern Collectivist. He looks to the State for bringing about the necessary reforms, though he thinks time is needed to bring about these reforms and deprecate revolution. Meanwhile he would advance gradually on the lines of State interference.

In his work as a social politician, he proved a man of high integrity and sincerity. Gladstone's tribute is worth recalling :

"We well know," said he, "Mr Mill's intellectual eminence before he entered Parliament. What his conduct there principally disclosed, at least to me, was his singular moral elevation. I remember now that at the time, more than twenty years back, I used familiarly to call him the Saint of Rationalism, a phrase roughly and partially expressing what I now mean. Of all the motives, stings and stimulants that reach men through their egoism in Parliament, no part could move or even touch him . . . For the sake of the House of Commons at large, I rejoiced in his advent, and deplored his disappearance. He did us all good. In whatever party, whatever form of opinion, I sorrowfully confess that such men are rare."

And we may add to this tribute—that Mill's memory will retain its freshness for the stimulus it gave to fair play, to a candid, open mind on every question great or small, to the fine sense of justice which dominated all his political writings, for his clear appreciation for the necessity of a patient, systematic inquiry into social grievances and weaknesses, finally, for that most excellent combination in a social reformer—a ready sympathy and shrewd common sense.

Among those who followed in the train of the Utilitarians are ALEXANDER BAIN (1818-1903) and HENRY SIDGWICK (1838-1900). Bain applied Utilitarian principles to psychology, as in his books The Senses and the Intellect and The Emotions and the Will. Sidgwick, Professor of Moral Philosophy at Cambridge, accepted the Utilitarian standpoint to a large extent, but in his case it was qualified by an admixture of Intuitionism. His was both an intensely religious and an intensely critical nature, and the result of this was that his intellectual position only inclined to the via media. To state a problem invariably suggested to Sidgwick the objections to that problem, and for a clear, judicial presentment of pros and cons in the domain of ethics or social politics, no one excelled him. If this quality of intellectual equipoise made Sidgwick a somewhat tame Oracle, it had the advantage of assuring the reader that he would always find in him a fair, just, and scrupulously honest thinker.

In the earlier half of the Victorian era, Utilitarianism, both in religion and political philosophy, proved a considerable and widespread influence. But with the turn of the mid-century its influence began to wane both in politics and religious speculation.

The effect of the doctrine of Evolution, elaborated by Spencer in history and applied more particularly by Darwin and Huxley to Biology and Ethics, affected contemporary thought to an extraordinary extent. One result of this was to give prominence to the theories of Comte, and Positivism (as his teaching is called) to some extent superseded Utilitarianism.

POSITIVISM

Positivism, like Utilitarianism, accepted the methods of science as the determining factor in speculative thought. Both confined their inquiries to the study of phenomena, excluding causes other than phenomenal. Both, therefore, ruled metaphysics out of court. Positivism differed from Utilitarianism in its attempt to provide a more constructive philosophy of life, not only to rationalise knowledge, but to formulate a religion that should prove an emotional substitute for Christianity. The weakness of Utilitarianism had been its aridity of imagination. John Stuart Mill himself felt this, and consequently strained Utilitarianism beyond the logical limits set down by its earlier exponents. Comte felt that man must have some object of love and reverence, and for the idea of a Deity he substituted the idea of Humanity regarded as a collective unity. This was to include all men and women, past, present, and to come, whose lives should have been consecrated to social service and to high moral endeavour. George Eliot well expressed the idea in her lines :

"O may I join the choir invisible
Of those immortal dead who live again
In minds made better by their presence : live
In pulses stirred to generosity,
In deeds of daring rectitude, in scorn
For miserable aims that end with self,
In thoughts sublime that pierce the night like stars,
And with their mild persistence urge man's search
To vaster issues."

Christianity had been a useful transition phase for the human race. Mankind had now outgrown it. The worship of humanity signified ideals in common with the spirits of all the great dead—whatever their creed. This would prove a dynamic spiritual power to act as the old religion had done, but in a spirit of greater charity and finer comprehensiveness.

An important aspect of Positivism is its social side, and its insistence on the organisation of labour, and in State interference for the good of society as a whole—not merely, as at present, for one section of society. Positivism has therefore been a factor in the development of modern Socialism.

Among English Comtists may be mentioned the names of RICHARD CONGREVE (1818-99), founder of the first Positivist community in London, of HARRIET MARTINEAU, of GEORGE HENRY LEWES, GEORGE ELIOT, and Mr FREDERIC HARRISON.

As a social leaven Positivism has exercised a considerable influence, but as a substitute for religion it has failed to appeal to the English people at large. The Utilitarian aim to work for the good of concrete Humanity was less unpoetical, but seemed more satisfactory to the practical Englishman, than to worship an abstract Humanity.

Speculative thought outside of orthodoxy was not, however, confined to Utilitarianism and Positivism. German philosophy, that had found its earlier exponents in Coleridge and his disciple, Thomas Hill Green, who, however, used it to bolster up orthodoxy, has in the brother Scots, JOHN and

EDWARD CAIRD (1820-98; 1835-1908), two more disinterested representatives

John Caird won notice first of all as a preacher; then, after a period of retirement and hard study, he devoted the rest of his life mainly to formulating an idealistic philosophy based on Hegel. Although he aimed thereby at giving fresh vitality to the Christianity of his day, he did so in a thoroughly broad and unpolitical spirit. Whether his Hegelianism accomplished all he hoped for it is another matter.

Edward Caird, also a Hegelian, exceeded his brother in intellectual vigour and in power of literary expression, and equally with him excelled in the simple sobriety with which he sought to combat the materialism of his day. His mind was more concrete than that of his brother, and his range of inquiry wider. Among his studies were the teaching of Kant, Comtism, and the characteristics of Greek thought. His attitude was conciliatory and interpretative, and for this reason he was distrusted by the extremists of all schools.

The Rationalistic tendency that was partially accepted by theologians of the Broad Church school received an even more generous welcome from Unitarians.

It is impracticable here to deal even briefly with the many distinguished thinkers of the extreme radical wing of religious thought, such as FRANCIS NEWMAN (1805-97), brother of the Cardinal, Professor DRUMMOND (1851-97), Professor CARPENTER, Professor UPTON. One name, and that the greatest, demands more than passing notice—that of JAMES MARTINEAU (1805-1900). Martineau's position among the philosophic writers of the Victorian era is so high that no excuse need be given for taking him as the best representative of the blend of Idealism and Rationalism that characterises the group as a whole.

JAMES MARTINEAU came of French Puritan stock, and was born at Norwich in 1805, his father was a business man of high integrity, but it was from his mother that he inherited his remarkable intellect. A delicate, refined, and highly-sensitive lad, he received a good education at Norwich Grammar School, and at Bristol under Dr Lant Carpenter. On leaving school he studied engineering, but mechanics did not satisfy his mental energies. Having realised his true vocation as a preacher and teacher, he spent five years in preparation for the Unitarian ministry. In 1828 he made a happy marriage, and after four years' ministerial work in Dublin accepted a call to Liverpool, where he ministered for twenty-five years. In London he added still further to his high reputation as a preacher at the Unitarian Chapel in Little Portland Street.

In 1840 Martineau was appointed to a lectureship at Manchester New College, on its removal to London in 1857 he was made Professor of Moral Philosophy, and from 1869-85 its Principal, thus, for forty-five years, his influence was both important and far-reaching. In 1893 he was greatly concerned at the removal of the college from London to Oxford, and in the course of an address upon the subject said: "In natures and types of thought cast in a different mould from ours Oxford may furnish all that can be desired. Not yet is it the true nursery for the children of the Puritans. The mountain flower transported to the hothouse or the southern garden-bed, is not more sure to fade than would the simple veracities and hardy vitality of devotion which it is ours to transmit, were they exposed to the enervating spiritual climate which is proposed for their development."

During Martineau's early manhood his sister Harriet's influence was considerable; both had intellectual gifts of a high order, and had therefore much in common. In later years they quarrelled over some earlier correspondence that at James' request his sister refused to destroy, and on the publication, in 1851, of her Letters on the Laws of Man's Social Nature, her brother's unfavourable criticism of this atheistic work considerably widened the breach, and they never became reconciled.

Martineau's physical activity was remarkable. He was a magnificent walker, and in his eightieth year thought nothing of a twenty-mile ramble. In his ninetieth year he had to be seriously cautioned for alighting from an omnibus in motion; and often complained that he was not able to run upstairs as he had been wont to do.

Between London and his beautiful country home in Scotland he spent the last few years of his life, and "fell on sleep" in London in 1900.

Martineau's principal works include Endeavours after a Christian Life (1843-47), Studies of Christianity (1858), Hours of Thought (1876-80), A Study of Spinoza (1882), Types of Ethical Theory (1885), A Study of Religion (1888), The Seat of Authority in Religion (1890), his last work on religious philosophy. A collection of articles ranging over many years, entitled Essays, Reviews, and Addresses, was published in four volumes in 1891.

In discussing the outlook of Martineau, it may be well to treat him first as a critic, in the second place as a mystic, and thirdly as an ethical teacher, where the two sides meet and mingle.

With the exception of Sidgwick, there has probably never been any writer at once so able and so fair-minded in the realms of philosophy and kindred subjects.

"I could never be moved," he declared, "to give an account of a book by pure antipathy any more than by monotonous assent. The whole interest of literary intercourse, like that of all quickening friendship, is conditional on crossing veins of likeness and unlikeness in thought and character, deepening the zest and sympathy by the need and the possibility of more. And true criticism seems to me the recorded struggle of the reader's mind into closer relations with an author whose intermittent bursts, helpful as they are, still do not enable him clearly to see his way."

These sentences should be written in letters of gold and hung up as illuminated texts in the study of every literary man. For they go to the very root of all large-minded criticism.

Let us illustrate the method of his criticism. Here is a passage from a paper on Carlyle. Having warmly praised the moral fervour of Sartor Resartus, he analyses the "hero-worship" tendency.

"We know," says Martineau, "that where he discovers, as in Mirabeau, great force of mind, he is ready to plead this as a bar to all objections against character, and to insist that in spite of appearance, such brightness of life must carry with it soundness of conscience. But will he turn the problem round and abide by it still? When he finds deep hid in the retreats of private life a goodness eminent and saintly, a moral clearness and force, great in their way as Mirabeau's keen-sightedness, will he accept the sign in evidence of mighty intellect? Will he say that, notwithstanding the meek and homely look, high genius must assuredly be there? For him as for many gifted and ungifted men, the force which will not be stopped by any restraint on its way to great achievement, the genius which claims to be its own law, and will confess nothing divinor than itself, have an irresistible fascination. His eye, overlooking the landscape of humanity, always runs up to the brilliant peaks of power, not, indeed, without a glance of love and pity into many a retreat of quiet goodness that lies beneath their shelter: but should the sudden lightning or the seasonal melting of the world's ice-barriers bring down a ruin on that green and feeble life, his voice, after one faint cry of pathos, joins in with the thunder and shouts with the triumph of the avalanche. Ever watching the strife of the great forces of the universe, he no doubt sides on the whole against the Titans with the gods, but if the Titans make a happy fling, and send home a mountain or two to the very beard of Zeus, he gets delighted with the game on any terms and cries 'Bravo!'

A truer picture of Carlyle's general attitude it would be hard to find.

In passing from Martineau the critic to Martineau the preacher, we realise that behind the fine gauzework of his dialectic is a white flame of powerful emotion, and it is a significant characteristic of the man that in the pulpit he should drop the weapons of the controversialist and don the robes of the mystic.

Martineau's sermons are devotional poems, breathing at one moment the spiritual fervour and beauty of Catholic piety, at the next the clear intellectual individualism of Protestant thought.

If they have any fault it is an undue compression of thought, and, however adapted for leisurely reading in the study, must have demanded the closest attention to the sermons when spoken in Liverpool or London. He was not a great preacher in the same way as were Newman and Robertson. His literary style is too heavily charged with ornament to give it that instantaneous power which the lucid periods of Newman invariably possessed. There was a lack of illustration and an avoidance of current problems which made them less attractive to the ordinary listener than the vigorous eloquence of Robertson. None the less, even when delivered—as many have testified—the sermons carried with them a singular charm and power.

Finally. What of Martineau as an ethical teacher?

In their religious philosophy both Newman and Martineau start from the same position—that in the sense of obligation or authority exercised by conscience we find the basis for our belief in a spiritual world. In Newman's case, however, this sense of conscience is too faint to be relied upon absolutely, it needs confirmation. The Being of God, he admits, is as certain to him as the certainty of his own existence. And yet his intellect remains dissatisfied with the mere assurance of God, or from arguments drawn from the general facts of human society and the course of history. And he sees in the vast accumulation of dogma and ritual provided by the Catholic Church a solution for his difficulties. Distrusting the unaided authority of his own mind, he leans for support on this infallible authority of the Church.

It is here that Martineau parts company with him. The conscience and intellect of man, he asserts, give the only reliable authority. Martineau sees in history the continual struggle between truth and error; the treasure is there, but it is in "earthen vessels," and he can see no literature nor institution into which errors both intellectual and moral have not crept.

There is no uncertainty in his verdict upon popular religion.

"A conclusion is forced upon me on which I cannot dwell without pain and dismay, i.e. that Christianity, as defined or understood in all the churches which formulate it, has been mainly evolved from what is transient and perishable in its sources, from what is unhistorical in its traditions, mythological in its traditions, and misapprehended in the oracles of its prophets. From the fable of Eden to the imagination of the last trumpet, the whole story of the divine order of the world is dislocated and deformed. The spreading alienation of the intellectual classes of European society from Christendom and the detention of the rest in their spiritual culture at a level not much above that of the Salvation Army, are social phenomena which ought to bring home a very solemn appeal to the conscience of stationary churches.

"For their long arrears of debt to the intelligence of mankind they ardently seek to make amends by elaborate beauty of ritual art. The apology soothes for a time, but it will not last for ever."

These are bold words, and might have been spoken by a Spencer or Huxley. But a few passages later we find this, the reverse of Spencerean:

"In the very constitution of the human soul there is provision for an immediate apprehension of God. But in the transient lights and shades of conscience we pass on, and 'know not who it is,' and not till we see in another the victory that shames our own defeat and are caught up by enthusiasm for some realised heroism or sanctity, do the authority of right and the beauty of holiness come home to us as an appeal literally divine. The train of the conspicuously righteous in their several degrees are for us the real angels that pass to and fro on the ladder that reaches from earth to heaven."

Here then we have a free critical spirit and a devotional spirit in juxtaposition. This is not the place for attempting to show how Martineau aims at justifying his position on intellectual grounds. I simply have to record the nature of his belief; to analyse the process by which he comes to his decision is obviously foreign to our purpose.

With Martineau, therefore, authority is internal, with Newman external. It is a mistake to urge as do certain sympathetic critics—i.e. Dr Mellor—that Martineau rejects entirely dogmatic systems. He does not do so. He realises that in the history of thought even the most rigid and uncompromising dogmas have contained germs of truth which have given them vitality. What he denies is their infallible authority. At the same time he imposes obviously upon the individual a far weightier responsibility than does Newman. We are not all so clear-sighted and fine-minded as Martineau. Some are dwellers in the valley, where mists and vapours sweep across the soul, obscuring the light that is never absent from the sun-flashed altitude of his mind, and one can understand why Catholicism or popular Protestantism found a far readier response with the majority of men than the Unitarian faith of Martineau.

This brings me to the central point of Martineau's individualism—his imperative sense of moral obligation.

It would be impossible with the space at my disposal to follow Martineau into the intricacies of his elaborate and powerful plea for moral intuition as opposed to the prudential hypothesis of Bentham, Mill, and Spence. I will try and state shortly the points at issue, for they lie at the very root of Martineau's philosophy.

"Conscience," urges Spencer, in effect, "is a reflection of prudence. Man ever acts with reference to ends which must always be in some form his pleasure, happiness, welfare."

Again:

"Happiness," exclaims John Stuart Mill, "is the sole end of human actions and the promotion of it the test by which to judge all human conduct. Those who desire virtue for its own sake, desire it either because the consciousness of it is a pleasure, or because the consciousness of being without it is a pain, or for both reasons united."

This philosophy is a highly persuasive one, and has much to support it. Against this view, Martineau, contends there are two criteria of judgment—prudence and conscience. Prudence is our regulative principle in deciding upon the utilities of conduct, conscience our light and guide in settling between conflicting motives. The former appoints for our welfare, the latter for our character. Take an illustration of the difference. Shall I buy a piece of land? This question I answer rightly enough by reference to my circumstances and tastes. Shall I right a wrong? Here I am called to another judgment. Not, 'Is a certain course wiser?' but, 'Is a certain course better?' The pleasure that ensues from a right action is the fruit of our choice, not its incentive. But if pleasure be the end of action, how explain acts of heroism and self-sacrifice or urge them on others? Because, says the Utilitarian, the happiness of the greatest number is what we should aim at. But why should a man incur some privation when it conflicts with the only good at whose disposal you place him?

"By what persuasion are you to move him to throw away his all? Either you must tell him that the high consciousness condensed into an hour of self-immolation will transcend all the possibilities he foregoes—in which case you bid him consult for himself under pretence of martyrdom for others—or else you must speak to him in quite another tone, must remind him that when he knows the true, when he sees the just, when he is haunted by the appeal for mercy, a constraint which he cannot question is put upon him to be their witness, however long their dolorous way, however agonising their Calvary. And, speaking thus, you altogether change your voice, and from casting up the account-book of greater happiness are caught and carried away into the hymn of all the prophets."¹

Seeing the unsatisfactory character of the old Utilitarianism, Herbert Spencer has explained this intuition that bids us sacrifice ourselves for others, as an inheritance transmitted from the habits of our forefathers, and formed in them by slow accumulation of personal experiments. Certainly, admits Martineau, through the evolutionary process the right becomes clearer and more dominating, but an impulse originally selfish or calculated can never evolve into one that is unselfish. The constraint of society, you urge, originates the intuition. Transport yourselves to the Diet of Worms, and to whom shall we look for the purer moral light? Not to the Emperor and the vast concourse of princes and nobles and Church dignitaries, but to the one defiant hero there.

I have indicated the line of thought to be found in Martineau's writing, from his Types of Ethical Theory, A Study of Religion, and A Seat of Authority in Religion.

To turn in conclusion to the colour of Martineau's philosophy. That it is not pessimistic is, I think, apparent. But in turning it optimistic some qualification is necessary.

No student of Martineau's writings can resist the feeling that a certain melancholy underlies them, it might have been seen, indeed, in the pensive wistfulness of his fine brow, it haunts his devotional books and dominates his ethical teaching. Some, as R. H. Hutton, have traced it to his "attenuated" Christian faith. They think they can discern it in the conflict between his scientific tendencies and fervent piety.

This theological explanation does not seem to me quite satisfactory, for something of the same melancholy can be traced in the personality and writings of both Newman and Maurice. Is it not due rather to a certain Puritan element, a distinctive lack of joyfulness—inseparable, perhaps, from men whose vocation it is to be "voices" crying in the wilderness?

A hardness of emotion, outside the range of religious experience, tended—I will not say to defective sympathies, but—to a want of flexibility in the sympathies.

In Maurice's case it was more an inability to adjust himself to the lighter amenities of life—a certain shyness and reserve. Martineau, however, if endowed with finer powers of adjustment to the ordinary duties and pleasures of everyday life, was by nature more of the scholar and recluse than Maurice, and less actively interested than he in social politics. With Maurice—the community, with Martineau—the individual.

Although Martineau's interests were wider than those of Wordsworth, yet there was in his nature the same stern, meditative rapture. Like Wordsworth's Michael.

"His mind was keen,
Intense and frugal, apt for all affairs,
And watchful more than ordinary men."

Deeply as he loved mystics like Tauler and Pascal, there was more of the logician than the mystic in his own habits of thought. Despite his sensitive response to the influences of the arts, he seemed to be always posting moral sentries at each emotional outlet of the soul, and regarded perhaps with too grudging an eye the ebb and flow of ordinary desires and regrets. But his was a great and beautiful soul. For intellectual foresight, and moral insight, our age has seen no finer spirit than James Martineau.

II. PROSE THE INFLUENCE OF SCIENCE IN THE LIFE AND THOUGHT OF THE DAY. Charles Lyell—Hugh Miller—Robert Chambers—Herbert Spencer—Charles Darwin—Thomas Huxley—W. K. Clifford—John Tyndall.

THE INFLUENCE OF SCIENCE IN THE LIFE AND THOUGHT OF THE DAY

THE adding of a new chapter to the history of science, as was done when Sir CHARLES LYELL (1797-1875) published his Principles of Geology (1830-33), had a far larger significance than at first appeared. Not only did it practically create Geology as a science, but it provided the first nail for the Rationalist to drive into the coffin of the older Evangelical theology. So much for Lyell's "testimony of the books." Yet although between the publication of this book and his Antiquity of Man (1863), Darwin had published the Origin of Species, and Spencer had applied the evolutionary theory to history and politics, Lyell never reconciled himself to this bold application of evolutionary doctrine, and was content with his more modest and cautious position of establishing the reign of law in geology, and by arguing from the present to the past, exhibiting the long history of the human race upon this planet.

HUGH MILLER (1802-56), though also a geologist, is better remembered for his pleasant Autobiography, since his scientific books are of no great value, and reactionary in tone, though showing keen observation and a genuine poetic feeling.

In his contemporary, ROBERT CHAMBERS (1802-71), we have the first scientific man to give us in a clear, straightforward form the evolutionary theory. Evolution was in the air. There are hints of it in Erasmus Darwin, traces of it in Lyell, and certainly it is implicit in Newman's Development of Christian Doctrine. But Chambers is the first to state it in his Vestiges of Creation (1844), and despite the scientific ignorance which aroused the wrath of Huxley, there is no gainsaying the fact that with agreeable clarity he certainly prepared the ground for Darwin and his successors by formulating a conception which he had not the knowledge adequately to support.

What Chambers applied to science HERBERT SPENCER took as the basis of a philosophy. He concentrated his entire life upon an intimate study of the facts relating to the evolution of organic life.

Born at Derby on April 27, 1820, Spencer's boyhood was a singularly unboyish one. His parents were intellectual dissenters of the old-fashioned, vigorous type, and the atmosphere of political, social, and religious discussion that surrounded the lad helped considerably in moulding a temperament of marked individuality. Far from robust, his early education was much neglected, and at seven years old he was unable to read.

In 1833, owing to the family's finances, his father's brother, the Rev. Thomas Spencer, perpetual curate of Hinton—a celebrated anti-corn-law agitator and Radical politician—generously undertook to carry on the boy's education. At first this did not prove a particularly happy arrangement. The pupil's self-confident manner and disregard of authority made an unfortunate impression upon a relative who naturally expected obedience, and the firm rule considered necessary to combat youthful self-will, with perhaps a certain amount of homesickness, decided the boy to run away to his home. He was, however, sent back, and soon settled down to his studies.

His uncle wished him to proceed to a university, but classics proving an insurmountable difficulty, the project was given up. For a while Spencer followed teaching as a profession, but this was soon relinquished for a post in the engineering department of the London and Birmingham Railway, and an incursion into journalism. In 1842 he had begun to write political articles for the Nonconformist, which soon brought him under public notice, and in 1848—two years after the railway crisis that had thrown him out of employment—he was offered and accepted the post of sub-editor to the Economist, a position he held for five years.

Spencer was gradually becoming more and more absorbed in the sociological and evolutionary problems occupying so prominent a place in the thought of the day, and in 1850 began a public exposition of his philosophy in the publication of Social Statics. His works have been translated into several European languages, as well as Japanese and Chinese.

Forty years of incessant toil resulted in many breakdowns. His early life, which had been nurtured in a religious atmosphere, drifted later into agnosticism. He never married, and although he had friends and acquaintances amongst the most notable men and women of the day, he preferred to live a quiet, lonely life, music and his daily visit to the Athenaeum Club being among the few enjoyments of his closing years. He died at Brighton on December 8, 1903.

Spencer's agnosticism was in effect a convenient lumber-room into which he would throw metaphysical problems for which he had no use. He started by formulating his principles of the Knowable and Unknowable. Having assailed the existence of the Unknowable, which he handed cheerfully over to the theologian, he proceeds with the Knowable. He deals with the differentiation of function in his Principles of Biology (1864-67), and with the characteristics of mind in his Principles of Psychology (1855), and the development of the social organism in his Principles of Sociology (1877-96). The ethical part of his scheme is formulated in the Principles of Ethics (1892-93).

Thus, broadly speaking, covers the various parts of his elaborate Synthetic Philosophy.

In his agnosticism it is clear that Spencer has derived to an extent from Hamilton and Mansel as to the unrecognisability of God, but there are important modifications. Force is constant in all phenomena that modern science reveals, and while it constantly modifies its method of expression, it remains unaltered. Light, heat, sound, motion, are but manifestations of this constant energy. Thus we can explain the Universe as a rhythmic alternation of attraction and repulsion, not only in what we call matter but in mental life as well. Integration and disintegration are universal laws. Spencer's Absolute Power, his Unknowable, therefore differs from the Unknowable of Hamilton and Mansel in the fact, paradoxical as it may sound, that it is much more Knowable.

Spencer's application and patent working out of the Evolutionary Doctrine in Social Politics is of high value, his application of it to the world of mental life is of more doubtful worth. Psychology is yet in its infancy, as the recent study of psychic phenomena certainly shows.

But if the Synthetic Philosophy has not that universal completeness which its author desired for it, its value to modern life, and to modern letters, has been great. The universality of law is a great conception, and the view of the State as a living organism, and not a mere mechanical contrivance, has done much to revolutionise history and political thought.

What Spencer did for science at large Darwin achieved in the narrower domain of physical science. In neither case did the central idea emanate from the individual in question, but it was Spencer who gave it so wide an application, and Darwin who furnished us with the wealth of illustrative material.

CHARLES ROBERT DARWIN was born at Shrewsbury in 1809, his mother was the daughter of Josiah Wedgwood, the celebrated potter, and his grandfather, Erasmus Darwin, the physician and poet, was also one of the pioneers of the theory of Evolution.

Educated at Shrewsbury, games and a mania for collecting specimens interested him more than the ordinary curriculum. At sixteen he proceeded to Edinburgh to study medicine, but here the wonders of sea life began to take prior claim to that of the dissecting-room. However, he went up to Christ's College, Cambridge, in 1828, and took a pass degree.

Medicine had now been definitely abandoned for natural history, and in 1851, when H.M.S. Beagle was being sent on a surveying expedition to South America, Darwin, at the instance of Professor Henslow, was invited by Captain Fitzroy to pursue his studies on this five years' cruise. "Thus," said Darwin, "was the most important event in my life, and has determined my whole career."

Although a martyr to sea-sickness during the whole voyage, the physical discomforts were more than counterbalanced by the joys of the naturalist, and his wonderful patience, and dogged, painstaking efforts in the cause of science are abundantly evident. One instance is recorded of an experiment, begun on December 20, 1842, for his book on Earth Worms (1881), that lasted for nearly thirty years.

In 1839 Darwin married his cousin, Miss Emma Wedgwood, and to her loving care of the delicate scientist the world at large is greatly indebted.

In 1881 Darwin's health failed rapidly—the death of his brother in the same year being a great blow. "I feel so worn," he wrote to a friend, "that I do not suppose I shall ever again give reviewers trouble." Hard at work to the last, he died of heart failure on April 19, 1882, and is buried in Westminster Abbey.

Beside Spencer, Darwin's literary equipment shines with especial brightness. Some of Spencer's slighter writings—as, for instance, his Introduction to Sociology—are certainly not without literary power; but on the whole you will not find literary grace in his writings. Darwin, on the other hand, is nearly always a delightful craftsman. His monograph on earth worms—an unpromising subject for literary art, is an astonishingly fascinating work; his Naturalist's Voyage round the World is full of entertaining matter, and making allowance for the condensed thought and argument in The Origin of Species (1859), and The Descent of Man (1871), few readers would vote them dull. They are stiff reading, but that is unavoidable, and quite another thing. The doctrine of Natural Selection as applied to plants and animals must claim Alfred Russel Wallace as its co-discoverer. Each, quite independently of the other, had come to the same conclusion, where they differ is in their application of this doctrine to the spiritual life of man.

But though Darwin had literary gifts, he was not a ready or a brilliant writer, and in the storm of controversy evoked by his book, an exponent who should at once be clear, concise, and incisive was called for. The opportunity produced the man—THOMAS HENRY HUXLEY—"Darwin's Bull Dog."

His Life

Born at Ealing on May 4, 1825, Huxley was the son of an assistant master at a semi-public school. His unhappy schooldays gave him little inclination for all-round study, he was, however, an omnivorous reader, and spent much time in working out mechanical problems, and had he been consulted, would have much preferred to be an engineer. At thirteen he was apprenticed to his brother-in-law, with a view to the profession of medicine. Four years later he entered Charing Cross Hospital. Research work now occupied a good deal of his time, and his important discovery of a membrane of the human hair hitherto unknown, and now called "Huxley's layer," was published in 1845

Having taken his degree, he accepted an appointment at the Naval Hospital, Haslar. Like Darwin, he had become an enthusiastic zoologist, and this brought him under the special notice of Sir John Richardson, the Arctic explorer, who in 1846 recommended him for the post of assistant surgeon on board H.M.S. Rattlesnake, about to proceed on a surveying expedition to Australia.

During this voyage Huxley made numerous observations, not as a collector—for, unlike Darwin, he cared little for the identification and naming of species—but because his interest lay, he tells us, in "the architectural and engineering part of the business, the working out of the wonderful unity of plan in the thousands and thousands of living constructions."

These investigations he forwarded to the Linnean Society, but heard nothing further of them. In 1849 a memoir of the Family of the Medusæ was, curiously enough, in the view of future episcopal opposition, communicated to the Royal Society by the Bishop of Norwich, the father of Captain Stanley of the Rattlesnake. In 1850 he returned to England on leave to work out the results of his voyage, he found that the memoir had been published by the Society, who made him a Fellow in 1851, and conferred their gold medal upon him the following year.

In 1854 Huxley was appointed to the Professorship of Natural History at the School of Mines, and the wonderful laboratory system inaugurated by him during his tenure of office has been almost universally adopted.

Huxley was as keenly interested in elementary education as in the highest branch of science. He served on the first London School Board in 1870, and considered that the ideal of its members should be "to make a ladder from the gutter to the university along which any child may climb."

From this period Huxley was a recognised specialist in biological science, and for many years no Royal Commission on fisheries or scientific education was complete without the "grave, black-browed, and fiercely earnest" face with its obstinate chin and fascinating smile.

A lifelong sufferer from dyspepsia, mental and physical depression attacked him in the 'seventies, and necessitated a tour in Egypt. In 1876 he was so far recovered as to visit America, and delivered in New York his famous lecture on the evolution of the horse. Honours were showered upon him, first by Aberdeen, then Cambridge and Oxford. In 1883 he received the coveted honour of being elected President of the Royal Society, which his health obliged him to relinquish in 1885, he then retired from public life, and settled at Eastbourne, where he died on June 29, 1895.

His Work

To mention Huxley to the orthodox theologian in the 'eighties of the last century was like the proverbial red rag to the bull, and it must be added that the suggestion of theology upon the redoubtable scientist had a similarly exciting effect. He was the Mephistopheles of the Evangelical home, and occupied a position similar to Lord Byron in the earlier years of the century.

He had adopted Darwin's theories, and pressed them into notice with polemical vigour in much the same way as Kingsley had treated Maurice. There is little doubt that Huxley was fond of a fight. He had a fine, lucid, literary style, a natural aptitude for dialectics, and an impatience with the cautious peradventures and hair-splitting logic dear to many theologians.

Huxley's combative powers are well brought out by his connection with the Metaphysical Society. This famous society was founded in 1869, ten years after The Origin of Species had set the religious world ablaze; and during the time a lively battle had been waged by the theologians on one side and those who accepted the Darwinian theory on the other. The Society had its origin in a conversation between Mr. James Knowles, editor of the Nineteenth Century, and some friends, including Tennyson. Tennyson suggested the formation of a society, the main object of which should be the submitting to searching criticism the intellectual foundations of the spreading Agnosticism. "Something must be done," he said, in his abrupt, emphatic manner, "to put down these Agnostics." At first it was proposed to confine the membership to thinkers of a Theistic stamp. Well-known men were sounded as to their willingness to join, among them Dr. Martineau. It was characteristic of Martineau's fearlessness that he declined to join a society so constituted.

"I feel," he wrote, "the deepest interest in these problems, and for the equal chance of gaining and giving light would gladly join in discussing them with Gnostics and Agnostics alike, but a society of Gnostics to put down Agnostics I cannot approve and would not join."

The scheme was accordingly altered to meet Martineau's wishes, and able Agnostics like Professor Tyndall and Huxley were invited and readily assented. That brilliant controversialist, Dr. W. G. Ward, played an active part in securing members, and certainly no society could boast of a more distinguished list of names. Of statesmen there were Mr. Gladstone, Lord Selborne, and the Duke of Argyll, prominent Churchmen, such as Dean Stanley and F. D. Maurice, Unitarians such as Martineau; Agnostic men of science like Tyndall and Huxley; Agnostic men of letters as John Morley and Leslie Stephen. For the rest, poets and journalists and lawyers of every shade of belief, such as Tennyson, Browning, Sir James Stephen, Sir Frederick Pollock, J. A. Froude, R. H. Hutton, Mark Pattison, Ruskin, Henry Sidgwick, Sir William Gill, Dr. Andrew Clark.

In an interesting article by Hutton in the Nineteenth Century, the writer says:

"At the meeting of the Metaphysical Society which was held on the 10th December 1872, Dr. Ward was to have read a paper on the question, 'Can Experience prove the Uniformity of Nature?' Middlemarch had been completed and published a few days previously. The Claimant was still staring it in the provinces in the interval between his first trial and his second. Thus the dinner itself was lively, though several of the more distinguished members did not enter till the hour for reading the paper had arrived. One might have heard Professor Huxley flashing out a sceptical defence of the use of the Bible in Board Schools at one end of the table, Mr Fitzjames Stephen's deep bass remarks on the Claimant's adroit use of his committal for perjury at another, and an eager discussion of the various merits of Lydgate and Rosamund at a third. Father Dalgairns, one of Dr Nowman's immediate followers, who left the English Church and entered the Oratory of St Philip Neri with him, a man of singular sweetness and openness of character, with something of a French type of playfulness in his expression, discoursed to me eloquently on the noble ethical character of George Eliot's novels, and the penetrating disbelief in all but human excellence by which they are pervaded. And as I listened to this eloquent exposition with one ear, the sound of Professor Tyndall's Irish voice descending on the proposal for a 'prayer-gauge' which had lately been made in the Contemporary Review for testing the efficacy of prayer on a selected hospital ward, captivated the other. Every thing alike spoke of the extraordinary fermentations of opinion in the society around us. Moral and intellectual yeast was as hard at work in the men at that table as in the period of the Renaissance itself.

"We thought at first," said Huxley, "that it would be a case of Kilkenny cats. Hats and coats would be left in the hall before the meeting, but there would be no wearers left after it was over to put them on again. Instead of this we came to love each other like brothers. We all expended so much charity, that had it been money we should have been bankrupt. Indeed," he adds, "the society died of too much love."

It certainly made for a more tolerant spirit among men of every shade of opinion. If it did not "put down" agnosticism, at any rate it defined more clearly the points at issue.

What are Huxley's leading characteristics?

These seem to be two—his passionate integrity and his idealism.

His Passionate Integrity

He admitted that theologians had recognised realities, though in strange forms. Predestination, original sin, and the primacy of Satan in this world were a good deal nearer the truth, he imagined, than the comfortable optimism culminating in Pope's doctrine, "Whatever is, is right."

On the death of his little son, to whom he had been devoted, Charles Kingsley, in his warm-hearted, generous way had written him a letter of sympathy, and pointed out incidentally some of the belief in which he would himself have found consolation. In his reply, Huxley said he had no a priori objection to the belief in immortality. But "it is totally without evidence," and the assertion that an unproved and unprovable doctrine is necessary to morality is altogether repugnant to him. "The most sacred act of a man's life is the assertion of a belief in truth." Men may call him whatever hard names they please, but they shall not call him a "liar." He would have endorsed George Eliot's saying that "the highest calling and election is to do without opium, and live through all our pain with conscious clear-eyed endurance."

On educational matters there is the same plain speaking out, though he touches here on less controversial ground. In one of his most stimulating essays on A Liberal Education he remarks, "To every one of us the world was once fresh and new as to Adam. And then, long before we were susceptible of any other mode of instruction, Nature took us in hand, and every minute of waking life brought its educational influence, shaping our actions into rough accordance with Nature's laws, so that we might not be ended entirely by too gross disobedience. . . . The question of compulsory education is settled so far as Nature is concerned. Her bill in that question was framed and passed long ago. But like all compulsory legislation, that of Nature is harsh and wasteful in its operation; Nature's discipline is not even a word and a blow, but the blow without the word. It is left to you to find out why your ears are boxed."

"The object of what we commonly called education—artificial education—is to make good these defects in Nature's methods. And a liberal education is an artificial education which has not only prepared a man to escape the great evils of disobedience to natural laws, but has trained him to appreciate and seize upon the rewards which Nature scatters with as free a hand as her penalties. That man, I think, has had a liberal education who has been so trained in youth that his body is the ready servant of his will, and does with ease and pleasure all the work that as a mechanism it is capable of, whose intellect is a clear, cold logic engine with all its parts of equal strength and in smooth working order, ready like a steam engine to be turned to any kind of work, and spin the gossamers as well as forge the anchors of the mind, whose mind is stored with a knowledge of the great and fundamental truths of Nature and of the laws of her operations, one who, no stunted ascetic, is full of life and fire, but whose passions are trained to come to heel by a vigorous will, the servant of a tender conscience, who has learned to love all beauty, whether of Nature or of Art, to hate all villainy, and to respect others as himself."

Sometimes his absolute sincerity led him to concede far more to the religious teacher than he was prepared to justify on logical grounds. But even at the risk of seeming inconsistent, he boldly gave expression to sentiments, instincts and promptings, that he felt were potent factors in moulding life, though they had no place in materialistic philosophy. Consequently, it is not accurate to call Huxley a materialist, for, as he says, "materialism and spiritualism are opposite poles of the same absurdity—the absurdity of assuming that we know anything about either spirit or matter."

This naturally leads us to his idealism, that so strongly colours his abstruse work as a thinker—Evolution and Ethics—which, as he explained, was an effort to put the Christian doctrine that Satan is the prince of this world on a scientific foundation.

Man, the animal, has worked his way to the headship of the sentient world, and has become the superb animal which he is by virtue of his success in the struggle for existence. The conditions having been of a certain order, man's organisation has adjusted itself to them better than that of his competitors in the cosmic strife. In the case of mankind, the self-assertion, the unscrupulous setting of all that can be grasped, the tenacious holding of all that can be kept, which constitutes the essence of the struggle for existence, have answered. In his successful progress throughout the savage state, man has been largely indebted to those qualities which he shares with the ape and the tiger, his exceptional physical organisation, his cunning, his sociability, his curiosity and his imitativeness; his ruthless and ferocious destructiveness when his anger is roused by opposition. But in proportion as men have passed from anarchy to social organisation, and in proportion as civilisation has grown in worth, these deeply ingrained serviceable qualities have become defects. "After the manner of successful persons," says Huxley, "civilised man would gladly kick down the ladder by which he has climbed." He would only be too pleased to see "the ape and the tiger die." But they decline to suit his convenience, and the unwelcome intrusion of these boon companions of his hot youth into the ranged existence of civil life, add pains and griefs unnumberable and immeasurably great to those which the cosmic process brings on the mere animal. In fact, civilised man brands all these ape and tiger promptings with the name of "sins", he punishes many of the acts which flow from them as crimes, and in extreme cases he does his best to put an end to the survival of the fittest of former days by axe and rope.

Now, whatever differences of opinion may exist among principles, there is a general consciousness that the ape and tiger methods of the struggle for existence are not reconcilable with sound ethical principles.

This is what he calls the "cosmic process." But social progress means a checking of "the cosmic process" at every stage and the substitution for it of another, which may be called "the ethical process," the end of which is, not the survival of those who may happen to be the fittest, in respect of the whole of the conditions which obtain, but of those who are ethically the best.

"The ethical process," adds Huxley in a note, "is, strictly speaking, also part of the general process of evolution." But how could ethical nature, as the offspring of cosmical nature, be at unity with it? Huxley meets the question thus:

Taking, as an example, the ground on which his house was built, he shows how the industry of man has converted a patch of wood-choked, economically unproductive soil into a fruitful garden, and how, if the skill and labour by which this has been done, are withdrawn, Nature, whose action never pauses, will reassert her sway and convert the place into a wilderness. The garden is a work of art, as is the house which stands in it, as is everything that man has produced. And the effect of all that he does is to oppose and for a time arrest the cosmic process, limiting the area of ceaseless struggle and competition. Applying this to human society, which at its origin was as much a product of organic necessity as that of the bees, "the ape and tiger" instincts are found dormant. It was based on selfishness. The race was to the swift and the battle to the strong. Even then, however, in the earliest grouping of a few families into clans, the blood tie, whose source is in the parent, engendered a sympathy which assured unity, and therefore some restraint on individual assertion. For sympathy is the germ plain of ethics. Knowledge, the only begetter of a wider sympathy, breaks down tribal divisions, and, with the obvious advantages which co-operation secures, enlarges the narrow borders of primitive altruism, limits the area of conflict, and mitigates the horrors of a state of warfare which, at the outset, was chronic. To this the state of mankind, after thousands of years of advance from the feral state, witnesses, since only in the minority of all who have ever lived has that advance been made, and even among these there needs small provocation to rouse the lightly-sleeping tiger. Hence, whenever self-restraint is practised, there is checking of the cosmic process of bitter struggle by the ethical, defined by Huxley as the "evolution of the feelings out of which the primitive bonds of human society are so largely forged into the organised and personified sympathy we call 'conscience'."

The "human" note in Huxley is more vibrant than in Spencer. No man can repress his emotional nature as sternly as he did, year after year, without suffering some disruption in his nature. Spencer's was naturally a kindly disposition, and he was not blind to the suffering of his fellow creatures or careless of their welfare. But his social sympathies suffered from a kind of chilly timidity, and he could not have said, as did Huxley:

"If I am to be remembered at all, I would rather it should be as 'a man who did his best to help the people' than by any other title."

"Men, my dear," he remarked in one of his delightful letters to a friend, "are very queer animals, a mixture of horse nervousness, ass stubbornness and camel malice, with an angel bobbing about unexpectedly like the apple in the posset, and when they can do exactly as they please are very hard to drive."

Some, I think, have seen only the "ass stubbornness" and "camel malice" in Thomas Henry Huxley. It is a mistake to overlook the "bobbing angel." Thus it was that gave fairness and sobriety to his exceptional power of controversy, that sweetened the fierce impatience of the man, that gave a fine elusiveness to his character—that did more than anything else to confute triumphantly those opponents who confound the agnostic position with that of the careless liver.

The same note of social fellowship that we find in Huxley accentuates the writings of another brilliant man of science, W. K. CLIFFORD (1845-1879), cut off unhappily before his power had matured.

Clifford, who was Professor of Mathematics and Mechanics at University College, London, lacked Huxley's splendid literary equipment, and he was a man of colder imagination. But he was equally sincere and outspoken, and there is a pathetic ring about his wistful adjuration, "Let us take hands and help, for to-day we are alive together."

Another scientist, very little inferior to Huxley as a man of letters, was JOHN TYNDALL (1820-1893), who accomplished admirable work in physics and chemistry. The friend of Tennyson, he was a man of considerable culture, and in his literary style had perhaps more grace, if less vigour and humour, than Huxley. But he had an equal gift of popularising scientific discoveries, and came scarcely less frequently than he into sharp collision with the theologian.

One feature that the literary student cannot help noticing in the writings of Tyndall and Huxley, is the unmistakable sympathy with the ethical ideals underlying religious thought. This is a feature that was to become more noticeable at the close of the century and in the early years of the New Era.

One of the most remarkable features of modern thought is the gradual crumbling away of the hard materialism of the mid-Victorian Era, called out, no doubt, by the equally hard theological dogmatism of the day. At the present time, theology has borrowed many of the methods of science, and science has certainly assumed some of the trappings of the theologian. The sharp opposition that once existed has utterly disappeared. Many lament the decay of dogmatism to-day. It is hard to appreciate their position. Dogmatism is inimical no less to the best interests of Science than to those of religion—for it is alien to the sincere and patient search for Truth, that should be the ideal of every thinker.

INTRODUCTION

It is not until we are well within the Victorian Era that the Romantic spirit exhibits itself unmistakably in historical literature, and we have the piquant sight of a fiction that is beginning under the influence of scientific pre-occupation to resemble history, and a history which in the hands of certain famous exponents begins to look very much like fiction.

Romanticism never leaves our letters high and dry again as had been the case after the Elizabethan age, but it ebbs and flows throughout the century, continually re-asserting itself—as in the case of the Pre-Raphaelite movement, just when it seemed to have receded into the distance.

In fiction we use the terms romance, realism, and romantic-realism, to explain certain specific influences. In history, let us speak of the Romantic, the Scientific, and the Philosophic historians. To the first, belong Macaulay and Froude, to the second, Stubbs and Gardiner, to the third, Buckle and Seeley.

The Romantic Historian differs from his cousin, the Historical Romancer, in this important respect: the latter uses historical material as a background for a picture that is in its main composition purely imaginary. The Romantic historian merely uses the arts of the storyteller to invest actual facts and actual scenes with colour and movement.

In both cases life is treated dramatically.

The object that the Romantic Historian has always in view is to make history a live and actual thing, to bridge the passage of years and convince the reader by making the past as familiar and vital as the present; and the supreme merit of this school lies in the interest which they have awakened in the general reader, to whom the past has been largely a dim and alien thing. The Scientific School, on the other hand, have argued that you cannot dramatise history without eking out scanty historical data with a great deal of guesswork. They have insisted, either categorically or inferentially, that in giving free play to the imagination it is fatally easy to sacrifice accuracy on the altar of dramatic effectiveness, and here, no doubt, they touch a real weakness in the Romantic standpoint. The attacks which Freeman made upon Froude give us in a nutshell the point of issue between the two methods, though Freeman himself has some of the grave defects for which he (not without justice) upbraided Froude.

A better representative of the Scientific School, with whom to oppose Froude, is Gardiner.

At the present juncture there is no necessity to inquire more closely into the credentials of the rival claimants. These will emerge necessarily into full light in the course of the present sketch. All I am concerned with here is to note the conflicting points of view.

The Romantic Historian says in effect:

"I am clothing the skeleton facts with flesh and blood, giving them corporal life."

To which his rival responds somewhat in this strain:

"But how do you know you're giving them the right life? What you call life seems largely an embodiment of your own personal predilection. Some of these skeletons are so imperfect, that the only justifiable thing is to leave them imperfect and content ourselves with describing the bones with their concomitant imperfections. History is not a shilling shocker; it is, or should be, a faithful investigation of actual facts. Give such facts as you find, and don't confound the function of the entertainer with the function of the seeker after truth."

There is, however, a difference between the point of view of the Scientific and the Philosophic Historian. The Scientific Historian agrees with his brother that the primary object of history is to deal with facts, but he disagrees in ruling out the imagination, postulating, however, that we need the imagination not to dramatise the facts but to elicit ideas from them, such as may prove of service to us at the present day

To put it briefly: the Romantic writer dramatizes the facts, the Scientific writer classifies the facts, the Philosophic writer generalises from the facts.

Each, properly considered, has his place and importance, though from a literary point of view the first and last are necessarily more interesting than the second

(A) HISTORY

I The Romantic School

The first figure of importance is THOMAS BABINGTON MACAULAY, born at Rothly Temple, Leicestershire, on 25th October 1800. He was the son of Zachary Macaulay, a wealthy merchant whose self-sacrifice in the support of anti-slavery involved his later years in serious financial difficulties. The child's early years were spent at Clapham, among the strict Evangelical sect of which his father was so faithful an adherent.

Of boyish disposition and studious habits, the lad appears to have been a voracious reader.

"The quantity of reading that Tom has poured in," wrote Hannah More to his father in 1814, "and the quantity of writing he has poured out, is astonishing, and he is as much amused with making a pat of butter as a poem."

From a private school, in 1818, the youth went up to Trinity College, Cambridge. Here he proved no mathematician, but was a fine classical scholar, wrote two prize poems, and was in 1824 elected to a fellowship.

In 1825 appeared the essay on Milton, his first contribution to the Edinburgh Review, a magazine with which he was connected for over thirty years. Literature had an almost irresistible attraction for him, but the failure of his father's business necessitated a more lucrative profession. He was called to the Bar in 1826, and two years later was appointed a Commissioner in Bankruptcy.

A sturdy upholder of the Whig party, he turned his attention to politics, and entered Parliament in 1830; and his speech on the Reform Bill in 1831 revealed his remarkable power as an orator; indeed, it was only necessary to remark that "Macaulay is up," to see members hurrying back to the chamber from all parts of the House.

While Macaulay was particularly interested in active political life, financial stress obliged him to accept a position in the Supreme Council of India: there he did thorough and conscientious work for four years (1834-1838), drafting the Indian Penal Code, and organising Indian education. On his return to England in 1839 he again entered Parliament, with a seat in the Cabinet as Secretary of State for War, till the fall of the Ministry in 1841. He now turned his leisure to good literary account by publishing the Lays of Ancient Rome (1842). Four years later, when the Whigs were again in office, Macaulay was appointed Paymaster-General of the Forces, but, failing to secure re-election in his Scots constituency in 1847—after supporting the Bill for a grant to the Roman Catholic College of Maynooth

—he gave up active politics and devoted himself more assiduously to literature, and the publication of the two first volumes of his History (1848), of which thirteen thousand were sold in four months. In 1852 the historian was again in Parliament as member for Edinburgh, and in 1857 was raised to the peerage—"For which," he remarked, "I never directly or indirectly solicited the honour."

In 1855 two further volumes of the History were published, but the fifth, that carried the record down to the time of William III, did not appear until two years after the author's death, and was edited by his sister. On December 28, 1859, in the midst of his work, he died suddenly, and is buried in the Poets' Corner in Westminster Abbey.

His Work

Macaulay's passion for reading, and his marvellously retentive memory, are the two characteristics that affect his work the most. Both as an historian and essayist his range of knowledge and faculty for vivid presentment are always in evidence. From the storehouse of his wide reading he seizes upon illustrations and analogies that give striking effect to his writings; and so persuasive is his pen that we do not realise for a while that the brilliant surface of his mind is somewhat hard and unyielding, and that his power of reflection is vastly inferior to his power of observation.

For this reason, superficially attractive as are a number of his critical essays, there is little genuine criticism in them. Certain points he sees clearly, and these he can visualise in his captivating if pontifical manner, but he has little sense of the complexity of his subject-matter. The personal equation is everything with Macaulay, and with the skill of the advocate he can make out an excellent case from his own point of view. But he is frankly a partisan, and there is little perspective in his work.

Yet if not a great critic, he is certainly, within definite limits, a great historian. For he has that rare quality, that power of vitalising the past, which compensates for so many minor defects. To put it simply, Macaulay made history something actual and alive, made us realise the organic connection between past and present. His historical portraits may be over-coloured at times; they are never insignificant. His historical judgments may be provocative; they are never negligible. He has made history attractive and real to thousands of readers, and this surely is no mean thing.

The man who has read carefully the History of England may absorb not a few exaggerated estimates and a distorted view of certain sides of eighteenth century life, but he has gained an insight into the general life of the time that is of the highest importance. Nowhere in historical literature is there a clearer or more masterly picture of social London in the days of the Restoration than may be found in the opening pages of the History. In the faculty for condensed narrative he has no superior.

"Whoever examines the maps of London which were published towards the close of the reign of Charles the Second will see that only the nucleus of the present capital then existed. The town did not, as now, fade by imperceptible degrees into the country. No long avenues of villas, embowered in hies and laburnums, extended from the great centre of wealth and civilisation almost to the boundaries of Middlesex and far into the heart of Kent and Surrey. In the east, no part of the immense line of warehouses and artificial lakes which now stretches from the Tower to Blackwall had even been projected. On the west, scarcely one of those stately piles of building which are inhabited by the noble and wealthy was in existence; and Chelsea, which is now peopled by more than forty thousand human beings, was a quiet country village with about a thousand inhabitants. On the north, cattle fed, and sportsmen wandered with dogs and guns over the site of the borough of Marylebone, and over far the greater part of the space now covered by the boroughs of Finsbury and of the Tower Hamlets. Islington was almost a solitude, and poets loved to contrast its silence and repose with the din and turmoil of the monster London. On the south the capital is now connected with its suburb by several bridges, not inferior in magnificence and solidity to the noblest works of the Cæsars. In 1685, a single line of irregular arches, overhung by piles of mean and crazy houses, and garished, after a fashion worthy of the naked harliumans of Dahomey, with scores of mouldering heads, impeded the navigation of the river . . .

"Of the metropolis, the City, properly so called, was the most important division. At the time of the Restoration it had been built, for the most part, of wood and plaster, the few bricks that were used were ill baked, the booths where goods were exposed to sale projected far into the streets, and were overhung by the upper stories. A few specimens of this architecture may still be seen in those districts which were not reached by the great fire. That fire had in a few days, covered a space of little less than a square mile, with the ruins of eighty-nine churches and of thirteen thousand houses. But the City had risen again with a celerity which had excited the admiration of neighbouring countries. Unfortunately the old lines of the streets had been to a great extent preserved, and those lines, originally traced in an age when even princesses performed their journeys on horseback, were often too narrow to allow wheeled carriages to pass each other with ease, and were therefore ill adapted for the residence of wealthy persons in an age when a coach and six was a fashionable luxury. The style of building was however, far superior to that of the City which had perished. The ordinary material was brick, of much better quality than had formerly been used. On the sites of the ancient parish churches had arisen a multitude of new domes, towers, and spires which bore the mark of the fertile genius of Wren. In every place, save one, the traces of the great devastation had been completely effaced. But the crowds of workmen, the scaffolds, and the masses of hewn stone were still to be seen where the noblest of Protestant temples was slowly rising on the ruins of the old Cathedral of St Paul."

Facts are, admittedly, invaluable things; but they can be made extremely dull things, and the accurate historian is often a desperately dull dog. Macaulay has been impugned for his inaccuracy, but his critics have not sufficiently realised how many of the facts with which his pages teem are accurate. No man who deals with a vast array of facts can help inaccuracy slipping in at times, but, putting aside errors due to lack of accessible information (as in Frederick the Great essay) for which he is not justly responsible, the wonder is not that he made mistakes, but that his mistakes were on the whole so few. Added to this, no man, with the exception of Froude, could make his facts so palatable and attractive as could Macaulay.

Within certain limits, then, Macaulay is a great historian. What are these limitations?

In the first place, Macaulay's imagination is panoramic, not stereoscopic. He can see with force and clearness the outlines of his pictures, but he rarely sees beyond the outline. He sees, but does not see through. His pages present us with a wondrously varied and extensive surface of life. But it is only surface. He has scarcely anything of Carlyle's insight into character—that quality which gives stereoscopic body to The French Revolution.

In the second place, there is no philosophy in Macaulay's outlook. The world for him is a brilliant pageant, and admittedly, the aspects of pageantry are worth noting. But it is something more than a pageant, it is a play of elemental forces kept in fitful leash by the hand of civilisation; and breaking away at times with dramatic violence. Macaulay saw nothing of this, or if he did, it had no interest for him. Carlyle's heroes are sometimes the reverse of estimable, but their dynamic quality we cannot gainsay. Macaulay's heroes are more estimable, but infinitely more commonplace. He could realise the merits of the doughty warrior—for these are obvious and theatrically imposing. But rude force of another kind—such as animated the Puritans—merely repelled him. He is essentially conventional and mediocre in his general estimate of men and women. He could see—as anyone can see—the absurdities and weaknesses of Boswell, he could not realise that the author of that splendid biography was something much more than a tedious fool.

But these defects are helps rather than hindrances to him as historian of the reign of William and Mary, for here are no volcanic upheavals, no great disturbing personalities, the men and the time suit Macaulay's temperament and bring out his strongest points, for he could make ordinary people and ordinary matters interesting and attractive.

During Macaulay's life, a more scientific attitude to history had been growing up. Macaulay himself, though not unimproved by the development of modern science, exhibits its influence in one direction only, in the ease with which he marshalled his details. Unphilosophical by temperament, he never thought of applying scientific laws to history. But those historians of the ancient world, Thirlwall, Grote, and Thomas Arnold, all united more or less by utilitarian ethics, make a notable attempt in this direction.

CONNOR THIRLWALL (1797-1875) was a great scholar, whose History of Greece (1835-47) was a solid column of learning, crowned by the lily-work of an attractive style. It was fair-minded, also more judicial, though less persuasive, than Grote's History, that so soon superseded it.

GEORGE GROTE (1794-1871) devoted many more years to his subject than Thirlwall, and this more than balances the greater intellectual power of Thirlwall.

The great feature of Grote's History is the almost idolatrous attitude towards the Athenian democracy.

THOMAS ARNOLD is certainly the most interesting personality of the three. Born in 1795, the son of an officer of Inland Revenue, he was educated at Winchester and Oxford. After his ordination, in 1818, he settled at Laleham-on-Thames, and entered upon his career as an educationist by preparing young men for the University. In 1827 he was appointed head-master of Rugby School, where for fifteen years his learning, force of character, and powerful influence not only raised the tone and educational reputation of his own school, but exercised a remarkable reformation over the public school life of England. The fearless expression of his own religious and political opinions involved him in many controversies. "He was an ardent lover of truth," says a contemporary, "without a grain of vanity or conceit."

Appointed Professor of Modern History at Oxford in 1841, he died suddenly the following year, and his History of Rome, upon which he was at work at the time of his death, was left unfinished.

History, in Arnold's view, was a good method of teaching sound moral principles. Its picturesque appeal, even its intellectual inspiration, he thought of less account than its ethical values. For he held to the organic unity of history, assuming that what helped men in the past would help them in the present, and that life is one and the same for practical purposes in all ages. But he laid far less emphasis than Carlyle on the personality of its actors.

Arnold's most important work is his History of Rome (1835-1843). History, however, was in a transitional state during these years; so, whereas Macaulay survives by his recreative imagination, men like Arnold, Thirlwall, and Grote, whose literary power was inferior to their learning, have been superseded. A closer study of early institutions, anthropological, philological, and archaeological researches, has resulted in the ear-marking of all these writers as old-fashioned. None the less these men played an important part in the more scientific development of history, and were not without their influence (Arnold especially) on the modern school.

The next writer of note is GEORGE FINLAY (1799-1875), whose elaborate and detailed History of Greece from its conquest by the Romans to the present time, was published in parts between 1843 and 1861.

Finlay's strength lay in his intimate knowledge of the people about whom he wrote. He was an indifferent man of letters, but he was a man not merely of great learning but of sagacious practicality.

What Finlay did for the Greeks, HENRY HART MILMAN (1791-1868) did for the Jews. His History of the Jews (1829) produced a great stir in many ecclesiastical dovecotes, and in those days the historical treatment of Biblical subject matter was looked upon as desperately wicked. Milman was discouraged, but refused to bow his head meekly to the storm, and adhered strictly to his point of view—that the fact that the Jews were a "chosen race" did not put them outside the ordinary methods of historical research.

Milman's significance lay in the pioneer work he accomplished (though unwittingly) for the rationalistic spirit in biblical criticism. He was quite orthodox himself, and did not pursue his own researches to their logical conclusions, though he enabled others to do so.

A more detailed and specialised investigation of historical phenomena marks all these writers, for a successor to Macaulay in literary power we must turn to JAMES ANTHONY FROUDE, third son of the Archdeacon of Tetnes, Devonshire, where he was born in 1818.

Educated at Westminster School and Oriel College, Oxford, he came under the influence of Newman in 1836: Froude's elder brother, Hurrell, was also a pronounced Tractarian. Having given some slight assistance to Newman in preparing the Lives of the Saints, Froude found it difficult to bring his own thought into line with Newman's, and speedily severed the connection. He took deacon's orders in 1844, but, gradually becoming more and more unorthodox, never proceeded to the priesthood. At length he discarded all ecclesiasticism, and became a follower of Carlyle and the German school of philosophers.

In 1848 he published (anonymously) The Nemesis of Faith, thereby arousing a storm of indignation in clerical circles. The book was publicly burned in the hall of Exeter College, of which Froude was a fellow, and resignation was inevitable.

This candid avowal of his opinions was to cost him yet dearer. His father withdrew his allowance, and a recent appointment as head master of Hobart Grammar School was cancelled. But for the anonymous gift of £200, through Professor Max Muller, Froude would have been in sore straits.

He now turned to literature as a profession, and became a regular contributor to the Westminster Review and Fraser's Magazine—the latter he edited from 1860-1874. The essays thus published were issued later as Short Studies on Great Subjects. The famous History, in twelve volumes, appeared at intervals between 1856 and 1870, after which Froude lectured in America, travelled as a Government Commissioner in Africa, and visited Australia and the West Indies—all of which experiences he used for literary purposes.

For forty-five years, Froude was the close friend and disciple of Carlyle, and at the latter's death in 1881, Froude found himself sole literary executor. He at once set to work and published the four volumes that provoked so much controversy.

Elected Lord Rector of St. Andrew's University in 1869, in 1884 Edinburgh conferred upon him their degree of LL.D., and in 1892—such is the march of tolerance—Froude was appointed Professor of Modern History at Oxford.

He died in 1894.

Froude is undoubtedly the most brilliant of the Romantic school of historians. It is this literary brilliance combined with his great unreliability in matters of fact, that made him the centre round which raged the battle between the picturesque and the scientific historian. A careful examination of Froude's writings, including his famous Life of Carlyle, must bring us to admit that his inaccuracies were both many and serious, but these inaccuracies were due to a constitutional obliqueness of vision.

rather than to any deliberate effort to suppress the truth. In fact, Froude's unreliability seems to be due to the free expression he gave to his own personal feelings; the likes and dislikes he never tried to suppress, and instinctively he manipulated his material to suit his own temperamental views.

But it is a mistake to suppose, as some of his adverse critics have done, that his errors were due to negligence, or to slovenly research. He was a man of laborious scholarship, and his exhaustive examinations at Hatfield House and the Record Office when writing his History of England, opened up an entirely new road in historical research.

As against his distortions must be placed the fact that by his fine literary faculties he has given us some wonderful pen-pictures of Tudor times, and some extraordinarily vital portraits that add materially to our appreciation of the life of the Elizabethan age. His historical writings cannot be explained away merely as attractive yet misleading romances.

Froude made the Elizabethan period live; and if the circumstances surrounding the Spanish Armada were not all he suggests, no one has pictured for us more powerfully the fact of the invasion, if Henry's character is overcoloured and one-sided, yet the man is alive, not a mere name. Like Macaulay, Froude can hold by sheer force of imaginative power, while he has a philosophic breadth quite beyond the reach of Macaulay.

If we turn to the study of Carlyle, the merits and defects of his method will be more clearly revealed. Froude had exceptional insight into character, and it never occurred to him to minimise the faults and failings of the man to whom he had been deeply attached. With his dramatic sense he felt the effectiveness to be gained by strong contrasts of light and shade; and so with all the art at his command he drew for us a figure of arresting interest that fell far short of the man worshipped by so many Victorians. The worshipper was horrified and indignant, even were it true, he argued, it said little for the loyalty of a man who had stood in such close relationship as Froude did to Carlyle. They did not understand that the arrogance and dogmatism that Froude had so relentlessly lusted were qualities that fascinated the unassuming and sceptical biographer.

He could love and admire his old master despite these qualities, and he was amazed that others should be unable to do so. In its broad outlines, I do not see that the character of Carlyle has been materially affected by the evidence brought forward by friends who indignantly impugned the justice of the picture. No doubt, with the unconscious cruelty of the literary artist, he has given too much prominence to qualities that cannot be controverted but were counterbalanced by other traits, for Carlyle was an astoundingly complex and contradictory personality. None the less there is no reason to dispute Froude's sincerity; and his biographical methods are at any rate preferable to those official writers of great men who, by carefully eliminating and suppressing all the "knots" and little infirmities in the subjects of their biographies, produce colourless and lifeless portraits.

Carlyle does live in Froude's pages, just as his Henry VIII or his Erasmus lives. We may dislike the Carlyle he drew (though many find the picture by no means unlovable), but we all feel he has drawn a giant and not a pigmy. Henry VIII was scarcely such good company as Froude would have us think, but he was no lay figure; he is a dominant and masterful man. As indeed he must have been to achieve the work he did.

Passing to less controversial matters, none could dispute the high beauty of Froude's literary style. It is at once strong and restrained, simple and sumptuous. His periods glow with a subdued and chastened richness.

In place of the showy but metallic brilliance of Macaulay, we have a delicately plastic and exquisitely modulated style. It is less mannered than Arnold's, less artificial than De Quincey's, less florid than Ruskin's. Its perfect taste and sure art may be gathered from the fact that we are rarely made conscious of it. It arises so naturally out of the subject-matter that we do not realise at first that art has gone to the making of it. Nowhere is it seen to better advantage than in the Short Studies of Great Subjects.

Whatever views we may hold of Froude as an historian, he is certainly among the greatest writers of English in our language.

THE BOOK OF JOB

Most of us, at one time or other of our lives, have known something of love—of that only pure love in which no self is left remaining. We have loved as children, we have loved as lovers, some of us have learnt to love a cause, a faith, a country, and what love would that be which existed only with a prudent view to after interests. Surely there is a love which exults in the power of self-abandonment, and can glory in the privilege of suffering for what is good. Que mon nom soit flétri, pourvu que la France soit libre, said Danton, and those wild patriots who had trampled into scorn the faith in an immortal life in which they would be rewarded for what they were suffering, went to their graves as beds, for the dream of a people's liberty. Shall we, who would be thought reasonable men, love the living God with less heart than these poor men loved their phantom? Justice is done, the balance is not deranged. It only seems deranged, as long as we have not learnt to serve without looking to be paid for it.

Such is the theory of life which is to be found in the Book of Job; a faith which has flashed up in all times and all lands, wherever noble men were to be found, and which passed in Christianity into the acknowledged creed of half the world. The cross was the new symbol, the divine sufferer the great example, and mankind answered to the call, because the appeal was not to what was poor and selfish in them, but to whatever of best and bravest was in their nature. The law of reward and punishment was superseded by the law of love. "Thou shalt love God and thou shalt love man", and that was not love—men know it once—which was bought by the prospect of reward. Times are changed with us now. Thou shalt love God and thou shalt love man, in the hands of a poor Paley, are found to mean no more than, Thou shalt love thyself after an enlightened manner. And the same base tone has saturated not only our common feelings, but our Christian theologians and our Antichristian philosophies. A prudent regard to our future interests, an abstinence from present unlawful pleasures, because they will entail the loss of greater pleasure by-and-by or perhaps be paid for with pain,—this is called virtue now, and the belief that such beings as men can be influenced by any feelings nobler or better, is smiled at as the dream of enthusiasts whose hearts have outrun their understandings. Indeed, he were but a poor lover whose devotion to his mistress lay resting on the feeling that a marriage with her would conduce to his own comforts. That were a poor patriot who served his country for the hire which his country would give to him. And we should think but poorly of a son who thus addressed his earthly father "Father, on whom my fortunes depend, teach me to do what pleases thee, that I, obeying thee in all things, may obtain those good things which thou hast promised to give to thy obedient children." If any of us who have lived in so poor a faith venture, by-and-by, to put in our claims, Satan will be likely to say of us (with better reason than he did of Job), "Did they serve God for naught, then? Take their reward from them, and they will curse Him to His face." If Christianity had never borne itself more loftily than this, do we suppose that those fierce Norsemen who had learnt, in the fiery war-songs of the Edda, of what stuff the hearts of heroes are composed, would have fashioned their sword-hilts into crosses, and themselves into a crusading chivalry? Let us not dishonour our great fathers with the dream of it. The Christians, like the Stoics and Epicureans, would have lived their little day among the ignoble sects of an effete civilisation, and would have passed off and been heard of no more. It was in another spirit that those first preachers of righteousness went out upon their warfare with evil. They preached, not on lightened prudence, but purity, justice, goodness holding out no promises in this world except of suffering as their great Master had suffered, and rejoicing that they were counted worthy to suffer for His sake. And that crown of glory which they did believe to await them in a life beyond the grave, was no enjoyment of what they had surrendered in life, was not enjoyment at all in any sense which human thought or language or languages can attach to the words, as little like it as the crown of love is like it which the true lover looks for when at last he obtains his mistress. It was to be with Christ to love themselves in Him.

How all this nobleness ebbed away, and Christianity became what we know it, we are partially beginning to see. The living spirit organised for itself a body of perishable flesh, and not only the real gains of real experience, but more conjectural hypotheses, current at the day for the solution of unexplained phenomena, became formulae and articles of faith, again, as before, the living and the dead were bound together and the seeds of decay were already planted on the birth of a constructed polity.¹

An even more attractive personality is JOHN RICHARD GREEN (1837-1883), and in so far as history touches literature he has no peer save Froude and Macaulay, no rival save Froude. He did not specialise to the extent that scientific historians like Stubbs, Creighton, and Gardiner had done, not for lack of intellectual equipment, but because the purpose he had in view necessitated his utilising much of the material garnered by other men, in order that he might present a general conspectus of our history. But that he had much of the equipment of the scientific historian may be seen by the two books published after his death—The Making of England and The Conquest of England.

Yet Green's real strength did not lie in this specialised work, for which sounder health and more extensive learning than he could boast of were required. His strength lay in his clear vision of the tidal aspects of the English history. The very title "History of the English People" shows where he lays the emphasis.

In the elder popular historians, kings, queens, and governments had loomed so largely as to dwarf everything else. To Green, the springs of our national life lay in the history of the people at large. With his sensitive and poetic imagination he makes everything live: a date, a fragmentary record, a dull city charter, he touches them with the same vital significance which Ruskin accorded to economic facts.

He is akin to Macaulay and Froude in his faculty for dramatising history, though he is more humanistic than either of them. With an imagination so alert, a literary sense so acute, it may well be that some of his pictures do more credit to his artistic susceptibilities than to the chronicler's judicial impartiality. But this, after all, is the price we must always pay for an insistent personal equation, and, like both Froude and Macaulay, he has the supreme merit of making his pages live. The general reader is more indebted to Green than to any other man for a quick insight into the history of his own country.

THE NEW LEARNING

While England cowered before the horrors of civil war, or slumbered beneath the apathetic rule of Henry the Seventh, the world around her was passing through changes more momentous than any it had witnessed since the victory of Christianity and the fall of the Roman Empire. Its physical bounds were suddenly enlarged. The discoveries of Copernicus revealed to man the secret of the universe. The daring of the Portuguese mariners doubled the Cape of Good Hope and anchored their merchant fleets in the harbours of India. Columbus crossed the untravelled ocean to add a New World to the Old. Sebastian Cabot starting from the port of Bristol, threaded his way among the icebergs of Labrador. This sudden contact with new lands, new faiths, new races of men quickened the slumbering intelligence of Europe into a strange curiosity. The first book of voyages that told of the Western World, the travels of Amerigo Vesputi, were at the time of More's Utopia, "in everybody's hands." The Utopia itself, in its range of speculation on every subject of human thought and action, tells us how roughly and utterly the narrowness and limitation of the Middle Ages had been broken up. The capture of Constantinople by the Turks, and the flight of its Greek scholars to the shores of Italy, opened anew the science and literature of the older world at the very hour when the intellectual energy of the Middle Ages had sunk into exhaustion. Not a single book of any real value, save those of Sir John Fortescue and Philippe de Commines, was produced north of the Alps during the fifteenth century. In England, as we have seen, literature had reached its lowest ebb. It was at this moment that the exiled Greek scholars were welcomed in Italy, and that Florence, so long the home of freedom and of art, became the home of an intellectual Revival. The poetry of Homer, the drama of Sophocles, the philosophy of Aristotle and of Plato woke again to life beneath the shadow of the mighty dome with which Brunelleschi had just crowned the City by the Arno. All the restless energy which Florence had so long thrown into the cause of liberty she turned now that her liberty was left from her, into the cause of letters. The galleries of her merchants brought back manuscripts from the East as the most precious portions of their freight. In the palaces of her nobles fragments of classic sculpture ranged themselves beneath the frescoes of Ghirlandajo. The recovery of a treatise of Cicero or a tract of Sallust from the dust of a monastic library was welcomed by the group of statesmen and artists who gathered in the Rucellai gardens with a thrill of enthusiasm. Crowds of foreign scholars soon flocked over the Alps to learn

Greek, the key of the new knowledge, from the Florentine teachers. Grocyn, a fellow of New College, was perhaps the first Englishman who studied under the Greek exile, Chalcondylas, and the Greek lectures which he delivered in Oxford on his return mark the opening of a new period in our history. Physical, as well as literary, activity awoke with the re-discovery of the teachers of Greece, and the continuous progress of English science may be dated from the day when Linacre, another Oxford student, returned from the lectures of the Florentine Politian to revive the older tradition of medicine by his translation of Galen. The awakening of a rational Christianity, whether in England or in the Teutonic world at large, begins with the Florentine studies of John Colet.¹

II The Scientific School

Passing to Froude's contemporary and bitter opponent, EDWARD AUGUSTUS FREEMAN (1823-1892), we pass from the Romantic school of historians to the Scientific.

It is curious that the man who should so unsparingly have attacked the partisan Froude, should himself have been an even more violent partisan as an historian. By temperament he was equally as idiosyncratic as Froude, only his partisanship attached itself to institutions, not to individuals. Where he differs from Froude in method is that he never attempts to use historical data as pigments for his pictures: he merely retails the facts, and tells the reader to limn the picture for himself. He was a virile and sincere man, but he might well have borrowed something of Arnold's "sweet reasonableness." To differ from him on some points of history was to write yourself down at once as among the lost and damned. His best work was his History of the Norman Conquest, where he works out in considerable detail his favourite thesis about the triumphant persistency of the Teutonic element.

Freeman did good work in pointing out with such wealth of illustration the important work accomplished by the Saxon, but did scant justice to the Celtic and Latin influences. Indeed, Teutonism is quite as much an obsession to Freeman as Henry VIII's heroic qualities were to Froude.

Freeman did splendid spade-work in the accumulation of historical data, but he had neither the critical sagacity nor the visualising power of the great historian. His style is cumbrous and unattractive.

A doughtier representative of the scientific school is found in WILLIAM STUBBS (1825-1901), who became Bishop of Chester in 1884. His Constitutional History of England (1874-1878), in three volumes, which carried its subject to the close of the Middle Ages, is a storehouse of erudition, and especially in the later volumes throws fresh and valuable sidelights upon a tangled period of our history. In tracing the gradual development of town life, in discussing the relation between national and international politics; in actualising the power of the Mediæval Church, Stubbs has no peer.

His admirable pendants to the Constitutional History are the Select Charters (1870). From the literary point of view the defect of the history lies in its surplusage of detail. The dry bones are of scientific value, but he rarely troubles to make them live. He is far more reliable in his personal judgment than Froude, but much of this virtue is rendered nugatory because he did not vitalise his facts.

Freeman could not do so. Stubbs shows in his Lectures on the Study of Mediæval and Modern History that he can when he wishes. Here the humour, of which hitherto he had been too sparing, is used with excellent effect. His style is lighter and more plastic, and there is a greater wealth of generalisation.

It is not given to many historians to treat with such an agreeable, light touch so unpromising a subject as Taxation under Henry VII.

"In the session of 1487 Morton preached on 'Cease to do evil, learn to do well' a wonderful sermon in four heads, subdivided each into three arguments, illustrated from Cicero and other gentle philosophers, the moral of which was the vote of two tenths and fifteenth, and a poll-tax upon aliens, payable at the next Easter. In 1489 the text was 'The eyes of the Lord are over the righteous'; the sermon a miracle of subdivision; the demand a lump sum of £100,000."

Or to so suggestively discern the personality of the king:

"Why should a king with a good character and a romantic career subside into a historical foggy? Look closely at Frederick III, the splendid old gipsy, in name governor of the world, ever august, and increaser of the empire, yet owning no more territory than an English alderman sitting in his study elaborating a horoscope with destiny of universal dominion for his grandchildren unborn, inventing the motto of empire for an Austria that was yet in embryo, honourable, perhaps, and careless about selfish gains, but a dreamer, about whom the strange thing is that so many of his dreams came true. Look at Maximilian, the most delightfully unprincipled hero of the age of transition, always in every feast and every fray, always wanting money and selling himself for promises, and never getting the money and never keeping his engagements, a good deal of the ruck and a good deal of the knight-errant, to himself a portentous politician, a reformer of Church and empire, yet willing to set Church and empire to sale, and himself to retire from the Caesarship, to accept the chair of St Peter, and provide before his death for his own canonisation, yet with all that the founder of one of the great powers of modern history, grandfather of Charles V, and contriver of the scheme which placed half Christendom under his grandson's sceptre. I have often thought of Maximilian in connection with Henry VII, all the balance of real goodness, what measure there is of politic honesty, purity of life, reality of character, straightforwardness in religion, intelligent appreciation of his people's needs, every moral consideration is in favour of Henry Tudor, yet we like Maximilian better. With all his undoubted faults, his absurd dishonesty which did more harm to himself than to anyone else, his grotesque pretensions, the astounding inconsistency between his undertakings and his fulfilments, there is an attractiveness about him which there is not about Henry VII."

Had Stubbs used this style more generously in his earlier works they would be important pieces of literature in place of being merely first-class book of reference.

As an authority on the Ecclesiasticism of the Middle Ages, Stubbs however has been seriously called in question by F. W. Maitland, a scholar who specialised in the legal aspects of history and whose indictment of Stubbs on certain points of Church law has never been seriously combated by Stubbs' supporters.

A man of remarkable personality was MANDELL CREIGHTON (1843-1901), Bishop of London from 1896.

Bishop Creighton succeeded with disconcerting success in eliminating all that was attractive in his nature from his writings. He was more interesting as a lecturer than as a writer, for flashes of wit and parenthetical wisdom would often light up his spoken discourses. But both in his magnum opus—The History of the Papacy during the Period of the Reformation—and in his lesser writings, he is disappointingly flat and arid in style and treatment. This is more the pity, as his shrewd sense of fairness would have made him a very wide influence had he not disdained so entirely the art of the literary craftsman. Of the scholarly qualities of his work, it is unnecessary to speak here. They are universally recognised.

The tendency to specialisation among historians of the scientific school was carried to its greatest extreme by SAMUEL RAWSON GARDINER (1829-1902), who concentrated the energies of a lifetime upon the earlier Stuart and Commonwealth periods. No man worked more conscientiously at his subject than he, no writer has succeeded in testing his facts more scrupulously, or preserving a more judicial detachment.

If the entire suppression of the personal equation be the goal of the historian, Gardiner certainly achieved it. But this fact, coupled with the microscopic treatment of his subject, put him out of court for the general reader. He belongs rather to what might be called the first-class reference writers.

That the presence of the personal equation and some feeling for literary presentment need not impair the scientific value of the historian's work, may be gathered from the writings of FREDERICK WILLIAM MAITLAND (1850-1906), who, although he specialised in legal history—than which nothing is less attractive to the general reader—was able to impart the most astonishing charm and vivacity to his work. Had he dealt with the broad fields of history rather than the unfrequented byways, he might have become one of our most influential historians, for he united some of the signal merits of the Romantic school with those of the Scientific.

Maitland could be accurate without being dull. Of how few can this be said?

Among the military historians of the era, Sir WILLIAM FRANCIS PATERICK NAPIER (1785-1860) and ALEXANDER WILLIAM KINGLAKE (1809-1891) may be mentioned. Napier is the more considerable figure, for he was not only a soldier—Kinglake being a civilian—but a man with a wide scientific knowledge of his subject. His History of the Peninsular War is, despite its obvious predilections and prejudices, a great book. Simple and direct in style, he can rise when fired by the dramatic dealings of his subject into descriptive writing of the highest kind, for he can be eloquent and impressive without being in any way flamboyant or verbose.

Kinglake was a man of letters and a traveller, and his Eothen (1844) is an admirable piece of travel literature full of imaginative observation. He was in the near East at the time of the war, and had special access later to Lord Raglan's papers. Despite his non-professional training he could boast some inside knowledge of his subject. His book, The Invasion of the Crimea, is an extremely attractive one; it is spirited and picturesque in its writing, and rarely fails in clearness and force. Inferior to Napier in restraint and perspective, it has that journalistic quality of vivid concreteness which has made for its greater popularity.

III. The Philosophic School

The first of these to be noted is HENRY THOMAS BUCKLE (1821-1862). Buckle, like Macaulay, was a man of prodigious memory and voracious reading. A delicate lad, he left school at an early age, and for the most part his education was a self-imposed one. On the death of his father he followed the bias of his own mind, studied many languages, and directed his energies to the realisation of the big scheme with which his name is associated. Here is the gist of it—to disintegrate the laws that govern human progress, since "the progress of every people is regulated by principles—or, as they are called, laws—as regular, as certain, as those which govern the physical world." The outcome of this was The History of Civilisation in England (two volumes), 1857 and 1861, followed by a third volume after his death, including Scotland, Spain, and France.

Every man with the gift of bold and brilliant generalisation is acclaimed alternately as an inspired genius and as a charlatan. Buckle's fame was no different. Admitting that historical phenomena are far too complex to be explained away with such neat and confident finality as Buckle showed, we may be grateful to him for the fruitful suggestions of many of his ideas. Even if the data of history be too uncertain for us to speak of it as a science, Buckle none the less shows that a scientific treatment of its phenomena is both helpful and illuminating. The strength and weakness of Buckle's philosophic standpoint will be apparent if we contrast it for a moment with that of Carlyle. To Carlyle, as we know, history was "the essence of innumerable biographies." It is the record of great personalities. Buckle, on the other hand, held that, "In the great march of human affairs, individual peculiarities count for nothing." Take a wide enough view, he urges in effect, and personal dynamics are negligible. Society is conditioned by the laws of its environment. It must be admitted that Carlyle took too little heed of environment—of character, food, soil, and the general aspects of nature. If those matters do not condition man's activities, they greatly modify them. Moreover, profound as is the influence of the Great Man upon his time, the Great Man is the product of his Age, as well as the moulder. Action and reaction are laws of life.

But Buckle pressed his point too far. He underestimates the dynamics of the great personality. He thought it possible to reason by averages if a wide enough view were taken of human society. He considered intellectual discoveries to be due to the progressive development of the world at large, and paid no heed to the intuition of genius that will hurry forward at certain stages the development of intellectual progress.

Both Buckle and Carlyle exaggerated their case; but Carlyle's Great Man theory is, of the two, open to less objection. The truth lies in the happy mean admittedly expressed by George Eliot's "Our deeds are fetters that we forge ourselves, but it is the world that brings the iron." Buckle forgot the innate power to forge, Carlyle overlooked the iron.

Buckle pioneered the way to a scientific treatment of sociological problems; therein lies his interest and historical value. He attempted on a big scale what Hume and economists like Adam Smith had merely hinted at.

What Buckle tried to do for society at large, Sir HENRY JAMES SUMNER MAINE (1822-1888) attempted for its political framework. More modest than Buckle, Maine is more successful in accomplishing his task. In Ancient Law (1861), Village Communities in the East and West (1871), and the Early History of Institutions (1875) he traced (in the now familiar evolutionary spirit) the development of laws and political institutions from their primitive to their complex modern forms. And not only does he trace the various stages, but he philosophises from these in a vital and suggestive manner. Just as Professor Owen could construct some prehistoric monster from a bone, so could Maine with some fragmentary survival rebuild the edifice of an ancient system of thought.

With Maine can be associated JOHN FRIGGUSON McLENNAN (1827-1881), another able sociological critic who on certain points challenges the conclusions of Maine. His special study was Primitive Marriage, a volume on this, published in 1865, first drew attention to his originality as a thinker. If in learning McLennan was equal to Maine, he was greatly inferior in literary power. Maine's writings, dry and unpromising as his subject-matter appears to many, are thoroughly vital and entertaining.

WALTER BAGEHOT (1826-1877), whose literary criticism is noted elsewhere, does not bring with him that formidable array of scholarship that we find in the case of those writers just discussed. More journalistic in his methods, more discursive in his interests, it is easy to underrate him. For though his critical work, whether in literature, economics, or sociology, is comparatively slight, none of it is negligible, and the bulk is of first-class importance.

Bagehot's supreme faculty was his incomparably light touch in dealing with heavy subjects. Many a writer has skimmed the surface of politics or business, deftly and entertainingly; but to trifle easily yet accurately with the intricate problems of the money market, and to frolic entertainingly and illuminatingly in the distracting labyrinth of English political institutions, has only been vouchsafed to one man—Bagehot. His two best writings deal with these matters. Lombard Street, a description of the money market (1873), and The English Constitution (1867).

The attraction of Bagehot's writings lies in the fact that he always emphasizes the human note, and always writes in a simple, clear, unpretentious manner. His power of dealing with scientific technicalities may be compared with Professor William James' power in treating of philosophic technicalities. Each, in the best sense of the word, has the gift of popular appeal.

There is no better introduction to the study of English politics than the delightful book on The English Constitution, where Bagehot puts into amusing opposition the theory of Government and the fact of Government—and makes us realise as no other writer has done where the real power of Government lies.

In JOHN ROBERT SEELEY (1834-1895), we have a man whose writings, whether on religion or on history, are crowded with ideas. The investigation of facts he leaves to others; he is content to accept certain undisputed facts and to generalise from these. His best historical works are his Expansion of England (1883) and his Growth of British Policy (1895). When most contemporary historians were investigating national politics, Seeley seeks to show the interrelation between national and foreign politics. His method is comparative. While the constitutional historians were taking us from room to room in the house, and pointing out their utilities, Seeley bids us come into the garden and view the house as compared with other houses, note its size, situation, general merits and defects, as compared with neighbouring dwellings. From the general reader's point of view, Seeley's outlook with its wider range is certainly more interesting. He writes also for the most part in a clear, agreeable, and arresting style.

A sane Imperialism is the prevalent note of Seeley's treatment of the Colonies, while the philosophic conservatism that marks his work generally is challenging and arresting rather than reactionary.

Another philosophic historian is WILLIAM EDWARD HARTPOLE LECKY (1838-1903) who, after sowing his literary wild oats in verse, settled down as a philosophic writer of striking ability. His History of the Rise and Influence of the Spirit of Rationalism in Europe (1865) was a remarkable piece of work for a man under thirty, and its freshness of outlook attracted general attention. Fully as fresh, and even surer in its handling, was the History of European Morals from Augustus to Charlemagne (1869). The same freshness and philosophic detachment marks the History of England in the Eighteenth Century (1878-1890). The best work of his later years was his thoughtful and critical examination of the democratic problems, in Democracy and Liberty (1896). In his sympathies Lecky is more Whig than Liberal, and he has little sympathy with the Socialistic tendencies of the age. But whatever the reader's own views he will find in Lecky a cool and reasonable debater, slave to no theory—in short, an almost ideal political philosopher.

LORD ACTON (1834-1902) is an historical scholar whose miscellaneous writings do scant justice to his monumental learning. All who came into contact with him testify not merely to his profound scholarship but to his breadth of philosophic thought. Unhappily, the world at large can form little idea of this, for Acton published nothing of primary importance. But those who wish to gain some slight idea of the fertility of his thought may well turn to the inaugural lecture he gave at Cambridge on his appointment to the Professorship, on the death of Seeley.

His outlook on historical phenomena is strongly ethical, and it is the moral problems raised by history rather than the actual occurrences that interested him the most.

"Judge not according to the orthodox standard of a system, religious, philosophical, political, but according as things promote or fail to promote the delicacy, integrity, and authority of conscience."

(B) BIOGRAPHY

Biography, though allied to History, is more in the nature of a distant relation. Playing so important a part in modern letters, it is largely a later-day product, and it owes much to the extraordinary development of the novel.

The eighteenth century, which witnessed the real beginning of modern fiction, and the popularity of the character study, witnessed also the first great biography, Boswell's Johnson.

During the earlier years of the nineteenth century, JOHN GIBSON LOCKHART (1794-1854) is easily first in the art of biography—an art that demands sympathy, self-detachment, and psychological insight, and the super-excellence of his Life of Scott (1837-1838) must not make us unmindful of his careful and discriminating Life of Burns (1828). On a lower plane is THOMAS MOORE's Life of Byron (1830)—it is a spirited and skilful piece of work, but though it does not lack sympathy, it certainly lacks the insight into the complexity of Byron's genius and personality. CARLYLE on the other hand, wilfully erratic as sometimes he was in his estimates of men, had a wonderful instinct for characterisation, and indeed much of his work is a series of elaborate biographies—the biographic element he is constantly employing. His one actual biographic study ranks among the best of his writings and among biographies of the first order—that is, Stirling.

ARTHUR PENRHYN STANLEY (1815-1881), Dean of Westminster, in his Life of Arnold (1814) owes more to his subject than to his own methods, but he was too agreeable and picturesque as a man of letters to make a failure of it. Of greater interest is LEWES' Life of Goethe (1855), for Lewes had the makings of a novelist in him and knew how to present his material.

Coming to Victorian times, the place of honour in the earlier period must be given to Mrs GASKELL's Life of Charlotte Brontë. Here again we see the value of the novelist's equipment. Sympathy, insight, and tact are all found here.

Another novelist, later in the era, did also excellent, if less memorable work in biographical literature, and Mrs OLIPHANT's Life of Edward Irving, of Laurence Oliphant, and The Blackwood Family, show a fine instinct for visualising character.

Few men have proved more industrious in biography than JOHN FORSTER (1812-1876). He had certainly a gift for characterisation—though anything but a subtle one—and none of his numerous studies are of first-class importance. Dealing as he does with some of the most interesting personalities in literature—Goldsmith, Swift, Lamb, and Dickens—Forster never succeeded in seeing round his subject. Industrious and sincere, he tells us a great deal that is of considerable interest, and provides us with ample material for estimating the subject of his biography—he does everything in fact except make that subject live. Dickens perhaps does live in a spasmodic and partial kind of way, but considering the exceptional advantages which Forster had here and the amazing vitality of "Boz," one cannot feel he has satisfactorily succeeded.

Worthy of a place beside Mrs Gaskell's Life of Charlotte Brontë is Sir GEORGE OTTO TREVELYAN's Life of Macaulay. Trevelyan is one of our best modern biographers, for he has, what so many painstaking biographers have not, a real sense of perspective as well as a lucid and cultured pen.

The tendency of late years towards an increasing specialisation in history has been accompanied, happily, by a larger measure of literary power than the earlier specialists exhibited, and this power has been used to put the results of historical and archaeological research into a clear and simple form such as may be understood by the large mass of laymen. An excellent illustration of this may be found in the series of monographs on Twelve English Statesmen. Particularly good are the volumes on Henry VII, Wolsey, Elizabeth, and Cromwell—by JAMES GARDNER (1828-1912), CREIGHTON, E. S. BEESLEY, and FREDERIC HARRISON. Mention must be made also of Lord BRUCE, whose wide historical knowledge has been allied with literary force and lucidity. As a result of this, The Holy Roman Empire (1862) proved not merely a notable addition to our continental history, but supplied a key to medieval politics which few but scholars had hitherto possessed. ANDREW LANG and MARTIN HUME have done excellent work in popularising respectively Scottish and Spanish history, while Lord ROSEBERY, Lord MORLEY, and Sir GEORGE TREVELYAN have written with brilliance and lucidity on outstanding personalities in the English and French history of the eighteenth century—such as Clitham, Burke, and Fox.

Special and increasing prominence has been given to the unravelling of the social history of our own era by men like SIDNEY WEBB, CHAMBERLAIN WALLAS, and HOLLAND ROSE, whilst a broad and clear view of Victorian politics has been supplied by JUSTIN HUNTLY MCCARTHY and HERBERT PAUL.

In the department of general biography, the most noticeable feature is the rapidly increasing number of sound and efficient monographs.

INTRODUCTION

THE Pilgrim Fathers set foot on American soil in the seventeenth century, but it was not until the nineteenth that America could claim a place of importance in the development of English literature. The reason for this is twofold

In the first place, great literature is determined largely by a nation's leisure and prosperity, and in studying the literature of our own country we have seen how that the great periods of our literature synchronise with our freedom from political and international worries. While a people is fighting for its physical well-being it has no time for letters, and the old Puritan settlers were more concerned with felling trees than with making lyrics. They were content to live epics before they wrote them; for the stimulus of Art sank into insignificance before the stimulus of the onerous Indian.

In the second place, Puritanism at best is not a favourable soil for the blossoming of literary art. The Puritan did not interest himself with the sensuous manifestations of life, he shunned it. The world for him was not a place of glorious adventure, but rather a place of tribulation, a preparation for another and better world.

In England there are a few names, notably Milton and Bunyan, who showed, given leisure and opportunity in the one case, and spiritual turmoil in the other, what Puritanism could do for letters. Yet Milton, after all, belonged partly to the Renaissance, and Bunyan's literary work was a happy accident. So if the Puritans, as a body, in England did little, the Puritans across the Atlantic were likely to do still less, for they represented the most uncompromising of their kind. Cromwell had some feeling for the fine arts, but many of his followers, as we know, hated the arts as they hated loose living, and in New England there was no Puritan reaction such as came over England at the time of the Restoration.

This being the case, we need not be surprised to find that the first book to be printed in New England is a hymn book—the Bay Psalm Book, and that the first notable writers were religious, like Jonathan Edwards. Puritanism, when it does express itself in literature, instinctively does so in terms of religion; but there was another and subsidiary reason for the religious note in New England letters.

Among the settlers the one class the least bound down to manual labour was the clergy. They, at any rate, enjoyed comparative immunity from the arduous work of colonisation. They, therefore, are the first to break the silence.

What are the centres from which American literature has sprung? Roughly speaking, we may say two—one at Virginia, the other at Massachusetts. Virginia was the home largely of the better-bred settler, Massachusetts of the more humbly bred—or, as Professor Trent has well put it, "Virginia may be regarded as an extension of county England with its Cavalier qualities, and Massachusetts as an extension or rather a culmination of borough England with its Puritan qualities."¹ Puritanism affected both, but it is much less marked in Virginia than in Massachusetts.

The indifferent ballads of gentlemen adventurers, and the poorer doggerel of clerical Puritans that served as somewhat doubtful diversions for the early colonists, need not detain us here. Their character may be gathered from the lines of Cotton Mather, on one of these painstaking craftsmen:

"He came to guide his flock and feed his lambs

By words, works, prayers, psalms, alms and anagrams";

and their rhythmic charm and fancy from a couplet of Mrs BRADSTREET (1612-1672), one of their most ambitious verse writers—intended as a tribute (?) to Queen Elizabeth.

"'Mongst hundred hecatombs of roaring verse

Mine blessing stands before thy royal hearse";

which for its infelicity is only excelled by one of this lady's literary admirers, who, wishing to testify to the entrancing effect of her verse, declared:

"Thus weltering in delight, my virgin mind Admits a rape."

American humour was obviously still a thing of the future!

Nor is there any material improvement in American verse during the major part of the eighteenth century. During this period New England was engaged in a fierce struggle against the Indians and the French, a struggle culminating in the success of the New Englander and the downfall of French power. The moral grit that stood its possessor in better stead as citizens than as literary artists is still undiminished, and a stern Calvinism broods over the theology. The influence of Pope percolated through during these years, and had some chastening effect upon the verse writers, but if we sample the work of two of the most illustrious names of the time—REV. MATHER BYLES (1707-1788) and JOSEPH GREEN (1706-1780)—we shall see how very far behind not merely Pope, but lesser men such as Prior and Gay, these Boston worthies were.

One change, however, may be noted. A lighter style is creeping unmistakably into American letters. American humour is dawning; though the dawn is somewhat grey. Yet the intense seriousness of the Puritan outlook is touched with a livelier and more flippant spirit. The satirical vigour of BENJAMIN CHURCH (b. 1739), and the agreeable Odes of NATHANIEL EVANS (1742-1787), mark, at any rate, a progress in the art of verse.

The period of the Revolution is more provocative of prose than of verse, but the verse, such as it is, exhibits a higher literary quality than had hitherto been shown. JOSEPH STANSBURY (1750-1809), a loyalist, proved a humorous and effective singer. FRANCIS HOPKINSON (1737-1791) is a pleasant ballad writer—by fits and starts—notably his Battle of the Kings, while his son Joseph is familiar through his well-known lyric Hail, Columbia! On a higher plane is PHILIP FRENEAU (1752-1832), of Huguenot stock, a patriotic poet of genuine power, who turned his eventful and stormy life to literary account. A good illustration of his work may be found in his verses, The Indian Burying-Ground.

JOHN TRUMBULL (1750-1831) is another figure of note—a precocious youth of good family, who soon showed a marked aptitude for rough and ready satire in the vein of Butler, and whose poem, McFingal, with its Hudibrastic methods, proved extremely to the taste of his countrymen. With Trumbull is associated TIMOTHY DWIGHT (1752-1817), also somewhat of a youthful prodigy, but more artificial and imitative in his style, and JOEL BARLOW (1754-1812), who had a stirring and adventurous career, he showed skill in the treatment of the heroic couplet, and is best remembered for his mock-heroic, Hasty Pudding.

During the Revolutionary period Philadelphia had been the literary centre of importance, and this primacy continued down to 1809.

From the little crowd of undistinguished verse writers in this early post-Revolutionary period may be excepted WILLIAM CLINTON (1772-1799), who continued to uphold the forceful, satirical traditions of New England, proving in addition an agreeable song writer, and that versatile Bohemian, ROBERT PAINE (1773-1811).

There is no need to particularise other writers; the verse of the time was almost entirely polemical and political, and dealt in a coarse and noisy spirit with the rival claims of Federal and Democratic Republicanism.

But the period of apprenticeship to letters was about to close, and of vital poetic literature to start in the person of WILLIAM CULLEN BRYANT (1794-1878).

Bryant, the son of a physician, was brought up in quiet, rural surroundings, where he could browse to his heart's content on Cowper and Wordsworth. His father, unlike many of his kind, indulged his son's boyish excursions into verse, even to the questionable extent of publishing his satire on Jeffries, written when he was in his early teens. After a brief college course, he studied law—thus following the true biographical tradition of poets—with the youthful poet's customary lack of enthusiasm, and wrote his first important poem, Thanatopsis, a favourable specimen of what has been called "The Churchyard School." This poem appeared in the North American Review, 1817. In 1825 Bryant took up the editorship, at New York, of the Evening Post, and journalistic duties reduced his poetic output very considerably. Yet he continued to write verse from time to time—verse invariably dignified and reflective in its character, and, like Wordsworth, concerned with Nature and the primal qualities of men and women.

He exercised a considerable influence with his countrymen as a poetic moralist, and if never an object of warm affection or enthusiasm, was regarded with respect and sober admiration. He died in 1878.

Though inferior to Wordsworth in poetic genius, one instinctively associates these poets with each other, for the large restfulness of Wordsworth, his austere morality, and cool, benignant power are equally characteristic of Bryant.

Yet though an admirer of Wordsworth and naturally influenced by him, his work is more reminiscent of Cowper and Collins. But he is in no sense an echo, and there is a quiet, insistent individuality about his work, which is essentially the product of a thoughtful, high-minded, self-contained, and not very flexible nature.

Bryant's blank verse is always workmanlike, sometimes, as in Thanatopsis, finely effective. Indeed, in these lines we have Bryant's muse at its happiest, with a sober beauty and easy mastery of its material.

"So live that, when thy summons comes to join
The innumerable caravan which moves
To that mysterious realm where each shall take
His chamber in the silent halls of death
Thou go not like the quarry slave at night
Scourged to his dungeon, but sustained and soothed
By an unfaltering trust approach thy grave
Like one who wraps the drapery of his couch
About him, and lies down to pleasant dreams."

Some of his shorter poems, idyllic, descriptive, hortatory, like The Death of the Flower, The Crowded Street, and Oh, Mother of a Mighty Race, exhibit tender sympathy and noble patriotic feeling. But his genius seems the most fully expressed in his blank verse, for most of his rhymed verse just lacks that lyric warmth and sweetness which would have transformed it from good into great.

Lowell's jocular reference to him in his Fable for Critics, as a

"Smooth, silent iceberg, that never is ignisied,
Save when by reflection 'tis kindled o' nights
With a semblance of flame by the chill Northern Lights," is, if a shade unkind, not essentially unjust

Nor is it essentially a reproach, as some might imagine. There is room in literature, as was pointed out in the article on Wordsworth, for the light rays as well as for the heat rays

'Ye have no history. I ask in vain
Who planted on the slope this lofty group
Of ancient pear-trees that with spring-time burst
Into such breadth of bloom. One bears a scar
Where the quick lightning scorched its trunk, yet still
It feels the breath of Spring, and every May
Is white with blossoms. Who it was that laid
Their infant roots in earth, and tenderly
C cherished the delicate sprays, I ask in vain.
Yet bless the unknown hand to which I owe
The annual festival of bees, these songs
Of birds within their leafy screen, these shouts
Of joy from children gathering up the fruit
Shaken in August from the willing boughs"¹

Contemporary with Bryant are FITZ-GREENE HALLECK (1790-1867) and JOSEPH REDMAN DRAKE (1795-1820). Drake was a young physician with a talent for descriptive writing, and, like so many of his countrymen, a talent for political satire; the latter he satisfied in collaboration with his friend Halleck—the upshot being The Croaker Papers (1819). Halleck's gifts were more lyrical than descriptive, and he showed considerable aptitude in that department of light ephemeral verse of which Praed and Mr Austin Dobson are the acknowledged masters. RICHARD HENRY DANA, senior (1787-1879), is a cultured writer of Massachusetts, a better critic than poet, who followed faithfully, as a rule, in the footsteps of Cowper and Wordsworth. In his most considerable poem, The Buccaneer, he makes an excursion into Gothic romance, and his poem was referred to favourably by Wilson, in Blackwood's Magazine. But he is more at home in simple Wordsworthian themes. More interesting as a poet, though less solid as a man of letters, is the painter WASHINGTON ALLSTON (1779-1843), Dana's brother-in-law. He had more fancy than imagination, but could turn a pretty lyric, and a spirited stanza, with good effect. Yet perhaps the most interesting thing about him is that he was a valued friend of the poet Coleridge.

While we had our Mrs Hemans and Eliza Cook, New England could seek edification and sentimental thrills in the gushing of Mrs BROOKS (1795-c 1845), approved by Southey; and the amazing fluency of Mrs SIGOURNEY (1791-1865). One other name may be mentioned—that is, FRANCIS SCOTT KEY (1780-1813), of Maryland, who will always be remembered by his countrymen for his patriotic song, The Star-Spangled Banner, a ditty remarkable, like many of its kind, more for its vigorous sentiment than any artistic merit.

We now come to a group of poets familiar to all readers of literature—Longfellow, Whittier, Poe, Holmes, Lowell, Emerson, Thoreau, and Whitman.

Of these, Longfellow, Whittier, and Whitman are the only three poets whose verse is of greater importance than their prose. With the others, prose proved the more effective medium, and their verse is considered in connection with it.

HENRY WADSWORTH LONGFELLOW

(1807-1882)

HIS LIFE

On February 27, 1807, Longfellow was born at Portland, Maine. His father, Stephen Longfellow, of good Yorkshire stock, was a shrewd and capable lawyer, who died in 1849, his mother, a gentle, loving woman of romantic temperament, died suddenly in 1851. The future poet was their second son—an amiable, sensitive, studious boy, with no interest in sports or any kind of exercise, save walking. In a sudden burst of youthful patriotism he looked forward to shouldering a rifle and fighting on behalf of his country, but his first and last expedition with a gun was into the Maine woods, for having there shot a robin, he returned home in tears, and never afterwards pulled a trigger.

Having finished his schooling at Portland Academy, Henry, accompanied by his elder brother, Stephen, entered Bowdoin College, where for three years the tall, slender, blue-eyed youth ranked high in scholarship. His father was aiming to make him a lawyer, but the youth's opinion was that "I do not, for my own part, imagine that such a coat would suit me. I am altogether in favour of the farmer's life"; however, he shortly wrote again to his father, saying, "Of divinity, medicine, and law, I should choose the last. Whatever I do study ought to be engaged in with all my soul—for I will be eminent in something."

Having graduated in 1825 and delivered a seven-minutes oration on "Native Writers," this promising young student was recommended for the proposed Chair of Modern Languages. With this end in view he studied in Europe for four years, returning to Bowdoin in 1830 to take up his duties.

Another interest now enters his life. In 1831 he married Mary Storer Potter, an intelligent and beautiful girl he had known for some years, unfortunately their happiness was short-lived, for while on a second tour in Europe in 1835 she fell ill in Holland and died. Shortly afterwards he returned to America and assumed the post of Professor of Modern Languages at Harvard University in succession to Professor Ticknor, and having made his home in Craigie House, famous as the residence of George Washington, he settled down to steady, conscientious work.

In 1833 he had published Coplas de Manrique, with an introductory essay on the Moral and Devotional Poetry of Spain; and in 1834, Outre-Mer, a prose description of his European travels. His first important publication, Voices of the Night (1839), was a collection of poems several of which had made an earlier appearance in the Knickerbocker Magazine; this volume included The Psalm of Life, The Beleaguered City, and The Midnight Mass of the Dying Year. Hyperion, a prose romance, followed in the same year, the heroine, Mary Ashburton, easily identified as Miss Frances Appleton, whom the author married in 1843.

For eighteen years Longfellow lived a happy, uneventful, busy life. He was successful and popular in his academic work, and winning fame as a poet, when his tranquil life was overshadowed by the tragic death of his second wife. Her dress, of some light material, became accidentally ignited and she was burned to death.

In 1868 Longfellow visited England and became the guest of Charles Dickens, and together they visited Landor at Bath. Longfellow was at all times fastidious as to his personal appearance, and Dickens in his whimsical way was unable to let an opportunity pass of making a humorous reference to the poet's weakness. "McDowall the boot-maker, Beale the hosiery, Laffin the trousers-maker, and Blackmore the coat-cutter," wrote Dickens to him after his return to America, "have all been at the point of death, but have slowly recovered. The medical gentlemen agreed that it was exhaustion occasioned by early rising—to wait upon you at those unholy hours!"

Longfellow was a hard worker; he filled his post of professor at Harvard with honour until, finding the duties becoming irksome and wishing to devote his whole time to poetry, he resigned in 1854. He had published several volumes, among them: Poems on Slavery, written on the way home from England, and published in 1842; The Spanish Student (1843); Belfry of Bruges (1846); Evangeline (1847); Kavanagh (1849); The Golden Legend, a story of the Middle Ages (1851); and Hwatha, dealing with Indian traditions (1855). The world-famed Village Blacksmith had made its appearance in 1841 in Ballads and Poems.

Shortly after his marriage in 1843 he began to arrange his book on The Poets and Poetry of Europe, published in 1845. At this time the poet's eyesight gave him trouble, it proved, fortunately, to be of a temporary character, but during this period Mrs. Longfellow's loving help was found to be invaluable.

In course of time came Miles Standish (1858), Tales of a Wayside Inn (1863), and a translation of Dante's Divine Comedy (1867-1870); the Divine Tragedy, published in 1871, that had occupied him for twenty years, proved a failure; Three Books of Song and Christus (1872); Aftermath (1873), and Hanging of the Crane, for which the New York Ledger had paid him three thousand dollars, was published in book form in 1874; Masque of Pandora (1875), Kéramos (1878), and Ultima Thule, in two parts (1880 and 1882), a collection of poems including many pathetic farewells.

A unique presentation gladdened his closing years. This was an arm-chair made from the chestnut tree under which had stood the famous smithy—a gift bought with the pence of child-lovers throughout the country.

Longfellow had lived five years beyond the allotted span, when he was attacked by peritonitis, which hastened his death. He passed peacefully away on March 24, 1882, and was buried, amid falling snow, in Mount Auburn Cemetery near Cambridge.

HIS WORK

Longfellow's popularity, both in his country and our own, has probably been rivalled only by that of Tennyson, and, as is the case with many very popular reputations, a reaction has set in, which threatens to do less than justice to a writer who, despite fluent mediocrities, has achieved some really fine and notable things.

Many, moreover, who speak slightly of Longfellow to-day, do so through memories of a few threadworn, hackneyed minor pieces that have been parodied to death, such as Excelsior, The Village Blacksmith, or The Psalm of Life. But it is as unfair to judge Longfellow by these as it would be to judge Tennyson by The May Queen, The Brook, or The Supposed Confession of a Second-rate Sensitive Mind.

The first insistent impression conveyed to us by Longfellow's verse is its deft and delicate grace. Take, for instance, such illustrations as these.

This of night—

"Thou lovest thy fingers on the lips of care,
And they complain no more."

This of tardy inspiration

"Becalmed upon the sea of thought,
Still unattained the land it sought,
My mind with loosely-hanging sails,
Lies waiting the auspicious gale."

Blow, breath of song! until I feel
The straining sail, the lifting keel,
The life of the awakening sea,
Its motion and its mystery."

Longfellow's briefer pieces throughout his long career ripple with graceful fancies, and if these are not always fresh enough to fill the "loosely-hanging sails," they are often sufficiently animated to give an agreeable vitality and dainty movement to the verse.

It is this gift that delights us in his touching lines on Hawthorne, with its happy allusiveness: "The unfinished window in Aladdin's tower, unfinished must remain," and that lifts out of the commonplace the myriad little pictures of Nature scattered throughout his writings.

"Morn on the mountain, like a summer bird, Lifts up her purple wing!"¹

"Her hair
Is like the summer tresses of the trees
When twilight makes them brown!"²

"Softly the evening came The Sun from the western horizon
Like a magician extended his golden wand o'er the landscape,
Tinkling vapours arose; and sky, and water, and forest
Seemed all on fire at the touch, and melted and mingled together!"³

pression into an harmonious pattern was beyond him. His sonnets too often are merely things of shreds and patches, and the few glimmering threads of gold are not sufficient recompense for the abundance of honest, yet unattractive fustian. But even here his grace of fancy has come to the poet's rescue more than once, and such sonnets as to Shakespeare and The Tides have certainly some claim to affection and remembrance.

"I saw the long line of the vacant shore,
The seaweed and the shells upon the sand,
And the brown rocks left bare on every hand
As if the ebbing tide would flow no more
Then heard I, more distinctly than before,
The ocean breathe and its great breast expand,
And hurrying came on the defenceless land
The insurgent waters with turbulent roar
All thought and feeling and desire, I said,
Love, laughter, and the exultant joy of song,
Have ebbed from me for ever! Suddenly o'er me
They swept again from their deep ocean-bed,
And in a tumult of delight, and strong
As youth, and beautiful as youth, upbore me."

The play of fancy is even more happily expressed in his prose. Longfellow was not a great proseman, and his little romances, Hyperion and Kavanagh, are negligible as essays in fiction, but they are well worth reading for the delightful fancies with which they abound, to say nothing of flashes of humour that never see light in his verse.

Sometimes he reminds us curiously of Holmes, as when describing the old servant in Kavanagh engaged to a travelling dentist who, in filling her teeth with amalgam, had "seized the opportunity to fill a soft place in her heart with something still more dangerous and mercurial."

Here are a few detached sayings, grave and gay, further illustrating this characteristic:

"Silence is a great peacemaker."

"In youth all doors open outward; in old age they all open inward."

"When looking for anything lost, begin by looking where you think it is not."

"The Spring came suddenly bursting upon the world, as a child bursts into the room, with a laugh and a shout and a hand full of flowers."

"They saw him daily moiling and delving in the common path, like a beetle, and little thought that underneath that hard and cold exterior lay folded delicate golden wings wherewith, when the heat of the day was over, he soared and revelled in the evening air."

"The passing years had drunk a portion of the light from her eyes, and left their traces on her cheeks, as birds that drink at lakes leave their footprints on the margin."

With this play of graceful fancy there is a singing quality in Longfellow's verse that is often underrated. His melodies may have nothing in them of the opulent splendour of Swinburne's or the haunting sweetness of Tennyson's; the music is thinner. But music it is, none the less, pleasant and appealing in its note.

"Stay, stay at home, my heart, and rest,
Home-keeping hearts are happiest;
For those who wander, they know not where,
Are full of trouble and full of care:
To stay at home is best."

"How beautiful it was, that one bright day
In the long week of rain."

"Loud from its rocky cavern, the deep-voiced mighty Ocean Speaks, and in accents disconsolate answers the wail
Of the forest."

"Good-night! good-night, beloved!
I come to watch o'er thee,
To be near thee—to be near thee
Alone is peace for me."

"Pleasant it was, when woods were green,
And winds were soft and low,
To be amid some sylvan scene
Where, the long drooping boughs between,
Shadows dark and sunlight shewn
Alternate come and go."

"Blind Bartimeus at the gates
Of Jericho in darkness waits,
He hears the crowd,—he hears a breath
Say, 'It is Christ of Nazareth',
And calls in tones of agony,
'Ιησού, ἐλέησον με!'"

"The book is completed,
And closed, like the day,
And the hand that hath written it
Lays it away."

Dun grow its fancies,
Forgotten they lie,
Like coals in the ashes,
They darken and die."

"All the stars of night looked at them,
Watched with sleepless eyes their slumber;
From his ambush in the oak-tree
Peeped the squirrel, Adjidaumo,
Watched with eager eyes the lovers;
And the rabbit, the Wahwasco,
Scampered from the path before them,
Peering, peeping from his burrow."

Pleasant was the journey homeward!
All the birds sang loud and sweetly,
Songs of happiness and heart's-ease;
Sang the blue-bird, the Owassa,
'Happy are you, Hiawatha,
Having such a wife to love you!'
Sang the Opeehoe the robin,
'Happy are you, Laughing Water,
Having such a noble husband!'

Thus it was that Hiawatha
To the lodge of old Nokomis
Brought the moonlight, starlight, firelight,
Brought the sunshine of his people,
Minnehaha, Laughing Water."

Whatever may be the faults of these poems from which snatches have been culled, they are certainly instinct with rhythmic melody. Longfellow's poems lend themselves to a musical setting better than do most poets, better than Shelley or Tennyson, because he did not pack them with too much music. They are just musical enough to crave the complement of a sister art to bring out their full charm. Tennyson, Shelley, Swinburne, lose rather than gain by a musical setting, for they have all the music they need. The very perfection of their art stands in their way as song-writers. Longfellow's cruder art and homelier methods give him the advantage here.

The Puritanism of New England is mellowed in Longfellow than in Bryant, but it is there unmistakably; he is at bottom a moralist, as nearly all American writers are, and it is this in combination with his homely sentiment that has assured him such great popularity. That its urgency at times spoiled his art, is obvious enough; but it was a source of his strength as well as of his weakness; especially when informed by the genial, buoyant spirit of the man. Poe had said some very bitter things about him, but after Poe's death, when someone commented on this to Longfellow, his only reply was: "He is dead. I am alive and writing that is an end of the matter."

And this tolerant charity is reflected in everything that he wrote. In spite of his didactic tendency, there is no obtrusion of the personal point of view; in fact, he is as impersonal often as Emerson himself. This is well exhibited in his lyrics, where most poets give expression to their moods and idiosyncrasies. But Longfellow's lyrics are local, not personal, as we shall see if we run over the titles. The Bridge, The Belfry at Bruges, The Lighthouse, The River Charles, &c. The emotions he expresses are general, not particular. This may blunt at times the interest we feel in his work. The sunshine is so evenly distributed that we long peculiarly for a storm or momentary eclipse. But it adds to the charm of the engaging friendliness of which I have spoken. What could be better in its intimate case, than the prelude to the pleasant Tales of a Wayside Inn:

"One Autumn night in Sudbury town,
Across the meadows bare and brown,
The windows of the wayside Inn
Gleamed red with firelight through the leaves
Of woodbine, hanging from the eaves,
Their crimson curtains rent and thin.

As ancient is this hostelry
As any in the land may be,
Built in the old Colonial day,
When men lived in the grander way,
With simpler hospitality,
A kind of old Hohobolin Hall,
Now somewhat fallen to decay,
With weather-stains upon the wall,
And stairways worn, and crazy doors,
And creaking and uneven floors,
And chimneys huge and tiled and tall.

A region of repose it seems
A place of slumber and of dreams,
Remote among the wooded hills!"

A word must be said in conclusion as to the wide range over which his benignant spirit passes. As the poet of American life, he touches on one side the Indian epic of Hiawatha; on the other, the doings of his Puritan ancestry in Evangeline and The Courtship of Miles Standish.

As a scholar and translator he did much to familiarise the reader with French, Spanish, German, and Italian poets. His own genius was more akin to the German than to any other European people; he is especially happy in dealing with Richter, and his cosmopolitan interests contributed greatly to the appreciation of Longfellow on the Continent.

Another aspect of his work is revealed in his concern with children and child life. He has been fitly called "The Children's Poet"; and his simple directness, his tenderness, his unpretentious sentiment are at their best here.

There is no poet more readily understood and loved by children than he. The Tales of a Wayside Inn can be appreciated by both young and old, but The Wreck of the Schooner Hesperus, Pegasus in Pound, The Leap of Rouahan Beg, The Three Kings, The Emperor's Bird's Nest—to mention a few only—have a peculiar appeal for children. Indeed, who can doubt that the man who wrote The Children's Hour knew how to warm young hearts and fire young imaginations?

After all, Longfellow's appeal lies chiefly in his intimate simplicity and tender humanity. He does not deal with recondite aspects of human life, but with the universal emotions of love, pity, faith, and hope. Whether in his domestic pictures, in his unpretentious moralities, his picturesque narratives, or his lyrics of everyday life, there is a direct and engaging friendliness and a sweet sanity of outlook that, though easily ridiculed, are matters for grateful remembrance. The very titles he gave to his collections of verse are eloquent of this homely simplicity—Voices of the Night, The Seaside and the Fireside, In the Harbour.

And thus we come back to Longfellow's power of dealing with simple, human characteristics. His faults and limitations as a literary artist are clear enough—I am not concerned to dispute them. But Longfellow is emphatically not to be dismissed as some have tried to do, as merely a facile writer of commonplace sentimentalities. He was a versatile scholar who did much to develop the culture of young literary America, a vigorous ballad writer with peculiar force and charm when the sea is his subject; a narrative poet of abundant force and clarity, above all, a kindly and gracious personality, whose kindness and graciousness diffused themselves over everything that he wrote. If not a great poet, he was a genuine one, with a power of swift and direct appeal to thousands whom our greater poets would have left cold.

JOHN GREENLEAF WHITTIER (1807-1892)

HIS LIFE

The descendant of a long line of New England Quakers, John Greenleaf Whittier, the son of a farmer, was born on December 17, 1807, at East Haverhill, Massachusetts. His father's narrow means necessitated the boy's help in the fields at an early age, so that his education, carried on only during the winter months, was extremely limited.

Yet even at school he began to write verse, and it was a red-letter day in the history of the Whittiers when a volume of Burns' poems was brought to the farmstead, and lent to the boy, who devoured them eagerly.

In 1827 he sent his first poem to the Free Press. The editor, William Lloyd Garrison, recognising that there was a future for the young poet, journeyed to Haverhill and suggested further schooling. The farmer, however, was against "putting notions in the boy's head," and said there was no money to spare for such a purpose. But the youth was not to be daunted. He took up shoemaking during the winter evenings, and by this means saved sufficient to pay for a six months' course at the new Haverhill Academy, where he was known by the name of "Uncle Toby." On his entrance in April 1827, which was also the inauguration of the Academy, Whittier wrote the dedicatory Ode.

Following this course at the Academy, Whittier taught in the district school at Merrimac, to find the wherewithal for another six months' training at Haverhill. During these years he wrote considerably in prose and verse, then became editor of the Haverhill Gazette in succession to Mr. Thayer, and in six months had left the Gazette for the more important New England Review, in which were published over forty of his poems, among them The Frost Spirit, The City of the Plain, and The Vaudreuil Teacher.

On the death of his father in 1831, Whittier was recalled to the farm, and much of his editorial work was carried on at home. But his health at this time began to give cause for anxiety, and for a time the newspaper work was abandoned. In this year (1831) was published the prose and verse Legends of New England, which he endeavoured afterwards to buy up and destroy.

The subject nearest to Whittier's heart and which subsequently became his mission in life, was the crusade against the slave trade. Notwithstanding his Quaker ancestry, Whittier threw himself into the thick of the fight, but it was on the side of Freedom.

It is interesting to note that although the citizens of Haverhill were opposed to his views as an Abolitionist, they nevertheless elected him as their representative in the State Legislature in 1835-36, but he declined a like honour in 1837.

For twenty years Whittier, by his whole-hearted devotion to the Anti-Slavery Movement, was "shut out from the favour of booksellers and magazine editors," and the majority of his work appeared in the organs of those periodicals favourable to the cause he had at heart, or those of which he was acting as editor.

As one of the secretaries of the Philadelphia Convention in 1833 he assisted in drafting the Declaration of Principles of the American Anti-Slavery Society, and began his crusade with a pamphlet, Justice and Expediency, printed at his own expense in 1833, that made a considerable stir in political circles. He then became editor of the Pennsylvania Freeman. During the riots in Philadelphia, the pro-slavery mob burned his office and sacked the Pennsylvania Hall, a new building where the office of the paper was situated; however, Whittier managed to save some of his effects, and published his paper next day as if nothing had happened.

In 1865 slavery virtually came to an end, at least so far as State recognition was concerned. Whittier had applauded or denounced every incident during the conflict, the gradual defection of Webster in 1859 from the Abolitionist party inspired his Ichabod.

In 1857, at the time of the launching of the Atlantic Monthly, Whittier joined the staff, and for twenty years scarcely a number was published without a contribution from his pen.

Never of robust health, overwork in youth and early manhood told its tale at the last. For years he was unable to write for even half an hour, without acute neuralgia and headache. In September 1892 he was seized with paralysis, and on December 7th he breathed his last, but conscious to the end. At his burial the greatest honour was accorded him, the City Government of Haverhill attended in a body, and many eulogistic speeches were made over his grave.

HIS WORK

In intensity of imagination and emotional power, Whittier ranks higher as a poet than Longfellow; indeed, he has no peer among American poets in the strength of his imaginative sympathies. But his artistic skill is not commensurate with his native endowment, and it is only by fine flashes here and there in the considerable body of his verse that we realise that his art matches his inspiration. Sometimes, as in that lovely idyll, Snowbound, or in the passionate lament over Daniel Webster's attitude towards the Abolitionist problem, Whittier rises to the heights of great poetry. But his emotions, though intense, have little plasticity; his imagination, though deep, is narrow and restricted. Given a cause that touched him to the quick, like Anti-Slavery, or certain aspects of New England life, he can rise to the occasion. Unfortunately, he has written a great deal of verse that, though workmanlike and agreeable, lacks distinction and fire, and has neither the simple, sentimental charm of Longfellow's ordinary verse nor the intellectual suggestiveness that reconciles one to some extent to the rough artistry of Emerson and Thoreau.

Taking him at his best, and selecting a score of poems from the hundreds that he wrote, Whittier is assuredly one of the greater poets of America, with a virility that can only be matched by the rarer ballad writers of English Literature. Snowbound, Randolph of Roanoke, Moloch in State Street, Ichabod, Barbara Frutchie, Maud Muller, The Henchman, The Barefoot Boy, Taking the Bees, and Poem are poems, for instance, full of tenderness, strength, and passionate scorn for the tyrant and the base. We may add also that beautiful hymn, Dear Lord and Father of Mankind, than which no lovelier expression of the Quaker spirit exists in our sacred verse.

"Drop Thy still dews of quietness,
Till all our strivings cease—
Take from our souls the strain and stress;
And let our ordered lives confess
The beauty of Thy Peace
Breathe through the pulses of desire
Thy coolness and Thy balm,
Let some be dumb, its heats expire;
Speak through the earthquake, wind, and fire,
O still small voice of calm."

ICHABOD

So fallen! so lost! the light withdrawn
Which once he wore!
The glory from his gray hairs gone
For evermore!

Reville him not,—the Tempter hath
A snare for all ;
And pitying tears, not scorn and wrath,
Bent his fall

O, dumb be passion's stormy rage,
When he who might
Have lighted up and led his age,
Falls back in night

Scorn ! would the angels laugh, to mark
A bright soul driven
Friend-goaded, down the endless dark,
From hope and heaven !

Let not the land once proud of him
Insult him now,
Nor brand with deeper shame his dim,
Dishonoured brow.

But let its humbled sons, instead,
From sea to lake,
A long lament, as for the dead,
In sadness make.

Of all we loved and honoured, nought
Save power remains,—
A fallen angel's pride of thought,
Still strong in chains

All else is gone, from those great eyes
The soul has fled
When faith is lost, when honour dies,
The man is dead !

Then, pay the reverence of old days
To his dead fame
Walk backward, with averted gaze,
And hide the shame !

POEM

(To introduce the first collected edition of his Poems)

I love the old melodious lays
Which softly melt the ages through,
The songs of Spenser's golden days,
Arcadian Sidney's rivery phrase,
Sprinkling our noon of time with freshest morning dew.

Yet vainly in my quiet hours
To breathe their marvellous notes I try,
I feel them, as the leaves and flowers
In silence feel the dewy showers,
And drink with glad, still lips the blessing of the sky.

The rigour of a frozen chime,
The harshness of an untaught ear,
The jarring words of one whose rhyme
Beat often Labour's hurried time,
Or Duty's rugged march through storm and strife, are here.

Of mystic beauty, dreamy grace,
No rounded art the lack supplies,
Unskilled the subtle lines to trace,
Or softer shades of Nature's face,
I view her common forms with unalighted eyes.

Nor mine the seer-like power to show
The secrets of the heart and mind,
To drop the plummet-line below
Our common world of joy and woe,
A more intense despair or brighter hope to find.

Yet here at least an earnest sense
Of human right and wrong is shown,
A hate of tyrannic intemperance,
And hearty in its vehemence,
As if my brother's pain and sorrow were my own.

O Freedom ! if to me belong
Nor mighty Milton's gift divine,
Nor Marvell's wit and graceful song,
Still with a love as deep and strong
As theirs, I lay, like them, my best gifts on thy shrine :

WALT WHITMAN (1819-1892)

HIS LIFE

Walt Whitman was born at West Hills, Long Island, on May 31, 1819, of yeoman stock. His father, a wood-cutter and carpenter, was a hard-working, kindly, but taciturn man, to whom the boy was a veritable thorn in the flesh, by reason of his wayward, self-willed, idle habits. His mother, of Dutch Quaker descent, was a loving, practical woman, whose unselfish disposition had a wonderful attraction for those with whom she came into contact ; to her the lad was ever affectionate and obedient.

An elementary education at Brooklyn, whither the family removed about 1823, was all that could be secured for the boy, even this was brought to an end after a few years, when he was put to work in a lawyer's office, two years later the office stool was exchanged for the printing works.

Having learned his trade, he started on a fresh experience. He took up teaching. In this he was both successful and popular, and a prime favourite with his scholars. In fact, his self-reliant, manly, and sunny nature was always singularly attractive to men, women, and children alike.

He had ideas of his own on the subject of school punishments: his own procedure was to relate a history of the crime in the form of a story to the whole school, leaving it with the delinquents to feel self-condemned and ashamed—a method that seldom failed in its effect.

From teaching he turned to journalism. He had contributed to The Mirror, a high-class weekly journal, while he was at the printing works. In 1838 he started a weekly paper, the Long Islander, of which he became editor, printer, and publisher. While the paper was a novelty Whitman was an assiduous worker, but as the novelty wore off the Long Islander became more and more irregular in its appearance, until in a few months it ceased to exist so far as Walt Whitman was concerned. He then returned to teaching.

In 1841 we see him in the rôle of compositor in the New World, and for twenty years a well known figure among New York journalists.

Until February 1849 Whitman was a stay-at-home, but a chance conversation interested him in the "magnetic South." Shortly afterwards he boarded a small steamer and journeyed as far as Mexico, to return after three months as editor of the Daily Eagle at Brooklyn. The following year he went on the staff of the Daily Crescent in New Orleans. Here he studied the teeming life of the city as he had done in New York. He made friends with the stowadores and boatmen at the quayside and the frequenters of the bar-room in the large hotels, while most mornings he took his coffee and biscuit at the stall of a mulatto woman in the French market-place.

Politics interested him, but never so wholeheartedly as with Whittier. Social functions took their place, and a prominent one, with Whitman. "He frequented lectures and races," says his friend, Dr. Bucke, "churches and auction rooms, weddings and clam-bakes," with strict impartiality while following the politics of the Free Soil Democrats. He gave us his political creed in Democratic Vistas (1870).

In 1853 he turned to carpentering. Two years later, on the death of his father, he gave up carpentering and set to work on publishing his Song.

The first edition of this characteristic work was a small volume of twelve poems that he named Leaves of Grass, bound in sea-green cloth, the type of which he had set up himself. This appeared in July 1856. The following year he reissued the volume with thirty-two new poems. Some of the poems gave great offence, and there was a hint of prosecuting the author, which caused the publishers to withdraw the book from circulation. Emerson took upon himself the task of remonstrating with Whitman upon his frankness; the poet listened calmly, but the friendly advice had no further effect.

In 1863, when the country entered upon the disastrous Civil War, Whitman offered his services as nurse to the wounded; for over two years he devoted his life, in camp and hospital, to his sick and dying countrymen. When the war was over he was offered and accepted a Government clerkship.

While the poet was preparing a fresh edition of the Leaves, his copy fell into the hands of Mr. Harlan, Secretary of the Interior, who immediately wrote a curt note and without assigning any reason dismissed Whitman from his post. This action was far from popular in Washington, where Whitman was well known. Friends threw themselves into the breach, and Whitman was reinstated in office but in another department.

In 1871 a fifth edition of the Leaves, which included Drum Taps, was published, and a few years later the poet was seized with paralysis. He resigned his clerkship and retired to New Jersey. Here he resumed his old comradeship with Nature, and in 1877 was able to write

"I have been almost two years, off and on, without drugs and medicines, and daily in the open air. Last summer I found a particularly secluded little dell off one side by my creek, originally a large dug-out marl-pit, now abandoned, filled with bushes, trees, grass, a group of willows, a straggling bank and a spring of delicious water running right through the middle of it, with two or three little cascades. Here I retreated every hot day, and follow it up this summer. Here I realise the meaning of that old fellow who said he was seldom less alone than when alone. Never before did I come so close to Nature, never did she come so close to me. By old habit I pencilled down from time to time almost automatically, moods, sights, hours, tints, and outlines on the spot."

During the "early candle-light of old age," as he so beautifully expressed his declining years, he gave us Memoranda during the War (1875), Specimen Days (1882), November Boughs (1888).

On his birthdays a dinner was given in his honour, when friends from all parts of the world either wrote or journeyed to congratulate the veteran. The greetings from friends in England particularly delighted him, but, he said, "Don't let them think of me as a saint, or a finished anything."

Goodbye, my Fancy—that he called his "last chirp"—appeared in 1891; in December he was ill with congestion of the lungs and lingered till March 26, 1892, when he passed quietly into the Unknown.

HIS WORK

Perhaps the chief defect in American verse, up to Whitman, lies in its excess of culture. The majority of the poets are men of scholarly attainments, steeped in literature rather than in life; and although some of them, like Whittier and Lowell, found inspiration in the social and political development of their time, they were lacking on the whole in a large, virile grasp of life, a first-hand elemental vigour that comes to those who have lived widely and deeply, and whose song is the direct product of their intimate experiences. Emerson counselled a return to Nature, but it was Nature in terms of philosophic abstraction. Thoreau, it is true, literally did return to Nature, for he had a touch of the wild and elemental about him—he knew what it was to come into direct relation with Nature, and counselled every man to do so as a necessary part of his education. Yet his scholarship and culture determined the form and scope of his Art. Poe is an intellectual hedonist, Bryant and Whittier cultured moralists; Holmes and Lowell were scholarly men of the world, Longfellow a scholarly sentimentalist; one and all were more or less derivative poets inasmuch as they were steeped in the ancient traditions of English literature, and followed well-beaten paths. And then came Whitman, in aim a literary revolutionary. Whitman is essentially a loafer, a loafer along the crowded streets, a loafer along the countryside, a loafer both in the spiritual and physical sense; and his writings are the frankly direct expression of his loafings. He is the Orson of literature. Unconventionality he carries out to its logical conclusion, and strides stark naked among our academies of learning. A strange, uncouth, surprising figure, it is impossible to ignore him, however much he may shock our susceptibilities. His songs are no mere peans of rustic solitudes, they are songs of the crowded streets, as well as of the country roads; of men and women of every type—no less than of the fields and the streams. In fact, he seeks the elemental everywhere. His business is to bring it to the surface, to make men and women rejoice in—not shrink from—the great primal forces of life. But he is not for moralising:

"I give nothing as duties,
What others give as duties I give as loving impulses.
(Shall I give the heart's action as a duty?)"

He has no quarrel with civilisation as such. The teeming life of the town is as wonderful to him as the big solitude of the Earth. Carlyle's pleasantries about the communistic experiments of the American Transcendentalists would have no application for him. "A return to Acorns and expecting the Golden Age to arrive."

Here is no exclusive child of Nature:

"I tramp a perpetual journey. . . .
My signs are a rainproof coat, good shoes, and a staff cut from the woods. . . .
I have no chair, no church, no philosophy."

People talk of Whitman as if he relied entirely on the "staff cut from the woods"; they forget his "rainproof coat and good shoes." Assuredly he has no mind to cut himself adrift from the advantages of Civilization.

First of all, Whitman's attitude towards Art.

It has been urged by some of Whitman's admirers that his power as a writer does not depend upon his artistic methods or non-artistic methods, and he himself protested against his Leaves being judged merely as literature. And so there has been a tendency to glorify his very inadequacies, to hold him up as a poet who has defied successfully the unwritten laws of Art.

This is to do him an ill service. If Whitman's work be devoid of Art, then it possesses no durability.

In other words, Whitman must be judged ultimately as an artist. And on the whole he can certainly bear the test. His Art was not the conventional Art of his day, but Art it assuredly was.

Who could deny the title of artist to the man who wrote those noble verses, On the Beach at Night:

"On the beach at night,
Stands a child with her father,
Watching the east, the autumn sky.

Up through the darkness,
While ravening clouds, the burial clouds, in black masses spreading,
Lower sullen and fast athwart and down the sky,
Amid a transparent clear belt of ether yet left in the east,
Ascends large and calm the lord star Jupiter,
And nigh at hand, only a very little above,
Swim the delicate sisters the Pleiades.

From the beach the child holding the hand of her father,
Those burial clouds that lower victorious soon to devour all
Watching, silently weeps

'Weep not, child,
Weep not, my darling,
With these kisses let me remove your tears,
The ravening clouds shall not long be victorious,
They shall not long possess the sky, they devour the stars only in apparition,
Jupiter shall emerge, be patient, watch again another night, the Pleiades shall emerge,
They are immortal, all those stars both silvery and golden shall shine out again,
The great stars and the little ones shall shine out again, they endure
The vast immortal suns and the long-enduring pensive moons shall again shine

'Then, dearest child, mournest thou only for Jupiter?
Considerest thou alone the burial of the stars?

'Something there is,
(With my lips soothing thee, adding I whisper,
I give thee the first suggestion, the problem and indirection)

Something there is more immortal even than the stars,

(Many the burials, many the days and nights, passing away)

Something that shall endure longer even than lustrous
Jupiter,

Longer than sun or any revolving satellite,
Or the radiant sisters the Pleiades."

Or those touching lines, Reconciliation:

"Word over all beautiful as the sky,
Beautiful that war and all its deeds of carnage must in time be utterly lost,
That the hands of the sisters Death and Night incessantly wash again, and ever again, this soil'd world,
For my enemy is dead, a man divine as myself is dead,
I look where he lies white faced and still in the coffin—
I draw near—
Bend down and touch lightly with my lips the white face in the coffin."

Or the song of Death in that splendid dirge in commemoration of President Lincoln:

"Come, lovely and soothing death,
Undulate round the world, serenely arriving, arriving,
In the day, in the night, to all, to each,
Sooner or later delicate death.

Praise'd be the fathomless universe,
For life and joy, and for objects and knowledge curious,
And for love, sweet love—but praise ' praise ' praise!
For the sure-enwinding arms of cool-enfolding death

Dark mother always gliding near with soft feet,
Have none chanted for thee a chant of fullest welcome?
Then I chant it for thee, I glorify thee above all,
I bring thee a song that when thou must indeed come, come unfalteringly."

This is not only Art, but great Art. So fresh in their power, so striking in their beauty, are Whitman's utterances on Death, that they take their place in our memories beside the large utterances of Shakespeare, Milton, and Shelley.

It is a mistake to think that where Whitman fails in expression it is through carelessness, that he was a great poet by flashes, and that had he taken more pains he would have been greater still. We have been assured by those who knew him intimately that he took the greatest care over his work, and would wait for days until he could get what he felt to be the right word.

To the student who comes fresh to the study of Whitman it is conceivable that the rude, strong, nonchalant utterances may seem like the work of an inspired but careless and impatient artist. It is not so. It is done deliberately.

"I furnish no specimens," he says; "I shower them by exhaustless laws, fresh and modern continually, as Nature does."

He is content to be suggestive, to stir your imagination, to awaken your sympathies. And when he fails, he fails as Wordsworth did, because he lacked the power of self-criticism, lacked the faculty of humour—that saving faculty which gives discrimination and intuitively protects the artist from confusing pathos with bathos, the grand and the grandiose. Nowhere is this more apparent than in his treatment of Sex. Frankness, outspokenness on the primal facts of life are to be welcomed in literature. All the great masters—Shakespeare, Dante, Dostoevsky, Tolstoy—have dealt openly and fearlessly with the elemental passions. There is nothing to deplore in this, and Swinburne was quite right when he contended that the domestic circle is not to be for all men and writers the outer limit of their world of work. So far from regretting that Whitman claimed right to equal freedom when speaking of the primal facts of procreation as when speaking of sunrise, sun-setting, and the primal fact of death, every clean-minded man and woman should rejoice in the poet's attitude. For he believed and gloried in the separate personalities of man and woman, claiming manhood and womanhood as the poet's province, exulting in the potentialities of a healthy sexual life. He was angry, as well he might be, with the furtive snigger which greets such matters as motherhood and fatherhood, with the prurient unwholesomeness of a mind that can sigh sentimentally over the "roses and raptures of Vico" and start away shamefaced from the stark passions—stripped of all their circumlocutions. He certainly realised as few have done, the truth of that fine saying of Thoreau's, that "for him to whom sex is impure there are no flowers in Nature."

But at the same time, one cannot help feeling that Stevenson was right when he said that Whitman "loses our sympathy in the character of a poet by attracting too much attention—that of a Bull in a China Shop."¹

His aim is right enough, it is to his method one may take objection. Not on the score of morality: Whitman's treatment of passion is not immoral; it is simply like Nature itself—unmoral. What shall we say then about his sex cycle, Children of Adam? Whitman, in his anxiety to speak out freely, simply, naturally, to vindicate the sanity of coarseness, the poetry of animalism, seems to me to have bungled rather badly. There are many fine passages in his Song of the Body Electric and Spontaneous Me, but much of it impresses as bad art, and is consequently ineffectual in its aim. The subject demands a treatment at once strong and subtle—I do not mean finicking—and subtlety is a quality not vouchsafed to Whitman. Lacking it, he is often unconsciously come where he should be gravely impressive. "A man's body is sacred, and a woman's body is sacred." True, but the sacredness is not displayed by making out a tedious inventory of the various parts of the body. Says Whitman in effect: "The sexual life is to be gloried in, not to be treated as if it were something shameful." Again true, but is there not a danger of missing the glory by discoursing noisily on the various physiological manifestations? Sex is not the more wonderful for being appraised by the big drum.

The inherent beauty and sanctity of Sex lies surely in its superb unconsciousness; it is a matter for two human beings drawn towards one another by an indefinable, world-old attraction; scream about it, caper over it, and you begin to make it ridiculous, for you make it self-conscious.

Animalism merely as a scientific fact serves naught to the poet, unless he can show also what is as undeniable as the bare fact—its poetry, its coarseness, and its mystery go together. Browning has put it in a line

" . . . savage creatures seek
Their loves in wood and plain—and God renews
His ancient rapture "

* Familiar Studies of Men and Books, by R. L. Stevenson.

It is the "rapture" and the mystery which Whitman misses in many of his songs of Sex.

I have another objection against The Children of Adam. The loud, self-assertive, genial, boastful style of Whitman suits very well many of his democratic utterances, his sweeping cosmic emotions. But here it gives one the impression of a kind of showman, who with a flourishing stick is shouting out to a gaping crowd the excellences of manhood and womanhood. Deliberately he has refrained from the mood of imaginative fervour which alone could give a high seriousness to his treatment—a high seriousness which is really indispensable. And his rough, slangy, matter-of-fact comments give an atmosphere of unworthy vulgarity to his subject. Occasionally he is carried away by the sheer imaginative beauty of the subject; then note how different the effect.

"Have you ever loved the body of a woman,
Have you ever loved the body of a man,
Do you not see that these are exactly the same to all in all
Nations and times all over the earth?
If anything is sacred, the human body is sacred,
And the glory and sweet of a man is the token of manhood untainted,
And in man or woman a clean, strong, firm-fibred body is
More beautiful than the most beautiful face."

If only all had been of this quality. But interspersed with lines of great force and beauty are cumbersome irrelevances, wholly superfluous details.

It is not, then, because Whitman treats love as an animal passion that I take objection to much in his Children of Adam. There are poets enough and to spare, who sing of the sentimental aspects of love. We need have no quarrel with Whitman's aim as expressed by Mr John Burroughs: "To put in his sex poems a rank and healthy animality, and to make them as frank as the shedding of pollen by the trees, strong even to the point of offence." All we ask is for him to do so as a poet, not as a mere physiologist. And when he speaks one moment as a physiologist, next as a poet; at one time as a lover, at another as a showman, the result is not inspiring. "He could not make it pleasing," remarks Mr Burroughs, "a sweet morsel to be rolled under the tongue, that would have been levity and sin, as in Byron and the other poets. He would sooner be bestial than Byronic, he would sooner shock by his frankness than inflame by his suggestion." This vague linking together of "Byron and the other poets" is not easy to understand. In the first place, not one of the moderns has treated love from the same standpoint. Shelley, for instance, is transcendental, Byron elemental, Tennyson sentimental, Rossetti looks at the soul through the body, Browning regards the body through the soul. There is abundant variety in the treatment. Then, again, why Byron should be angled out especially for opprobrium I fail to see, for love is to him the fierce, elemental passion it is for Whitman. As for frankness, the episode of Haidee and Don Juan does not err on the side of reticence. Nor is it presently suggestive. It is a splendid piece of poetic animalism. Let us be fair to Byron. His work may in places be disfigured by an unworthy cynicism, his treatment of sexual problems be marred by shallow flippancy; but no poet had a finer appreciation of the essential poetry of animalism than he, and much of his cynicism, after all, is by way of protest against the same narrow morality at which Whitman girds.

It may be objected, of course, that Whitman does not aim in his sex poems at imaginative beauty, that he aims at sanity and wholesomeness, that what he speaks—however rank—makes for healthy living. Maybe; I am not concerned to deny it. What I do deny is the implication that the wholesomeness of a fact is sufficient justification for its treatment in literature. There are a good many disagreeable things that are wholesome enough, there are many functions of the body that are entirely healthy. But one does not want them enshrined in Art.

On the other hand, to attack Whitman on the score of morality is unjustifiable, his sex poems are simply unmoral. But had he flouted his art less flagrantly in them they would have been infinitely more powerful and convincing, and given the Philistines less opportunity for blaspheming.

I have dwelt at this length upon Whitman's treatment of Sex largely because it illustrates his strength and weakness as a literary artist. In some of his poems—those dealing with Democracy, for instance—we have Whitman at his best. In others, certainly a small proportion, we get sheer, unilluminated doggerel. In his sex poems there are great and fine ideas, moments of inspiration, flashes of beauty, combined with much that is trivial and tiresome.

But this, I think, is the inevitable outcome of his style. The style, like the man, is large, broad, sweeping, tolerant, the sense of "mass and multitude" is remarkable, he aims at big effects, and the quality of vastness in his writings struck John Addington Symonds as his most remarkable characteristic.¹ This vast, rolling, processional style is splendidly adapted for dealing with the elemental aspects of life, with the vital problems of humanity. He sees everything in bulk. His range of vision is cosmic. The very titles are suggestive of his point of view: A Song of the Rolling Earth, A Song of the Open Road. There are no detailed effects, no delicate points of light and shade in his writings, but huge panoramic effects. It is a great style, it is an impressive style, but it is obviously not a plastic nor a versatile style. Its very merits necessarily carry with them corresponding defects. The massiveness sometimes proves more unwieldiness, the virile strength tends to coarseness; the eye, fixed on certain broad, distant effects, misses the delicate by-play of colour and movement in the foreground. The persistent unconventionality of metre and rhythm becomes in time a mannerism as pronounced as the mannerism of Tennyson and Swinburne.

I do not urge these things in disparagement of Whitman. No man can take up a certain line wholeheartedly and uncompromisingly without incurring the disabilities attaching to all who concentrate on one great issue.

And if sometimes he is ineffectual, if on occasion he is merely strident in place of authoritative, how often do his utterances carry with them a force and conviction which compel us to recognise the sagacious genius of the man.

Indeed, it is when we examine Whitman's attitude towards Humanity that we realise best his strength and courage. For it is here his qualities find their fittest artistic expression. Nothing in Whitman's view is common or unclean. All things in the Universe, rightly considered, are sweet and good. Carrying this view into social politics, Whitman declares for absolute social equality. And this is done in no doctrinaire spirit, but because of Whitman's absolute faith and trust in man and woman—not the man and woman over-ridden by the artifices of convention, but the "powerful uneducated person." Whitman finds his ideal not in Society (with a capital S), but in artisans and mechanics. He took to his heart the mean, the vulgar, the coarse, not idealising their weaknesses, but imbuing them with his own strength and vigour.

"I am enamoured of growth out of doors
Of men that live among cattle, or taste of the ocean or woods,
Of the builder and steerers of ships, and the wielders of axes, and
The drivers of horses
I can eat and sleep with them week in week out."

Such are his comrades. And well he knows them. For many years of his life he was roving through country and city, coming into daily contact with the men and women about whom he has sung. Walt Whitman—farm boy, school teacher, printer, editor, traveller, mechanic, nurse in the army hospital, Government clerk. Truly our poet has graduated as few have done in the school of Life. No writer of our age has better claims to be considered the Poet of Democracy.

"Whitman," wrote the late Mr. William Clarke, in his stimulating study of the poet,²

"sings of the Modern Man as workman, friend, citizen, brother, comrade, as pioneer of a new social order, as both material and spiritual, final and most subtle, compound of spirit and nature, firmly planted on this rolling earth, and yet 'moving about in worlds not realised.' As representative democratic bard Whitman exhibits complete freedom from unconventionality, a very deep human love for all, faith in the rationality of the world, courage, energy, and the instincts of solidarity."

But he is not concerned to convert you to his way of thinking. He throws out a hint, a suggestion, the rest you must do for yourself.

"I am a man who, sauntering along without fully stopping, turns a casual look upon you and then averts his face. Leaving you to prove and define it. Expecting the main things from you."

Nowhere are Whitman's qualities more admirably shown than in his attitude towards the average

² Walt Whitman, by William Clarke, p. 79.

human being. As a rule, the ordinary man is not a person whom the Poet delights to honour. He is concerned with the exceptional, the extraordinary type. Whitman's attitude, then, is of especial interest.

"I will leave all and come and make the hymns of you ;
None has understood you, but I understand you,
None has done justice to you—you have not done justice to yourself
None but has found you imperfect, I only find no imperfection in you
None but would subordinate you, I only am he who will never consent to subordinate you "

Painters have painted their swarming groups, and the centre figure of all,
From the head of the centre figure, spreading a nimbus of gold coloured light
But I paint myriads of heads, but paint no head without its nimbus of gold-coloured light

From my hand, from the brain of every man and woman it streams effulgently flowing for ever
O ! I could sing such grandeurs and glories about you !
You have not known what you are, you have slumbered upon yourself all your time. . . . "

And so on, in a vein of courageous cheer, spoken with the big, obtrusive genial egotism that always meets us in Whitman's writings. Whitman's egotism proves very exasperating to some readers, but I do not think it should trouble us much. After all, it is the egotism of a simple, natural, sincere nature ; there is no self-satisfied smirk about it, no arrogance. He is conscious of his power, and is quite frank in letting you know this. Perhaps his boisterous delight in his own prowess may jar occasionally on the nerves, but how much better than the affected humility of some writers. And the more you study his writings, the less does this egotism affect even the susceptible. Your ears get attuned to the pitch of the voice, you realise that the big drum is beaten with a purpose. For it must be remembered that it is an egotism entirely emptied of condescension. He is vain certainly, but mainly because he glories in the common heritage, because he feels he is one of the common people. He is proud assuredly, but it is pride that exults in traits that he shares in common with the artist, the soldier, and the sailor. He is no writer who plays down to the masses, who will prophesy fair things—like the mere demagogue—in order to win their favour. And it is a proof of his plain speaking, of his fearless candour, that for the most part the very men for whom he wrote care little for him.

"The art of Art, the glory of expression, and the sunshine of the light of letters is simplicity. Nothing is better than simplicity, nothing can make up for excess or for the lack of definiteness. To carry on the heaven of impulse, and pierce intellectual depths, and give all subjects their articulations, are powers neither common nor very uncommon. But to speak in literature with the perfect rectitude and insouciance of the movements of animals and the unimpeachableness of the sentiment of trees in the woods, and grass by the woodside, is the flawless triumph of Art."

A fitting attitude for a Poet of Democracy, one likely to bring him into direct contact with that broad, variegated stream of human life.

As a panacea for social evils, Whitman believes in the remedial power of comradeship, in a large-hearted charity.

"You felons on trial in courts,
You convicts in prison cells, you sentenced assassins chained and handcuffed with iron,
Who am I, too, that I am not on trial or in prison ?
Me ruthless and devilish as any, that my wrists are not chained with iron, or my ankles with iron ? "

Mark the watchful impassiveness with which he gazes at the ugly side of life.

"I sit and look out upon all the sorrows of the world,
and upon all oppressions and shame,
I hear convulsive sobs from young men at anguish with themselves, remorseful after deeds done."

I see the workings of battle, pestilence, tyranny ;

I see martyrs and prisoners—

I observe a famine at sea—I observe the sailors casting lots who shall be killed, to preserve the lives of the rest.

I observe the slights and degradations cast by arrogant persons upon labourers, the poor, and upon negroes and the like,

All these—all the meanness and agony without end,
I sit and look out upon,
See, hear, and am silent."

No one is too base, too degraded for Whitman's affection. This is no mere book sentiment with him, and many stories are told of his tenderness and charity towards the "dregs of humanity." That a man is a human being is enough for Whitman. However he may have fallen, there is something in him to appeal to. He would have agreed with Browning that:

"Beneath the veriest ash there hides a spark of soul,
Which, quickened by Love's breath, may yet pervade
the whole
O' the grey, and free again be fire, of worth the same
Howe'er produced, for great or little flame is flame."

Like Browning, also, Whitman fears lassitude and indifference more than the turmoil of passion. He glories in the elemental. At present he thinks we are too fearful of coarseness and rankness, lay too much stress on refinement. And so he delights in "unrefinement," glories in the woods, air-sweetness, sun-tan, brawn.

"So long !

I announce a life that shall be copious, vehement,
spiritual bold,

And I announce an old age that shall lightly and joyfully meet its translation."

Cultured conventions, of which we make so much, distress him. They tend, he argues, to enervation, to a poor, imitative, self-conscious art, to an artificial, morbid life.

His curative methods were heroic ; but who can say that they were not needed, or that they were mischievous ?

Certainly, in aiming first of all at sincerity he has attained that noble beauty which is born of strength. Nature, as he saw, was full of vital loveliness by reason of her very power. The average literary artist is always seeking for the loveliness, aiming after beauty of form, without a care whether what he is saying has the ring of sincerity and truth, whether it is in touch with the realities of Nature. And in his super-refinements he misses the beauty that flashes forth from the rough, savage songs of Whitman.

Whitman does not decri culture. But he places first the educative influence of Nature. "The best culture," he says, "will always be that of the manly and courageous instincts and loving perception, and of self-respect."

No advocate of lawlessness he; the influence of modern science informs every line that he has written.

To speak of him as did his biographer, Dr. Bucke, as "perhaps the most advanced nature the world has yet produced," to rank him, as some have done, with the world's greatest moral teachers, beside Jesus and Socrates, seems to me the language of hysterical extravagance. Nay, more, it misses surely the special significance of his genius. In his religious thought, his artistic feelings, his affections, there is breadth of sympathy, sanity of outlook, but an entire absence of intensity, of depth.

We shall scan his pages vainly for the profound aspiration, the subtle spiritual insight of our great religious teachers. In his indifference to form, his insensibility to the noblest music, we shall realise his artistic limitations.

Despite his genial comradeship, the more intimate, the more delicate experiences of friendship are not to be found in his company. Delicacy, light and shade, subtlety, intensity, for these qualities you must not seek Whitman. But that is no reason for neglecting him. The Modern and Ancient world are rich in these other qualities, and the special need of the present day is not intensity so much as sanity, not subtlety so much as breadth.

In one of his telling phrases, Mr. Havelock Ellis has described Whitman "as a kind of Titano Undine."¹

Perhaps it is a good thing for us that he never "found his soul." In an age of morbid self-inspection there is something refreshing in an utterance like this, where he praises the animals because .

"They do not sweat and whine about their condition,
They do not lie awake in the dark and weep for their sins,

They do not make me sick discussing their duty to God."

The academic traditions of American Literature were rudely shaken by Whitman. If, with the majority, we suffer from a plethora of culture, Whitman certainly redresses the balance. Not that he was a Goth in this respect; he loved the great race-utterances of the world, the Bible, Homer, the Nibelungenlied, the elemental side of Shakespeare, and those sufficed him. The wisdom that we find in his pages is not the wisdom of a well stored mind, not the wisdom of a profoundly reflective nature, not the wisdom of an Art sensitive nature. It is the wisdom of a hearty and primal nature immensely receptive to the primal forces about him in Life, whether in Nature or in human society. All this, of course, he might have had and not been a force in letters save by some happy accident. Unresponsive as he was to the subtler beauties of life, he had an instinctive sense of beauty, which in a curious, unregulated and often coarse grained way, vouchsafed to him from time to time the fine intuition of the great poet. To regard him as a mere egotistic power, whose "barbaric yawp" has no place in literature, is as far from the truth as is the attitude of his fervent disciples, who claim him as one of the greatest poets, as well as one of the greatest moral teachers the world has seen. His work is far too unformed and chaotic, too full of absurd bathos and amazing doggerel, for us to acknowledge him as a great poet. But among the chaos are shooting stars, in the midst of the rank tangle of weeds are precious flowers—not garden blossoms, but beautiful wild ones. It is here that the supreme value of Whitman's work lies. He is a fresh and original first-hand power that has brought into English letters a healthy and reviving influence.

Standing on the verge of a new era of democratic ascendancy, we need a broader basis, a more intimate vitality for our Art. The Pre-Raphaelite movement in letters, memorable as it was for its passionate insistence on the ideal of beauty, exhibited in its methods one grave defect. In its endeavour to break away from the scientific and social tendencies of the day, that had invaded poetry and jeopardised its grace and charm, it had with its artistic exclusiveness lost in human significance. With all his faults as an artist, Browning worked on surer and surer lines, in keeping poetry in intimate touch with life. You do not strengthen any art by closing the gates on new forces, new influences; you must take them in with all their roughness and disturbing quality and try to transform them into beauty.

Browning, to a large extent, did this, though he retained many of the old poetic forms. Whitman, with greater daring but with less intellectual power, invented fresh forms to express the fresh forces. He was not great enough to do this with complete success, but to a large extent he triumphed. His failure lay less in his methods than in his personal shortcomings.

There had been many democratic poets in the nineteenth century, but he is the first real poet of democracy. Out of the throes of the Industrial Revolution had been born a lusty, clamorous infant that demanded recognition—the new Demos. And it claimed not only recognition in politics, but recognition in literature. Wordsworth and Shelley essayed to speak for it with varying success; but Wordsworth was too exclusive, and Shelley—the most sympathetic of all our poets till the coming of Browning—was too ethereal in his manner. Like his own skylark, he sang to us poised midway between earth and heaven; a more emphatically flesh and blood personage was wanted.

Here and there a writer of genuine democratic feeling, like Ebenezer Elliot, voiced the aspirations of the people, but only on one side. Thomas Hood and Mrs. Browning sounded a deeper note; but the huge clamorous populace needed a yet fuller note, a more penetrating insight, a more forceful utterance. And in America, with its seething democracy—a democracy more urgent, more insistent than our own—it found its spokesman. That it did not recognise him, and is only just beginning to do so, is not remarkable. It did not recognise him, for it had scarcely recognised itself. Only dimly did it realise its wants and aspirations. Whitman divined them; he is the Demos made articulate.

Perhaps the most inspiring thing about Whitman's attitude towards humanity is his thorough understanding of the working classes, and his quick discernment of the healthy naturalism that animates them. He neither patronises them nor idealises them. He sees their faults, which are obvious enough, but he also sees, what is not so obvious, their fine independence of spirit, their eager thirst for improvement, for ampler knowledge, for larger opportunities, and their latent idealism.

He was not a philosopher as Browning was; indeed, there is less of the philosopher about Whitman than about any poet of our age. His method is quite opposed to the philosophic. It is instinctive, suggestive, and as full of contradictions as Nature herself. You can no more extract a philosophy from his sweeping utterances than you can from a tramp over the hills.

But, like a tramp over the hills, Whitman fits every reader who accompanies him for a stronger and more courageous outlook. It is not easy to say with Whitman as is the case with many writers. "This line quickened my imagination, that passage unravelled my perplexities." It is the general effect of his writings that exercises such a remarkable tonic influence. Perhaps he has never indicated this cumulative power more happily than in the lines that conclude his Song of Myself:

"You will hardly know who I am, or what I mean,
But I shall be good health to you nevertheless,
And filter and fibre your blood
Failing to fetch me at first keep encouraged,
Missing me one place search another,
I stop somewhere waiting for you."

Yes, that is Whitman's secret—"Good health."

"Flow on, river! flow with the flood-tide, and ebb with the ebb-tide!
Frolic on, created and scallop-edg'd waves!
Gorgeous clouds of the sunset! drench with your splendour me, or the men and women generations after me!"

MISCELLANEOUS VERSE WRITERS

MEANWHILE, during the time that Whitman was sounding a new note in literature, a number of lesser writers were continuing the elder tradition of verse. Among these may be mentioned NATHANIEL PARKER WILLIS (1806-1867), a facile writer whose sentimental verse, now almost forgotten, was once as popular as the verse of Tom Moore; CHARLES FENNO HOFFMAN (1806-1884), less popular and singularly unequal, but a sweet Cross from shore to shore, countless crowds of passengers!

Stand up, tall masts of Mannahatta! stand up, beautiful hills of Brooklyn!

Throb, baffled and curious brain! throw out questions and answers!

Suspend here and everywhere, eternal float of solution!

Gaze, loving and thirsting eyes, in the house or street or public assembly!

Sound out, voices of young men! loudly and musically call me by my highest name!

Live, old life! play the part that looks back on the actor or actress!

Play the old rôle, the rôle that is great or small according as one makes it!

Consider, you who peruse me, whether I may not in unknown ways be looking upon you,

Be firm, rail over the river, to support those who lean idly, yet haste with the hastening current,

Fly on, sea-birds! fly sideways, or wheel in large circles high in the air,

Receive the summer sky, you water, and faithfully hold it till all the downcast eyes have time to take it from you!

Diverge, fine apokes of light, from the shape of my head, or anyone's head, in the sunlit water!

Come on, ships from the lower bay! pass up or down white sail'd schooners, sloops, lighters!

Flaunt away, flags of all nations! be duly lowered at sunset!

Burn high your fires, foundry chimneys! cast black shadows at nightfall! cast red and yellow light over the tops of the houses!

Appearances, now or henceforth, indicate what you are,

You necessary film, continue to envelop the soul, About my holy body for me, and your body for you, be hung our divinest aromas,

Thrive cities,—bring your freight, bring your shows, ample and sufficient rivers,

Expand, being than which none else is perhaps more spiritual,

Keep your places, objects than which none else is more lasting

You have waited, you always wait, you dumb, beautiful ministers,

We receive you with free sense at last, and are insatiate henceforward,

Not you any more shall be able to foil us, or withhold yourselves from us,

We use you and do not cast aside—we plant you permanently within us,

We fathom you not—we love you—there is perfection in you also,

You furnish your parts toward eternity,
Great or small you furnish your parts toward the soul!"

singer at his best; and Dr THOMAS WILLIAM PARSONS of Boston (1819-1892), who belongs to the considerable school of scholarly verse-writers, he was strongly affected by the Dante Revival, and no poem that he wrote is happier in its dignity and grace than the Lines on a Bust of Dante.

Two figures of greater literary importance are BAYARD TAYLOR (1825-1878), and SIDNEY LANIER (1842-1881). Taylor was an illustrious traveller.

who lived abroad for two years, seeing a good deal of the democratic life both of Germany and Italy. His first success was made in travel-letters, and he always excelled in these, but he was an effective ballad-writer, his Poem of the Orient (1834) being among his best. His life was one of tragic and varied interest, he essayed much, but perhaps he will best be remembered for his fine translation of Goethe's Faust (unfinished), and his delightful Travel Chat.

Lanier—musician, soldier, poet, and critic—fought for the South in the American War, and emerged from his harrowing experiences broken in health. His skill as a musician is exhibited in his verse, notably The Marshes of Glynn, Sunrise, and Corn. He died of consumption in North Carolina, after a vain search for climes to restore his health. A less considerable figure in American letters than Taylor, he is, if not a more accomplished, a more original poet.

Among the ballads evoked by the Civil War, there is none better than the familiar Maryland, My Maryland, by JAMES RIDER RANDALL.

It is not practicable to discuss here the later development of American verse. All that need be said is that democratic ideals have entered more and more intimately into the poetry of the age, and although no poets of commanding power have arisen, yet such names as THOMAS BAILEY ALDRICH (1836-1896) and RICHARD WATSON GILDER (1844-1909) are sufficient indication of the sound technical accomplishment and imaginative fervour to be found among a large number of latter-day poets.

A Canadian verse-writer of originality and power appears in WILLIAM BLISS CARMAN (1861). His first work, Low Tide on Grand Pré, was published in 1893, and at once made its mark. He is especially happy as a song writer, e.g. Behind the Arras, Ballads of Lost Haven.

PROSE

AMERICAN Poetry has, as its modest pioneer, the pious ineptitudes of the Bay Psalm Book, and American prose was launched in the stormy waters of Puritan theology. Among the earlier New England divines, the most agreeable figure is that of ROGER WILLIAMS (c. 1607-1683), the apostle of toleration, a philologist of some merit, and a vigorous controversialist, whose most famous polemic was his reply to that intolerant and arid divine, JOHN COTTON—The Bloody Tenent (i.e. of persecution) made yet more Bloody by Mr Cotton's endeavours to wash it White.

During the seventeenth century the theocratic ascendancy of the Puritan weakened, and the religious enthusiasm, the ecclesiastical fervour of that era gave place to the political aspiration and democratic spirit of the eighteenth century. Literature then became gradually secularised. In place of The Bloody Tenent of Persecution, we have The Selling of Joseph—one of the earliest Anti-Slavery documents, by JUDGE SEWALL: instead of Orphans well provided for in the Divine Providence, we find a History and Present State of Virginia.

Yet it may be said that Puritanism, just when its theological vitality seemed flickering out, sent out a dying flame more fiery and consuming than ever before. In short, it gave us the Calvinist preacher, JONATHAN EDWARDS (c. 1703-1758). Lacking the culture that has given literary distinction to the writings of continental thinkers like Pascal and Fénelon, he exhibited rare power of dialectic; indeed, his metaphysical skill and imaginative fervour place him among the great theologians of the world. He is best known, perhaps, as the preacher of Hell fire, but this minatory type of sermon was by no means uncommon among the Puritan preachers, and Edwards' more solid claim to remembrance lies in his powerful treatise on the Will, where he refutes the Arminian doctrine of "freedom of choice" and to some extent anticipates Hume's theory of Causation. Edwards' philosophical position, therefore, is quite as compatible with a purely sceptical outlook, though he chose to make it the handmaid of his Calvinistic theology. He was a man of intense sincerity and warm piety, and by no means the harsh, unfeeling dogmatist he is sometimes pictured. Like many another theologian, the man was better than his creed.

Edwards was born at Connecticut, his great contemporary, the utilitarian and scientist, BENJAMIN FRANKLIN, was born three years later, at Boston, Massachusetts. His father was a tallow-chandler with a large family, and Benjamin was apprenticed at an early age to his brother, a printer of the New England Courant. He was a keen devourer of books, and well read in contemporary letters. Addison proved an important literary influence, and his earliest publications, anonymously published, were in the style of the Spectator. Literary, scientific, and political interests absorbed Franklin for the greater part of his life, and whether as a shrewd and homely moralist, as a slashing pamphleteer, as a masterly letter-writer, or a distinguished scientist, he is equally remarkable. But above all, he was a great citizen. In everything that pertains to public life, and the advancement of the best interests of his country, there is no name more dear to America than is that of Benjamin Franklin.

He has given us a vital picture of himself in his famous Autobiography, and no writer is more completely self-revealing in his writings than he. His books and letters give us Franklin's personality in solution. His sense and wit shine in Poor Richard's Almanac, his integrity and robust hopefulness are revealed in the Autobiography, whilst in his dialogues and pamphlets, the level-headedness, the sober dignity, the moral earnestness of the man are richly exhibited. Truly, his was a versatile and many-sided career, such as is seldom vouchsafed to a single personality. He is at once a typical product of the finest elements of American life, and a cosmopolitan force in letters. There have been many greater literary artists, but no one writer who combined in himself so many diverse qualities of sagacious thought, scientific brilliance, shrewd worldliness, and humanitarian zeal.

JOHN WOOLMAN (1720-1772) stands on a lower plane, yet he has many of the qualities that endeared Franklin to us. His Journal reflects a noble and kindly nature, a simple homeliness of disposition, that justify Whitier's assertion that they exhaled "a sweetness as of violets." Born at New Jersey, he worked on a farm for some years, and became in turn a bookkeeper's clerk, a tailor, and a home missionary. Philanthropy and spiritual preoccupations possessed him more and more as he grew older, and he was strenuously opposed to the institution of Slavery, as witness his tract, Some Considerations on the Keeping of Negroes. He died of small-pox in 1772, while on a journey to England.

A gentle and benignant soul, whose one passion was for plain living and high thinking.

Another agreeable personality, with less of the Puritan in his nature, and a more plastic culture, is J. HECTOR ST. JOHN DE CRÉVECEUR (1731-1813), whose Letters of an American Farmer—more idyllic than realistic—are only second in literary charm and human appeal to the Autobiography of Franklin. The idyllic note, if somewhat over-sentimental, has proved peculiarly attractive on that very account, for as Professor Trent has said:

"Crèveceur's imagination, fired by the vastness and the still virgin beauty of the country, and by the unshackled life of its inhabitants, bodied forth an ideal American which the real American has ever since taken more or less to heart."

We now come to the advent of the first professional man of letters in American history. CHARLES BROCKDEN BROWN (1772-1810), came of Quaker parentage, and devoted his earlier years to legal studies. A period of verse-writing of little importance followed; then Brown turned to fiction, where he achieved considerable success. His best novels were Wieland, or, The Transformation (1798), dealing with the hardships of the marriage tie; Ormond; or, The Secret Witness (1799), influenced by Godwin's Caleb Williams; and Arthur Mervyn (1800-1801), remarkable for its haunting picture of a plague-stricken city.

Brown's strength lay in his sensitive and vivid imagination, and although his work owed something to the English Gothic School of Romancers, especially to Walpole and Mrs. Radcliffe, there is abundant originality in the treatment of his themes, and if he has some natural affinity for the wild and mysterious, such as The Mysteries of Udolpho show, he had a greater sense of reality than we find in Mrs. Radcliffe. He is the precursor of Fenimore Cooper, Hawthorne, and Poe.

Before dealing with those great American writers, mention must be made of a man of quite another temperament and order of ability—WASHINGTON IRVING (1783-1859). He came of British stock, his father being Scotch, his mother English, and as a delicate lad he went to Europe in 1804, in quest of health. The change not only restored him physically, but stirred his imaginative power, and as a writer of travel-letters he first attracted attention. On his return in 1806, he undertook the editing of a literary miscellany, Salmagundi, where he tried his hand blithely at every kind of literary experiment—essay, satire, verse, fiction. The death of a girl to whom he was deeply attached, brought out the sentimental and romantic side of his nature; it mellowed also his somewhat over-exuberant humour, and in the comic History of New York, his gifts as a discursive humourist are first clearly seen. But the Sketch Book proved his most emphatic success, for here both his genial fun and romantic imagination find admirable expression. In such tales as Rip Van Winkle, The Spectre Bridegroom, and The Legend of Sleepy Hollow, he invented a fantastic type of romance, less crude and more delicately whimsical than Brown's, while in Christmas Eve and Bracebridge Hall he gave us a charming picture of English country life, second only in merit to those of Goldsmith. His later interest in Spanish history bore fruit in his Life of Columbus (1828), The Conquest of Granada (1829), and The Alhambra (1832). The first is only moderately good, the others gave the author ample scope for his gift of happy description, and contain some of his best writing.

Later in life, after his return to America, he was attracted by the life out West, but though something of this found its way into a Tour on the Prairies, and The Adventures of Captain Bonneville, the romance of the West was to find its most satisfying exponents later in Cooper and Parkman. Biographical work occupied the last few years of his life, but he is not at his best in the Life of Goldsmith or the unfortunate Life of Washington, for he had not the gifts of the true biographer.

Reviewing his work as a whole, we are struck by its freshness, geniality, and picturesque breadth. In many ways Irving is to American prose what Longfellow is to its poetry: he is a varied, wholesome, and attractive writer, somewhat voluminous in his sentiment, and graceful and charming rather than strong and profound. If not a great man of letters, he is a genuine and delightful one.

A RAINY DAY AT THE INN

The day continued lowering and gloomy; the slowly, ragged, spongy clouds drifted heavily along, there was no variety even in the rain, it was one dull, continued, monotonous patter, patter, patter, excepting that now and then I was enlivened by the idea of a brisk shower, from the rattling of the drops upon a passing umbrella. It was quite refreshing—if I may be allowed a hackneyed phrase of the day—when in the course of the morning a horn blew, and a stage-coach whirled through the street with outside passengers stuck all over it, covering under cotton umbrellas, and seethed together, and reeking with the steams of wet box-coats and upper benjamins. The sound brought out from their lurking-places a crowd of vagabond boys and vagabond dogs, and the caroty-headed hostler and that nondescript animal yeclpt Boots, and all the other vagabond race that infest the pulchus of an inn—but the bustle was transient, the coach whirled on its way, and boy and dog, and hostler and Boots, all slunk back again to their holes, the street became silent, and the rain continued to rain on.

The evening gradually wore away. The travellers read the papers two or three times over. Some drew round the fire, and told long stories about their horses, about their adventures, their overturns, and breaking-downs. They discussed the credits of different merchants and different inns, and the two wags told several choice anecdotes of pretty chamber-maids and kind landladies. All this passed as they were quietly taking what they called their nightcaps—that is to say, strong glasses of brandy and water and sugar, or some other mixture of the kind, after which they one after another rang for Boots and the chamber-maid, and walked off to bed in old shoes cut down into marvellously uncomfortable slippers. There was only one man left—a short-legged, long-bodied, plethoric fellow, with a very large, sandy head. He sat by himself with a glass of port wine negus and a spoon, sipping and stirring, and meditating and sipping, until nothing was left but the spoon. He gradually fell asleep bolt upright in his chair, with the empty glass standing before him; and the candle seemed to fall asleep too, for the wick grew long and black, and cabbaged at the end, and dimmed the little light that remained in the chamber. The gloom that now prevailed was contagious. Around hung the shapeless and almost spectral box-coats of departed travellers, long since buried in deep sleep. I only heard the ticking of the clock, with the deep-drawn breathings of the sleeping topor, and the drippings of the rain—drop, drop, drop—from the eaves of the house.¹

JAMES FENIMORE COOPER (1789–1851), was born in New Jersey in September 1789, of mixed English and Swedish stock, and his earliest years were spent amid the wilds still tenanted by the Indians. His scholastic training was brief owing to differences between his father and the authorities at Yale College. Before entering the Navy as a midshipman in 1809, he served two years before the mast in a merchant vessel.

After some years' wandering he married in 1811, and settled down to a country gentleman's life, but chance leading him into experimenting in fiction, he stumbled upon a line of work in which he was to achieve fame. Thus he did not win until after some apprenticeship; but very soon, and despite irritating faults as a writer, he clearly proved himself a story-teller who excelled in action, and none have transcended him as a romancer of the forest, prairie, and the sea. He is uncertain in characterisation—Natty Bumppo notwithstanding—especially with his women, but he has an epic gift for adventure and a strong and robust imagination. Given primal types, such as the Indians, he is admirable. Leather Stocking is a masterpiece; given elemental background such as the sea or the prairie, he is impressive. His effects are highly coloured, and his religious prejudices are frankly insistent. But, like our own Charles Reade, whom he resembles largely in temper and in method, there is a sinewy strength and spacious greatness about his best work. Such stories as The Pilot, The Deerslayer, The Last of the Mohicans, The Pathfinder, The Pioneers, and The Prairie, dealing as they do for the most part with the clash of the new civilisation with the primitive life of Young America, have no peers in romantic fiction. In their own way they are unique.

Among a crowd of lesser romancers who followed Cooper, may be mentioned HERMAN MELVILLE (1819–1891) who spent many years as a sea-lover, and achieved success with his novel Typee, a prelude to Polynesian life (1846), Moo-moo a Narrative of Adventures in the South Sea (1847), and Moby Dick, or the White Whale (1851). As a painter of life at sea he is fully equal to Cooper, but his powers of story-telling are less varied and sustained.

JOHN PENDLETON KENNEDY (1795–1870) wrote one notable romance dealing with the Revolution in the South, Horse-Shoe Robinson, a tale of the Tory ascendancy; and WILLIAM GILLMORE SIMMS (1806–1870), a Southerner, was a more prolific writer with greater staging power, who in The Yemassee, a story of South Carolina, exhibited a rough but genuine power of exciting narrative, not unworthy of Cooper.

We now come to the two greatest forces in American fiction: Hawthorne and Poe.

NATHANIEL HAWTHORNE (1804–1864)

HIS LIFE

The descendant of a long line of sea-worthies, NATHANIEL HAWTHORNE was born at Salem, Mass., on July 4, 1804, and when his father died four years later, his mother, who was but twenty-seven, became depressed and melancholy, living the life of a recluse until her death in 1819. Had it not been for his Uncle Robert, the boy's welfare and education might have fared badly.

Young Hawthorne's first schoolmaster was the eminent Dr. Worcester, then a young graduate fresh from Yale, who had set up a school at Salem. By an accident that prevented him for some years from taking any part in school sports, the lad not unnaturally became a voracious reader—a mixed diet of Shakespeare, Milton, Smollett, and Mrs. Radcliffe (on week days) gave place on Sundays to Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress.

A shy, sensitive, dreamy boy, he lived a singularly lonely life with his mother and sisters, and seems to have had no companions of his own age. When he was fourteen the family left Salem for Raymond, where his grandfather possessed some landed property. Wild and solitary as the country was, and devoid of all society but that of his own family, Hawthorne always looked back upon his two years there as the happiest of his boyhood: "I lived in Maine like a bird of the air," he wrote fifty years later, "so perfect was the freedom I enjoyed. But it was there I first got my cursed habits of solitude."

Leaving Raymond in 1819, two years were spent with the Rev. Caleb Bradley in preparation for college. At the same time, his literary sense began to stir. In 1820 he made his first experiment in journalism: a paper for boys, entitled The Spectator—written with a pen on small notepaper, containing two characteristic essays on Solitude and Industry—four numbers of which were issued from August 21st to September 18th.

But the time had arrived for him to choose a profession, and a letter to his mother revealed his opinions on the subject. The Church was regarded as "so dull a way of life", the Law was put aside, as the multitude of lawyers revealed the fact that "one half of them (upon a moderate calculation) are in a state of actual starvation"; and as a doctor, the idea of living on the diseases of his fellow-creatures did not appeal to him. "What do you think of my becoming an author?" he wrote. "Indeed, I think the illogibility of my handwriting is very author-like."

In the summer of 1821, with no very definite calling in view, Hawthorne left Bowdoin, a small college presided over by a cultured and kindly staff, where Franklin Pierce and Longfellow were his companions. Notwithstanding his retiring disposition, he seems to have taken his share in the rough-and-tumble life of his college. On one occasion he was fined fifty cents for card-playing, but as Hawthorne had a hatred of debt and managed to live on three hundred dollars a year, we may presume that his convivialities were not on a very extensive scale. In 1825 he graduated, and having distinguished himself in Latin and English, returned to Salem, where for twelve years in "the monastery of Home" he lived the somewhat hermit life characteristic of the whole family. His days were spent in reading and study, he received no visitors and made no friendships, and his meals were left outside his locked door until it pleased him to take them in. An early sea bath in the summer, and long walks after dark, appear to have been his sole recreations.

Hawthorne had definitely decided to earn his living by his pen if possible, but his early ventures were doomed to disappointment. Fanshawe in 1826, published anonymously and at his own expense, was a failure; he then wrote a number of short stories, but unable to find a publisher he burned them in disgust. Nothing daunted, however, he proceeded to write another collection which appeared in The Token, edited by S. C. Goodrich ("Peter Parley"), and with some measure of success these made their appearance in 1837 as Twice Told Tales. He also did much editorial work, but the remuneration was so poor that he was glad to accept a post in the Customs at Boston, which he occupied from 1839 to 1841. A year later, he married Miss Sophia Peabody, and in the old dwelling at Concord to which he brought his bride was written the famous Mosses from an Old Manse.

It was at this period that Hawthorne became connected with the Utopian scheme known as the Brook Farm Community, and he does not seem to have been so impressed with the experiment as he anticipated: "I went to live in Arcady," he said, "and found myself up to the chin in a barnyard." However, but for this experience we might never have had The Blithedale Romance (1852).

While acting as Surveyor of the port of Salem, Hawthorne was hard at work on The Scarlet Letter, published in 1850, followed by The House of the Seven Gables (1851), Grandfather's Chair, and The Wonder Book.

On the election of Franklin Pierce to the Presidency, he at once sought out his old friend and schoolfellow. The consulship at Liverpool was offered and accepted by Hawthorne, and in Our Old Home (1863) he gives us a vivid description of the four years spent in England. For the next three years he roamed through France and Italy; a series of Note Books and The Marble Faun being the result of his European wanderings.

On Hawthorne's return to America in 1860, the country was in the throes of an impending civil war, and he found it difficult to settle down, or to give his attention to any serious literary work. His health failed gradually until 1864, when it rapidly gave way, and while on a visit to his friend, ex-President Pierce, the great novelist was taken seriously ill, he died on May 18th, at Plymouth, New Hampshire, and is buried at Concord.

HIS WORK

In Hawthorne's writings there are three characteristics that impress themselves upon the reader—his sense of mystery, his gift of fantasy, his intellectual detachment.

His Sense of Mystery—When Hawthorne declared that he was "a lover of the brown twilight," he gave us, in that admirable, self-revealing phrase, a clue to his outlook as a literary artist. Twilight was his art medium. Some flowers are the sweetest after sunset, and keep their fragrance for the coming of night. So did Hawthorne's genius. But the twilight in which it throbs was a homely one, a warm twilight with gold and sepia in it. Poe also was a lover of the twilight, but it was a grey, brooding one, full of strange unrest. Hawthorne's twilight is a restful atmosphere. Thus his sense of mystery has an individual note about it. It has not the uncanny magic of Poe; it eschews the morbidly grotesque and horrible. It seeks only to reveal the unfamiliar side of familiar things; to put ordinary life in an unusual setting. That this is so is perfectly clear from the exquisite preface to The Scarlet Letter.

"Moonlight in a familiar room," he says, "falling so white upon the carpet, and showing all its figures so distinctly, making every object so minutely visible, yet so unlike a morning or noontide visibility,—is a medium the most suitable for a romance writer to get acquainted with his illusive guests. There is the little domestic scenery of the well-known apartment; the chairs, with each its separate individuality; the centre table, sustaining a work-basket, a volume or two, and an extinguished lamp; the sofa, the bookcase, the picture on the wall;—all these details, so completely seen, are so spiritualised by the unusual light, that they seem to lose their actual substance and become things of intellect. Nothing is too small or too trifling to undergo this change and acquire dignity thereby. A child's shoe, the doll seated in her little wicker carriage, the hobby-horse,—whatever, in a word, has been used or played with during the day, is now invested with a quality of strangeness and remoteness, though still almost as vividly present as by daylight. Thus, therefore, the floor of our familiar room has become a neutral territory, somewhere between the real world and fairyland, where the Actual and the Imaginary may meet, and each imbue itself with the nature of the other."

Hawthorne's world is a real enough world; for a thing seen in the twilight or the moonlight is no more unreal than that seen in the sunlight. But it is different. It gives us a fresh point of view, with a subdued and delicate charm of its own. Poe sought to heighten the excitement of everyday life, Hawthorne merely to heighten the beauty. "Some things we miss," he said, "not because our eyes are not clear enough . . . but because the daylight is too blinding."

His Puritan strain is shown unmistakably in his choice of subjects. Whether we look at his longer romances or his short stories, one thing is clear: Sin in one form or another is the constant pre-occupation. Sinful passion in The Scarlet Letter; hereditary evil in The House of the Seven Gables; the unconscious cruelty of the philanthropist in The Blithedale Romance, sin and human progress in The Marble Faun. Yet no Puritan was ever less didactic than he, and it is in his treatment of the familiar Puritan formulas that the originality of the literary artist emerges. For it is the psychological, not the ethical implications, as we might expect, that immediately concern him. He is fascinated by the mystery of the problem; the obvious moral he passes by.

The Scarlet Letter, for instance, is only superficially a tale of sinful passion, fundamentally it is a study in the pathology of remorse. We are not called upon to assess the responsibility of the vindictive husband, the erring clergyman, or the wife false to her vows. Hawthorne asks us rather to watch the effect of remorse upon the character of the two chief actors, we find ourselves scrutinizing with meticulous care the evil arising from the necessarily furtive up-bringing of the child, the corroding effects of the enforced insincerity of the man's daily life, the spiritual degradation caused by the fateful letter woven on the woman's breast. So in The House of the Seven Gables, the author is not concerned with the character of the original wrong-doing, but with the growing blight spread by this wrong-doing on future generations. It is not with the sour grapes eaten by the father that we are concerned but with the "children's teeth set on edge."

We may apply the same test to all the other stories, where Hawthorne states an ethical problem, and in each case shall we find that it is the mysterious alchemy of sin that attracts him. He treats his subject in fact as an artist, not as a moralist.

A sense of mystery leads its possessor often into vague visions. It is not so with Hawthorne. His best work is clear, definite, and simple. Take as an illustration that beautiful little interlude, The Story of David Swan. It deals with a young man, who while waiting for the coach to take him to the town where he may essay his fortune, falls asleep in a copse near the highway. While he is sleeping, a man and his wife pass by, and attracted by his youth, wish he was their son. They are wealthy. Why should they not adopt him? Had he awakened just then the half-formed resolution might have been confirmed, but he does not wake, and they pass on. Then comes a maiden tripping along; she is fair and sweet and made for love, and she looks with favour on the sleeping youth. Again, if he had awakened just then—what might not the future have held for both of them? She looks wistfully at his upturned face, and in her turn passes on. Then come men with murder in their hearts. They see the sleeping youth and covet his knapsack. But before they can actualise their ugly designs the rattle of the coach is heard on the road, and the sound of the horn.

The youth leaps up from sleep, and jumps on the coach, unconscious of the fact that in this brief space of time while he had been resting, wealth, love, and death had each appeared in turn, and in turn passed him by.

A simple little episode, told with rare delicacy and restraint—an eloquent little fancy on the possibilities of life . . . of the things that nearly happen; an idea that could so easily have been spoiled by a too ponderous purpose, or an over-anxious art. There is no more perfect piece in all Hawthorne's writings than this.

His Gift of Fantasy—Fantasy is common to two classes of writers—those who see more dimly than ordinary people, who see "men as trees walking," and who resort therefore to fantastic images and embellishments to conceal their poverty of sight, and those who see more clearly than the majority, and who use fantasy as a pictorial appeal to impress folk with dimmer power of vision than themselves.

Hawthorne belongs to the latter. There is no greater mistake than to think of him as some readers do, as a vagrant dreamer who saw the world with half-closed eyes. He was a remarkably clear-sighted man, and a proof of this may be seen in the clarity and vividness with which he could, when he chose, draw everyday characters. Take as an illustration his picture of the old apple dealer—it is an amazing little vignette of delicate, detailed observation. De foe himself could not have bettered its realism, for Hawthorne not only sees, but sees into. And it is because he saw behind the externals of his characters, that we are often disinclined to credit him with the power of seeing externals at all.

If we examine a few of his fantasies we shall realise the fundamental reality that underlies them, and not regard them merely as the iridescent spray of an excitable imagination.

In Rappaccini's Daughter we have what is, on the surface, a little fairy tale of love and poison, charmingly told, yet apparently remote enough from ordinary life. Beatrice has been brought up by her father in a garden of beautiful flowers, which derive their fragrance and loveliness from poison. And living and breathing as she does an atmosphere of poison, she is like one of the flowers, lovely as they and as poisonous. Then she falls in love, and her lover finds out, to his horror, the tainted source of her life and beauty. The father is persuaded to destroy this poison in her nature, and administers a powerful antidote. The poison is annihilated, and with it her life also, for poison has become to her a second nature, a law of life, although the law of death to others. The psychological truth underlying this ingenious little romance is incontestable, and Hawthorne, in place of leading us away from reality, as some weavers of fantasy do, brings us through fantasy to the very heart of reality.

Take another fictional extravagance, The Snow Image, a delicate and exquisite little fantasy, told with the simplicity of Hans Andersen. No more charming commentary on the mischief wrought by kind, well-meaning, but unimaginative people could be desired.

Hawthorne's fantasies are never meaningless: they are symbolic. Symbolism is a perilous weapon save in the hands of the true artist. In Hawthorne's hands, it is nearly always attractive; for it is never too obtrusive, never overcrowded.

Donatello's pointed ears (in The Marble Faun) are delicately suggestive of his animal nature; the red stigma over Dimmesdale's heart suggests the corroding remorse within, the likeness of The Great Stone Face to that of the eager seeker who is expecting to see it externalised as some other, never dreaming of himself, is a beautiful reminder of a familiar text.

Sometimes the play of fantasy runs thin, as in The Birth Mark, and the symbolism asserts itself over-insistently, but given the mood (and Hawthorne is essentially a writer for certain moods), the fantasies touch the imagination delicately and pleasantly, like flowers that brush the face in the gloom, dimly seen, and faintly fragrant.

What a grateful contrast from the romantic upholstery of the Gothic school. Here are no stage directions for "screams without"; "lights down" and "lights up", no manipulation of the weather for the sheer purpose of thrill-making. Hawthorne's romantic sympathies surround the simplest things, enveloping their familiar, everyday appearance in his brown twilight atmosphere, until they lose their sharp outline and assume strange and alien shapes. "Among ourselves," he sighed, "there is no fairy land for the romancer." He need not have lamented, his very strength lay in the barrenness of the environment in which he lived, its hard, unblinking actuality. Give him a heap of stones and he sees a ladder at once from earth to heaven. Throw him a handful of nettles and he will, like Eliza, weave out of them mantles of magic. He could strike the hard rock of New England life, and the waters of romance gushed forth at once.

If this be so, says the reader, what miracles will be wrought when he can pass to a land rich in romantic associations? Hawthorne in Italy! does not the combination rouse the highest expectations? What did happen we can see for ourselves in The Marble Faun, and the result is on the whole disappointing. It is a long and ambitious romance, with a fine, promising motif—that of the faunlike being who is suddenly stricken into manhood through an overwhelming passion. But the very richness of the romantic material among the streets of Rome seems to have stunned rather than stimulated his imagination. The book has many beauties: beauties of description, beauties of suggestive fancy; but there is a curious immaturity about it. And as a result of this there is an unreality at times about the fantastic development that we never feel in some of the Twice Told Tales, or Mosses from an Old Manse. He is sensitive enough to the romantic association of his surroundings, but they distract rather than inspire him as a literary artist.

Hawthorne's finest efforts are not the result of external stimulus at all. His gossamer fancies are spun like the spider's web out of his own self. Shorn of romantic surroundings, he achieves his highest triumphs. He was always sighing for richer mental diet, but the sparse, ascetic living suited his temperament and genius best.

"No author," he says, "can conceive of the difficulty of writing a romance about a country where there is no shadow, no antiquity, no mystery, no picturesque and gloomy wrong, nor anything but a commonplace prosperity, as is happily the case with my dear native land. It will be very long, I trust, before romance-writers may find congenial and easily-handled themes either in the annals of our stalwart republic, or in any characteristic and probable events of our individual lives. Romance and poetry, ivy, lichens, and wall-flowers need ruins to make them grow."

We think of his New England Stories, and smile at the perversity of the man unable to realise not only where his own strength lay, but wherein lies the real spirit of romance. "Romance and poetry, ivy, lichens, and wallflowers need ruins to make them grow." Fie! Nathaniel Hawthorne, there is no worse pathetic fallacy than this, and your own fantasies give the lie to it. You yourself have shown us that Romance is the poetry of reality, that below every commonplace lurks a mystery; and that the fantasies you love are merely imaginative attitudes without any reference to the thing looked at. Nor can anyone doubt that in his heart he loved what a critic has called the "bleak granite rocks and half-baked civilisation" of his own country; it is this zealous love for them that gives the note of petulance and childishness to his comments on English life. With his sensitive artistic eye he drank in our richer store of romantic material, revelled in the old hospital at Leicester; the historical memories of the countryside; yet smarting all the while, loyal American as he was, that these things were not in his own land. Then in his jealousy he girds at our John Bullism. For his diatribes on Englishmen he has been severely taken to task by English critics. But really it is not for us to cast stones at him. Our own insularity is often far more offensive, when we enter countries other than our own, lacking the excuse that Hawthorne had at his uncongenial post at the Liverpool Customs Office, where he first took stock of our countrymen. Yet he is exquisitely alive to the romantic aspects of English life, though firmly convinced that we have too much beer and roast beef in us to appreciate them. That he under-estimated our imaginative powers, need not prevent us from appreciating his

His Intellectual Detachment—Behind the romantic idealism of Hawthorne, behind that acute sense of spiritual perspective that we call mystery, there is a cool, inquisitive intellect. There is no passion in his writing, often as he deals with passion. His imagination is fertile and exquisite, but the flowers it gives birth to are no rich, vital blooms, but delicate, faintly-tinted, faintly-scented blossoms, with a palpable yet chill beauty of their own—for the cool, bracing air of New England has helped to nurture them. He has the hand of the artist, but the soul of the scientist. He probes, analyses, weighs dispassionately (when his prejudices are not engaged), keeping himself in detachment from his subject so as to more thoroughly rate its value. Take as an illustration of this, the powerful passage where he addresses the dead body of Squire Pyncheon, running steadily and relentlessly through the dead Judge's appointments and idiosyncrasies so as to make us realise the littleness of the man and the irony presented by his mute, lifeless figure. It is a fine passage, and the mystery and pitifulness of death are admirably suggested, yet the cold, relentless analysis of the man's short-comings (just as it is), reveals a fresh side of Hawthorne's nature.

"Half an hour. Why, Judge, it is already two hours by your own undeviatingly accurate chronometer. Glance your eye down on it and see. Ah! he will not give himself the trouble either to bend his head or elevate his hand, so as to bring the faithful time-keeper within his range of vision. Time all at once appears to have become a matter of no moment with the Judge!"

Yet Hawthorne's emotions never radiate heat as do the emotions of some novelists. His characters pass through awful spiritual experiences, but he intellectualises the tragedy, and though we are interested, even fascinated, we are rarely moved. Think what Charlotte Brontë would have made of the young girl Hilda, burdened by her dead secret, or Mr Hardy of Zenobia with her tragic affliction. Hawthorne's cool, prying intellect moves across his subject, and the emotional problem is scarcely felt. We are looking at a scientific "case," not at a human problem. The Scarlet Letter is a wonderful book, delicate and subtle in its art, noble in its austere beauty, but surely never was a poignant passion so frigidly treated. We are in the spirit of the dissecting-room. Hawthorne will pursue some nice point in psychology or moral pathology with a kind of intellectual fury. This intellectualism comes as a surprise to many readers who imagine that the choice of emotional subject-matter necessitates an emotional treatment. But the imagination has its intellectual side as well as its sentimental side, and the tendency to fantastic treatment is in itself an intellectual bent. Indeed fantasy is the intellect in holiday mood.

Nowhere, however, do we better realise this detachment than in The Blithedale Romance. Ostensibly the record of a communistic experiment, based on the experience of the little colony at Brook Farm, it exhibits in a most striking way the keen analytic power of Hawthorne; and we shall not err greatly if we associate the personality of Miles Coverdale with that of his creator. Coverdale is a sympathetic and kindly man, imaginative enough to sympathise with and understand the aspiration of the little colony, cool and observant enough to note their foibles and weaknesses.

Admirably does he depict in Hollingsworth, the thoroughgoing Reformer and Social Idealist. Read the scene where he and Coverdale are working together, piling stones in a dyke, and the narrow, uncompromising, though desperately nervous character of the man is shown with that dry, astringent humour in which Hawthorne excelled.

"He" (Hollingsworth) "would glare upon us from the thick shrubbery of his meditations, like a tiger out of a jungle, make the briefest reply possible, and betake himself back into the solitude of his heart and mind. . . . He was for ever busy with his strange, and as most people thought, impracticable plan for the reformation of criminals through an appeal to their higher instincts. Much as I liked Hollingsworth, it cost me many a groan to tolerate him on this point. He ought to have commenced his investigation of the subject by committing some huge sin in his proper person, and examining the condition of his higher instincts afterwards."

Yet there is nothing hard in Hawthorne's nature; indeed the intellectual detachment serves as a protection for his fine and delicate sensibilities. There are many fine, tender touches in the characterisation of the girl Priscilla; while the splendid figure of Zenobia is portrayed with a true sense of tragedy.

Mention has been made of Hawthorne's humour, which is too often under-estimated. It is a quiet, insidious humour, the natural product of a brooding, meditative temperament, with no touch in it of animal spirits, but with a whimsical charm that lightens up many a passage in his writings, and flashes agreeably from his letters.

Thus he writes to a friend about his house at Concord:

"I know nothing of the house except Thoreau's telling me that it was inhabited a generation or two ago by a man who believed he should never die. I believe, however, he is dead, at least I hope so, else he may probably reappear and dispute my title to his residence."

Here is a fine touch of self-criticism dealing with his early Custom House experience.

"It was a folly, with the materiality of this daily life pressing so intrusively upon me, to attempt to fling myself back into another age; or to insist on creating a semblance of a world out of airy matter. The wiser effort would have been, to diffuse thought and imagination through the opaque substance of to-day, and thus make it a bright transparency. . . . to seek resolutely the true and indestructible value that lay hidden in the petty and wearisome incidents and ordinary characters with which I was now conversant. The fault was mine. The page of life that was spread out before me was dull and commonplace, only because I had not fathomed its deeper import. A better book than I shall ever write was there. . . . These perceptions came too late. . . . I had ceased to be a writer of tolerably poor tales and essays, and had become a tolerably good Surveyor of the Customs. That was all. But, nevertheless, it is anything but agreeable to be haunted by a suspicion that one's intellect is dwindling away, or exhaling, without your consciousness, like ether out of a phial, so that at every glance you find a smaller and less volatile residuum."

He comments thus on a child's drawing :

"One of the children drawing a cow on the black-board says, 'I'll kick this leg out a little more,' a very happy energy of expression, completely identifying herself with the cow ; or perhaps as the cow's creator, conscious of full power over its movements "

Thus, on a domestic duty performed during his wife's absence .

"The washing of dishes does seem to me the most absurd and unsatisfactory business that I ever undertook . If, when once washed, they would remain clean for ever and ever (which they ought in all reason to do, considering how much trouble it is) there would be less occasion to grumble, but no sooner is it done than it requires to be done again "

Again :

"I am at this moment superintending the corned beef, which has been on the fire, as it seems to me, ever since the beginning of time, and shows no symptoms of being done before the crack of doom . . . To say the truth, I look upon it as such a masterpiece in its way that it seems irreverential to eat it . Things on which so much thought and labour are bestowed should surely be immortal "

Again .

"I went to George Hillard's office, and he spoke with unmitigable resolution of the necessity of my going to dine with Longfellow before returning to Concord ; but I have an almost miraculous power of escaping from necessities of this kind . Destiny itself has often been worsted in the attempt to get me out to dinner "

His literary style is no less the result of his intellectual subtlety, than of his sympathetic imagination . It gives form and precision to his fancies :

"The wine demanded so deliberate a pause in order to detect the hidden peculiarities and subtle exquisiteness of its flavour, that to drink it was really more a moral than a physical enjoyment "

"His feeling for flowers was very exquisite, and seemed not so much a taste as an emotion "

"She was plucked out of a mystery and had its roots still clinging to her."

Hawthorne is referred to frequently as a mystic . Now a mystic is, above all things, a man who is in intimate touch with spiritual realities . If Vaughan, Blake, and Francis Thompson are mystics (and no one would deny this), then assuredly Hawthorne is not . He loved mystery, it touched his imagination and excited his curiosity, but he loved it as a literary artist, just as did Rossetti, and to have a subtle sense of the mystery of life is not necessary to be a mystic . His inheritance of Puritan instincts, again, is used as a pigment to paint his pictures, not as a creed to regulate his outlook on life . Ethical preoccupations drift through his pages, yet he is not really a moralist ; he is not concrete, practical, direct enough, he never became more than a psychological dreamer, fascinated by the complexities of the human conscience and allowing his delicate fancies to play over them . He holds, indeed, a unique place in English letters, by virtue of a subtle, elusive genius that concerns itself neither primarily with the world of everyday life, nor with the world of the spirit ; but is poised midway—in a shadowy borderland —a visionary with his head amid the star-dust of romance, his feet set firm on the concrete actualities of life.

"A large number of passengers were already at the station-house awaiting the departure of the cars. By the aspect and demeanour of those persons it was easy to judge that the feelings of the community had undergone a very favourable change in reference to the celestial pilgrimage. It would have done Bunyan's heart good to see it . Instead of a lonely and ragged man, with a huge burden on his back, plodding along sorrowfully on foot while the whole city hooted after him, here were parties of the first gentry and most respectable people in the neighbourhood setting forth towards the Celestial City as cheerfully as if the pilgrimage were merely a summer tour . Among the gentlemen were characters of deserved eminence—magnates, politicians, and men of wealth, by whose example religion could not but be greatly recommended to their meaner brethren . In the ladies' apartment, too, I rejoiced to distinguish some of those flowers of fashionable society who are so well fitted to adorn the most elevated circles of the Celestial City . There was much pleasant conversation about the news of the day, topics of business, and politics, or the lighter matters of amusement, while religion, though indubitably the main thing at heart, was thrown tastefully into the background . Even an infidel would have heard little or nothing to shock his sensibility .

"One great convenience of the new method of going on pilgrimage I must not forego to mention. Our enormous burdens, instead of being carried on our shoulders as had been the custom of old, were all snugly deposited in the baggage car, and, as I was assured, would be delivered to their respective owners at the journey's end . Another thing, likewise, the benevolent reader will be delighted to understand . It may be remembered that there was an ancient feud between Prince Beelzebub and the keeper of the wicket gate, and that the adherents of the former distinguished personage were accustomed to shoot deadly arrows at honest pilgrims while knocking at the door . This dispute, much to the credit as well of the illustrious potentate above mentioned as of the worthy and enlightened directors of the railroad, has been pacifically arranged on the principle of mutual compromise . The prince's subjects are now pretty numerously employed about the station-house, some in taking care of the baggage, others in collecting fuel, feeding the engines, and such congenial occupations ; and I can conscientiously affirm that persons more attentive to their business, more willing to accommodate, or more generally agreeable to the passengers, are not to be found on any railroad . Every good heart must surely exult at so satisfactory an arrangement of an immemorial difficulty .

"Where is Mr. Greathart ?" inquired I . "Beyond a doubt the directors have engaged that famous old champion to be chief conductor on the railroad ?"

"Why, no," said Mr. Smooth-it-away, with a dry cough . "He was offered the situation of brakeman ; but, to tell you the truth, our friend Greathart has grown preposterously stiff and narrow in his old age . He has so often guided pilgrims over the road on foot that he considers it a sin to travel in any other fashion . Besides, the old fellow had entered so heartily into the ancient feud with Prince Beelzebub that he would have been perpetually at blows or ill language with some of the prince's subjects, and thus have embroiled us anew . So, on the whole, we were not sorry when honest Greathart went off to the Celestial City in a huff, and left us at liberty to choose a more suitable and accommodating man . Yonder comes the engineer of the train . You will probably recognise him at once."

"The engine at this moment took its station in advance of the cars, looking, I must confess, much more like a sort of mechanical demon that would hurry us to the infernal regions than a laudable contrivance for smoothing our way to the Celestial City. On its top sat a personage almost enveloped in smoke and flame, which, not to startle the reader, appeared to gush from his own mouth and stomach as well as from the engine's brazen abdomen.

"Do my eyes deceive me?" cried I. "What on earth is this? A living creature? If so, he is own brother to the engine he rides upon!"

"Poh, poh, you are obtuse!" said Mr Smooth-it-away, with a hearty laugh. "Don't you know Apollyon, Christian's old enemy, with whom he fought so fierce a battle in the Valley of Humiliation? He is the very fellow to manage the engine, and so we have reconciled him to the custom of going on pilgrimage, and engaged him as chief engineer!"

"Bravo, bravo!" exclaimed I, with irrepressible enthusiasm; "this shows the liberality of the age; this proves, if anything can, that all musty prejudices are in a fair way to be obliterated. And how will Christian rejoice to hear of this happy transformation of his old antagonist! I promise myself great pleasure in informing him of it when we reach the Celestial City."

"The passengers being all comfortably seated, we now rattled away merrily, accomplishing a greater distance in ten minutes than Christian probably trudged over in a day. It was laughable, while we glanced along, as it were, at the tail of a thunderbolt, to observe two dusty foot travellers in the old pilgrim guise, with cockle-shell and staff, their mystic rolls of parchment in their hands, and their intolerable burdens on their backs. The preposterous obstinacy of these honest people in persisting to groan and stumble along the difficult pathway rather than take advantage of modern improvements, excited great mirth among our wiser brotherhood. We greeted the two pilgrims with many pleasant gibes and a roar of laughter; whereupon they gazed at us with such woeful and absurdly compassionate visages that our merriment grew tenfold more obstreperous. Apollyon also entered heartily into the fun, and contrived to firt the smoke and flame of the engine, or of his own breath, into their faces, and envelop them in an atmosphere of scalding steam. These little practical jokes amused us mightily, and doubtless afforded the pilgrims the gratification of considering themselves martyrs."

"At some distance from the railroad Mr Smooth-it-away pointed to a large, antique edifice, which, he observed, was a tavern of long standing and had formerly been a noted stopping place for pilgrims. In Bunyan's road book it is mentioned as the Interpreter's House."

"I have long had a curiosity to visit that old mansion," remarked I.

"It is not one of our stations, as you perceive," said my companion. "The keeper was violently opposed to the railroad; and well he might be, as the track left his house of entertainment on one side, and thus was pretty certain to deprive him of all his reputable customers. But the footpath still passes his door; and the old gentleman now and then receives a call from some simple traveller, and entertains him with fare as old-fashioned as himself."

"Before our talk on this subject came to a conclusion we were rushing by the place where Christian's burden fell from his shoulders at the side of the Cross. This served as a theme for Mr Smooth-it-away, Mr Live-for-the-world, Mr Hide-sin-in-the-heart, Mr Scalpy-conscience, and a knot of gentlemen from the town of Shun-repentance, to descend upon the inestimable advantages resulting from the safety of our baggage. Myself, and all the passengers indeed, joined with unanimity in this view of the matter; for our burdens were rich in many things esteemed precious throughout the world, and, especially, we each of us possessed a great variety of favourite habits, which we trusted would not be out of fashion even in the polite circles of the Celestial City. It would have been a sad spectacle to see such an assortment of valuable articles tumbling into the sepulchre. Thus pleasantly conversing on the favourable circumstances of our position as compared with those of past pilgrims and of narrow-minded ones at the present day, we soon found ourselves at the foot of the Hill Difficulty. Through the very heart of this rocky mountain a tunnel has been constructed of most admirable architecture, with a lofty arch and a spacious double track, so that, unless the earth and rocks should chance to crumble down, it will remain an eternal monument of the builder's skill and enterprise. It is a great though incidental advantage that the materials from the heart of the Hill Difficulty have been employed in filling up the Valley of Humiliation thus obviating the necessity of descending into that disagreeable and unwholesome hollow."

EDGAR ALLAN POE (1809-1840)

HIS LIFE

On January 19, 1809, the self-willed, reckless, brilliantly-gifted Edgar Allan Poe was born at Boston. His father, of good Irish stock, was destined for the Bar, but preferred the calling of an actor. For this, and for his marriage when nineteen, to a young widow, also an actress, his parents cast him off, and a grim struggle with poverty ensued. Five years later the young couple died of consumption in the same year, leaving three young children.

Edgar, the second child, was adopted by the Allans. Mr Allan was his godfather and a wealthy tobacco merchant. This good fortune was mere apparent than real, and the picture we have of a pretty, precocious child, indulged and petted, standing on a dinner table glass in hand, proposing toasts, can scarcely be considered the best method of youthful training.

When Poe was six years old the Allans crossed to England and the boy was put to school at Stoke Newington; here he remained till 1821, when he returned to the States. After a year's idleness he was sent to a day school at Richmond, Virginia, where the Allans resided. On leaving in 1825 he was a good linguist, and a fair Latin scholar, a voluminous writer of verse, and an excellent swimmer. In January of the following year he was entered at the University of Virginia.

His choice of companions at college was unfortunate. He fell into intemperate habits, and at the end of his first year was heavily in debt through gambling. Mr. Allan was a generous and good-natured man while he had everything his own way, but he was also capricious and exacting, and failed to see that by his own injudicious training of the child he was mainly responsible for the lad's want of moral stamina. He, however, refused to pay Poe's "debts of honour," so his career at the university came to an end. A place was then found for him in Mr Allan's office, but from this unconventional occupation he shortly ran away and enlisted. On the death of Mrs Allan in 1829, the youth returned home, a reconciliation took place, and a substitute was found to return to the regiment of his stead. He was then sent to the Sandhurst in America—West Point.

Poe must have had his industrious moments for

* 1 The Celestial Railroad.

in 1827 he had published Tamerlane and Other Poems, with the following quotation from Cowper on the title-page.

"Young heads are giddy, and young hearts are warm,
And make mistakes for manhood to reform;"

but we cannot trace in his later career that Poe lived up to the latter half of his motto. In March 1831 he was dismissed from West Point and once more thrown penniless upon the world, and at the end of two years he was in the direst poverty. But the tide was turning.

In 1833 he sent his story, A Manuscript Found in a Bottle, to The Saturday Visitor. With this he gained the prize offered of 100 dollars, and from this period Poe had no difficulty in procuring work. His worth was quickly recognised, and for two years he contributed largely to the magazines.

In 1836 he married his young cousin, Virginia Clemm, and it was hoped that his love for his child-wife would have a restraining influence upon his vicious habits, but it was not to be. He successively filled the editorial chairs of The Southern Literary Messenger, The Gentleman's Magazine, and Graham's, in which appeared The Murders in the Rue Morgue, and The Descent into the Maelstrom, and from each of these posts his dissolute ways procured him dismissal.

In 1844 Poe settled in New York with his invalid wife and her mother, whose devotion to her unstable son-in-law was remarkable. On January 29, 1845, The Raven appeared in The Evening Mirror, and shortly afterwards Poe went on the staff of The Broadway Journal, within the same year he was joint-editor, sub-editor, and proprietor, and on January 3, 1846, the paper was issued with the following note.

"Unexpected engagements demanding my whole attention, and the objects being fulfilled, so far as regards myself personally, for which The Broadway Journal was established, I now, as its editor, bid farewell—as cordially to foes as to friends.

"Mr Thomas H. Lowe is authorized to collect all money due the Journal.
EDGAR A. POE."

The little household was then removed from New York to Fordham, Westchester County. Mrs Poe's health was rapidly failing, and she died on January 30, 1847.

It is but fair to Poe's memory to record that after his wife's death he endeavoured to throw off his bad habits, but they had gained too firm a hold upon him. He then had recourse to opium, and the last two years of his life are too sad to recall.

"I have absolutely no pleasure in the stimulants in which I sometimes so madly indulge," he wrote a year before his death. "It has not been in the pursuit of pleasure that I have perilled life and reputation and reason. It has been in the desperate attempt to escape from torturing memories—memories of wrong and injustice and imputed dishonour—from a sense of insupportable loneliness and a dread of some strange impending doom."

After a drunken bout Poe was found insensible in Baltimore and taken to the Washington University Hospital, where he died on October 7, 1849.

HIS WORK

A brilliant though erratic critic, with a naturally fine literary palate, and a bundle of prejudices; an ingenious versifier with flashes of greatness, and a master craftsman in the romance of horror. Thus briefly may we sum up the work of this unhappy man of genius. As a writer of fiction he belongs to the Gothic school, only he achieves with remarkable skill what Mrs Radcliffe, Horace Walpole, Maturin, and Monk Lewis did in cruder and more stumbling fashion, revels as they did in the eerie side of things, but he is a professional artist in horrors, while they were well-meaning amateurs succeeding only by fits and starts and more or less accidentally, in the art of blood-curdling. Maturin, in his Eastern Romances, approaches the closest to Poe in ghoulish power; but a wide gulf divides Valhalla from masterly studies like The Pit and the Pendulum, and the Fall of the House of Usher.

In certain respects Poe resembles his greater contemporary, Hawthorne. He brings to bear upon his work an analytical intellect, a prying imagination. Like Hawthorne he is attracted towards the night side of things, and is fascinated by pathological problems. But here the likeness ends. Poe externalised his horrors, Hawthorne spiritualised them. Hawthorne stimulates our imagination, Poe sears it. In constructive power, Poe is superior; he has a more meticulous mind, a more masculine genius. But the beauty, the delicacy, the essential sanity of Hawthorne is without his range. Even while he grips he disgusts you. There is the reek of the charnel-house in the majority of his tales, and his intensely morbid preoccupation with pain and death oppress one like a miasma. His most agreeable work lies in the direction of the puzzle story. Here his ingenuity and power of rationalisation mark him out as the pioneer of the modern detective story. He is the protagonist of Gaboriau and Du Boisgobey, Anna K. Green, and Conan Doyle. Of their kind, nothing could well be better done than his Murder in the Rue Morgue, his Mystery of Marie Roget, or The Gold Bug. On a somewhat lower plane come his pseudo-scientific tales such as The Descent into the Maelstrom, but even here he opens a new field in fiction which has since his time been more fully exploited by Jules Verne and Mr H. G. Wells.

His studies in morbid psychology exhibit yet a third side of his genius; and if he is excelled here in range and delicacy by his successor, Hawthorne, yet he certainly prepared the way, and putting aside the "spiritual clamminess" which R. H. Hutton found in his tales, the haunting intensity with which he can depict a guilty conscience, or trace the growth of some terrible obsession, as in The Tell-Tale Heart, is horribly effective and arresting.

Poe's work, therefore, when viewed in relation to certain developments in the later fiction of the age, is of undeniable interest, even apart from its intrinsic merit. It is a pity that he wasted his genius so much in the merely gruesome; for his imagination was strong enough to dispense with those adventitious horrors. I do not find fault with him, as some do, because he elected to deal with problems of mental pathology; I blame him because he treats them too little as an artist, too much as a scientist.

As a poet, there is no American man of letters who is his peer in sheer artistry. There is greater artistry in his verse than in his prose, and if the imagination shown is less flexible, less adventurous, it is also less rank, less variable. Its range is narrow; but in that range its effectiveness is remarkable.

In Israfel and To Helen, he has achieved a fantastic beauty and melodic cadence, that of its kind has never been equalled in American literature. Elsewhere in his tenuous body of verse he has shown himself a cunning master of verbal harmonies, and three at least of his poems—The Raven, The Bells, and Annabel Lee—have taken captive the popular imagination to an extraordinary extent. Nevertheless, we cannot but feel the presence, more or less, of a certain strain of affectation and pretentiousness in his verse, which, although not impairing the universal sweetness of his music, debar one from classing it with the romantic lyrics of poets like Shelley, Keats, and Tennyson. The debatable border line between Art and Artifice finds Poe nearly always on the wrong side. Sometimes, as in Annabel Lee and The Bells, faintly so, at others, as in The Haunted Palace and the over-praised Raven, markedly so. Of course many readers do not feel this. To them there is something peculiarly haunting and compelling in Poe's imaginative power, nor do they feel any jarring note. But excepting Israfel, which seems to me quite the most magically perfect thing that Poe ever wrote, there is no poem that is not spoiled, however slightly, by some touch of tinsel.

There is the touch of tinsel even in Helen, with its elusive charm and fine phrasing. It occurs in the third line (the italics are mine):

"Helen, thy beauty is to me
Like those Nicéan barks of yore
That gently, o'er a perfumed sea,
The weary, way-worn wanderer bore
To his own native shore."

Why "perfumed"? This boudoir word strikes an artificial note and will not compensate even for such felicities as:

"The glory that was Greece
And the grandeur that was Rome"

Sometimes the touch of tinsel shows itself, not in a word or a phrase, but in the palpable effort on the part of the writer to intensify his effects. This is the weakness of The Raven. The effects are not subtle enough; the shadows are accented with too obvious a care to achieve the impressive. To a less extent The City in the Sea, with its admirable opening, suffers from over-elaboration. To compare with a fantasy that is perfect in its romantic art, let the reader turn to Tennyson's Lady of Shalott after reading Poe's verse, and he will realise the difference.

Apart from its fitful, though genuine romantic beauty, and admirable though not perfect artistic cunning, Poe's verse is singularly limited in its scope. He never touches the broad, general interests of life and thought, and has nothing of the benign sanity of Longfellow, the tender humanity of Whittier, or the naked force of Whitman. Yet he is an attractive and influential poet in his own way, and as a prosoman one of the few original forces in American letters. Had his breadth and sanity of outlook been at all commensurate with his shaping and imaginative faculty, he would have had no peer in the literature of his country.

THE HAUNTED PALACE

In the greenest of our valleys
By good angels tenanted,
Once a fair and stately palace—
Radiant palace—reared its head
In the monarch Thought's dominion—
It stood there!
Never seraph spread a pinion
Over fabric half so fair!

Banners yellow, glorious, golden,
On its roof did float and flow
(This—all this—was in the olden
Time long ago),
And every gentle air that dallied,
In that sweet day,
Along the ramparts plumed and pallid,
A winged odour went away

Wanderers in that happy valley,
Through two luminous windows, saw
Spirits moving musically,
To a lute's well-tuned law,
Round about a throne where, sitting (Porphyrogene)
In state his glory well befitting,
The ruler of the realm was seen

And all with pearl and ruby glowing
Was the fair palace door,
Through which came flowing, flowing, flowing,
And sparkling evermore,
A troop of Echoes, whose sweet duty
Was but to sing,
In voices of surpassing beauty,
The wit and wisdom of their king

But evil things, in robes of sorrow,
Assailed the monarch's high estate.
(Ah, let us mourn!—for never morrow Shall dawn upon him desolate!)
And round about his home, the glory
That blushed and bloomed
Is but a dim remembered story
Of the old time entombed

And travellers now, within that valley,
Through the red-litten windows see
Vast forms that move fantastically
To a discordant melody,
While, like a ghastly rapid river,
Through the pale door
A hideous throng rush out for ever
And laugh—but smile no more!

THE CITY IN THE SEA

Lo! Death hath reared himself a throne
In a strange city lying alone
Far down within the dim west
Where the good and the bad and the worst and the best
Have gone to their eternal rest
There shrines and palaces and towers
(Time-eaten towers that tremble not)

Resemble nothing that is ours.
Around, by lifting winds forgot,
Resignedly beneath the sky
The melancholy waters lie.

No rays from the holy heaven come down
On the long night-time of that town ;
But light from out the lurid sea
Streams up the turrets silently—
Gleams up the pinnacles far and free—
Up domes—up spires—up kingly halls—
Up lanes—up Babylon-like walls—
Up shadowy long-forgotten bowers
Of sculptured ivy and stone flowers—
Up many and many a marvellous shrine
Whose wreathed friezes intertwine
The viol, the violet, and the vine
Resignedly beneath the sky
The melancholy waters lie
So blend the turrets and shadows there
That all seem pendulous in air,
While from a proud tower in the town
Death looks gigantically down

There open fanes and gaping graves
Yawn level with the luminous waves
But not the riches there that lie
In each idol's diamond eye—
Not the gaily-jewelled dead
Tempt the waters from their bed.
For no ripples curl, alas !
Along that wilderness of glass—
No swellings tell that winds may be Upon some far-off happier sea—
No heavings hint that winds have been
On seas less hideously serene.

But lo, a stir is in the air !
The wave—there is a movement there
As if the towers had thrust aside,
In slightly sinking, the dull tide—
As if their tops had feebly given
A void within the filmy heaven
The waves have now a redder glow—
The hours are breathing faint and low—
And when, amid no earthly moans,
Down, down that town shall settle hence,
Hell rising from a thousand thrones,
Shall do it reverence

ISRAFEL

In Heaven a spirit doth dwell
" Whose heart-strings are a lute ",
None sing so wildly well
As the angel Israfil,
And the giddy stars (so legends tell),
Ceasing their hymns, attend the spell
Of his voice all mute.

Tottering above
In her highest noon,
The enamoured moon
Blushes with love,
While, to listen, the red levin
(With the rapid Pleiades, even Which were seven),
Pauses in Heaven.

And they say (the starry choir
And the other listening things)
That Israfil's fire
Is owing to that lyre
By which he sits and sings—
The trembling living wire
Of those unusual strings.

But the skies that angel trod,
Where deep thoughts are a duty—
Where Love's a grown-up God—
Where the Hours glance are Imbued with all the beauty
Which we worship in a star

Therefore thou art not wrong,
Israfil, who deepest
An unimpassioned song,
To thee the laurels belong,
Best bard, because the wisest !
Merrily live, and long

The ecstasies above
With thy burning measures suit—
Thy grief, thy joy, thy hate, thy love,
With the fervour of thy lute—
Well may the stars be mute !

Yes, Heaven is thine ; but this
Is a world of sweets and sour,
Our flowers are merely—flowers,
And the shadow of thy perfect bliss
Is the sunshine of ours.

If I could dwell
Where Israfil
Hath dwelt, and he where I,
He might not sing so wildly well
A mortal melody,
While a bolder note than this might swell
From my lyre within the sky

The Note of Realism in American Fiction—The later years of the nineteenth century witness a change in the character of American fiction. Hitherto the romantic note had predominated, but just as in England realistic stories of town and country life gradually grew more and more numerous, and relegated romantic adventure to the background, so in America the note of realism becomes gradually insistent. The change was ushered in by no great names as in England, and few would prefer the milk-and-water sentimentalities of The Wide, Wide World of ELIZABETH WETHERELL and The Lamplighter of MARIA S. CUMMINS to the flamboyant excitement of Cooper and Melville.

Far more interesting is the work of such American humorists as Bret Harte and Mark Twain, with its blend of romantic realism and humorous extravagances, yet the growing interest in humanitarian subjects was to produce one memorable writer—HARRIET BEECHER STOWE, who is responsible for several interesting pictures of the quieter aspects of New England life in the Hyperion of Longfellow and the Elsie Venner of Oliver Wendell Holmes.

HARRIET BEECHER STOWE (1811–1896), was born in Connecticut, being the sixth child of the noted Congregational preacher, Lyman Beecher. Her brother, Henry Ward, inherited his father's powers of oratory, and for a while was a figure of almost sensational celebrity in our country. Harriet was a thoughtful, imaginative girl, whose worship of Byron was met by doses of Butler's Analogy—just as a child is given rhubarb for a plethora of sweets. After passing through a religious crisis, she became what we should call pronouncedly "Evangelical" in her views. In 1836 she married the Rev. Calvin E. Stowe, an able scholar, by no means of the dry-as-dust type. He encouraged his wife's literary ambitions and proved a pleasant companion. Meanwhile she was studying the problems of Slavery, and in 1851 Uncle Tom's Cabin was begun for the Anti-Slavery journal Era. As a serial it did not attract much attention. But on its publication in book form it leapt at once into popularity—a popularity that soon became cosmopolitan.

This book was followed by another far less effective slavery story, Dred, a Tale of the Great Dismal Swamp (1856). She made two visits to England, meeting on the first occasion Lady Byron.

After Dred came The Minister's Wooing, an excellent story of colonial life. Among her later writings, Oldtown Folks (1869) is the best, and exhibits clearly the more sober realistic tendencies of the time.

Although she was a voluminous writer in verse, travel-talk, children's stories, novels, her reputation will rest upon Uncle Tom's Cabin, which, with all its crudities, has extraordinary power and grip. Her unfortunate incursion into the Byron controversy, Lady Byron Vindicated, was a sad error of judgment that is best forgotten.

Two novelists of the elder romantic type merit brief notice. These are THEODORE WINTHROP (1828–1861), and FITZJAMES O'BRIEN (c 1828–1862). Winthrop was a man of some culture, with an ebullient literary style, and a tendency to idealise his characters in a slap-dash way, that found many admirers. O'Brien was an attractive Irish-American journalist, with a gift for clever (but only clever) verse, and an ingenious writer of short stories reminiscent of Poe and Hawthorne, yet by no means quite imitative. One of his best tales is The Diamond Lens, really a striking little fantasy.

HENRY JAMES (1843–1916) enjoyed a cosmopolitan education at New York, Geneva, Paris, and Boulogne. Like so many literary men he was destined for the Bar, though he had his sympathies elsewhere. After a brief canter in literary journalism, he published his first novel in 1875, this was succeeded by The American, The European, and Daisy Miller, A Bundle of Letters, and Washington Square (1880). These novels dealt for the most part with American life. In the years following, his locale is more varied, and in several books, The Princess of Casamassima (1886), and A London Life (1889), for example, he presented studies of English society. From the outset he showed a special aptitude for analysis of character, and as the years passed by, his analytical faculty—influenced by the French Realistic school—became more and more subtle. This, combined with an elliptical and somewhat precious style, has stood in the way of his popularity. The subtlety and delicacy of his method are at their best in The Two Magics (1898), where he takes as his motif supernaturalism, and while avoiding all those melodramatic tricks which writers so often resort to, in dealing with this subject, achieves a grim and poignant intensity which he had never hitherto attained. Much of his work, brilliant as it is, is marred by intellectual gymnastics. In this he resembles Meredith. But Meredith's work has a less astringent and, on the whole, more poetical quality about it. Yet at his best, James is a superb literary craftsman, who would be loved better were we less conscious of the craftsmanship.

As a critic, Henry James is always interesting, though somewhat circumscribed in his sympathies. He is seen to best advantage when dealing with modern French literature. His monograph on Hawthorne abounds in just criticism and admirable touches, but in broad comprehensiveness is inferior both to Leslie Stephen's critical essay and to Hutten's masterly little study. His recent autobiographic volumes show him both at his best and at his worst—at his worst in constructive arrangement of his material and in lucidity, at his best in the delicacy and insight of their characterisation.

Of late years American fiction has been particularly rich in writers of distinction, many of whom have proved as popular in England as across the water.

JOEL CHANDLER HARRIS (1848–1908) is affectionately remembered for his inimitable Uncle Remus (1880), and some of our political cartoonists, particularly Mr. F. Carruthers Gould, have good reason to be grateful for the creation of "Brer Rabbit" and the "Tar Baby"—that "kep' on sayin' nothin'."

JAMES LANE ALLEN (1849) of Kentucky has published many tales and sketches, dealing with those regions of America he knows so well, and his delicacy of treatment, his poetic insight into life, give special charm to such stories as A Kentucky Cardinal, A Summer in Arcady, The Choir Invisible.

Less fastidious as a literary artist, but more versatile and spacious as a story-teller, is FRANCIS MARION CRAWFORD (1854–1909), whose novels of Italian life won the hearty admiration of Swinburne. He has written both of American and Italian life, but is at his happiest in the Italian novels. His earlier work—like Mr Isaacs (1882), his first novel, a story of Indian life, Dr Claudius, and The Witch of Prague—depends rather upon the suggestion of mystery and adventure for its interest. But even here, as in A Cigarette Maker's Romance (1890), he showed a real sense of character, and the characterisation of his later novels, e.g. Via Crucis and The Heart of Rome, is excellent.

Two writers of brilliant promise were cut off in the height of their power: HAROLD FREDERIC (1856–1898), born in Utica, New York, exhibited in Illumination (The Damnation of Theron Ware) especially, unusual power of satiric insight and trenchant portraiture, and STEPHEN CRANE (1870–1900), who won fame first of all as a war correspondent (Turkey and Greece), showed later, in his Red Badge of Courage (1895), an extraordinary insight into the psychology of the soldier.

JOHN OLIVER HOBBS (Pearl Mary Teresa Richards), although she lived for most of her life in England, was born in Boston (1867) and comes of American stock. Her early work, Some Emotions and a Moral, The Sinner's Comedy, &c, though lacking the breadth and imaginative power of her later novels, is in many respects more original and attractive, by virtue of its sprightly wit and deft psychology. After her reception into the Roman Catholic Church, her fiction grew more serious and weighty: but, despite its careful craftsmanship and cultured writing, it may be questioned whether it possesses the vitality that marked her first adventures into fiction. She wrote also for the stage;

her best play being The Ambassadors—a clever comedy not uninfluenced by Oscar Wilde. Her comparatively early death in 1906 makes it impossible to say whether she would have regained that touch of vitality that was lacking in her later books. Certainly, she never did full justice to her very considerable intellectual powers and artistic capacity.

At the present day one of the ablest novelists is WINSTON CHURCHILL, born at St. Louis in 1871, and his historical romance, Richard Carvel (1899), The Crisis (1901), and The Crossing (1904), a sequel dealing with the time of the Civil War, show both massive vigour and breadth of imaginative sympathy.

Among the women writers may be mentioned SARAH ORNE JEWETT (1849), whose Tales of New England Life show subtle power of portraiture; FRANCES HODGSON BURNETT (1849), perhaps best known for her Little Lord Fauntleroy, but seen to greater artistic advantage in a novel called Through One Administration.

The sentimental humorist, KATE DOUGLAS WIGGIN (1857), whose Rebecca of Sunnybrook Farm was recently produced in dramatic form, but proved too saccharine for English tastes.

MARY ELEANOR WILKINS (1862), a perfect artist in miniature of New England life, with an exquisite delicacy of touch, unrivalled by any of her contemporaries. GERTRUDE FRANKLIN HORN (Mrs. Atherton), who has never perhaps quite fulfilled the splendid promise of such earlier work as Patience Sparhawk, American Wives and English Husbands, but who, at her best, shows a breadth of treatment and a primal emotional quality unusual among women writers.

Finally, there are MARY JOHNSON (1870), a striking historical novelist, whose stories, The Old Dominion (1898), By Order of the Company (1900), and Audrey (1901), have won high praise; and EDITH WHARTON, whose keen insight into modern conditions of life, and whose fine craftsmanship, place her among the best novelists of the day.

Among Canadian writers of fiction, two men have made a mark upon the fiction of the age—one, GRANT ALLEN (1848–1899), an extremely versatile writer, who for broad-and-chose reasons was never able to do full justice to his remarkable intellectual gifts. Much of his fiction is frankly of the pot-boiler kind, though of its kind it is clever enough; but in some of the short stories originally published in the Cornhill Magazine, he showed a power of imagination not unworthy of Poe; and in one story, The Ren John Creedy—a study in racial reversion—he touched upon a theme which has always fascinated Mr. Kipling. The best tribute one can pay Allen is to say, Kipling himself has never bettered the dramatic irony and intensity of this powerful little tale.

The other story-teller is Sir GILBERT PARKER (1862), who first attracted attention with those fresh and arresting studies of Canadian character, Pierre and his People (1892). He has written also a number of historical novels of good quality; though his gifts are most happily shown when dealing with Canadian life—whether past or present.

RALPH WALDO EMERSON (1803–1882)

HIS LIFE

RALPH WALDO EMERSON was born on May 25, 1803, at Boston, Massachusetts, to which State his progenitor, Thomas Emerson, had migrated from the Old Country in the middle of the seventeenth century. For generations the Emersons had ministered to the spiritual needs of the people of Concord, Harvard, and Boston, and Emerson's father was pastor of Boston Unitarian Church at the time of his death in 1811. This calamity plunged the family into straitened circumstances. A small pension was paid by the church to Mrs. Emerson for seven years, but, despite the strictest economy and her untiring industry, it was a hard struggle to provide even the bare necessities of life for her young family. An aunt, Miss Mary Moody Emerson, placed her scanty means, as well as her gospel of stoicism, at the disposal of her sister-in-law and nephews, and did her best to secure for them a good education. Whether the little lads took as keen an interest in her stories of heroic endurance as they would have done had she been able to set before them a hearty meal, we can but conjecture; but many years later, Emerson paid his tribute to this Spartan training when he wrote:

"It is the iron band of poverty, of necessity, of austerity, which, excluding them from the sensual enjoyments which make other boys too early old, has directed their activity into safe and right channels, and made them, despite themselves, reverers of the grand, the beautiful and the good."

Lessons began at a very early age in the Emerson household, for his father deplored the fact that at three years old, "Ralph does not read very well yet." When nine he was sent to Boston Latin School, where, in part payment for his board and lodging, he rendered many small services.

For mathematics Emerson had no bent, and was continually in conflict with the school authorities for this weakness. He had, however, an enthusiasm for Greek, and a profound love for Shakespeare and the early English dramatists, but gave no sign of the future poet and mystic.

In 1817 Emerson entered Harvard, the expense of which was partly defrayed by an elder brother, who had set up a young ladies' school at Boston. On leaving the university he took charge of this school, in order to set his brother free for the study of theology, but Emerson's natural reserve precluded success in a girls' school, and it was given up in 1825, when Ralph also began to study for the ministry. Ill-health interfered with this for a time, but eventually he was "approbated to preach," and in March 1828, ordained associate pastor of the Old North Church in Boston, Dr. Ware's resignation shortly afterwards placing him in sole charge. In the same year he married Miss Ellen Louise Tucker. This marriage was one of sincere attachment, and her death in 1831 was a great blow to her husband.

Doubts as to certain religious observances began to assail the mind of Emerson, and, unable to satisfy these, he resigned his pastorate in 1832. This set him free for a trip to Europe.

In these days of rapid transit between America and England, it is interesting to know that Emerson's journey took him one month and five days to accomplish. A short visit to the Continent was followed by a trip to England, where he met Wordsworth, "who was so benevolently anxious to impress upon me my social duties as an American citizen, that he accompanied me near a mile from his house, talking vehemently, and over and anon stopping short to imprint his words."

After an interview with Coleridge, he went to Craigenputtock to visit Carlyle. "That is the man, my man," he said to his wife,—pointing to a picture of Carlyle shortly before his death.

In 1833 he returned to America, and, making his home with his mother at Newton near Boston, was in great request as a lecturer and preacher. In the midst of his popularity and success, in 1835, he again married; this time to Miss Lydia Jackson, the daughter of Dr. Charles Jackson, who claimed to be the first to use ether as an anæsthetic. Emerson then bought a house at Concord, where he lived for the remainder of his life.

Nature, Emerson's first book, was published in 1836, and in 1837 he gave his famous "Phi Beta Kappa" address at Harvard on The American Scholar. Lectures on Representative Men, that he had delivered in England and Scotland (1847), were published in 1850, and English Traits in 1856.

In July 1840, The Dial—a quarterly organ of the Transcendentalists—was started. Emerson's duties as editor—shared by Margaret Fuller and Thoreau—brought him into conflict with certain of his contributors which brought about the downfall of the magazine four years later.

The famous community at Brook Farm was another venture of the Transcendental Club. This co-operative scheme had Emerson's sympathy, in a measure, but he preferred life in his own little farm at Concord. Unfortunately, in 1873, his house was burnt down, and although most of his belongings were rescued from the fire, the loss of the house itself was a serious one. For all his success as a lecturer, his remuneration seldom reached ten pounds for a single lecture, and he was never in affluent circumstances, friends and sympathisers therefore took the opportunity of a third trip across the Atlantic, to club together for the rebuilding of his house, and great was Emerson's surprise to find his home ready for occupation on his return.

Another recognition, this time from the Old Country, was his nomination for the Lord Rectorship of Glasgow University in 1874. Emerson was very proud of this honour, although he was defeated—Disraeli being elected.

A regular contributor to The Atlantic Monthly from its commencement, in 1860 he published Conduct of Life, followed by Society and Solitude, Letters and Social Aims, and his poem May Day. His last book, Parnassus, a collection of poems, was published in 1874.

For some years before his death Emerson's health was gradually giving way, and at Longfellow's funeral, in February 1882, it was evident that his powers were fast failing, for he was unable to recall his friend's name. "When one's wits begin to fail," he once remarked, "it is time for the heavens to open and take him away"—Emerson's time had thus come. After a few days' illness from pneumonia, he passed away on April 27, 1882.

HIS WORK

Emerson is the articulate conscience of New England. There is something curiously impersonal about his writings. Despite the gracious, subtly distinctive personality that emerges from his chat-chat in letters and from the reports of friends, we, who have never known him in the flesh, think of him as a Voice rather than as a Man. We can picture the shy, critical, brooding Hawthorne from his tales and essays, can actualise sharply and distinctly the genial philosopher of the Breakfast Table, the placidly observant Thoreau. But Emerson? We gather from the talk of friends that he was gentle, benignant, humorous, and we may reasonably infer that there was a forcefulness about his presence, or Carlyle would not have so warmly welcomed him.

But as we turn over the pages of his lectures and essays, we find ourselves merely listening to an oracular voice uttering words of gnomic wisdom, in clear but almost expressionless tones.

In his basic attitude towards life he is certainly a mystic—that is obvious to the most superficial reader. But the mysticism has no warmth or ecstasy about it. It has a cold, astringent quality, very agreeable to some temperaments, but disconcerting to the fervent enthusiast. When Lowell said he had a "Greek head on right Yankee shoulders," he gave us the clue to his character. For Emerson is only half a mystic, his intellect approved this relation with the unseen world, the world of spirit; having approved it, the practical, critical American side of him came uppermost. When he bade us "hitch" our "wagon to a star," many of us saw in this adjuration merely the mystical moralist, nor realised that the moralist showed quite as fully the practical moralist. He is quite as emphatic about the wagon as about the star. The Idealist who is always looking at the star moved Emerson to mild reproach, though he was tolerant enough with his reforming friends. "We are a little wild here . . . numberless projects of reform," he wrote, adding characteristically, "I am gently mad myself."

So gentle, so calm, so temperate is his method that we do not realise at once the extent of his spiritual radicalism.

The Mystic—Unless we grasp the mystical side of Emerson's nature, we shall be apt to lose ourselves in the steady halstome of pithy sayings, apparently unrelated with one another. His central doctrine may be found in his Essay on the Over-soul. This world of ours is permeated with a spiritual being—Soul. What, then, is Soul? It is a universal spiritual tidal life that overflows into individual lives, working independently of our own efforts, when once we have allowed it ingress. It is a life that makes for righteousness. We are possessed of it. Our individualities, indeed, are like islands lapped round by an infinite sea. Those who admit its influence are linked to one another by a social solidarity of spirit; and everyone may admit the influences, and should do so, for our own individual strength depends on it. Every man may be his own philosopher. So let us unbar our private door, and let in God.

In a fine saying he tells us, "I conceive of a man as always spoken to from behind, and unable to turn his head and see the speaker. In all the millions who have heard the voice, none ever saw the face."

The purpose of life, then, in Emerson's view is to acquaint man with the character of his own powers. And he must be always open to fresh impressions, and beware of the stereotyped mind. "I want to say what I feel and think with the proviso that tomorrow, perhaps, I shall contradict it all."

And this mystical attitude towards life in general, he carries into its various departments. He is a mystic in his critical valuations. No one would have more thoroughly endorsed Milton's saying that "a good book is the precious life blood of a master spirit." He valued writers for their vitalising powers. He loved those who, to use his own quaint phrase, could make his "top spin." The great man is a forceful hero to Carlyle; he is an illuminating seer to Emerson. Yet each acclaimed him for his dynamic influence. "The unstable estimate of men," said Emerson, "crowd to him whose mind is filled with truth as the heaped waves of the Atlantic follow the moon."

In temperament Emerson is akin to the Quakers. Anger and violence he passes on one side. As a thinker, he has no wish to storm the reader with philosophic artillery, merely to surround him, and permeate him like an atmosphere.

His thought is not original, his texts are familiar enough, but he gives them freshness by his handling.

The Moralist—Yet the practicality of the man is quite as insistent as his mysticism. He believes absolutely in the paramount importance of conduct. His mysticism is concerned not in making for spiritual exaltation, but for moral stability. With Emerson, as with Matthew Arnold, "Conduct is three-fourths of life."

"Every man takes care," says he, "that his neighbour shall not cheat him, but a time comes when he begins to care that he shall not cheat his neighbour. Then all goes well. He has changed his market cart into a chariot of the sun."

Right thinking and clean living, according to Emerson, go together. The average moralist says, "Live straight and don't waste time in searching for intellectual truth." Emerson says, "Live straight and you'll think straight." Morality to him implies health—health of mind and body; "Character is the habit of action from the permanent vision of truth." Here we see the link that binds the moralist to the mystic. The obedience to the universal spirit is no blind fatalism with Emerson, it is conscious effort on man's part; let him identify himself with the sublime order of things, and he will do "with knowledge what the stars do by structure," fulfil the law of their being. Thus, by understanding ourselves and identifying ourselves with the great forces of the universe we become rulers of others. Emerson takes pains to show that the moral law of the universe is as clear as the physical law, and will affect the soul of man just as gravitation and chemical forces affect his body.

Yet Emerson had little sympathy with dogmatic religion.

"We are all very sensible," he says, "it is forced on us every day, that churches are outgrown: that the creeds are outgrown. . . . The Church is not large enough for the man; it cannot inspire the enthusiasm which is the parent of everything good in history. . . . For that enthusiasm you must have something greater than yourselves, and not less. But in churches every healthful and thoughtful mind finds itself in something less: it is checked, cribbed, confined."

"The Jewish cultus is declining. The Divine, or, as some will say, the truly Human, hovers, now soon, now unseen, before us."

"Swedenborg and Behmen both failed by attaching themselves to the Christian symbol instead of to the moral sentiment, which carries innumerable Christianities, humanities, divinities, in its bosom. What have I to do with arks and passovers, ephabs and ephods? . . . Good for Orientals, these are nothing to me. The more learning you bring to explain them, the more glaring the impertinence. Of all absurdities, this of some foreigner proposing to take away my rhetoric and substitute his own, and amuse me with pelican and stork instead of thrush and robin, palm-trees and shittim-wood instead of sassafras and hickory, seems the most useless."

"If a man claims to know and speak of God, and carries you backward to the phraseology of some old mouldered nation in another country, in another world, believe him not."

Again:

"I object, of course, to the claim of miraculous dispensation—certainly not to the doctrine of Christianity. This claim impairs, to my mind, the soundness of him who makes it, and indisposes us to his communion. . . . It is contrary to that law of Nature which all wise men recognise—namely, never to require a larger cause than is necessary to the effect."

"The word miracle, as it is used, only indicates the ignorance of the devotee, staring with wonder to see water turned into wine, and heedless of the stupendous fact of his own personality. Here he stands, a lonely thought, harmoniously organised into correspondence with the universe of mind and matter. What narrative of wonders coming down from the thousand years ought to charm his attention like this? . . . It seems as if, when the Spirit of God speaks so plainly to each soul, it were an impiety to be listening to one or another saint. Jesus was better than others, because he refused to listen to others and listened at home."

"It is so wonderful to our neurologists that a man can see without his eyes, that it does not occur to them that it is just as wonderful that he should see with them, and that is ever the difference between the wise and the unwise: the latter wonders at what is unusual, the wise man wonders at the usual."

"Far be from me the impatience which cannot brook the supernatural, the vast, far be from me the lust of explaining away all which appeals to the imagination, and the great preëminent which haunt us. Willingly I too say, Hail! to the unknown awful powers which transcend the ken of the understanding."

"It is not the incredibility of the fact, but a certain want of harmony between the action and the agent. We are used to vaster wonders. One moment of a man's life is a fact so stupendous as to take the lustre out of all fiction. But Nature never works like a conjuror . . . The soul penetrated with the beatitude which pours into it on all sides, asks no interposition, no new laws,—the old are good enough for it,—finds in every cart-path of labour ways to heaven, and the humblest lot exalted.

"We want all the aids to our moral training. We cannot spare the vision nor the virtue of the saints; but let it be by pure sympathy, not with any personal or official claim. If you are childish, and exhibit your saint as a worker of wonders, a thaumaturgist, I am repelled. That claim takes his teachings out of logic and out of Nature, and permits official and arbitrary senses to be grafted on the teachings. It is the praise of our New Testament that its teachings go to the honour and benefit of humanity,—that no better lesson has been taught or incarnated. Let it stand, beautiful and wholesome, with whatever is most like it in the teaching and practice of men, but do not attempt to elevate it out of humanity by saying, 'This was not a man,' for then you confound it with the fables of every popular religion, and my distrust of the story makes me distrust the doctrine as soon as it differs from my own belief."

The essence of religion to Emerson, as to Carlyle, was the moral life. Theology he looked upon as "the rhetoric of morals." "Men talk," he complained, "of 'mere morality,' which is much as if we should say: Poor God, with nobody to help him!"

Emerson will have little to do with the Utilitarian conception of morality as the promoter of happiness. He believes that the State should try to secure the greatest good of the greatest number; but "good" to him meant spiritual good; and might even involve some measure of material unhappiness:

"He that feeds men serveth few;
He serves all who dares be true."

The Optimist—Emerson was not blind to the evolutionary doctrine, as some imagine, in fact it is his outlook on evolution that made him so optimistic. Note this vigorous and eloquent passage.

"Very few of our race can be said to be yet finished men. We still carry sticking to us some remains of the preceding inferior quadruped organisation. We call these milions men, but they are not yet men. Half engaged in the soil, pawning to get free, man needs all the music that can be brought to disengage him. If Love, red Love, with tears and joy, if Want with his scourge, if War with his cannonade, if Christianity with its charity, if Trade with its money, if Art with its portfolios, if Science with her telegraphs through the depths of space and time, can set his dull nerves throbbing, and by loud taps on his rough chrysalis can break its walls and let the new creature emerge erect and free,—make way and sing psalm! The age of the quadruped is to go out, the age of the brain and of the heart is to come in. The time will come when the evil forms we have known can no more be organised. Man's culture can spare nothing, wants all the material. He is to convert all unpediments into instruments, all enemies into power. The formidable mischief will only make the more useful slave. And if one shall read the future of the race hunted in the organic effort of Nature to mount and meliorate, and the corresponding impulse be the better in the human being, we shall dare affirm that there is nothing he will not overcome and convert, until at last culture shall absorb the chaos and gehenna. He will convert the Furies into Muses, and the hells into benefits."

Emerson has often emphasized the enormous influence of heredity and environment. Not unnaturally we may inquire how far his own optimism is the result of a happily balanced disposition.

"Men are," he said frankly, "what their mother made them. You may as well ask a loom which weaves huckaback why it does not make cashmere, as expect poetry from this engineer, or a chemical discovery from that jobber."

Now Emerson's whole life shows him to have been a man of a naturally sanguine and bright disposition. The sights which so distressed Carlyle, the tragic spectacle of misery and degradation in the streets of London, shocked him, but left no strong impression. Evil, he declares, has no real existence, and vanishes when we come to see the whole, instead of dwelling on isolated facts. His life had its sorrows, but for the most part it was free of those things that chafe and worry. He never experienced the oppressive problem of industrial warfare, had no sense in his own life of wasted effort, nor knew of the heartrending fight with debilitating disease. No deep tidal passion swept over his soul, there were neither ecstasies nor horrors in his nature; but temperate equability. Circumstances did something, temperament (as is always the case) a great deal in determining the tone of his philosophy and its note of tranquil and cheerful assurance. Being born on the heights he could ill realise the hardships of those less fortunate ones who stumble along in the valley below, baffled by ground mists.

The most satisfying point about Emerson's thought is not its optimism but its crisp practicality. What is the good of tolling a man or woman whose life has been blighted by another's baseness that evil has no real existence? What consolation is afforded by telling the victim to cancer that "all's right with the world"? It is not Browning's optimism, but his courage and grit that inspire his readers: it is not Emerson's optimism, but his cool common-sense and sensitiveness to spiritual values, that count for those who construe his pages. His views on the problem of Evil will appeal to those in basic affinity with him. They cannot touch others. At the best his generalisation is but a cheery guess, for which he gives no intellectual justification. But the common-sense helpfulness of such lines as these is quite obvious.

"Some of the ills you have cured,
And the sharpest you still have survived.
But what torments of pain you endured
From the Evil that never arrived."

To do him justice, it should be said that Emerson, despite the tenacity of his own convictions, never attempted propagandist work. Like Newman, he disliked controversies, and held that they were for the most part futile. As early as 1838 he had written:

"I do not gladly utter any deep convictions on the soul in a company where I think it will be contested. No, nor unless I think it will be welcomed. Truth has already ceased to be itself if polemically said."

"Unless I think it will be welcomed." The words are significant and illustrate the man's whole attitude ; its strength as well as its limitations

Emerson's was a high-minded and finely moulded nature. Among the moral counsellors of the age he will always hold a distinguished place, for the spiritual delicacy of his monitions and the practical wisdom of his ethics

HENRY DAVID THOREAU (1817-1862)

HIS LIFE

HENRY DAVID THOREAU, who has described himself as "a mystic, a transcendentalist, and a natural philosopher," was born at Concord on July 12, 1817. His father, a quiet, unambitious business man, who took no part in the politics or social problems of the day, was of French birth ; his mother, a shrewd, kindly, hospitable Scotchwoman, a striking contrast to her husband, was an inveterate talker—in fact, wherever Mrs Thoreau appeared all work had to be put aside. Their four children, of whom Henry was the third, were one in high ideals, and without wealth or social influence imparted an air of individuality and dignity to the common round of their daily lives

Thoreau's early education, received at private schools, was a good one, with special attention to the classics ; and, on going to Harvard at the age of sixteen, he was a good Greek scholar. He was a sturdy, manly youth of stoical fortitude and affectionate disposition, with simple, unaffected tastes, an innate love of nature and books, and found a wonderful fascination in everything pertaining to the North American Indians

Having graduated in 1837, he left Harvard with Josiah Quincy's testimony to his moral and intellectual qualifications as a teacher, and found employment for a short time at the Grammar School at Concord. On April 11, 1838, he delivered his first lecture at the Freemasons' Hall, on the subject of Society, before the Concord Lyceum

Unable to settle down to regular teaching work, he turned to his father's trade of pencil making, and during the next few years followed a variety of occupations

The acquaintance with Emerson had begun in 1837 and ripened into the closest intimacy. In 1841 Thoreau became a member of Emerson's household for two years, and assisted in editing The Dial, to which he also contributed until its extinction in 1844

In 1845 the much-talked-of Walden episode began to take shape. Thoreau had for years meditated a life of retirement, and his friend Ellery Channing wrote :

"I see nothing for you in this earth but that field which I once christened 'Brars', go out upon that, build yourself a hut and there begin the grand process of devouring yourself alive."

Thoreau took his advice, borrowed an axe, and began to cut the timbers for the famous hut built on the edge of Walden Pond, where for over two years he laboured and studied in seclusion. Yet he was no misanthropic individual. He still held social intercourse with his friends, but "The man

I meet," he said, "is seldom so instructive as the silence which he breaks." He had few wants, and these he satisfied by some small piece of work of any nature that would bring a quick remuneration, the greater portion of his time being utilised in writing his delightful experiences of A Week on the Concord and Merrimac Rivers, published in 1849, and an Essay on Carlyle that first appeared in Graham's Magazine in 1847.

From a lad he had kept a journal in which he recorded his thoughts as well as the minutest observation of his walks and excursions. In 1860 the volumes numbered thirty, and form the groundwork of his essays and lectures

Horace Greeley, editor of the Tribune, gave Thoreau much friendly advice and assistance in placing his literary work, and after Walden (1854) was published, it was Greeley who wrote : "There is a small class in England who ought to know what you have written," and suggested that copies of Walden and the Week be sent to the Westminster Review, whose editor has "expressed surprise that your book has not been sent him, and I could find very few who had read or seen it." The Week had a poor sale of three hundred copies in eight years ; but a small edition of Walden was exhausted before the author's death

A vigorous supporter of the Anti-Slavery movement, Thoreau lectured in 1854 on behalf of the Abolitionists and in defence of John Brown, and the Walden hut was regarded as a "station on the underground railroad," where slaves could receive hospitality and refuge when required. Neither had Thoreau any sympathy with the Mexican War, and suffered imprisonment in default of paying the church tax. His indignation at his friends paying the tax and procuring his release is well known.

Thoreau was not a physically strong man. In 1859 he wrote to a friend

"The doctors are all afraid that I am suffering for want of society. Was never a case like it! First, I did not know I was suffering at all ; secondly, as an Irishman might say, I had thought it was indigestion of the society I got"

The following year pulmonary consumption became evident, and for two years he lived on, working industriously so long as he could hold his pencil. Patient, cheerful, and consoling to those around him, he preferred to endure the greatest suffering rather than have his mind dulled by narcotics. On May 6, 1862, he was granted a "gentle, easy exit," and after a public funeral was buried in "Sleepy Hollow"—the village cemetery

Among American men of letters there are more winning personalities than that of Thoreau, more versatile literary artists, but none—not even Whitman himself—more interesting. One proof of this lies in the widely varying estimate of Thoreau's character and genius to be found in contemporary criticism. By some he is regarded as a poor imitation of Emerson, given to posing, and the Walden episode has been referred to as a theatrical flourish. Lowell and Robert Louis Stevenson, to mention two of his most formidable critics, have covered him with sarcastic ridicule, and even Mr. Watte-Dunton, the avowed friend of the "Children of the Open Air," in his introduction to an edition of Walden, impugned his sincerity, leaving us with the impression that Thoreau was an uncomfortable kind of egotist. As it is the Walden episode which has been chiefly responsible for the critical diatribes, it may be well to examine this two years' sojourn in the woods near Concord, and see how far it deserves the ire that has been called down upon it.

From his earliest years, Thoreau showed a passion for the open—unmistakably sincere and whole-hearted. In 1839, soon after leaving college, he made his first long jaunt in company with his brother John. This was a voyage on the Concord and Merrimac rivers.

The keen enjoyment afforded to mind and body by this and subsequent outings suggested to Thoreau the desirability of a longer and more intimate association with Nature. Walden Wood had been a familiar and favoured spot for many years, and so he began the building of his tabernacle there. So far from being a sudden, sensational resolve with an eye to effect, it was the natural outcome of his passion for the open.

He had his living to earn, and would go down into Concord from time to time to sell the results of his handiwork. He was quite willing to see friends and any chance travellers who visited from other motives than mere inquisitiveness. On the other hand, the life he proposed for himself as a temporary experiment would afford many hours of congenial solitude, when he could study the ways of the animals that he loved, and give free expression to his naturalistic enthusiasms.

Far too much has been made of the Walden episode. It has been written upon as if it had represented the totality of Thoreau's life, instead of being merely an interesting episode. Critics have annidverted upon it, as if the time had been spent in brooding, self-pity, and sentimental affectations, as if Thoreau had gone there to escape from his fellow-men. All this seems to me wide of the mark. He went to Walden not to escape from ordinary life, but to fit himself for ordinary life. The sylvan solitudes, as he knew, had their lessons for him no less than the busy haunts of men.

Yet it is a mistake to think, as some do, that he favoured a kind of Rousseau-like "return to Nature," without any regard to the conventions of civilisation.

"It is not," he states emphatically, "for a man to put himself in opposition to society, but to maintain himself in whatever attitude he finds himself through obedience to the laws of his own being, which will never be one of opposition to a just government. I left the woods for as good a reason as I went there. Perhaps it seemed to me that I had several more lives to live, and could not spare any more time for that one."

This is not the language of a crank, or the words of a man who, as Lowell unfairly said, seemed "to insist in public in going back to flint and steel when there is a match-box in his pocket."

Lowell's criticism of Thoreau, indeed, is quite wide of the mark. It assumes throughout that Thoreau aimed at "an entire independence of mankind," when Thoreau himself repeatedly says that he aimed at nothing of the sort. He made an experiment for the purpose of seeing what a simple, frugal, open-air life would do for him. The experiment being made, he returned quietly to the conditions of ordinary life. But he did not lack self-assurance, and his frank satisfaction with the results of his experiment was not altogether pleasing to those who had scant sympathy with his passion for the earth.

To be quite fair to Lowell and other hostile critics, one must admit that, genuine as Thoreau was, he had the habit, common to self-contained and self-opinionated men, of talking at times as though his very idiosyncrasies were rules of conduct imperative upon others. His theory of life was sound enough, his demand for simple modes of living, for a closer communion with Nature, for a more sympathetic understanding of the "brute creation," were reasonable beyond question. But the Emersonian mannerism (which gives an appearance of dogmatism, when no dogmatism is intended) starts up from time to time and gives the reader the impression that the path to salvation traverses Walden, all other paths being negligible, and that you cannot attain perfection unless you keep a pet squirrel.

Yet, if a sentence here and there has an annoying flavour of complacent dogmatism, and if the note of self-assertion grows too loud on occasion for our sensitive ears, yet his life and writings, considered as a whole, do not assuredly favour verdicts so unfavourable as those of Lowell and Stevenson.

There are certain aspects of Thoreau's nature that help us to understand more fully the significance of the Walden episode, and the special value of his writings.

In the first place there was that touch of wildness in his nature that made a simple, austere life especially attractive to him, and made him peculiarly critical of modern civilisation.

It was in no quixotic spirit, in no burst of moral crusading zeal, that he undertook the experiment. It was a natural expression of his temperament, and he felt, quite rightly, that along these lines he was likely to accomplish the most efficient work.

Thoreau's sympathy with and insight into the Indian character is on a par with Borrow's affinity with the Gypsies. If he could not give to his intimate knowledge such happy literal expression as Borrow could, it has at any rate inspired some of his best passages. A lover of Indian relics from his childhood, he followed the Indians into their haunts and conversed with them frequently; he understood the apparent coldness and reserve which debarred the ordinary man from intercourse, for he had no little of this reserve and impenetrability himself, and saw the fine points of their character. Take, for instance, this illuminating passage from A Week on the Concord:

"We talk of civilising the Indian, but that is not the name for his improvement. By the wary independence and aloofness of his dim forest-life he preserves his intercourse with his native gods, and is admitted from time to time to a rare and peculiar society with Nature.

He has glances of starry recognition to which our salons are strangers. The steady illumination of his genius, dim only because distant, is like the faint but satisfying light of the stars compared with the dazzling but ineffectual and short-lived blaze of candles . . . We would not always be soothing and taming Nature, breaking the horse and the ox, but sometimes ride the horse wild and chase the buffalo. The Indian's intercourse with Nature is at least such as admits of the greatest independence of each. If he is somewhat of a stranger in her midst, the gardener is too much of a familiar. There is something vulgar and foul in the latter's closeness to his mistress, something noble and cleanly in the former's distance. In civilisation, as in a southern latitude, man degenerates at length and yields to the incursion of more northern tribes—

'Some nations yet shut in
With hills of ice.'

"There are other savager and more primeval aspects of Nature than our poets have sung. It is only white man's poetry—Homer and Oasian even can never revive in London or Boston. And yet behold how these cities are refreshed by the mere tradition or the imperfectly transmitted fragrance and flavour of these wild fruits. If one could listen but for an instant to the chant of the Indian muse, we should understand why we will not exchange his savageness for civilisation. Nations are not whimsical. Steel and blankets are strong temptations, but the Indian does well to continue Indian."

These are no empty generalisations, but the comments of a man who has observed closely and sympathetically. All of Thoreau's references to Indian life merit the closest attention. For, as I have said, they help to explain the man himself. He had a sufficient touch of wildness to be able to detach himself from the civilised man's point of view. Hence the life of the woods came so naturally to him. The luxuries, the excitements, that mean so much to some, Thoreau passed by indifferently. There is much talk to-day of "the simple life," and the phrase has become tainted with affectation. Often it means nothing more than a passing fad on the part of overfed society people, who are anxious for a new sensation. A fad with a moral flavour about it will always commend itself to a certain section. There is no real intention of living a simple life any more than there is any deep resolve on the part of the man who takes the waters annually to abstain in the future from over-eating. But with Thoreau the simple life was a vital reality. He was not devoid of American self-consciousness, and perhaps he pats himself on the back for his healthy tastes more often than we should like. But of his fundamental sincerity there can be no question.

He saw even more clearly than Emerson the futility and debilitating effect of extravagance and luxury—especially American luxury. And his whole life was an indignant protest.

And if the touch of wildness in Thoreau helps us to understand the man and his writings, his Oriental sympathies help still further in this direction. He was fundamentally at one with Eastern modes of regarding life; and the pantheistic tendency of his religious thought, especially his care and reverence for all forms of life, suggest the devout Buddhist. The varied references scattered throughout his writings to the Sacred Books of the East, show how Orientalism affected him.

Herein we touch upon the most attractive side of the man; for it is this Orientalism, I think, in his nature that explains his regard for, and his sympathy with, the birds and animals.

The tenderness of the Buddhist towards the lower creation is not due to sentimentalism, nor is it necessarily a sign of sensitiveness of feeling. In his profoundly interesting study of the Burmese people Mr. Fielding Hall thus sums up the teaching of Buddha: "Be in love with all things, not only with your fellows, but with the whole world, with every creature that walks the earth, with the birds in the air, with the insects in the grass. All life is akin to man." The oneness of life is realised by the Eastern as it seldom is by the Western. The love that stirs in your heart kindled the flower into beauty, and broods in the great silent pools of the forest.

But Nature is not always kind. That he cannot help feeling. She inspires fear as well as love. She scatters peace and consolation, but can scatter also pain and death. All forms of life are more or less sacred. The creatures of the forest whose ferocity and cunning are manifest, may they not be inhabited by some human spirit that has misused his opportunities in life? Thus they have an affinity with us, and are signs of what we may become.

So if a measure of sacredness attaches to all life, however unfriendly and harmful it may seem, the gentler forms of life are especially to be objects of reverence and affection.

In one particular, however, Thoreau's attitude towards the earth and all that therein is differed from the Buddhist, inasmuch as the fear that enters into the Eastern's earth-worship was entirely purged from his mind. Mr. Page has instituted a suggestive comparison between Thoreau and St. Francis d'Assisi. Certainly the rare magnetic attraction which Thoreau seemed to have exercised over his "brute friends" was quite as remarkable as the power attributed to St. Francis, and it is true to say that in both cases the sympathy for animals is constantly justified by a reference to a dim but real brotherhood. The brutes are "undeveloped men"; they await their transformation and stand on their defence; and it is very easy to see that inseparably bound up with this view there are certain elements of mysticism common to the early saint and the American "hut builder."

And yet, perhaps, Mr. Page presses the analogy between the mediæval saint and the American "poet-naturalist" too far. St. Francis had an ardent, passionate nature, and whether leading a life of dissipation or tending to the poor, there is about him a royal impulsiveness, a passionate abandonment, pointing to a temperament far removed from Thoreau's.

Prodigal in his charities, riotous in his very austerities, his tenderness towards the animals seems like the overflowing of a finely sensitive and artistic nature. With Thoreau one feels in the presence of a more tranquil, more self-contained spirit; his affection is the affection of a kindly scientist who is intensely interested in the ways and habits of birds, beasts, and fishes; one who does not give them the surplus of the love he bears towards his fellow-men so much as a care and love which he does not extend so freely towards his fellows. I do not mean that he was apathetic, especially when his fellow-creatures were in trouble; his eloquent defence of John Brown, his kindness towards simple folk, are sufficient testimony on this score. But on the whole his interest in men and women, genuine as it was, lacked the personal warmth and eager inquisitiveness that he showed towards the denizens of the woods and streams—his suggestive, yet somewhat anæmic essay on Friendship bears out this criticism. I am not sure that Hawthorne was so far out in his characterisation of Donatello, the creature half animal, half man, which he says was suggested by Thoreau. It does not pretend to realise all his characteristics, nor do justice to his fine qualities. None the less in its picture of a man with a flavour of the wild and untarnishable about him, whose uncivilised nature brings him into close and vital intimacy with the animal world, we detect a real psychological affinity with Thoreau. May not Thoreau's energetic rebukes of the evils of civilisation have received an added zest from his instinctive repugnance to many of the civilised amenities valued by the majority?

Thoreau's love of children, moreover, is a fresh instance of his attraction towards simpler, more elemental forms of life. Men and women not ringed round by civilised conventions, children who have the freshness and wildness of the woods about them; such were the human beings that interested him.

Pleasant stories are told of his children's parties

"His resources for entertainment," says Mr. Moncure Conway, "were inexhaustible. He would tell stories of the Indians who once dwelt thereabouts till the children almost looked to see a red man skulking with his arrow and stone, and every plant or flower on the bank or in the water, and every fish, turtle, frog, lizard about was transformed by the wand of his knowledge from the low form into which the spell of our ignorance had reduced it, into a mystic beauty."

"Little Edward Emerson, on one occasion, carrying a basket of fine huckleberries, had a fall and spilt them all. Great was his distress, and offers of berries could not console him for the loss of those gathered by himself. But Thoreau came, put his arm round the troubled child, and explained to him that if the crop of huckleberries was to continue it was necessary that some should be scattered. Nature had provided that little boys and girls should now and then stumble and sow the berries. 'We shall,' he said, 'have a grand lot of hushes and berries on this spot, and we shall owe them to you.' Edward began to smile."

Thoreau evidently knew how to console a child, no less than how to make friends with a squirrel.

"Sometimes he would play juggler tricks for us," records a lady who knew him when she was a child, "and swallow his knife and produce it again from our ears or noses. We usually ran to bring some apples for him as soon as he came in, and often he would cut one in halves in fine points that scarcely showed on close examination, and then the joke was to ask Father to break it for us and see if it fell to pieces in his hands. But perhaps the evenings most charming were those when he brought some ears of pop-corn in his pocket and headed an expedition to the garret to hunt out the old brass warming-pan, in which he would put the corn, and hold it out and shake it over the fire till it was heated through, and at last, as we listened, the rattling changed to popping. When this became very brisk, he would hold the pan over the rug and lift the lid, and a beautiful fountain of the white corn flew all over us. It required both strength and patience to hold out the heavy warming-pan at arm's length so long, and no one else ever gave us that pleasure."

Thoreau's intellectual indebtedness to Emerson must not be overlooked; and some of his earlier work suffers somewhat from a too faithful discipleship, in the vocal imitation of the "voice oracular." Occasionally, indeed, it is hard to distinguish the disciple from his master, as when he writes:

"How can we expect a harvest of thought who have not a seedtime of character?"

"Only he can be trusted with goods who can present a face of bronze to expectations."

But this is only a passing phase. Thoreau is no weak replica of Emerson; and the bond between them is at bottom a real spiritual bond, a common outlook on life; the imitativeness is a pure literary trick that young inexperienced writers frequently fall into before they have found their own individual style.

This Thoreau did in his Walden. Beyond an imaginative affinity with the author of Nature, there is nothing Emersonian in the following individual and characteristic passage:

"The stillness was intense and almost conscious, as if it were a natural sabbath. The air was so elastic and crystalline that it had the same effect on the landscape that a glass has on a picture—to give it an ideal remoteness and perfection. The land appeared as if bathed in a mild and quiet light, while the woods and fences chequered and partitioned it with new regularity, and rough and uneven fields stretched far away with lawn-like smoothness to the horizon, and the clouds, finely distinct and picturesque, seemed a fit drapery to hang over fairyland."

The ascetic hardness of Thoreau is well illustrated in this "Naturalistic" sketch.

"The wonderful purity of Nature at this season is a most pleasing fact. Every decayed stump and moss-grown stone and rush of the dead leaves of autumn are concealed by a clean napkin of snow. In the bare fields and trickling woods so what virtue survives. In the coldest and blackest places the warmest charities still maintain a foothold. A cold and searching wind drives away all contagion, and nothing can withstand it, but what has a virtue in it; and accordingly whatever we meet with in cold and bleak places as the tops of mountains, we respect for a sort of sturdy innocence, a Puritan toughness."

Thoreau, indeed, is at his best as a poetic observer of Nature. His style lacks the rich opulence of Jefferies, but it has a cool clarity and austere beauty of its own. He has been called "the Poet-Naturalist," by many; and by a few acclaimed as a Philosopher. But he is really neither the one nor the other. He had neither the intellectual equipment of the naturalist, nor the ratiocinative power of the philosopher. He had neither the scientist's faculty of correlating facts, nor the philosopher's faculty of generalising from them. He is a literary Vagabond.

Mr Sanborn when first he met him described him as looking like "a sort of wise, wild beast." This vivid little touch is more illuminating than the elaborate picture he makes of Thoreau ultimately, as poet and philosopher.

The literary vagabond is at bottom a wise, wild beast; and no bad blend either. Emerson's admirable little sketch bears out this aspect of the man:

"It was a pleasure and a privilege to walk with him. He knew the country like a fox or bird, and passed through it as freely by paths of his own. Under his arm he carried an old music-book to press plants; in his pocket his diary and pencil, a spy-glass for birds, microscope, jack-knife, and twine. He wore straw hat, stout shoes, strong gray trousers to brave shrub-oaks and smilax, and to climb a tree for a hawk's or squirrel's nest. He waded into the pool for the water-plants, and his strong legs were no insignificant part of his armour. His intimacy with animals suggested what Thomas Fuller records of Butler the apologist, 'that either he had told the bees things, or the bees had told him.' Snakes coiled round his leg, the fishes swam into his hand, and he took them out of the water; he pulled the woodchuck out of its hole by the tail, and took the foxes under his protection from the hunters. He confessed that he sometimes felt like a hound or a panther, and, if born among Indians, would have been a fell hunter. But, restrained by his Massachusetts culture, he played out the game in the mild form of botany and ichthyology. His power of observation seemed to indicate additional senses; he saw as with microscope, heard as with ear-trumpet, and his memory was a photographic register of all he saw and heard. Every fact lay in order and glory in his mind, a type of the order and beauty of the whole."

At the same time I do not wish to underrate Thoreau's work as a thinker or as an observer of Nature. He was a fresh-minded and keen observer of natural phenomena, but his observations are far less valuable for scientific data (as are the naturalists) than as supplying him with agreeable material for humorous fancy, for ethical reflection, or for graceful and delicate description. In like manner, while as a thinker he is vigorous and effective in his own discursive and fragmentary way, with flashes of gnomic wisdom that, if less impressive than Emerson at his best, are more reliable; yet it is ultimately his manner of speech rather than his matter of thought that arrests us the most. For his thought after all is a piquant blend of pantheism, orientalism, puritanism, paganism: an attractive enough patchwork to deck a literary vagabond, but a shade distracting in a philosopher.

Why not leave him then as the "wise, wild beast"; a curious and arresting personality, half scholar, half faun; a mystic and a realist, sarcastic moralist and idyllic naturalist. In this way we can enjoy best his vagrant moods, according to our own inclination and the mood of the moment; acclaiming him when, as the fervent moralist, he writes in lofty vein of "Life without Principle underlying it"; or delighting in his pagan humour, as when, while dying, an earnest young friend asked him whether he had made his peace with the next world, and Thoreau replied: "One world at a time"; or lingering with the poetic observer of Nature, with his cold, bracing imagination and love of elemental things; or finally, responding to the fierce enthusiasm of the hero-worshipper, when he writes on John Brown or Thomas Carlyle.

Thus there is abundant diversity in Thoreau. Herein lies his charm as a man of letters. Of his verse I have said little, for though, like all he wrote, it is striking and individual, he was a poetic thinker rather than a poetic artist. Yet he wrote one set of verses, which may not unfittingly serve to round off this review of the man and his work; for they abound in self-revealing touches and are among the happiest that he wrote:

"I am a parcel of vain strivings tied
By a chance bond together
Dangling this way and that, their links
Were made so loose and wide
Methinks
For milder weather.

A bunch of violets without their roots
And sorrel intermixed,
Encircled by a wisp of straw
Once coiled about their shoots,
The law
By which I'm fixed.

Some tender buds were left upon my stem
In mimicry of life,
But ah, the children will not know
Till Time has withered them,
The woe
With which they're rife."

"We should treat our minds—that is, ourselves—as innocent and ingenuous children, whose guardians we are, and be careful what objects and what subjects we thrust on their attention. Read not the Times. Read the Eternities. Conventionalities are at length as bad as impurities. Even the facts of science may dust the mind by their dryness, unless they are in a sense effaced each morning, or rather rendered fertile by the dews of fresh and living truth. Knowledge does not come to us by details, but in flashes of light from heaven. Yes, every thought that passes through the mind helps to wear and tear it, and to deepen the ruts, which, as in the streets of Pompeii, evince how much it has been used. How many things there are concerning which we might well deliberate whether we had better know them,—had better let their peddling carts be driven, even at the slowest trot or walk, over that bridge of glorious span by which we trust to pass at last from the farthest brink of time to the nearest shore of eternity! Have we no culture, no refinement,—but skill only to live coarsely and serve the devil?—to acquire a little worldly wealth, or fame, or liberty, and make a false show with it, as if we were all husk and shell, with no tender and living kernel to us? Shall our institutions be like those chestnut-burrs which contain abortive nuts, perfect only to prick the fingers?"

"When I think of Brown and his six sons, and his son-in-law, not to enumerate the others, enlisted for this fight, proceeding coolly, reverently, humanely to work, for months if not years, sleeping and waking upon it, summering and wintering the thought, without expecting any reward but a good conscience, while almost all America stood ranked on the other side,—I say again that it affects me as a sublime spectacle. If he had had any journal advocating 'his cause,' any organ, as the phrase is, monotonously and wearisomely playing the same old tune, and then passing round the hat, it would have been fatal to his efficiency. If he had acted in any way so as to be left alone by the Government, he might have been suspected. It was the fact that the tyrant must give place to him, or he to the tyrant, that distinguished him from all the reformers of the day that I know.

"It was his peculiar doctrine that a man has a perfect right to interfere by force with the slaveholder, in order to rescue the slave. I agree with him. They who are continually shocked by slavery have some right to be shocked by the violent death of the slaveholder, but no others. Such will be more shocked by his life than by his death. I shall not be forward to think him mistaken in his method who quickest succeeds to liberate the slave. I speak for the slave when I say that I prefer the philanthropy of Captain Brown to that philanthropy which neither shoots me nor liberates me. At any rate, I do not think it is quite sane for one to spend his whole life in talking or writing about this matter, unless he is continuously inspired, and I have not done so. A man may have other affairs to attend to. I do not wish to kill nor to be killed, but I can foresee circumstances in which both these things would be by me unavoidable. We preserve the so-called peace of our community by deeds of petty violence every day. Look at the policeman's bully and handcuffs! Look at the gaol! Look at the gallows! Look at the chaplain of the regiment! We are hoping only to live safely on the outskirts of this provisional army. So we defend ourselves and our hon-roosts, and maintain slavery. I know that the mass of my countrymen think that the only righteous use that can be made of Sharpe's rifles and revolvers is to fight duels with them when we are insulted by other nations, or to hunt Indians, or to shoot fugitive slaves with them, or the like. I think that for once the Sharpe's rifles and the revolvers were employed in a righteous cause. The tools were in the hands of one who could use them."¹

"Carlyle is no mystic, either, more than Newton or Arkwright or Davy, and tolerates none. Not one obscure line, or half line, did he ever write. His meaning lies plain as the daylight, and he who runs may read; indeed, only he who runs can read, and keep up with the meaning. It has the distinctness of a picture to the mind, and he tells us only what he sees printed in largest English type upon the face of things. His utter substantial English thoughts in plainest English dialects; for, it must be confessed, he speaks more than one of those. All the shires of England, and all the shires of Europe, are laid under contribution to his genius, for to be English does not mean to be exclusive and narrow, and adapt one's self to the apprehension of his nearest neighbour only. And yet no writer is more thoroughly Saxon. In the translation of those fragments of Saxon poetry, we have met with the same rhythm that occurs so often in his poem on the French Revolution. And if you would know where many of those obnoxious Carlyleisms and Germanisms came from, read the best of Milton's prose, read those speeches of Cromwell which he has brought to light, or go and listen once more to your mother's tongue. So much for his German extraction.

"Indeed, for fluency and skill in the use of the English tongue, he a master unrivalled. His felicity and power of expression surpass even his special merits as historian and critic. Thorough his experience has not failed him, but furnished him with such a store of winged, ay and legged words, as only a London life, perchance, could give account of. We had not understood the wealth of the language before. Nature is ransacked, and all the resorts and purlieus of humanity are taxed, to furnish the fittest symbol for his thought. He does not go to the dictionary, the word-book, but to the word-manufactory itself, and has made endless work for the lexicographers. Yes, he has that same English for his mother-tongue that you have, but with him it is no dumb, muttering, mumbling faculty concealing the thoughts, but a keen, unwearied, resistless weapon. He has such command of it as neither you nor I have, and it would be well for any who have a lost horse to advertise, or a town-meeting warrant, or a sermon, or a letter to write, to study this universal letter-writer, for he knows more than the grammar or the dictionary.

"The style is worth attending to, as one of the most important features of the man which we at this distance can discern. It is for once quite equal to the matter. It can carry all its load, and never breaks down nor staggers. His hooks are solid and workman-like, as all that England does, and they are graceful and readable also. They tell of huge labour done, well done, and all the rubbish swept away, like the bright cutlery which glitters in shop windows, while the coke and ashes, the turnings, filings, dust, and borings lie far away at Birmingham, unheard of. He is a masterly clerk, scribe, reporter, writer. He can reduce to writing most things,—gestures, winks, nods, significant looks, patois, brogue, accent, pantomime, and how much that had passed for silence before, does he represent by written words. The countryman who puzzled the city lawyer, requiring him to write, among other things, his call to his horses, would hardly have puzzled him; he would have found a word for it, all right and classical, that would have started his team for him. Consider the ceaseless tide of speech for ever flowing in countless cellars, garrets, parlours, that of the French, says Carlyle, 'only ebbs towards the short hours of night,' and what a drop in the bucket is the printed word. Feeling, thought, speech, writing, and, we might add, poetry, inspiration,—for so the circle is completed, how they gradually dwindle at length, passing through successive colanders into your history and classics, from the roar of the ocean, the murmur of the forest, to the squeak of a mouse, so much only parsed and spelt out, and punctuated, at last. The few who can talk like a book, they only get reported commonly. But this writer reports a new 'Lieferung'.

"One wonders how so much, after all, was expressed in the old way, so much here depends upon the emphasis, tone, pronunciation, style, and spirit of the reading. No writer uses so profusely all the aids to intelligibility which the printer's art affords. You wonder how others had contrived to write so many pages without euphuistic or italicised words, they are so expressive, so natural, so indispensable here, as if none had ever used the demonstrative pronouns demonstratively before. In another's sentences the thought, though it may be immortal, is as it were embalmed, and does not strike you, but here it is so freshly living; even the body of it not having passed through the ordeal of death, that it stirs in the very extremities, and the smallest particles and pronouns are all alive with it. It is not simple dictionary it, yours or mine, but IT. The words did not come at the command of grammar, but of a tyrannous, inexorable meaning; not like standing soldiers, by vote of Parliament, but any able-bodied countryman pressed into the service, for 'Sire, it is not a revolt, it is a revolution.'"²

OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES (1809-1894)

HIS LIFE

OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES was born in Cambridge, Massachusetts, on August 29, 1809, and was the son of the staunch old Calvinist who had ministered to the First Church of Boston for forty years.

From a dame's school, where the pupils were "reminded rather than chastened" by a long willow rod, he passed to Cambridgeport Academy, where for five years he shared its teaching with Margaret Fuller and Richard Henry Dana; one year was then spent at Phillips' Academy, Andover, where at the early age of fifteen he translated the first book of the Æneid into heroic couplets.

Speaking of his boyhood's days he once remarked that "exceptional boys of fourteen and fifteen make home a heaven it is true, but I have suspected late in life that I was not of the exceptional kund." He was certainly versatile; he played the flageolet and flute, and with a pistol fired at everything but the house cat; he would smoke a cigar by instalments, and during the intervals hide it from the eyes of suspicious relatives in the barrel of his pistol.

In 1825 he went to Harvard. Here he was a universal favourite, elected class poet and a member of the select Phi Beta Kappa Society, and for over forty years after his graduation in 1829, he was a welcome figure at the College reunions.

On leaving Harvard he made a twelve months' acquaintance with the "lawless science of the law," but finding medicine a more congenial study, he crossed to Europe, first made the "grand tour," and then studied in Paris and Edinburgh. On his return he took his degree of Doctor of Medicine at Harvard in 1836. For a year he held the Chair of Anatomy at Dartmouth College, then returned to Boston, where he finally settled. Henceforth medicine and literature were to be driven in double harness.

In patriotic disgust at the proposed demolition of the old frigate Constitution he wrote Old Ironsides, as a protest. The poem was sold in the streets, and printed in nearly every newspaper throughout the country, the Constitution was saved, and the poet became famous.

Holmes published a first collection of his verse in 1837; this included a versified Essay on Poetry, The Last Leaf, and a boyish quip typical of the poet—My Aunt. Here is a stanza:

"My aunt! my dear unmarried aunt!
Long years have o'er her flown
Yet still she strains the aching clasp
That binds her virgin zone,
I know it hurts her—though she looks
As cheerful as she can,
Her waist is ampler than her life,
For life is but a span."

But there is also the serious side to be acknowledged, for Holmes also distinguished himself in 1836–1837, by gaining three medals for medical theses.

In 1840 he married Miss Amelia Lee Jackson, daughter of a Judge of the Supreme Court, and it was about this time that for the dinner given to Charles Dickens, Holmes was asked to write the song of welcome.

As Parkman Professor of Anatomy, at Harvard, from 1847 to 1882, Holmes was delivering four lectures a week. He does not appear to have been a successful practitioner, but had a wonderful power as a lecturer.

"We always welcomed Professor Holmes," wrote one of his students, "his lectures were so brimful of anecdote that we sometimes forgot it was a lesson in anatomy we had come to learn. But the instruction—deep, sound, and thorough—was there all the same, and we never left the room without feeling what a fund of knowledge and what a clear insight upon difficult points in medical science had been imparted to us through the sparkling medium."

In 1852 he also gave a course of lectures on English Poets of the Nineteenth Century, at the Lyceum.

When the Atlantic Monthly was started in 1857,

Lowell accepted the editorship only on the understanding that Holmes would become a regular contributor. Thus he agreed to do, and with The Autocrat of the Breakfast Table, he continued an old series that had previously appeared under the same title in The New Englander in 1831. With The Autocrat he made his own literary reputation as well as the financial and literary position of the magazine. The Professor and The Poet followed, but not with quite the same measure of success.

Elsie Venner first appeared as a serial in 1859, and in book form two years later; The Guardian Angel (1867) and A Mortal Antipathy (1885) are his only three novels. A biography of his friend Emerson was published in 1885, and of his friend Motley in 1878 (one of his least satisfactory works).

To celebrate his seventieth birthday, the Monthly gave a breakfast, at which Emerson, Whittier, and Harriet Beecher Stowe were present; for this occasion he composed his poem, The Iron Gate.

Many were the letters received by Holmes from budding aspirants to literary fame, asking his advice. One who had done so and was encouraged to go forward called upon Holmes some years later—it was Bret Harte.

Holmes' last volume of table talk, Over the Tea Cups, published in 1880, lacked the freshness and sprightliness of his earlier volumes. Tea-time proved a less suitable milieu for his chit-chat than breakfast time, and his last publication, Our Hundred Days in Europe (1889), is merely a pleasant record of a trip abroad among friends and admirers, and has no literary pretensions.

It was fitting that one who expressed so fully the best Bostonian traditions should die in Boston on October 7, 1891.

A man of strong personal charm, of keen sympathy and kindly thought of everyone, he was, said one who knew him well, "the perfect essence of wit and hospitality, courteous, amiable and entertaining to a degree, which is more easily remembered than imparted or described."

HIS WORK

There is no more genial, more agreeable personality in American letters than Oliver Wendell Holmes; and the versatile ease with which he could turn from verse to table-talk, and from table-talk to fiction, are not the least of his attractions. As essayist he has neither the distinction of Emerson, the freshness of Thoreau, nor the vigorous staying power of Lowell. Yet, at his best, as in The Breakfast Table Series and Elsie Venner, there is an ease and a play of charming fancy about his work, that gives him quite a distinctive place among American prose-men. He is an adept in the art of allusive chit-chat. No American writer can talk in print so intimately, or with such discursive wisdom as he. He has mastered the art of button-holing, and his easy-jacket, carpet-slipper style admirably suits the play of humour and fancy which he brings to bear upon all manner of subjects. The very title of his famous series of chatters is significant of the man: The Breakfast Table Series.

He is the Autocrat, Poet, and Professor of the Breakfast Table Not a time many of us would select for philosophy and dialectics, however airily and playfully conducted. We recall sympathetically "Ella's" eloquent plea for lying a-bed on mornings and digesting our dreams, and say "Amen" to his comment that "Jokes came in with candlelight." His strenuous, healthy, and sanguine temperament bids us start the day well, with a clear head and a bright heart. And that is why, despite superficial resemblances between his chit-chat and that of Lamb, there is a basic difference of temperament between them.

Lamb is the prince of potterers in the realms of the imagination. At heart he is as sane and clear-visioned as Holmes himself, but he is not a moralist by persuasion like Holmes. Holmes, that voluble and cheerful policeman of letters, is concerned in continually moving us on. He has all the alert practicality of the Yankoo. He is for clearing up matters, for solving problems psychological and ethical, though his broad sympathies and kindly confidences make us forget at times that the arm which is linked in ours is concerned in increasing our pace, and keeping us along the high road.

The chatter of "Ella" is the chatter of the artistic temperament, the chatter of our Breakfast Table philosopher that of the scientific temperament. Yet, for all his fun and fancy and literary sense, Holmes' outlook is the outlook of the scientist. He sees life through the surgery window. We never forget for long that he is Doctor Oliver Wendell Holmes; for very soon he has his hand on the reader's pulse and is ready with some prescription for his moral health. But it is done all so agreeably and amiably that we are never bored.

In his three novels, Ella Venner, The Guardian Angel, and A Mortal Antipathy, he is primarily concerned with some nice point in mental psychology; with prenatal influences, with the legacies of heredity, with the psychology of likes and dislikes. Indeed, the charm of Holmes lies in the fact that he is an imaginative medical man, who can blend fact and fancy with an agreeable skill for the least instructed layman.

Less a man of the world than Lowell, less a man of the study than Emerson, he presents as a humorist a happy blend of these two sides. Let these quotations serve by way of illustration:

"You don't suppose that my remarks made at this table are like so many postage stamps, do you—each to be only once uttered? If you do, you are mistaken. No must be a poor creature that does not often repeat himself. Imagine the author of the excellent piece of advice, 'Know thyself,' never alluding to that sentiment again during the course of a protracted existence? Why, the truths a man carries about with him are his tools, and do you think a carpenter is bound to use the same plane but once to smooth a knotty board with, or to hang up his hammer after it has driven its first nail? I shall never repeat a conversation, but an idea often; I shall use the same types when I like, but not commonly the same stereotypes. A thought is often original, though you have uttered it a hundred times. It has come to you over a new route, by a new and express train of association."

"You never need think you can turn over any old falsehood without a terrible squirming and scattering of the horrid little population that dwells under it."

"Every real thought on every real subject knocks the wind out of somebody or other. As soon as his breath comes back, he very probably begins to expend it in hard words. These are the best evidence a man can have that he has said something it was time to say. Dr. Johnson was disappointed in the effect of one of his pamphlets, 'I think I have not been attacked enough for it,' he said,—'attack is the reaction, I never think I have hit hard unless it rebounds'."

"If a fellow attacked my opinions in print would I reply? Not I. Do you think I don't understand what my friend, the Professor, long ago called the hydrostatic paradox of controversy?"

"Don't know what that means?—Well, I will tell you. You know, that if you had a bent tube, one arm of which was of the size of a pipe-stem and the other big enough to hold the ocean, water would stand at the same height in one as in the other. Controversy equalizes fools and wise men in the same way,—and the fools know it."

There is no special profundity in either of these passages, but the alert common-sense of a shrewd observer of men and things sparkles in every sentence.

If not a deep thinker, he is invariably a clear and vigorous one, and carries the epigrammatic power of Emerson and Thoreau with a more light-hearted air. Occasionally he can be as serious and as suggestive as the Concord Oracle himself, for instance when he observes:

"Sin has many tools, but a lie is the handle which fits them all."

Or

"Faith always implies the disbelief of a lesser fact in favour of a greater."

But more often he is content to be blithe and flippant, as in

"We never tell our secrets to people who jump for them."

"Memory is a net. One finds it full of fish when he takes it from the brook but a dozen miles of water have run through it without sticking."

(Of the Red Indian)

"A few instincts on legs flourishing a tomahawk."

But the graceful flippancies of Holmes are the most palatable when turned into verse. There his literary deftness, his underlying tenderness, his worldly sagacity, blend with the happiest results.

THE OLD MAN DREAMS

O for one hour of youthful joy!
Give luck my twentieth spring!
I'd rather laugh a bright haired boy
Than reign a grey-beard king!

Off with the wrinkled spoils of age!
Away with learning's crown!
Tear out his wisdom-written page,
And dash its trophies down!

One moment let my life blood stream
From boyhood's fount of flame!
Give me one giddy, reeling dream
Of life all love and fame!

—My listening angel heard the prayer,
And calmly smiling, said,
"If I but touch thy silvered hair,
Thy hasty wish hath sped."

"But is there nothing in thy track
To bid thee fondly stay,
While the swift seasons hurry back
To find the wished-for day?"

—Ah, truest soul of womankind!
Without thee, what were life!
One bliss I cannot leave behind;
I'll take—my—precious—wife!

—The angel took a sapphire pen
And wrote in rainbow dew,
"The man would be a boy again,
And be a husband too!"

—"And is there nothing yet unsaid
Before the change appears?
Remember, all their gifts have fled
With those dissolving years!"

Why, yes, for memory would recall
My fond paternal joys,
I could not bear to leave them all—
I'll take—my—girl—and—boys!

The smiling angel dropped his pen,—
"Why, this will never do,
The man would be a boy again,
And be a father too!"

And so I laughed,—my laughter woke
The household with its noise,—
And wrote my dream, when morning broke,
To please the grey-haired boys

THE LAST BLOSSOM

Though young no more we still would dream
Of beauty's dear deluding wiles,
The leagues of life to grey beards seem
Shorter than boyhood's lingering miles

Who knows a woman's wild caprice?
It played with Goethe's silvered hair,
And many a Holy Father's "niece"
Has softly smoothed the papal chair.

When sixty bids us sigh in vain
To melt the heart of sweet sixteen,
We think upon those ladies twain
Who loved so well the tough old Dean.

We see the Patriarch's wintry face,
The maid of Egypt's dusky glow,
And dream that Youth and Age embrace,
As April violets fill with snow

Tranced in her lord's Olympian smile
His lotus-loving Memphian lies,—
The musky daughter of the Nile
With plaited hair and almond eyes.

Might we but share one wild caress
Ere life's autumnal blossoms fall,
And Earth's brown, clinging hips impress
The long cold kiss that waits us all!

My bosom heaves, remembering yet
The morning of that blissful day
When Rose, the flower of spring I met,
And gave my raptured soul away.

Flung from her eyes of purest blue,
A lass, with its leaping chain
Light as a loop of larkspur, flew
O'er sense and spirit, heart and brain.

Thou com'st to cheer my waning age,
Sweet vision, waited for so long!
Dove that would seek the poet's cage
Lured by the magic breath of song!

She blushes! Ah, reluctant maid,
Love's drapeau rouge the truth has told;
O'er girlhood's yielding barricade
Floats the great Leveller's crimson fold!

Come to my arms!—love heeds not years,
No frost the bud of passion knows—
Ha! what is this my frenzy hears?
A voice behind me uttered,—Rose!

Sweet was her smile,—but not for me;
Alas, when woman looks too kind,
Just turn your foolish head and see,—
Some youth is walking close behind!

In his higher flights Holmes is less satisfactory; that ingenuity of his, so telling in the lighter verse—such pieces as The Deacon's Masterpiece, or The One-Hoss Shay—gives a touch of artificiality to poems like The Chambered Nautilus; the graceful sentiment which touches with sufficient tenderness The Last Leaf, grows too riotous in a lyric like Under the Violets. These things are assuredly not without charm, but they are insufficiently strong and ample for great poetry. One has only to compare Hood's treatment of a young girl's death with Holmes to appreciate the difference.

Holmes never mastered the art that conceals art: and thus he is at his best when he reminds us of our own Præd, where a delicate artificiality is a charm, and not a blemish.

The most poetic thing Holmes ever wrote is his novel, Elsie Venner: the scientific problems raised in that remarkable book have a stimulating effect on the writer's imagination, that is nowhere else manifest. More of the twilight atmosphere of Hawthorne would no doubt have heightened the tragic romance of the Snake Woman—it is a little too clear-cut and definite; but there are passages in the book that reach a very high level of imaginative beauty.

On the whole, Holmes is at his best when he appears before us—to use a phrase Thackeray applied to himself—as the "week-day preacher." Bred in an intellectual atmosphere, there is nothing academic about his thought. His fresh adventurous mind scorns the narrow groove. He might have demurred to Bernard Shaw's contention that the medical profession is an organised conspiracy to defraud the laity (though we can imagine him chuckling at its daring impudence), but he was strongly in favour of the idea underlying Shaw's sally—

"You can't keep gas in a bladder, and you can't keep knowledge tight in a profession—special knowledge will leak out and general knowledge leak in."

His general outlook may be gauged by his statement, that

"The great thing is not so much where we stand as in what direction we are moving"—"To reach the port of heaven we must sail sometimes with the wind; sometimes against it."

We may regard Holmes in literature as we regard the shrewd family physician in daily life. For serious crises we call in the expert, as at such times the family physician may prove unequal to the emergency. But in the ordinary run of life, all we need is sound counsel on hygienics and, perhaps, an occasional alternative mixture to keep us fit. There we find the value of Holmes. He knows our little infirmities well, and can adapt himself to our moods and fancies. He knows that what does all of us good at times, is a picnic of ideas, and none can prepare that meal more adroitly and more palatably than the "Autocrat"

JAMES RUSSELL LOWELL (1819-1891)

HIS LIFE

JAMES RUSSELL LOWELL, in whom we see the somewhat rare combination of the wise and thoughtful man of affairs and the successful literary artist, was born at Cambridge, New England, on February 23, 1819. He was the fourth son of the Rev. Charles Lowell, who had ministered for fifty years at a Boston church, his mother—of remarkable personality and high accomplishments—was the grand-daughter of Robert Traill of Orkney.

Delicate as a child, James' early years were carefully tended by an elder sister, whose duty it was to see that he had an afternoon nap; as a soporific she would read extracts from the poetry of Shakespeare and Spenser, but so interested did he become in the stories of Spenser that his frantic efforts to keep awake were often most amusing. From boyhood he had the most marked power of self-control; and with a keen sense of humour combined a characteristic—unfortunately, not common—of an exquisite regard for the feelings of others.

From William Wells' famous classical school at Boston, Lowell went to Harvard in 1834. At that time little or no attention was there paid to English literature, yet among the young Harvardians was the same enthusiasm for the poetry of Coleridge, Shelley, and Keats as was shown for Tennyson twenty years later at Oxford.

In 1837 he was acting as joint editor of the College magazine—Harvardiana, and a year later his power as a versifier resulted in his election as class poet. The composition of the class poem proved no little trouble.

"Here I am, as it were, at the end of nothing," he wrote home, "and not a pillow of consolation whereon to lay the aching head of despair."

School and college days were uneventful, if we except his "rustication" for the repeated neglect of the hard and fast rule of attendance at morning chapel. Having graduated in 1838, he studied for the bar, poetry, however, proved to have a prior claim, and led to his friendship with Miss Maria White, a beautiful, delicate girl of simple and refined tastes. A four years' courtship ended in a happy union that was severed only by the death of Mrs. Lowell in 1853, leaving one little daughter.

An easy and fluent speaker, it was not long ere Lowell was in great request as a lecturer. His first public utterance, in 1812, was to an audience of three thousand members of the Women's Total Abstinence Society. His lectures on English poetry at Boston in 1855 were so overcrowded that he was forced to give them twice a day.

"The modulations of his voice," we are told, were "unstudied and agreeable," and it "was kept in its natural compass." There were no oratorical climaxes, and no pitfalls set for applause.

The famous Biglow Papers, which first appeared in the Boston Courier in June 1846, were published in book form some two years later, The Vision of Sir Launfal, an Arthurian legend, written in two days, during which he scarcely ate or slept, and A Fable for Critics, belong also to this period.

In July 1851 the Lowells sailed for Italy in search of health for the delicate wife; after an absence of fifteen months, which proved ineffectual, they returned to America, where she died. A second marriage, in 1857, to Miss Frances Dunlop proved as happy and fortunately not so brief as the first.

From 1857-1861 Lowell was editor of the Atlantic Monthly, for which he wrote one hundred and sixteen articles—prose and poetry—between the years 1857 and 1877. In 1803 he joined his friend, Professor Charles Norton, as joint editor of the North American Review; for this he also wrote thirty-four articles besides critical work. Many of these papers were collected in Among My Books (1870) and My Study Windows (1871).

For nearly thirty years Lowell was Smith Professor of Modern Languages at Harvard, having succeeded Longfellow in 1854. On resigning his Chair in 1872 he made another journey abroad, and on his return threw himself into the politics of the day. In his kind, tactful nature the President saw the successful diplomat, and in 1877 he was appointed official representative at the Court of Madrid. From 1880 to 1885 he honourably filled the same distinguished position in England. Just before his return to America the second Mrs. Lowell died.

On his arrival from England he settled down at his beautiful home, Elmwood. To one who congratulated him on his return, he said, "Yes, it is very nice to be here, but the old house is full of ghosts." It contained so many sad memories. His own health began to give cause for anxiety, but after a serious illness from hereditary gout, he rallied for a time, and began to collect his fugitive pieces for a new edition of his works. This was his last literary labour. He died in August 1891.

"He never seemed more cheerful and companionable and cordial and wise," says his friend Mr. Edward Everett Hale, "than in his seventh decade."¹

HIS WORK

Lowell is essentially American as a poet, and cosmopolitan as a prose writer. For this reason his verse is less appreciated across the water than is his prose, and in popularity he is certainly less appealing than Longfellow, Poe, Whitman, or even Holmes. There is, of course, a respectable body of his verse not concerned with patriotic motives and local inspirations, but thus, with one or two rare exceptions, is the least distinguished point about it, while as a poet his reputation rests chiefly on his inimitable Biglow Papers. For the rest, his most considerable productions in verse are, it will be seen, American in their inspiration—to wit, the wise and witty Fable for Critics—on American poets and poetry, the stirring Commemoration

Ode, and other memorial poems, especially the ode Under the Old Elm—celebrating the one hundredth anniversary of Washington's command of the Revolutionary army. A passionate love of country animates Lowell's best verse. When the matters with which he deals are of more universal interest—the stock-pot of poetic art—he is less fresh, less original, but his poetry is always virile and intelligent, and his later work especially finished and impressive in its Art.

Turning from his verse to his prose, his criticism may first be noticed. As a versatile scholar with a gift of happy, lucid exposition, and a mingling of shrewd humour and artistic feeling, he has no peer in American letters. In his purely literary criticism he is more catholic, more sane, than Poe. It is when we place his critical work beside the great English critics that Lowell's shortcomings are most clearly seen. As pieces of writing, as expressions of the author's interesting personality, they rarely fail to give us pleasure, but there is a lack of perspective about some, as, for instance, the Milton, and critical irrelevances about many, as, for instance, the Wordsworth, which detract from their value.

As an illustration of what I mean, take this passage from the Essay on Wordsworth, which contains so much good and admirable matter.

"The play" (e.g. The Borderers) "has fine passages, but is as unreal as Jane Eyre." What is Jane Eyre doing here? How is it possible to elucidate the qualities of The Borderers by a slighting reference to Charlotte Brontë's famous novel? Jane Eyre may be unreal in parts where the author strays out of her own experiences of life, but the unreality of these passages is quite different from the unreality of The Borderers. Charlotte Brontë's unreality has in it a fundamental ignorance of the particular phase of life she is describing with such eager earnestness. Wordsworth's unreality lies in his deliberate avoidance of concrete actuality of any kind. Further, to refer to Jane Eyre as unreal is bad criticism. Taken as a whole, the book is alive and memorable by virtue of this very quality. The touches of unreality are overwhelmed by the vital reality of the book as a whole. Lowell's dictum, then, is challengeable, first because its allusion to Jane Eyre is fundamentally wrong. In the second place, because, even had the passage been so framed as to apply in a limited way to Jane Eyre, the criticism is inapposite, for the unreality of the one is a different thing from the unreality of the other. So far as Jane Eyre is unreal, it is unreal because of its over-accentuation, The Borderers because of its under-accentuation.

Neither is Lowell quite a fair critic of the Transcendental movement, he sees clearly and well enough the weaknesses and absurdities of that movement, but he badly undervalues one of its most original spokesmen—Thoreau. Lowell is, on the whole, a good taster of books, with a nice appreciation of what is fine in literature, but he is neither profound, original, nor thorough in his critical treatment. Yet his critical essays are certainly interesting and suggestive, they exhibit a strong and agreeable personality, and display a versatile culture; structurally awkward and lop-sided, irritating in their hasty generalisations, they none the less stimulate because of the happy flashes of wisdom with which they abound. And he is really the most happy, the most delightful, when he is least literary, and is not concerned with critical literary problems.

Looking finally at his entire output, both in prose and verse, it seems to me that his powers are fairly evenly distributed. An admirable letter-writer, a fresh and vigorous publicist, a suggestive literary critic, a cultured and virile poet; in short, perhaps the best all-round man in American letters.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN

Nature, they say, doth dote
And cannot make a man
Save on some worn-out plan,
Repeating us by rote
From him her Old World moulds aside she threw,
And choosing sweet clay from the breast
Of the unexhausted West,
With stuff untainted shaped a hero new,
Wise, steadfast in the strength of God, and true.
How beautiful to see
Once more a shepherd of mankind indeed,
Who loved his charge, but never loved to lead;
One whose neck flock the people joyed to be,
Not lured by any cheat of birth,
But by his clear grained human worth,
And brave old wisdom of sincerity!
They knew that outward grace is dust;
They could not choose but trust
In that sure-footed mind's unfaltering skill,
And supple tempered will
That bent like perfect steel to spring again and thrust
His was no lonely mountain peak of mind
Thrusting to thin air o'er our cloudy bars,
A sea mark now, now lost in vapours blind,
Broad prairie rather, genial level lined,
Fruitful and friendly for all humankind,
Yet also nigh to heaven and loved of loftiest stars
Nothing of Europe here,
Or, then, of Europe fronting mornward still,
Ere any names of Serf and Peir
Could Nature's equal scheme deface,
Here was a type of the true elder race,
And one of Plutarch's men talked with us face to face.
I praise him not, it were too late,
And some innate weakness there must be
In him who condescends to victory
Such as the Present gives, and cannot wait.
Safe in himself as in a fate,
So always firmly he;
He knew to hide his time,
And can his fame abide,
Still patient in his simple faith sublime,
Till the wise years decide
Great captains, with their drums and guns,
Disturb our judgment for the hour,
But at last silence comes,
These all are gone, and standing like a tower,
Our children shall behold his fame,
The kindly-earnest, brave, forewarning man,
Sagacious patient, dreading praise, not blame,
New birth of our new soil, the first American.

(From the Commemoration Ode)

A GOOD WORD FOR WINTER

If one would know what snow is, I should advise him not to hunt up what the poets have said about it, but to look at the sweet miracle itself.

The preludings of Winter are as beautiful as those of Spring. In a grey December day, when, as the farmers say, it is too cold to snow, his numbed fingers will let fall doubtfully a few star-shaped flakes, the snowdrops and anemones that harbinger his more assured reign. Now, and now only, may be seen, heaped on the horizon's eastern edge, those "blue clouds" from forth which Shakespeare says that Mars "doth pluck the masoned turret." Sometimes also, when the sun is low, you will see a single cloud trailing a flurry of snow along the southern hills in a wavering fringe of purple. And when at last the real snowstorm comes, it leaves the earth with a virginal look on it that no other of the seasons can rival, compared with which, indeed, they seem soiled and vulgar.

And what is there in nature so beautiful as the next morning after such confusion of the elements? Night has no silence like this of busy day. All the batteries of noise are spiked. We see the movement of life as a deaf man sees it, a mere writhing of the clamorous existence that inflicts on our ears when the ground is bare. The earth is clothed in innocence as a garment. Every wound of the landscape is healed, whatever was stiff has been sweetly rounded as the breasts of Aphrodite, what was unsightly has been covered gently with a soft splendour, as if, Cowley would have said, Nature had cleverly let fall her handkerchief to hide it. If the virgin (Notre Dame de la Neige) were to come back, here is an earth that would not bruise her foot nor stain it. It is

"The fanned snow

That's bolted by the northern blasts twice o'er,"—

'Soflata e strotta dal venti Schia'i

(Winnowed and packed by the Slavonian winds),"—packed so hard sometimes on hill-slopes that it will bear your weight. What grace is in all the curves, as if every one of them had been swept by that inspired thumb of Phidias' journeyman. . . .

The snow that falls damp comes commonly in larger flakes from windless sides, and is the prettiest of all to watch from under cover. This is the kind Homer had in mind, and Dante, who had never read him, compares the dilatate falde, the flaring flakes, of his fiery rain, to those of snow among the mountains without wind. This sort of snowfall has no fight in it, and does not challenge you to a wrestle like that which drives well from the northward, with all moisture thoroughly winnowed out of it by the frosty wind Burns, who was more out of doors than most poets, and whose bare-foot Muse got the colour in her cheeks by vigorous exercise in all weathers, was thinking of this drier deluge when he speaks of the "whirling drift," and tells how—

"Chanticleer

Shook off the pothery snaw "

But the damper and more deliberate falls have a choice knack at draping the trees, and about eaves of stone walls—wherever, indeed, the evaporation is rapid, and it finds a chance to cling—it will build itself out in curves of wonderful beauty. I have seen one of these dumb waves, thus caught in the act of breaking, curl four feet beyond the edge of my roof and hang there for days, as if Nature were too well pleased with her work to let it crumble from its exquisite pause. After such a storm, if you are lucky enough to have even a sluggish ditch for a neighbour, be sure to pay it a visit. You will find its banks corniced with what seems to be precipitated light, and the dark current down below gleams as if with an inward lustre. Dull of notion as it is, you never saw water that seemed alive before. It has a brightness like that of the eyes of some smaller animals, which gives assurance of life, but of a life foreign and unintelligible.

II PROSE. (b) MODERN THEOLOGIAN'S AND CRITICS William Ellery Channing—The Transcendental Movement—Amos Bronson Alcott—Margaret Fuller—George Ticknor—Henry James, Senior—William James—Charles Godfrey Leland—George William Curtis.

THEOLOGIAN'S AND CRITICS

ALTHOUGH American Literature was cradled in theology, and never quite shook off its baby vestments, yet New England has produced very few religious thinkers of the first order. The reason for this lies in the intense practicality of the Yankee. When theology was largely a matter, as in the old Puritan days, of positive morality, then theologians of a sort flourished—though Jonathan Edwards was probably the only one whose influence was other than parochial. With the growth of toleration, the encroachment of political interest, the practical energies of the New Englander flowed into other channels. And it is not until the nineteenth century that we find any speculative thinker that may lay claim to literary distinction.

Liberal religious thought, emphasized by a reaction from the shackles of Calvinism, took a Unitarian form, and among the earlier Unitarians, WILLIAM ELLERY CHANNING (1780-1842), is the first name of any importance. A dominant characteristic of Channing and his successors is the liveliness of their social sympathies. They tried to do for Christianity in America what Kingsley and Maurice tried to do in England—make it a life rather than a creed.

Channing was a thoughtful, sympathetic, and occasionally eloquent writer, not profound nor soul-stirring, but a consistent upholder of liberty of speech and tolerance of outlook, and a cautious though genuine democrat. During his lifetime came that wave of romantic idealism which is usually called Transcendentalism.

THE TRANSCENDENTAL MOVEMENT

The Transcendental Movement in America is in reality a phase of that Romanticism which we have clearly seen permeating European thought and letters. The significance of Romanticism in prose-letters has been discussed in a previous chapter: its significance in thought may be gathered from a study of the romantic movement in Germany with its metaphysical and artistic implications. Kant himself is responsible for the word Transcendental.

It is the word of passport from a philosophy of sense-perception to a philosophy of primary intuition. A little band of writers and teachers arose during the forties in America, who seized upon this intuitional idea and developed it into a rule of life—a rule tending towards spiritual arrogance in some of its exponents, and expressing itself in many extravagant ways, yet at bottom indicating a sincere and high-minded endeavour to find a fresh faith and a new outlook.

It found its most sober expression in Emerson's teaching, notably the doctrine of the Over-Soul, and in the more Oriental pantheism of Thoreau; but around these men were a number of personalities who demand some attention.

In September 1836, the Rev. Frederick Henry Hedge, a student of Emerson's letters and philosophy, Amos Bronson Alcott, an ardent communist, James Freeman Clarke, the philanthropist, together with Emerson, met at the house of George Ripley, a keen social reformer. Thus the Transcendental Club came into being. To its circle were added shortly, the theologian and untiring social worker, Theodore Parker, and that somewhat flamboyant but striking personality, Margaret Fuller.

Emerson was to be the oracle of the Club; Alcott a kind of gnomie understudy; with others the work was to be more of a social character. The precise scope and propaganda of the club were left agreeably vague. They were generally agreed over plain living and high thinking, but the extent of the "plainness," and the character of the mental flights were left to individual tastes. If any motto could have been found for the Club on which these widely-differing temperaments could have agreed it would have been Emerson's adjuration—"Trust thyself, and, though thou shouldst walk the world over, thou shalt not be able to find a condition inopportune or ignoble." Beyond this it is hard to find many points in common.

The main things seemed to be, a hostility towards traditions and the processes of reasoning; intuition being the rule of life, a fervent belief in the social beneficence of culture, and a return to Nature, more or less as Rousseau desecrated Wordsworth's poetic Pantheism and Goethe's Individualism proved perhaps the most potent literary influences upon this little group, while on the more definitely theological side, German philosophy via Coleridge, and German literature via Carlyle, were factors with which to reckon.

The most interesting and practical outcome of the Club was the "Brook Farm Association," made famous by Hawthorne's Mother's Romance. George Ripley was the leading spirit here; and the project was undertaken and organised with more practical sagacity than many of its critics have thought fit to allow it. The failure of the communistic experiment lay not in any business mismanagement of details, but in the inherent weakness that affects all such schemes. Indeed, with ample financial resources something might have been made of the various trade activities in which the members co-operated. Insufficient funds hastened to bring about the failure of an experiment doomed to disaster through the temperamental incompatibility of those taking part. If the whole thing was little better than a "transcendental picnic," it was an agreeable and interesting one in many ways. One cannot regret a scheme that served Hawthorne for one of his happiest literary inspirations.

AMOS BRONSON ALCOTT (1799-1888) was one of the leading spirits, who later on attempted to establish an even more ideal community, "Fruitlands," that read into "Transcendentalism" many more extravagances than Emerson and Thoreau would have countenanced. The son of a farmer in Connecticut, he was an amiable visionary, whose helplessness as a man of affairs, and whose steady capacity for getting into debt, reminds one of Goldsmith. Most of his life he spent as a school teacher, in various places, though he was continually obliged to move on, owing to the visionary schemes he was always trying to materialise. Nowadays there might be some opening (though not a commercial one) for a man who was a mystic after the Eastern pattern, a vegetarian, a non-resistant, an advocate of woman's rights; but in those days there was little consideration for the "orank," and poor Alcott proved very unpopular with his neighbours. It is a pity that he had not some of the delightful humour and common-sense that his gifted daughter, Louisa M. Alcott, showed in her stories of girl life. It might have preserved him from many eccentricities of conduct. What success could be hoped for a reformer who gravely forbade the planting of anything that grew downward rather than upward, deprecated the use of manure, and respected the existence of canker-worm? His sweetness of disposition and his real nobility of aim attracted to him not a few powerful friends, and Emerson championed him so far as possible. There is much to be said for some of his educational ideals. He was certainly an attractive personality, though he must have proved a difficult man to live with. The best part of Alcott's teaching may be studied in the saner writings of the daughter who wrote Little Women, Good Wives, and Jo's Boys—stories rich in humanitarian feeling and tender charm.

A more forceful personality than Alcott was SARAH MARGARET FULLER (1810-1850). After an unhappy childhood, she became a teacher, teaching for a while in Alcott's school at Boston. Unattractive in appearance, she fascinated many by her romantic enthusiasm and her extensive learning. She is reputed to have been a brilliant conversationalist, better in the spoken word than in writing. Yet she was a vital and interesting writer—somewhat spoiled by excessive self-consciousness—and much of her work appeared in the Dial. Later on she became literary editor of the New York Tribune under Horace Greeley. She was fond of travel, and loved Italy. It was on her return from Italy with her husband, Marquis Ossoli, and her child, that she perished in a shipwreck in May 1850.

She excelled in critical work of the psychological order, and one of her best portraits is that of her friend Mazzini. Lacking plasticity and breadth of sympathy, she is always worth reading when she deals with the spiritual elements in society.

A few words may be said, in concluding this brief sketch of American Literature, about some miscellaneous writers, who excelled in the work of literary and philosophic criticism.

GEORGE TICKNOR (1791-1871) was born at Boston, and educated for the Bar. Literature, however, lured him as she has lured many a young barrister, and after travelling through the States, he visited Europe, where he made the acquaintance of many famous men, including Roscoe and Lord Byron. In 1819 he returned to America, and became Professor of Modern Languages and Literature at Harvard. He was an erudite scholar and an enthusiast for Spanish literature; and his History of Spanish Literature (1849) did a good deal to stir that cosmopolitan spirit in letters which his successor in the Chair, Longfellow, achieved in fostering. He was a sound and immensely industrious writer, lacking as a critic in those charms and graces that make scholarship attractive to a wide circle of readers. Yet he had an attractive literary side which may be enjoyed in his own Life, Letters, and Journals (1878).

HENRY JAMES (1811-1882), the father of the novelist and of the late Professor William James, was a fresh and original philosophical thinker, whose personality has lately been limned anew for us by his son, HENRY JAMES, in Notes of a Son and a Brother. Henry James, the elder, proved a delightful personality, with an unconventional method that was inherited and developed by Professor William James in his stimulating philosophical studies. As the popular expositor of Pragmatism, WILLIAM JAMES has become a familiar name of late years to many readers who hitherto had given philosophy the cold shoulder. This is not the place to discuss views which have naturally given rise to much technical controversy, but even his most hostile critics cannot deny him the power of luminous expression and a power of stating the problems of the schools in a live and attractive manner. While his reputation as a scholar will rest largely upon his brilliantly suggestive Principles of Psychology, the general reader will be drawn more especially to The Varieties of Religious Experience, with its bold attempt to analyse and harmonise conflicting phases of the religious temperament. His influence has been greater as a psychological critic than as a metaphysician.

To descend from philosophic heights to the lowlands of discursive letters, we have in CHARLES GODFREY LELAND (1804-1903), a versatile and accomplished writer, who is best known to the majority as "Hans Breitmann," after the famous medley-dialect ballads, published about 1870. He had a speculative and roving mind, delving in gypsy lore, the psychology of dreams, mental physiology, Italian folk-lore, birds, and art. He translated also Heine's verse and prose.

Leland was nearly always an interesting writer, with a great fund of miscellaneous knowledge, though over-ready to generalise on insufficient data. Probably his Hans Breitmann's Ballads will survive his other writings, indeed, not a few lines have passed into current speech and become the familiar tags of the journalist.

Another versatile writer was GEORGE WILLIAM CURTIS (1824-1892), who also became a journalist. He wrote a popular story of New York life, Trumpet (1861), and among much miscellaneous work published some agreeable travel sketches and some lively satires on American life in The Potiphar Papers (1853). He was a vigorous and untiring social reformer and an able and finished orator.

As an essayist, Curtis is a graceful and cultured exponent of the "light brigade"; sounding no great depths, nor achieving much originality, but nearly always a pleasant and entertaining companion.

II. PROSE: (c) HISTORIANS. George Bancroft—William Hickling Prescott—John Lothrop Motley—Francis Parkman—Daniel Webster—Abraham Lincoln—Goldwin Smith.

THE HISTORIANS

HISTORICAL literature in America is especially connected with Massachusetts, and this fact has been explained by American writers as being due partly to the existence in Boston and Cambridge of fine libraries peculiarly adapted for historical research, partly due to the greater wealth and culture to be found in this State. Historical research obviously needs leisure for its adequate pursuit.

The first historian of considerable note is GEORGE BANCROFT (1800-1889). His twelve volumes dealing with the History of the United States, carry the subject down to the termination of the Constitution. The work is a quarry of valuable information rather than a work of literary art. His discursive and crudely rhetorical style, his laborious minuteness, do not make for agreeable reading. His work, indeed, is not really a history of the States, but a history of the beginnings of the States. Yet, as a pioneer of American history, painstaking and generous-minded, he occupies an honoured place.

On a much higher level stands WILLIAM HICKLING PRESCOTT (1796-1859), whose History of the Conquest of Mexico (1843) and History of the Conquest of Peru (1847), have attained a European reputation. He was not a great scholar, and qua historian is far less accurate than Bancroft, not through wilfulness or carelessness, but because of the poverty of reliable material at the time that he wrote upon the subjects that attracted him the most. Yet, making all allowance for the picturesque inexactitudes of his popular histories, there is much that is still valuable in his work. As literary historian with a power of actualising the past and arresting the imagination of the reader, he can hold his own with our own Macaulay, and, like Macaulay, he has probably infected the minds of thousands with a taste for history.

JOHN LOTHROP MOTLEY (1814-1877) is more accurate and reliable than Prescott, and at the same time he has many of Prescott's literary powers as a picturesque writer, so that we may regard him as the best historical writer America has yet given birth to. He is expressly connected with Dutch history, and his Rise of the Dutch Republic (1856), and the History of the United Netherlands (1860-1868), are the works of a thorough scholar and a dramatic writer Like Froudo, with whom Motley presents points of affinity, Motley has his prejudices, and his Spanish portraits are over-coloured, but that is only to say he has the defects of his good qualities He was an ardent patriot and an intense lover of liberty, and if his style is less easy to read than Prescott's, and some of his pictures over-elaborated, he is, at his best, fully as graphic and arresting

FRANCIS PARKMAN (1823-1893), though younger than Motley, belongs to the more modern school of research He devoted most of his energies to a lengthy and detailed history of America, up to the time of the Revolutionary War He was a great traveller both in America and the Continent, and his personal observation proved of great value to him; fully as valuable in another way were his thorough and systematic explorations in European archives

Already in The Oregon Trail (1847) he had shown himself a lover of nature, an observer of character, and the possessor of a vivid and plastic style When to these accomplishments in literary craftsmanship were added the knowledge and scholarship of the expert investigator, Parkman took his place as one of the great historians in American letters His work is less wide in its appeal than that of Motley and Prescott, and lacks both the style and dignity of Motley; but on the whole Parkman may take a place very little below that of these two brilliant writers; while qua scholar he is certainly superior to Prescott, and is more judicial than Motley.

Allied to the work of the historian is the work of such great publicists as DANIEL WEBSTER (1782-1852) and ABRAHAM LINCOLN (1809-1865)

As an orator, Webster is the greatest that America has given us. Born in 1782, in New Hampshire, he displayed at an early age his power of eloquent speech Entering Congress in his thirty-first year, he soon made his mark, just as earlier he had made his mark as an able lawyer; being regarded as one of the greatest interpreters of the Constitution In 1822 he defended the theory of an indissoluble union in an eloquent and memorable speech His greatest orations were on the two-hundredth anniversary of the landing of the Puritans in 1820, and on the death of John Adams and Thomas Jefferies, and the Reply to Hayne (1830) In 1859 his support of the compromise, on the subject of Anti-Slavery, brought upon him the wrath of Whittier, but here he was more short-sighted than deliberately base, as Whittier's bitter portrait shows him In his desperate attempts to save the Union, he conceded too much to the opponents of freedom And, as we know now, his concessions were vain and fruitless. Yet he was a great and sincere, and a very upright man, somewhat spoiled by success and adulation, whose sincerity was more remarkable than his clear-sightedness

Regarded from the literary point of view, Webster's orations are clear and apposite in exposition, dignified and stately in treatment If not Burke's peer in imaginative power and in variety, he is an oratorical writer of a high order

Abraham Lincoln is a finer figure than Webster Indeed there is no finer figure in American history than he, less brilliant and diverse than Franklin, he is a more thorough representative of the best elements of American democracy The importance of this homely, self-educated man as a factor in American life cannot easily be overestimated

Nobility of character gave both Franklin and Lincoln their pre-eminence as men of affairs, but Lincoln more than Franklin made of letters an ethical rather than artistic matter In political literature Lincoln did for the American people what Longfellow did in poetry—spoke from the heart to the heart, concerned primarily to elevate and purify the springs of national life He is seen at his best in his oration at the Cooper Union in 1860, and in some of his State papers and letters His knowledge of the Bible and theology gives a simple, direct eloquence to his language that reminds us of our own Bunyan Though of the people and for the people, he is no mere prophet of fair things He is as much alive as Whitman was to their weaknesses and faults A democrat of the rarest and most precious order

GOLDWIN SMITH (1823) was a Canadian by adoption Born at Reading, he was educated at Eton and Oxford, and it was not till 1868 that he settled in Canada, becoming Professor of English and Constitutional History in Cornell University An able Canadian publicist, he is also a forceful and suggestive historical critic, and has written a Political History of the United Kingdom (1899), as well as a number of monographs on Cromwell, &c, while later he has showed his versatility by publishing a volume of scholarly verse, Bay Leaves: Specimens of Greek Tragedy (1894) In outlook somewhat pessimistic, in his style trenchant and caustic, his critical work shows everywhere the working of a powerful mind In politics he was an individualist Radical and an anti-Imperialist both in Britain and America

HUMORISTS

INTRODUCTION. HUMOUR ANALYSED. "Artemus Ward"—Francis Bret Harte—"Mark Twain"

It will be obvious to all who have studied American Letters, how insistent the note of humour is both in prose and verse, from Washington Irving onwards. No less obvious is the lack of humour before that time. The few exceptions were, before the coming of Irving, modelled chiefly upon the satirists of the late seventeenth and early eighteenth centuries, and fell considerably short of their models. But there is scarcely a writer of note in the nineteenth century (Margaret Fuller is, perhaps, the one exception) whose humour is not an integral part of his work. Humour plays an important part in the work of scholarly writers such as Lowell and Holmes, it gives a pleasant tang to Thoreau's discursive wisdom, and ripples delicately over the surface of Hawthorne's fantasies. It plays an even more important part in writers more essentially popular, like Bret Harte and Mark Twain. The question naturally arises. Are there any distinctive marks that differentiate American from English humour?

At bottom, of course, humour is an elemental fact, independent of nationality, it derives from a sense of incongruity, an instinctive realisation of the clash between the Ideal and the Real, of the poetry of life and the prose of life. The truth of this statement may be readily tested by applying it to the work of such great humorists as Chaucer, Shakespeare, Rabelais, Corneille. Their humour is basically at one, in its manifestation it is necessarily coloured by racial characteristics.

One thing, however, should be made clear. Humour is, in its ultimate analysis, quite independent of culture. All that culture does is to determine its form, the humour of the cultured writer we may conveniently call "wit"; that of the less cultured, "fun". Both English and American can furnish good examples of each, there is more fun than wit in Mark Twain, for example, more wit than fun in Oliver Wendell Holmes.

In estimating American humour we must bear in mind that many of the writers were profoundly influenced by English models, and to that extent their humour is derivative rather than original. There is, for instance, not a little in Washington Irving that reminds us of Addison and Steele, in Holmes, that recalls Parnock and Lamb. But after making ample allowance for what one might call the natural imitativeness of widely read and impressionable natures as opposed to the artificial imitativeness of the mere literary parasite, there is a good margin of humour in American letters that has a distinctive flavour of its own, affected as it is especially by the racial conditions and particular environment of New England.

Firstly, then—What is this? In the second place—Why this distinctive flavour?

American humour has a dry, astringent quality about it. French humour also is dry, but is far less astringent on the whole, and English humour is, for the most part, not dry at all, but fruity and full-bodied. American humour, then, makes rather for chuckling than for hearty laughter.

For instance, Thoreau's famous retort "One world at a time." Holmes' "Put not your trust in money, but put your money in trust." Lowell's

"Ez to my principles I glory
In beavin' nothin' o' the sort,
I ain't a Wig—I ain't a Tory—
I'm jest a candidate, in short."

Mark Twain's "I could not lie, so I told Harris to do it." Bret Harte's

"Then Abner Dean of Angel's raised a point of order—when

A chunk of old red sandstone took him in the abdomen
And he smiled a kind of sickly smile, and curled up on the floor,
And the subsequent proceedings interested him no more."

Artemus Ward's

"I used to drink once but when I did I never allowed business to interfere with it."

Whence arises this dry brand of humour?

It arises from (1) the contrast between the vastness of America with its primal aboriginal society, and the concentrated civilised life of its cities, (2) the continual clash between the intense practicality of the Yankee, and his larger human sympathies.

Both these features will be better appreciated when we have considered with some detail the especially distinctive American humorists. Washington Irving, Thoreau, Holmes and Lowell, are notable humorists, but they are cosmopolitan in their sympathies, and if we want to analyse American humour, we must needs turn to really national humorists like Artemus Ward, Bret Harte, and Mark Twain. The others are national in parts, these are wholly national.

THE HUMORISTS

CHARLES FARRER BROWNE ("Artemus Ward"), (1834-1867), is better known as a popular humorous lecturer than as a humorous writer, but his writings, though quite unpretentious in their solemn absurdities, have a quaint raciness and originality that make him a welcome addition to the body of acceptable fun-makers. He makes abundant comic capital from orthographical eccentricities (a line of humour worked often to death by many of his successors); thus, in the interview between some pretty young Shakoreesses and the Showman.

"My pretty dears, ear I go you have no objections, have you, to a innersent kiss at parting?"

"'Yay,' they sed, and I yay'd."

"'My pretty dears,' sez I, 'shall we yay agin?'"

"'Nay,' they sed, and I nay'd."

Naturally, he pokes fun at the sentiment over the Red Indian (shades of Cooper!).

"I will remark here, while on the subject of Injuns, that they are in the main a very shaky set, and when I hear philanthropists bewailin' the fact that every year 'carries the noble red man nearer the settin' sun,' I simply have to say I'm glad of it, tho' it is rough on the settin' sun. They call you by the sweet name of brother one minit, and tho next they scalp you with their Thomas-hawks. But I wander. Let us return to the Tower."

Once, when crossing the desert, he was surrounded by a band of Ute Indians. Their chief rejoiced in the name of Wocky bocky.

"Ho said

"Torcha arrah darnah, mishky bookshean!"

"I told him he was right

"Wocky-bocky again rubbed his tomahawk across my face, and said, 'Win-ho-ho-loo!'"

"Says I—'Mr Wocky-bocky,' says I—'Wocky—I have thought so for years—and so's all our family!'"

Bryant's tribute to Artemus is worth recording.

"Artemus has a style of his own, which no lecturer has yet discovered. He says so many funny things that the audience lets a 'goak' slip by unnoticed, and then Artemus will pause for a moment with a downcast expression, till a sudden guffaw tells him that somebody has seen the point. His lecture, besides his rollicking humour, includes considerable information, which is relieved from the tedious elements usually existing in valuable information by the panoramic pictures with which it is illustrated. An excellent idea of social life in great Salt Lake City is obtained from a visit to 'Yours truly,' besides a good stock of jokes to pass off at the next dinner party as original."

In the absurd "Rules of the House" appended to his lecture papers, there are some deliciously ridiculous quips:

"Children in arms not admitted if the arms are loaded

"Children under one year of age not admitted, unless accompanied by their parents or guardians

"Artemus Ward will not be responsible for any money, jewellery, or other valuables left with him—to be returned in a week or so

"If the audience do not leave the hall when this entertainment is over, they will be put out by the police

"Soldiers on the battle-field will be admitted to this entertainment gratis

"Artemus Ward delivered lectures before

ALL THE CROWNED HEADS OF EUROPE ever thought of delivering lectures"

Here is an extract from the programme at the Egyptian Hall:

"Mr Artemus Ward will call on the citizens of London at their residence, and explain any jokes in his narrative which they may not understand"

The following is taken from some (we need hardly say bogus) recommendations appended to the programme

"It was a grand scene, Mr. Artemus Ward standing on the platform talking, many of the audience sleeping tranquilly in their seats, others leaving the room and not returning, others crying like a child at some of the jokes—all, all formed a most impressive scene and showed the powers of this remarkable orator. And when he announced that he should never lecture in that town again, the applause was absolutely deafening."

Poor Browne's early death from consumption was universally regretted. America lost their most original humorist; his friends a genial, tender-hearted comrade.

FRANCIS BRET HARTE (1839-1902) was something more than a mere fun-maker (though that limitation is by no means to be despised). He was born in New York, August 1839, with English, German, and Hebrew blood in his veins. He was a delicate lad, and in 1856 went to California with his mother, becoming in succession a messenger, a drug clerk, a printer, a school teacher, and an Indian fighter, and secretary to the Superintendent of the Mint in San Francisco. In the last capacity he found opportunity for writing, and achieved some of his earliest successes, as, for instance, those capital parodies Condensed Novels. He did well also in whimsical light verse. Later on he achieved greater fame with his Luck of Roaring Camp and other Californian studies, which delighted all but the Californians themselves. Throughout his life he was a wanderer, but he never did any work of value apart from the inspiration of Western America, and it had been better for his genius if the wanderer-lust had been less firmly rooted. He died in 1902, at Camberley, Surrey.

Bret Harte's humour found a natural outlet in the rough, elemental life of the mining camp, where extravagances of personality as well as of incident seem quite in harmony with the surroundings. With this eye for extravagances he combined a dry, restrained, staccato style, peculiarly effective as a vehicle alike for his melodramatics, sentimentalities, and more comicities. His best writings have something of that colloquial realism, and rough actuality, that attract us in Mr. Kipling's tales, and which was, in the days of Bret Harte's popularity, a new and alluring feature.

There is a certain spiritual kinship between Bret Harte and Charles Dickens, in so far as each man was drawn towards rough, uncultured folk, and sought to show beneath the roughness and uncouthness, some fine strain of character, and each man won his greatest artistic successes in this field. The analogy must not be pressed further; for putting aside the incomparably greater genius of Dickens, his literary method has little in common with that of Bret Harte. But as moralists in fiction their likeness is of interest to the student of letters.

Here is a picture from one of the Californian stories :

'The winter of 1851 will long be remembered in the foot-hills. The snow lay deep on the Sierras, and every mountain creek became a river, and every river a lake. Each gorge and gulch was transformed into a tumultuous water-course that descended the hill sides, tearing down giant trees and scattering its drift and debris along the plain. Red Dog has been twice under water, and Roaring Camp had been forewarned 'Winter put the gold into them gulches,' said Stumpy. 'It's been here once, and will be here again!' And that night the North Fork suddenly leaped over its banks and swept up the triangular valley of Roaring Camp.

"In the confusion of rushing water, crashing trees, and crackling timber, and the darkness which seemed to flow with the water and blot out the fair valley, but little could be done to collect the scattered camp. When the morning broke, the cabin of Stumpy, nearest the river-bank, was gone. Higher up the gulch they found the body of its unlucky owner, but the pride, the hope, the joy, the Luck of Roaring Camp had disappeared. They were returning with sad hearts when a shout from the bank recalled them.

"It was a relief boat from down the river. They had picked up, they said, a man and an infant, nearly exhausted, about two miles below. Did anybody know them, and did they belong here?"

"It needed but a glance to show them Kentucky lying there, cruelly crushed and bruised, but still holding the Luck of Roaring Camp in his arms. As they bent over the strangely assorted pair, they saw that the child was cold and pulseless. 'He is dead,' said one. Kentucky opened his eyes. 'Dead?' he repeated feebly. 'Yes, my man; and you are dying too.' A smile lit the eyes of the expiring Kentucky. 'Dying!' he repeated, 'he's taking me with him. Tell the boys, I've got the Luck with me now,' and the strong man, clinging to the frail babe as a drowning man is said to cling to a straw, drifted away into the shadowy river that flows for ever to the unknown seas."

Apart from his power of visualising a side of life hitherto untouched in literature, and from his sense of local colour, Bret Harte lacks distinction as a writer. Away from his favourite locale he becomes more often than not wearisome, and though there is excellent feeling in his prose parodies, they are not parodies of the first order, as Mr. Max Beerbohm's are. The burlesque element is too strong, the sense of style too weak.

In his verse there is plenty of vigour and colour. If it lacks the polish of Holmes and the intellectual tang of Lowell, it has humour and observation—while once at least, in the oft-quoted Heathen Chinee, it reaches a high level of satiric ingenuity. But on the whole, it is inferior to his best prose, for it is too rough-hewn, too dependent on well-known models.

Bret Harte will be remembered by his Luck of Roaring Camp, his Miggles, and his Outcasts of Poker's Flat, for there his erratic genius finds its most satisfying expression.

SAMUEL LANGHORNE CLEMENS, otherwise "Mark Twain," was born in Florida, Missouri, 1835. His early years, with their variety of employment, served him well as an apprenticeship to letters. As a printer, a journalist, a river pilot, a soldier (in the Confederate Army), he amassed experiences that soon found an outlet in letters. Bursting upon his countrymen with broad extravaganzas like The Jumping Frog and The Innocents Abroad, he is regarded by many as merely a humorist of the old-fashioned two-penny coloured order—in other words, a jolly-hearted buffoon.

But he is very much more than that, and even in The Innocents Abroad, amid much cheap tomfoolery, there are touches of admirable observation, and a graphic power of description.

As a humorist, he is less whimsical, less subtle than Bret Harte, but superior to him in fertility of inspiration and fecundity of subject matter. As a story-teller he has greater variety, and a steadier outlook on life; with greater force and intensity of his best if less poignancy. His nom-de-plume came to him while as a pilot he was working on the Mississippi, and he would often hear the cry of warning "Mark Twain" or "In Two Fathom." Thus he seized on the name and used it for his work.

Mark Twain's travel experiences are drawn freely upon in his earlier works: The New Pilgrim's Progress, and The Innocents Abroad (dealing with Palestine), Roughing It and The Innocents at Home (dealing with life in Western America); A Tramp Abroad (dealing with European places, especially Switzerland).

In his later works the humour is less extravagant, the tone less cheerfully irresponsible, the humorist reveals himself as not merely a brilliant descriptive writer, or an acute observer, but as a delicate and subtle observer, an admirable story-teller, with a fine sense of character. He never did anything better than Tom Sawyer, Huckleberry Finn, and Pudd'nhead Wilson—unsurpassed in their own way as pictures of American life.

His later years were filled with sorrow, yet at no time did his personality seem more attractive, or his character more lovable. Grief embitters some natures; it mellowed Twain's and revealed what few had suspected that not only was he very much more than a jester, but that he was better in his serious than in his jocular moods. As a humorist, Twain scarcely ranks higher than fun-makers such as Max Adeler. He is less original than Artemus Ward, less artistic than Bret Harte, for his taste is by no means impeccable, as those disingenuous books, A Yankee at the Court of King Arthur, and Personal Recollections of Joan of Arc, show.

Even in his Travel Yarns, his descriptions are better than his jokes—for all their jolly, good-natured exuberance.

Take, for instance, this admirable pen picture from The Innocents Abroad:

"We walked out into the grass-grown, fragment-strewn court beyond the Parthenon. It startled us every now and then, to see a stony white face stare suddenly up at us out of the grass with its dead. The place seemed alive with ghosts. I half expected to see the Athenian heroes of twenty centuries ago glide out of the shadows, and steal into the old temple they know so well and regarded with such boundless pride."

The full moon was riding high in the heavens now. We sauntered carelessly and unthinkingly to the edge of the lofty battlements of the citadel, and looked down. A vision!—and such a vision! Athens by moonlight! It lay in the level plain right under our feet—all spread abroad like a picture, and we looked upon it as we might be looking at it from a balloon. We saw no semblance of a street, but every house, every window, every clinging vine, every projection were marked as clearly as if it were at noonday, and yet there was no glare, no glitter, nothing harsh or repulsive. The hardest city was flooded with the yellowest light that ever streamed from the moon, and seemed like some little temple, whose delicate pillars and ornate front glowed with a rich lustre that chained the eye like a spell, and nearer by, the palace of the king leered its creamy walls out of the mist of a great garden of shrubbery, that was flecked all over with a random shower of amber lights—a spray of golden sparks that lost their brightness in the glory of the moon, and glinted softly upon the sea of dark foliage like the pallid star of the milky way. Overhead the stately columns, majestic still in their ruin, underfoot, the dreaming city, in the distance, the silver sea. The picture needed nothing. It was perfect."

Indeed his fun is most acceptable when well diluted by other qualities, the "set scenes" seem too often mechanically comic. We would willingly surrender them for such occasional flashes as this, dealing with the terrors of tipping in a big hotel.

"If you have a man to sneeze for you, and another chooses to help him, you have got to pay both."

Yet, excellent as his travel books are in vivid snapshots of men and things, Twain is at his happiest as a national writer when dealing with American life. Elsewhere he is a fitful artist, there a great artist.

The Jumping Frog might have been written by Josh Billings or Max Adeler. The Man that Corrupted Hadleyburg (1900) is worthy of Lowell at his best.

It may savour of paradox to give serious examples of the best work of the humorist. Yet herein lies the fount of their humorous inspiration—a poetic sensibility and power of observation. Without these qualities they might have been jesters of a kind—not great jesters.

INTRODUCTION

NOMINALLY, the Victorian era closes in 1900; actually, it came to an end during the 'eighties. The last ten years of the century saw a ferment of new ideas, gave birth to a fresh set of forces in literary life, and witnessed a reaction against many of the old Victorian ideals.

The new movement bears some resemblance to the Romantic revival that quickened our sensibilities at the close of the eighteenth century. It also is affected by Revolutionary ideas, it also is Democratic in its implications, it also involves a closer correspondence of Art with Nature.

But if the general resemblance is considerable, there are particular differences that give it a distinctive character of its own. There is always a rhythmic ebb and flow in literary fashions and ideals, but history, despite the adage, never repeats itself, though historical conditions may. No two sunrises are ever the same.

What are the special characteristics of the present-day tendencies in life and letters?

(1) Its reiteration of the old Revolutionary formula of Liberty, Equality, and Fraternity, in a new setting. (2) Its worship of Power rather than of Beauty—here it parts company abruptly with the age of the Romantic revival and the Victorian age. (3) Its challenging attitude of the elder values in Art and Life—this to some extent is true also of the age preceding, but the challenging attitude is more persistent, more searching to-day.

1. Its Reiteration of the old Revolutionary Formula

The old formula emphasized the individual, it drew attention to the importance of man as man, irrespective of class distinctions, and its reading of "equality" and "fraternity" was a moral and sentimental one. To-day the formula is construed in a fresh light. It is collectivist, not individualistic in its emphasis, it is economic rather than moral and sentimental, it does not express itself in a humanitarian appeal to the more influential classes to help their poorer brethren, it strikes a more radical note in aiming at the abolition of class distinction. We can see this clearly if we place the social idealism of Wordsworth and Coleridge beside that of William Watson and John Davidson, of Dickens and Reade beside that of Shaw and Wells.

The change, of course, is no violent transition, it began in the 'sixties. Mill in his later studies, Kingsley in his songs, Ruskin in his economic criticism, had paved the way.

But there were pioneers at every stage, and it is none the less certain that the social heresies of yesterday have become the orthodoxies of to-day. Ruskin, once regarded as a dangerous innovator, is now regarded as almost old-fashioned in some of his social theories.

Put briefly, the difference between the appeal of the old Revolutionary formula and the new, is, that the old was made to the community as a collection of individuals, the new to the state as an organic and collective whole. Nor has this revolutionary gospel been confined as before to a few isolated figures in poetry and prose, it is promulgated by a compact body of writers drawn from the middle classes, whose aim is more systematically and logically, less sentimentally and didactically, expressed than in the Victorian era. The failure of the Labour riots in the 'eighties had taught the reformers the need of an educational programme to arouse more effectually the apathetic majority and to give the poor man a better intellectual equipment for the fight against oppression.

It may be urged that the battle song of Liberty, Equality, and Fraternity is as vital to-day among progressive thinkers as ever it was in the day of Byron and Shelley. That it yet carries with it a vital significance is of course true, but do we sufficiently realise how imperceptibly the values attached to these words have altered. Let us examine, soberly and fairly, these terms so abused by rhetoricians.

Liberty is, in plain English, merely the freedom to do as you like. Obviously such a freedom must in every civilized community be qualified, for you can only do as you like provided you do not interfere with the rights of other people. In Revolutionary France, it meant freedom from the interference of the ruling classes, and this is the sense in which Coleridge and Shelley used the word. In other words, the old ideal of liberty implied a minimum of government. Both Godwin and Shelley looked upon government as an evil. Spencer considered the evil to be necessary, though the less State interference we had the better. This is the prevalent attitude during the earlier years of the century, this ideal saturated the Benthamite radicalism and accounts for the (otherwise inexpliable) reluctance to accept factory legislation it was held to be unconducive to liberty.

But as the years went by, this old ideal wavered; it was felt that excessive individualism retarded rather than helped forward liberty; and to-day the freedom of the community, so far from resting on a decrease of government, is made to depend on a steadily increasing quantity of government. The Socialist to-day who talks about liberty looks to government interference; he does not resent it. Collectivism, so far from connoting a minimum, connotes a maximum of government.

Sociological science, a thing of essentially modern growth, has given greater exactitude and a clearer significance to the term liberty than it possessed in the earlier years of the last century; it has also done a like service for the terms equality and fraternity. No longer are we content with the moral implication of the term as is suggested by Burns' familiar lines "The man's tho gowd for a' that." We have attempted to particularise the sentiment, as may be seen in such phrases as "Equality of opportunity." Fraternity likewise, for many years respected more in the light of a pious aspiration and left in the hands of the theologian and the poet, has gradually become an important factor in social politics. Not even the ghastly carnage of a Europe red with blood, should blind us to the fact that fraternity is a more living reality to-day than it was at the time when Shelley pleaded for Love as the law of life, and Coleridge declared that "ho prayeth best who loveth best."

At first sight this statement may seem grotesquely untrue in face of the unspeakable horrors with which we have been for the last few months familiarised. But just as one does not accept as normal the temperature of a man in a raging fever, so one does not assess the moral sentiments of a nation when it is drunk with militarism.

Few of us in England can have realised the disintegration of all the finer instincts that this militaristic poison is capable of accomplishing. The poison has been secretly at work for years past. Now it has spread from a section of the governing classes in Germany to the German people at large. A little leaven leaveneth the whole lump. On the few who have deliberately fostered the poison, a terrible responsibility exists. But the many who have been unwittingly poisoned, must not be judged in the same way. They are as much the victims of a pernicious theory as are the thousands of tortured and murdered men, women, and children who have suffered in Flanders and Northern France. When the hour of madness has passed, fraternity, paralysed but not killed, will emerge the stronger and the deeper for the momentary set-back. And that the fraternal sentiment is not killed must be clear to all who recall the remarkable account of Christmas 1914 in the trenches, when for a brief space enemies were forgotten and friend and foe fraternised together.

That brutality should even thus far have inhibited the growth of humanitarian feeling that has undoubtedly spread during the last hundred years, is largely due to a second characteristic which has leapt into prominence during the last twenty years.

The second characteristic in modern life and letters is the Worship of Power rather than of Beauty. In its inception this characteristic is a wholesome reaction from the over narrow ideal of Beauty that marked Victorian ideals. Strictly speaking there should be no line of demarcation between Power and Beauty. The most vital beauty is dynamic; many of the Victorians imagined it was something merely static. Immediately it is thus restricted it tends to lose its freshness and primal inspiration: conventionality weakens its vital appeal. artificiality creeps in to make it a source of enervation rather than of stimulus.

And some of the greater Victorians were keensighted enough to realise this. Browning consistently strove for strength rather than for sweetness in literary expression, just as he valued vigorous individuality above meek acquiescence in law and order; and not the least of his gifts to English literature was his strenuous attack upon the pretty-pretty conventionality that was one of the weaknesses of Victorian letters. Meredith and Hardy, each in his own way, followed in Browning's lead, and achieved for fiction what he had done for poetry.

But the new generation was to go further still, and it found an effective method to hand in the movement that has been christened Realism.

Writers like George Moore, W. E. Henley, and Rudyard Kipling brought a rough outspokenness into our letters. More and more do we notice a relaxation on the part of literary craftsmen, of those general problems of life and conduct that hitherto had been the chief concern of letters, for the particular problems of the day. The Woman's Movement found expression in the "keynote" series of the early 'nineties; Socialism, no longer a communistic dream as in the pages of Morris, becomes in the hands of men like Shaw, Wells, Edward Carpenter, Robert Blatchford, a homily for the particular needs of the nation. Even Morris, with all his devotion to beauty, significantly postulated that it must subserve some social end; and if Morris, the lover of beauty, insisted on this, can we be surprised that many in whom the sense of beauty was more superficially awakened should sometimes pass it by altogether in their efforts to be faithful to the actuality of contemporary life? As a result of this the literature of the New Era, with all its freshness, its living interest, its power to grip, became less and less of an art, more and more a method of social propaganda.

No better illustration of this tendency can be found than in the extraordinary development of Journalism, and in the revival of the Drama. There are few better rostrums for preaching than the editorial table and the stage; yet without denying literary qualities to the drama and also the journalism of to-day, clearly the chief claim to attention lies in their vigorous preaching qualities. All the outstanding literary personages of to-day, first and foremost, are lay preachers—Shaw, Wells, Bennett, Galsworthy, Maschfield, Chesterton, Hilaire Belloc.

It is clear, therefore, that this craving for more power, more freedom, greater unconventionality in literature, had its beginnings in a perfectly wholesome mood of reaction. It is, moreover, clear that it accomplished a good deal that was desirable in re-invigorating both Literature and Life. At the same time it carried with it dangers of its own, that were fully as mischievous in quite another way as the dangers inherent in the tendencies of the age preceding. What these dangers more precisely were will be better realised if we turn to the third characteristic—The Note of Challenge.

While the preachers are many, the gospel that they preach is a negative rather than a positive one. To say this implies no reproach. The age is a transitional one. Old landmarks are disappearing, new points have not yet been clearly marked out. Meanwhile the attitude of the new movement is one of challenge—challenge of the old moral and social values, challenge of elder literary forms; it is an age of experimentalism. In every pioneer movement a period of destruction must precede that of construction. It was so with the English Renaissance, so with the Romantic revival. Old literary conventions, just like old social conventions, had to be broken up. Windows must be smashed when you want to let in fresh air, idols have to be overturned when you wish to revitalise reverence. An experimental age, that is quite clear as to the sources of dissatisfaction, but is by no means clear as to the means of remedying matters, necessarily finds expression in experimental forms of literature. Throughout English history we have found a close correspondence between the life and the literature of the day. This is equally true at the present time.

Not only is the intellectual restlessness of the time obvious enough in the content of present-day literature, but it has influenced its form as well. The novel of to-day, the drama of the hour, the verse of the moment, its signal merits notwithstanding, is in a curious state of unstable equilibrium.

In an older age we went for romanticism to a Scott, for realism to a Crabbe, to Byron for cynical wit, to Shelley for social idealism. Now we find wit and idealism inextricably mingled in the work of Shaw, romanticism and realism play at see-saw in Maschfield. George Eliot was severely taken to task because in Elia Holt she observed to some extent the rules of the story of incident and did not confine herself to characterisation which she had made her special line.

What would the Victorian critics have thought of Mr. Arnold Bennett, who varies his punctiliously realistic studies of life with light-hearted jocularities like The Card and the Grand Babylon Hotel?

Even Mr. Kipling has proved both one of the most unconventional and most conventional of our verse-makers, while Mr. Wells has ranged through every door in the palace of fiction in turn, so that we are reminded in his writings of Jules Verne, Swift, Hawthorne, and Dickens.

One of the great features of life to-day is the curious shrinkage of the world. The invention of the motor car, the aeroplane, wireless telegraphy, have helped to annihilate space. Of their scientific importance and social value there is no need to speak here, but the cumulative effect of these things upon the psychology of the day is worth noting, inasmuch as it reacts upon our literature.

Is not our literature and journalism eloquent of an age of rapid transit? The old leisurely atmosphere has gone, gone also much of the old dignity, grace, sweetness. Even more regrettable is the lack of the old thoroughness. A breathless hurry informs the writing of to-day, a neglect of form, a contempt for beauty. There are compensations, positive gains, of which I am not unmindful and which will be noted by us later; he would be a foolish critic who could see nothing but retrograde elements in the literature of his generation, or who could fail to appreciate qualities of greatness in its best writers. In an age of flux and transition, when fresh tracts of experience are being annexed for literary treatment, when old modes of expression are being cast aside and new ones essayed, art of any kind must necessarily suffer violence and be temporarily at a disadvantage.

The excesses of the realistic school, the extravagances of certain artistic coteries, the scrappy sensationalism of modern journalistic developments, are part of the price we must pay in order to bring our life and letters into closer correspondence.

There is no need to reiterate here the qualities of greatness that characterise Victorian letters. These have been insisted upon at some length. But admiration and affection for it need not blind us to the fact that a literary age, like an individual, grows infirm in course of time. Literature, as we have seen throughout its history, needs from time to time to be reinforced with fresh vitality, with new vigour, otherwise it will languish and decay. To do this has been the work of the new generation since the closing years of the last century, and if there is more force and sincerity than beauty and sweetness in modern letters, it is because force and sincerity were the things needed. The new wine may at present be rather acid and heady, but it has body, and time will remedy its defects. Meanwhile we must bear as tolerantly as possible with those who have drunk too deeply of this heady beverage, and mistake violence and license for strength and freedom.

I POETRY

As regards the poetry of the period this may be said by way of preface. The splendid legacy of the past has enriched the imagination of all, its significance made the clearer and weightier by increased facilities in the book-selling world, and the greater attention given to critical and interpretative literature. The influence of Wordsworth and of Tennyson especially may be traced in much contemporary verse. Mr. William Watson carries on the Wordsworth tradition, while the lyrical sweetness and rhythmic charm of Tennyson have left their impress in different ways upon Mr. Stephen Phillips and Mr. Alfred Noyes.

It is not in these writers, however, that we shall find the new spirit in letters asserting itself. To find this we must turn to Kipling. Henley has introduced a more realistic note into poetry, especially in the emphasis he laid on Victorian life, but Rudyard Kipling is the first man who treated the raw material of modern existence in such a way as to appeal to the man in the street. And in dealing with the crude actualities of "things as they are," neither Mr Kipling nor his successor, Mr John Masefield, have been at pains to eliminate the concomitant ugliness from their art. Masefield is the less sparing here, and it is curious to note that while his best work shows a finer and surer imaginative beauty than that of Kipling, he is less concerned than his contemporary to soften the brutal realities with which as a writer he is concerned.

I do not think this is due to the fact that he is more realistic in his method than the author of Barrack Room Ballads; for if you examine their work closely, Kipling's verse shows a more deliberately realistic manner. But Kipling is at heart more conventional than Masefield. Masefield's keener sensibilities drive him into a frenzy when he compares the idealities with the realities, and the coarse and nauseous violence of certain passages in his verse are the outcome of an exasperated romanticism, not the result of a deliberate realism. Less conventional than Kipling, he is at less pains to hide his feelings. That he has greater imagination I would not aver—recalling such things as Mandalay—but he has certainly a more sensitive one.

Another illustration of the new spirit in our poetry may be seen in the work of æsthetic writers like Arthur Symonds and Ernest Dowson, and brilliant experimentalists such as John Davidson.

Symonds grew lyrical over lip salve, rouge, and the thick atmosphere of the music hall. There are other things beside elemental realities that may claim to be treated of in Art, said Dowson and Symonds in effect. The realities of life include very many phases of human experience—even exotic and morbid moods, and the dallying with artificialities. Artistic skill need not be denied the author of London Voluntaries and Amoris Victima—though Dowson is the finer artist here in morbidzza—but the defect of Mr Symonds' metrical art lies in the absence of any true gaiety, abandon, joie de vivre in his erotic moods. His amatory verses repel, not because they are concerned with sensual sensations, but because it is a cold—not a hot-blooded sensuality—because there is too little of the genuine Bohemian, too much of the clever experimental journalist in his work. It is a pity, for Symonds has a fine and fastidious literary palate, and a genuine love of letters, as his prose writings show.

The work of JOHN DAVIDSON deserves a more lengthy consideration.

JOHN DAVIDSON

John Davidson, born 1857, was the son of Scottish parents, and was educated at the Highlanders' Academy, Greenock, up to the age of thirteen; he then worked in a sugar manufactory for a brief while, but in 1873 returned to his old school as a pupil teacher. Other scholastic work followed during the next few years. Then came a brief business interregnum again in a Glasgow thread firm; after which his career as a teacher was resumed. During this time he had given much thought to literature and published several plays.

Finally he gave up his scholastic work, and coming to London threw all his energies into literature and journalism. He wrote for The Speaker and The Yellow Book, scored a fair measure of theatrical success with his translation of Coppée's For the Crown and Victor Hugo's Ruy Blas, but distinguished himself most as a fresh and vigorous verse writer. Such volumes as Fleet Street Eclogues and Ballads and Songs, published during the 'nineties, exhibit him at his best as a literary artist. During his later years he gave more attention to matter than to manner, and was mainly concerned with giving his philosophy of life to the world in a series of "testaments."

Circumstances were often adverse, yet he had a fair mood of success and a generous allowance of recognition compared with that which has fallen to some men of letters. But his proud nature and awkward temperament shaped him for tragedy. He was a born revolutionary, an instinctive fighter, and stoical fortitude was not among his virtues, courageous as he was in many ways.

Depressed and discouraged by the necessity of doing so much pot-boiling work in order to earn a livelihood, Davidson, it is surmised, put an end to his life in 1909. His body was found by some fishermen in Mount's Bay, Cornwall, and he was buried at sea, in consonance with his own wishes.

His Work

Various as his work is, farce, satire, fantasy, romance, it is as a writer of ballads that he will probably be best remembered. There is an opulence, a passion about these that grip the imagination. Sometimes indeed he rises to a stark splendour of phrasing worthy of the highest traditions of English poetry. For instance, in such stanzas as these from A Ballad of Heaven:

"He wrought at one great work for years,
The world passed by with lofty look
Sometimes his eyes were dashed with tears,
Sometimes his lips with laughter shook
His wife and child went clothed in rags,
And in a windy garret starved
He trod his measures on the flags,
And hush on heaven his music carved.
Wistful he grew but never feared,
For always on the midnight skirts
His rich orchestral score appeared
In stars and zones and galaxies
He thought to copy down his score
The moonlight was his lamp," he said.
'Listen, my love,' but on the floor
His wife and child were lying dead."

Or these from Romney Marsh—

"Masts in the offing wagged their tops,
The swinging waves pealed on the shore
The saffron beach, all diamond drops
And heads of surge, prolonged the roar
As I came up from Dymchurch Wall,
I saw above the Downs' low crest
The crimson bands of sunset fall,
Flicker and fade from out the west.
Night sank like flakes of silver fire
The stars in one great shower came down,
Shrill blew the wind; and shrill the wire
Rang out from Hythe to Romney town.

The darkly shining salt sea drops
Streamed as the waves clashed on the shore,
The beach, with all its organ stops
Pealing again, prolonged the roar."

There is a fine humour in Davidson's verse, that sparkles in The Ballad of a Nun, and flashes from his haunting lyric The Runnable Stag—

"Three hundred gentlemen able to ride
Three hundred horses, as gallant and free,
Behold him escape on the evening tide
Far out till he sank in the Severn sea,
Till he sank in the depths of the sea—
The stag, the buoyant stag, the stag
That slept at last in a jewelled bed
Under the sheltering ocean's spread,
The stag, the runnable stag."

Davidson is rough and uneven as a writer, by deliberate intent, not through lack of care, but he is never weak and negligible; there is power and passion in his earliest dramatic work, e.g. Bruce, and power and thought in the somewhat chaotic Testaments of his later period, when he had come to look on rhyme as a sign of decadence, and to insist upon his revolutionary creed as the one thing that mattered. His blank verse is remarkably forceful, and the influence of Milton and Shakespeare is considerable.

In his outlook on life, Davidson owed much to Nietzsche. Like Nietzsche he made it his business continually to question accepted ideas and to demand a revaluation. With Nietzsche he worshipped Power and Will, but he had no sympathy with the doctrine of the Super man. He was impatient with the rationalistic spirit that the science of the mid century had helped to disseminate.

"Rationalism was only a stage in the process. For the old conception of a created Universe, with the fall of man, an atonement, and a heaven and a hell, the form and substance of the imagination of Christendom, Rationalism had no substitute. Science was not ready, but how can poetry wait? Science is synonymous with patience, Poetry is impatience incarnate. Science is still a valley of dry bones till imagination breathes upon it."

But in striving to give expression to these ideas in artistic form, he lost grip as a writer. He surrendered his ancient heritage as a poet, and his links with the past, but was unable to find a medium through which to express his new ideas. We may admire the vigour and sincerity of his later utterances, but their form is displeasing and their utterance confused and vague. It is for his ballads especially, and after these his eclogues, that he will be esteemed by lovers of literature, the one for their beauty and passion, the other for their fantasy and whimsical grace.

THE CELTIC NOTE

What of the "Celtic School," it may be said, of which we have heard so much lately? How is this to be reconciled with the new spirit of which we have been speaking?

Frankly, I cannot admit the existence of any Celtic school such as may claim a distinctive place in modern verse. A Celtic note there is admittedly, but this is nothing new. Let us consider what the phrase connotes in the literature of to-day.

Broadly speaking, the Celtic note in English letters is as old as our literature, finding expression on one side in the Arthurian Romances, on the other in the Scots ballads, but when it comes to differentiating the Celtic from the Teutonic note we are faced by insuperable difficulties which are certainly not surmounted by labelling everything that survives of mysticism and idealism as Celtic. Neither Blake, Coleridge, nor Shelley were Celts, yet where in our poetry do you find these elements more rarely emphasized? In fact our greatest imaginative writers have been men of mixed blood, whereas the pure Celtic man of letters has nearly always been a writer of the second or third rank. T. W. Moore, George Darley, Mangan, Ferguson. The touch of melancholy in British verse has been claimed on the Celt's behalf, but this vein runs throughout the work of men like Tennyson and Matthew Arnold, and Clough, and none of these were Celts.

Attention has been paid to a number of writers who strike the Celtic note, whether in Britain or Ireland, when, however, we pass out of Victorian times this Celtic note loses the vague indefinite quality that had for the most part characterised it before, and becoming more nationalistic, merges into what has been called the Celtic Revival. The phrase, however, must be regarded in a political and social sense rather than a literary; for the Celt has no more importance as a literary force to-day than at any time during the last hundred years. Distinctive nationalistic movements in Ireland, Scotland, and Wales have, however, given him a more definite position.

In Ireland, the literary movement is associated largely with the name of Mr. W. B. Yeats, who founded the Irish Literary Society in 1891, and was responsible some years later for the Irish Literary Theatre. With him may be mentioned Dr. Douglas Hyde, Lady Gregory, and Mr. Arthur Percival Graves, who concentrated attention, as Scott had done in the case of his own country, upon the ancient songs and legends of Ireland.

In Scotland, the Celtic note has been popularised of late years by the work of "Fiona Macleod" (William Sharp), but in Wales the people have expressed themselves latterly more through political than literary channels. In Victorian times, Sir Lewis Morris is the only Cymric singer of importance, and popular as his writings were, they had no special artistic excellence. There are signs however of an attempt to emphasize the more literary aspects of Welsh life, and Mr. Ernest Rhys has done good work in this direction.

The Celtic note, therefore, in so far as it exists, is merely a continuation of a persistent element in British verse from earliest times. If it has gained more attention to-day than formerly, this is merely because it is sharply differentiated from the prevalent note of realism, it is a Romantic survival that has resisted the spirit of change, not a fresh manifestation in literary life.

II FICTION

The novel provides such a facile and attractive means of popular appeal, and is so adaptable to literary fashions, that its continued vitality will surprise no one. It enjoys, however, no longer the unchallenged supremacy that was its own in Victorian times, when many of the best minds of the age used it as a medium of expression.

If the literary student will follow the development of fiction from the 'nineties down to the present day, he will realise that while the quantity of output suffers slight diminution there is a marked decline in the quality, and that there is an increasing tendency on the part of our ablest men to choose other modes of expression. Journalism and the drama have proved serious rivals to the intellectual supremacy of the novelist. Indeed, some of the most remarkable men of the present time achieve their best work in terms of the newspaper office, or of the theatre—e.g. Bernard Shaw, G. K. Chesterton, John Galsworthy, J. M. Barrie, Granville Barker. Mr G. K. Chesterton, with his acrobatic intellect, has essayed fiction in the same way as he has essayed most forms of literature, but he is, above everything, a brilliant journalist. Sir J. M. Barrie won a name in contemporary letters, truly, by his studies in Scottish life; but the kernel of Barrie's genius lies in his plays.

Yet in the first decade of the period at any rate, the novel was still a force of considerable magnitude in the life of the day.

The brilliant little band of writers who contributed to the Yellow Book and the Savoy, despite extravagances and alliterations, did work that was worth the doing in tilting against the conventions that had hampered even some of the greatest Victorian novelists, to the depicting of certain phases of life. Mr Morrison in particular proved a needful influence by opening up in his Tales of Mean Streets and A Child of the Jago, a frank and intimate study of the seamy side of city life—a phase of our life that had been over-sentimentalised and covered up. Oliver Twist was realistic beside Jack Sheppard, but Dickens was afraid to speak out as he would like to have done, and could have done, for fear of scandalising his readers. It was time that some one should speak out. So Mr Morrison on one side, and Mr George Moore and Mr George Gissing on the other, gave us greyness to counterbalance the glut of rose-pink.

Another striking feature in the fiction of to-day, is the dominance of the woman novelist. Of the important part she played in Victorian fiction mention has been made, and here, as there, she is to be found in the forward movement. The note of revolt against the sex-limitations of modern life had been struck by that passionate little Puritan, Charlotte Brontë. The bugle had been blown, and now across the years its cry was taken up by a little band of clever women. There had been spasmodic outbursts before, as for instance, when Olive Schreiner published, in 1881, her Story of an African Farm, but it became a chorus of revolt through the mouths of "George Egerton" (Mrs Golding Bight), Sarah Grand, "Iota" (Miss Mannington Cuffyn), Beatrice Harraden, Elizabeth Robins, and Mrs W. K. Clifford.

But not all of them were revolutionaries. Mrs Humphry Ward, who started with the van, was too critical, too judicial by temperament, to sympathise with her sister extremists; and to-day she would certainly be accounted among the literary conservatives.

There was more freshness and daring than art and staying power in many of these writers, but though the literary revolution of the woman's movement was a brief one, it left a permanent mark on the fiction that succeeded, and the experimentalists to-day, such as Mr Compton Mackenzie and Mr Gilbert Cannan, owe a considerable debt to the women pioneers who broke fresh ground, especially in the domain of sexual psychology, in the 'nineties of the last century.

The experimentalist, however, was by no means wholly concerned with realistic points of view, he is to be found also among the Romantics of the time. The dialect novel sprang into popularity in the late 'eighties with Barrie's Auld Licht Idylls, and along with Barrie in the 'nineties must be associated S. R. Crockett and Ian Maclaren, in their tales of Scottish life; Miss Jane Barlow in her Irish tales—Bogland Studies (1892), while the Realists, quickly appraising the value of local colouring did likewise with their enchantments, and the Cockney school in the hands of men like Arthur Morrison, Israel Zangwill, W. Pett Ridge, Edwin Pugh, and Barry Pain, surpassed in staying power the popular "Kail Yard" school.

The influence of science upon Victorian fiction has already been noted. It is more dominant to-day, indeed, it is in science that fiction finds its richest inspiration.

To illustrate from three different types:

In purely sensational fiction it permeates the methods of detective stories like Sherlock Holmes; in the novel of character it lies at the root of Mr Arnold Bennett's cool self-detachment, in the novel of adventure it inspires the restless fantasies of Mr H. G. Wells.

Every experimental period is necessarily self-conscious in its art, and save in the hands of a few masters, intense self-consciousness meets us in the fictions of the last decade or so. This is by no means such an embarrassment to enjoyment as it may seem, but since it throws the onus of pleasing entirely on the personal equation, its limitations will be obvious. It is most agreeably illustrated in the humorous work of the time, so severely criticised by that fine man of letters, H. D. Trill.

The "New Humour," as it was called, lacked the body, the sanity, the broad humanity of the great Victorians, and the virility of the eighteenth-century humorists, so Mr Trill's animadversions were to some extent justified. None the less there is a distinctive quality about latter-day humour that gives it both a literary and human significance.

The paradoxical art of Wilde's Dorian Grey, the fantastic fun of J. M. Barrie, each in its own way contributes a distinct and original contribution to humorous literature, while its special characteristic lies in the self-consciousness of the jester and the capricious blond of romance and reality in his method. The spirit of mockery is more in evidence than in the elder humour, there is an absence of that immense flow of animal spirits that meets us in Dickens, or the tender, spontaneous whimsicality of Lamb. The humour is thinner, drier, less universal in its appeal. It belongs far more to a time and to a fashion than does the humour of the elder humorists. None the less it is excellent in its more limited way, and there is an intellectual flavour about Wilde's wit, and a poetic flavour in Barrie's, that may always be sure of an audience.

Mr W. W. Jacobs can scarcely be classed with the "New Humorists," for he derives so unmistakably from Dickens and Smollett, and carries on worthily—in miniature—the elder traditions.

III THE DRAMA

The weaknesses of the Victorians are more conspicuous in the drama of the period than in other forms of literature, while those qualities that made the Victorian novel and Victorian verse so remarkable, are precisely those that admit least of being expressed in terms of the theatre. It is clear, therefore, that the new note of realism that was becoming more and more insistent would find a better welcome on the stage than elsewhere, for there it was needed most of all. Two men who prepared the way for the striking change that took place in the 'nineties—a change that has not yet reached its fullness of development—are Henry Arthur Jones and Arthur Wing Pinero. Mr H. A. Jones showed a lively sense of characterisation that helped materially to vitalise the stereotyped figures of the older Victorian play, Sir A. W. Pinero by his deft craftsmanship and keen appreciation of stage effects did good work in creating a livelier illusion of reality. Neither the one nor the other were Realists in the accepted sense of the term, Mr Jones' rhetorical methods detracted often from his shrewd observation, and Sir A. W. Pinero showed more ingenuity in his situations than in his ideas.

But they prepared the way none the less for an appreciation of Ibsen's genius, and accustomed the playgoer to a more faithful and intimate picture of contemporary life than that to which he had been accustomed.

In some quarters the change that came over the English drama is attributed almost entirely to Ibsen, with William Archer as his high priest and Bernard Shaw as his prophet. But the change cannot be expressed so simply as that; it was a change in the psychological climate of Europe that affected some countries more quickly than others, and it was in the natural order of things that our insular conservatism should hold out against it, whilst Scandinavia and Germany should give us the lead. Ever since the earlier years of the century, the poverty of the English drama had oppressed the thoughtful men of the time. William Gifford, of the Quarterly Review, had said in 1810, "It seems as if all the idiots of the United Kingdom had combined together to write for the stage." Certainly while, in every other domain of art, beauty and fundamental brain work was not far to seek, in the theatre alone, at any rate for the first two-thirds of the era, poverty of idea and artificiality of treatment triumphed. The play-going public as a whole accepted cheerfully the mechanical plays of Scribe and his school; indeed, so fetter-bound were we by the machine-made play that the "tea-cup and saucer" school of T. W. Robertson in the 'sixties, with its simpler, less sophisticated methods, came as a breath of fresh air. A determined attempt was made by some of the great Victorians to restore the prestige of the romantic drama, about the same time as Robertson was effecting a mild revolution in the drama of ordinary life. Tennyson, Browning, and Swinburne worked hard to vitalise old poetic forms, but interesting as much of their work is, it is nothing more than interesting. Tennyson's gifts were panoramic, Browning's psychological, Swinburne's lyrical, valuable enough qualities certainly in poetic drama, yet of little use without the power of expressing action.

Meanwhile, among the dramatic critics of the day there was Mr William Archer, who saw clearly into the human significance of Ibsen's work, and worked hard to introduce the Ibsen "yeast" into English theatrical bread. What Ibsen purposed to effect has been thus expressed in Mr Shaw's exuberant style:

"What we might have learned from Ibsen was that our fashionable dramatic material was worn out as far as cultivated modern people are concerned, that what really interests such people on the stage is not what we call action—moaning two well-known and rather short-sighted actors pretending to fight a duel without their glasses, or a handsome leading man chasing a beauteous leading lady round the stage with threats, obviously not feasible, of immediate rapine—but stories of lives, discussion of conduct, unveiling of motives, conflict of characters in talk, laying bare of souls, discovery of pitfalls—in short, illumination of life."

In 1889 A Doll's House was produced in England by Charles Charrington, and this was followed a few years later by Hedda Gabler and Ghosts. Naturally there was an uproar amongst the conservative school of critics, but the effect of Ibsen's methods, and Ibsen's attitude towards life, was unmistakable. He did not take us by storm, but he shook our self-complacency, the yeast was introduced. It has been working in our drama ever since. The later plays of H. A. Jones and Pinero testify to this leaven, as we may readily see if we compare The Liars and Michael and his Lost Angel of Jones, The Second Mrs Tanqueray and Iris of Pinero, with their earlier work. An enthusiastic little band of radicals kept the revolutionary note sounding, through the medium of the Independent Theatre and the Stago Society, and more lately the Barker-Vedrenno management at the Court Theatre. For the rest, Mr Stephen Phillips accomplished what his greater predecessors were unable to do—he made the poetic drama, to an appreciable extent, a vital reality, in Paolo and Francesca and in Herod, for he had what men like Tennyson and Browning lacked, a natural instinct for the stage. Then this concentration on the poetic drama had stimulated a fresh interest in Shakespeare, and both Sir Henry Irving and after him Sir Herbert Beerbohm Tree did real service to the stage in their scholarly and poetic productions. Nor must we overlook the splendid work done by that Shakespearean enthusiast Sir F. R. Benson in the provinces.

Of Wilde's work mention is made elsewhere. Here it is sufficient to say that his influence upon the stage was that of a wit, not of a craftsman.

The most important work achieved by the radical wing of playwrights was effected at the Court Theatre early in the new century, and introduced a number of writers, several of whom are still doing notable work for the stage. Granville Barker scored his first unequivocal success in The Voysey Inheritance; while John Galsworthy, John Masefield, and St. John Hankin were responsible for live and fresh contributions to the realistic drama.

The playgoing public, however, as a body is sentimental at heart; and though Shaw and a few others took its fancy by their wit, cleverness, and daring, Sir J. M. Barrie has proved the most popular dramatist of modern times. His vogue is as great as that of Robertson's, and he has what Robertson had not, a tender and whimsical humour, and a touch of high poetry in his nature. His keen, alert humour has disarmed all but the most encouraging sympathisers with realism; his sentimental appeal has appealed to the average man and woman; his theatrical resourcefulness and inventive imagination has interested the critic.

IV CRITICISM AND THE ESSAY

The influence of modern journalism upon the various forms of literary expression is too big a subject to be discussed adequately in these pages. Some rough idea of its sphere of influence may, however, be indicated.

Mr. Bernard Shaw has expressed the view that good journalism is much rarer and more important than good literature. This is probably only his extravagant and provocative way of drawing attention to the importance of dealing with the concrete actualities of one's own age, examining its particular problems; of being vital and, in the best sense of the word, topical. And, in so far as Mr. Shaw seeks to discourage the purely academic view of literature as a by-product—a scholar's game—we may sympathise with his aims.

Great literature, however, as Mr. Shaw knows perfectly well, is great only so far as it is a living, organic thing, intimately related to life and related in two ways. Its tap-root lies in the soil from which it draws its sustenance, the soil of a particular age, with its limitations and characteristics, but its flower is blown upon by the breezes of heaven and fed by the rain and the sun—in this respect it is related to the universal, and is an expression not of an age but of the ages.

And the difference between great journalism and great literature is this, that great journalism deals with the application of general ideas to particular and transient problems, great literature to universal problems; great journalism has an immediate and localised aim in view; it is in a sense literature in a hurry. Its form and method, therefore, necessarily differ from the form and method of literature, inasmuch as it is essentially controversial and deliberately one-sided, and the qualities it needs are not beauty, subtlety, or symmetry, but clarity, conciseness, and sincerity. To speak of journalism as slipshod literature is quite as absurd as it would be to maintain seriously that journalism was more important than literature.

Journalism is as emphatically an art as literature; but it is a different art, and is governed by different rules—the one conforms to the poster, the other to an etching, and it is scarcely necessary to point out to-day what excellent art there may be in a first-class poster. No sensible man would maintain that a poster is more important than an etching, just because the poster aims at a more immediate effect upon practical life. It would be as sensible to say that a policeman was more important than the Lord Chancellor, because his immediate influence could be traced more easily.

So long as the distinction between journalism and literature is recognised, there is no reason why journalism should not exercise a wholesome influence upon letters. Each has an important work to do in focussing and reflecting contemporary life, but while journalism is concerned primarily with the stuff of life, for the sake of its content, literature seeks to enshrine that content in some permanent art-form.

The great value of journalism lies in its close correspondence with actual life, and thus it should tend to preserve literature from becoming conventional and unreal. That it is doing this to a considerable extent may be admitted, but at the present time, journalism is a much more vigorous thing than literature, and consequently in place of being merely a useful ally it is a somewhat tyrannous autocrat. The literature of to-day is like the young lady of Riga who went for a ride on a tiger. Journalism is the tiger, and the two should ever prove good friends, the young lady's refining influence proving beneficial to the tiger, and the activity of the tiger proving a perambulating blessing to the young lady. But unhappily, as we are reminded in the verse, "They returned from the ride with the lady inside, and a smile on the face of the tiger." In other words, journalism has practically swallowed up literature. Our ablest men to-day are, with few exceptions, able as journalists, not as men of letters. They have deliberately chosen journalistic methods by which to appeal to their generation, their verse is journalistic, their fiction is journalistic, their drama is journalistic, but the methods of the journalist are even more notorious when we come to the essay.

We need lament no lack of brains; we have among our writers men as vigorous in intellect as in any age of letters, but in common with their brainless comrades they are moved by the restlessness, the mutability and hurry of the day. They do not talk over their ideas with us as did the elder writers, there is no genial button-holing; no mellow discursiveness. They think it better to spring at our throats, and hurl their ideas at us with a catapultic violence that is often disconcerting and daring. This is the peculiarity of such men as Shaw, Chesterton, Bennett, and Hilaire Belloc, who throw many of their best ideas into essay form.

The essays are live enough, provocative, stimulating, but they are essentially journalistic in form.

Nor is this by any means due to contrariness or pose. Let it be frankly admitted that life as it is lived to-day is not favourable to literature. The still small voice of the artist will not be heard in the babel of sound. The journalist has better lungs, and knows he must shout in order to be heard at all, and that if the imagination of the great crowd is to be arrested, he must achieve the capture by vigorous methods.

It is improbable that the writers in question are not fully alive to this, that they do not deliberately sacrifice the more permanent value of artistic form to the more transient methods of the journalistic touch. Both Mr Shaw and Mr Chesterton would doubtless defend their methods by saying that they did not write for future generations but for the present, that they were concerned with the live questions of the hour, and wished to present these with an instant urgency that would effect their ends. The attitude is not a new one. Browning, when particularly interested in some point of psychology or philosophy, frankly disregarded his manner of speech, intent only upon the thing he wished to say. The attitude is quite a reasonable one from the point of view of the reformer and dialectician, but it removes the work of such writers to that extent out of the domain of pure literature, and out of the domain of fine art.

While a large number of able writers deliberately adopt the poster method there are some whose interests are more literary, and whose temper is more critical, and here the older traditions of style and form persist. Mr Arthur Symonds has carried on the best traditions of Victorian criticism, and his acute and subtle taste as a man of letters is certainly second to none among the critics of to-day. As a stylist he is as delicate and finished an artist as was Pater, and often more luminous. Mr Max Beerbohm, again, is a delightful trifler, and excels in filigree work as a stylist, presenting a piquant contrast to Mr Beerbohm the caricaturist.

Mention must also be made of the quiet irony of Mr G. S. Street, and the agreeable whimsicality though more imitative art of Mr Richard Le Gallienne's earlier essays, while Mr Le Gallienne has done sound work in literary criticism by his studies of Meredith and Rudyard Kipling. Less personal and idiosyncratic, less inclined to abandon the older traditions, are thoughtful and seminal writers like Dr C. H. Horford, Sir W. Robertson Nicoll, Sir Walter Raleigh, Professor Hugh Walker, while as a literary biographer Sir Sidney Lee has admirably upheld the high critical standard of his predecessor, Sir Leslie Stephen. Among the genial discursive essayists of the day, Mr J. V. Lucas makes an agreeable and attractive figure, while Mr A. C. Benson, despite the greater popularity of his prose musings on life and its problems, will be better remembered by the literary student for such sympathetic, discerning studies as his Tennyson and Dante Gabriel Rossetti.

Among the best exponents of English culture, special mention must be made of Professor Gilbert Murray for his interpretation of the Greek drama;

Professor A. W. Ward for his erudite contribution to special periods of English Literature, and Professor Mackail for his lectures on English Poetry.

Of travel literature on its topographical side, we have Sir Martin Conway on the Andes and Spitzbergen, Sir Harry Johnston supplements Stanley's pictures of African life, and Mr A. H. Savago Lander has added greatly to our knowledge of Eastern peoples, on the psychological side, Fielding Hall in his Soul of a People, and Lafcadio Hearn, a genuine literary artist, in his studies of Japanese life, strike a fresher and more original note in travel literature.

V. ART AND LETTERS

No account, however brief, of modern tendencies in literature can overlook the inter-action between art and letters.

Already, in dealing with the Victorian era, the work accomplished by John Ruskin and William Morris has been noted in their co-relation of art with life. Art had been democratised, beauty and social utility had been wedded, so far as was possible under modern economic conditions, and this stress on the significance of beauty and colour, rhythm, harmony, clarity of design, acted as a healthy check upon the tendency of some of the revolutionaries of the day to sacrifice everything to the purely intellectual. The weakness of the new drama lay in its formlessness, its contempt of poetry, and in its striving to be vital at all costs. The followers of Ruskin and Morris showed that beauty is as indispensable to life (and consequently to literature) as is strength, and that the one need not exclude the other.

Art, in the view of these men, was the spirit of order and lucidity and grace, that wrought on men's lives, transforming chaotic passions into harmonious forces for the good of the community in general.

Thus did Morris' Dream of John Ball become translated into Ebenezer Howard's garden cities. The revival of printing, and of book decoration, for which Morris did so much, was continued by men such as Emery Walker, Charles Ricketts, and Walter Crane, and worked a transformation in the book formats of the new generation.

We have but to compare the graceful and artistic publications of to-day with those of twenty-five years ago, to realise the revolution that has been wrought. Quite as remarkable as the cheapness of the modern volume, is its artistic appeal. Good print, tasteful binding, graceful decoration are no longer the prerogative of the well-to-do. The Pre-Raphaelite had restored beauty and reality to painting, the generation that succeeded did the same for black and white work, and for the art of impressionism. Whistler, of course, was the pioneer of impressionism, and Walter Crane did much for the renaissance of book illustration. Here, as elsewhere, Romanticism and Realism vary in proportion according to the temperament of the artist, and while many kept more or less to the ideals of Pre-Raphaelitism, others more frankly and exclusively followed realistic methods.

The Victorian era had its notable black and white artists, as readers of Punch know: and the life of the age with its whims and fancies, fashions and manners is indelibly stamped on the work of such men as John Leech, Charles Keene, and George du Maurier.

But in the last decade of the century and the early years of the new, there are half a dozen first-rate men where there was only one before. It is the age of Phil May, Raven Hill, Harry Furness, Bernard Partridge, and few would dispute the place of honour for Phil May. His art epitomised all the humours of town life, from Bond Street to Whitechapel, with an ease, simplicity, and good-natured tolerance that made him equally popular with his brother artists and the public at large. There is no movement in the literature of the time that does not find pictorial expression in the black and white art. Phil May and Raven Hill stand for realism, Aubrey Beardsley in the earlier years. Sydney Sime in the later, for cynical extravagance; Romanism found its exponents in Maurice Greiffenhagen and Walter Crane, caricature in Max Beerbohm and E. T. Reed. Everywhere the spirit of experimentalising is to be seen, and the self-conscious spirit that showed itself in letters is as fully apparent in the art of the day. There is necessarily much that is unsatisfying, whether from the point of view of art or of life, much that is wilfully grotesque and morbid. But there is life and variety; and that is as much as we have a right to expect from a period of flux and restless adventure.

SOME WRITERS OF TO-DAY

INTRODUCTION

It is a difficult and somewhat perilous thing to discuss the work of men who are still living and expressing themselves in letters—especially in an experimental age like ours, where our ablest men are free lances, unembarrassed by the insignia of any particular school, and pioneers who are constantly prospecting fresh ground. The difficulty is a twofold one. In the first place, there is the old problem of perspective. Those who live among the hills can gain no fair idea of their relative importance and proper configuration, some distance is needed to visualise them satisfactorily. And time is required for any critic who attempts to assay his contemporaries. This is of course, a commonplace, but it is a commonplace with which the critic of the times needs constantly to refresh himself. In the second place, although you may allow for the process of artistic development, there is an incalculable element in all genius, whether great or little, that may confound the most careful and detached survey of the work already accomplished.

It is easy for us, with the whole output of Keats before us to detect the gleam of pure gold and the rich promise amid the alloy and crudities of Endymion. But what critic, however keen-sighted, could have divined in that poem the poet who gave us the Ode on a Grecian Urn or the Ode to Autumn? Much was written on Byron as a poet before Beppo and Don Juan; and many might have thought it quite possible to give a fair estimate of his powers and capabilities on the substantial work already achieved. Yet these poems revolutionised Byron as a literary force. The author of Childe Harold, Manfred, Lara, The Siege of Corinth, was little more than a second-rate rhetorician; the author of Beppo and Don Juan, a poet of the first order. Again imagine an estimate of Scott as a writer before he had written his first novel, Waverley. It may be said that if this is true of some cases, there are others—for instance, Wordsworth and Coleridge—where no injustice would be done by those who had appreciated their work from 1790 to 1805: since the remaining years added nothing to their reputation, while most of their work fell very far short of the Lyrical Ballads. But this line of reasoning confuses the criticism of finished work with criticism of the worker. To see and value the imponderable greatness of The Ancient Mariner is assuredly to value the poetic genius of Coleridge at its highest. But without knowing the premature flickering out of his poetic genius, and of the sudden transfer of imaginative power for creative verse to creative criticism, without reckoning with the brilliant volubility of the talker on Highgate Hill, it is impossible to measure either the extensivity or intensity of his genius.

All that is possible for a critic of his contemporaries to do with any measurable utility, is to examine the character and tendency of a writer so far as it has exhibited itself, contenting himself with tentative and provisional estimates, and avoiding any suggestion of finality in his remarks. Is this desirable? Would it not be better to leave men, whose work is yet unfinished, alone? The point is an arguable one, but for my own part I think in a history of our literature such as I have attempted, there is a distinct advantage in our closing pages of trying to get some rough idea of the character and tendency of the age in which we are living. It is for this reason that I have briefly sketched a kind of ground plan of the last twenty-five years, and shall by way of conclusion select a few representative writers of to-day for more detailed treatment. We may not be able to estimate the extent of Mr Wells' future flights, or the profundity of Mr Bennett's maturer studies; but at any rate we can see how far Mr Wells has flown already and the direction in which he is flying at present, and can form some idea of Mr

Bennett's vision and the particular lines on which it is developing

The genius of these men is incalculable, and they may confound all prophecy; but their talents and idiosyncrasies offer as fair material for analysis as the quality of their pigmentation and the character of their physique

The writers discussed in the following pages are not selected for any supposed superiority over others who have won a place in contemporary letters during the last five-and-twenty years. They have been selected merely because they seemed typically representative of some of the most vital literary movements of the day. For this reason Mr Bennett has been given the preference over Mr Conrad, since Conrad's genius is less characteristic of his generation than is Bennett's. Many names, of course, of whom mention has been made in the chapter upon Present-day Tendencies, are regretfully excluded, through obvious limitations of space. But imperfect and fragmentary as this review of contemporary letters necessarily is, sufficient has been said, I hope, to indicate roughly the chief characteristics of the period, and the tendency and drift of English letters at the present time.

MR. RUDYARD KIPLING

MR RUDYARD KIPLING was born at Bombay on December 30, 1865, his father, Mr John Lockwood Kipling, C.I.E., being at that time Head of the Lahore School of Art

In 1877, his father brought him to England, and left him for five years to store up useful knowledge at the United Services College in Devonshire. An inimitable picture of schoolboy life is given us in Stalky & Co., in which he figures as the Beetle

Having begun his literary apprenticeship as editor of the College Magazine, on returning to India he joined the staff of the Civil and Military Gazette and The Pioneer; his extravagance in ink at this time is humorously recorded by a friend who says, "He had a habit of dipping his pen frequently and deep into the inkpot, and as all his movements were abrupt, almost jerky, the ink used to fly," with the result that at the end of the day he was "spotted all over like a Dalmatian dog"

In 1891 Mr Kipling visited America, and with Mr Wolcott Balestier wrote The Naulahka, he likewise added a little romance on his own account by falling in love with his collaborator's sister, whom he married in London the following year

A considerable traveller, Mr Kipling has roamed through China, Japan, Australia, and Africa, and during the Boer War edited The Friend, a journal published in Bloemfontein. While in the United States, where he resided for seven years, he nearly succumbed to pneumonia. He has now settled down in England

His Poetry

Known as the writer of some clever verses, Departmental Duties (1886), Kipling won his early laurels as a man of letters with his Plain Tales from the Hills (1887), but while the critics were wondering what particular brand of story-teller

they should label him, he published the Barrack Room Ballads (1892), and many realised that the clever verse-writer had become a poet. The roughness, the colloquialism, the frank actuality of his muse made sticklers for the old conventions gasp and objurgate. Many men hailed him as a Realist, who had come to knock the romantic stuffing out of poetry more effectually even than did Whitman, since although Whitman has shown us man as he is, Kipling shows us men as they are. In other words, Kipling was fuller of the concrete realities than Whitman; moreover, he had a sense of humour denied to the American. Consequently the average man, who feels much about poetry as Sir Isaac Newton did when he called it "ingenious nonsense," took Kipling at once to his heart. "There is no romantic high-falutin about this fellow," said the average man. High-falutin there was not, but those who blithely ticked him off as a Realist must soon have realised their error. As a matter of fact, Kipling from the start never has been a Realist, for the very good reason that no true poet ever is. Realism in his work there was, as there is bound to be in the work of any man who can talk in print about the things he has seen and experienced. But the notion that a Realistic method precludes a Romantic vision is a popular error. Romance may lurk beneath a Cockney dialect and the coarse directness of the mess-room, as much as in a jewelled phrase, or in the pure waters of English undefiled. Romance does not necessarily go abroad in fine clothes. And Mr Kipling is steeped in romance. He has felt the glamour and the wonder of life, as fully as the most ardent Romantic, only he does not always speak of these things. He feels them, and he can suggest both in prose and verse, but he speaks of everyday matters and familiar commonplaces. He takes us into the smoking-room and puffs tobacco smoke at us. But while we are speculating as to the brand of tobacco, the pall of smoke resolves itself into the clouds of romance, we chuckle at his masculine yarns and club-room slang, then suddenly find the club-room window, in all its familiar drabness, is really a magic casement "opening on the foam of perilous seas." The realism of Mr Kipling's stage properties is obvious enough, but their novelty has worn off and we can see meanwhile what really took hold of us is the romance behind. We recall the haunting melody of Mandalay, and rhythmic vitality of the Ballad of East and West. Like every true romancer, he has guarded against the make-believe of romance—but he does it in his own way. Keats sang of the glamour of sex, and of the tragic folly of man, in his ballad La Belle Dame sans Merci; Kipling treats precisely the same thing in The Vampire, though in the uncompromising way of everyday talk—

"A fool there was and he made his prayer,

Even as you and I,

To a rag and a bone and a hank of hair

(We called her the woman who did not care)

But the fool he called her his lady fair

(Even as you and I!)"

Keats allows us to see the problem of femininity through the eyes of the bewitched man, Kipling makes us the looker-on, that is the difference. We sympathise with the knight-at-arms, we jeer at the fool; yet Kipling realises as fully as Keats, with what lightning rapidity the best fellow in the world may be converted into the fool when he has the ill fortune to stumble across the woman who can bewitch him. We are all of us heroes, saints and sensible men, with the women who do not attract us.

Mr Kipling can suggest a great deal in a few words. Examine his apparently careless listing, you will find sound philosophy there. For instance, this of woman

... the Colonel's Lady an' Judy O'Grady
Are sisters under their skins "

This of the poet's art:

"There are nine and sixty ways of constructing tribal lays
And every single one of them is right "

Or he can sum up a character in a stanza, as when he wrote of Fuzzy-Wuzzy

" 'E rushes at the smoke when we let drive,
An' before we know 'e's ackin' at our 'ed.
'E's all 'ot sand and ginger when alive
And 'e's generally shamming when 'e's dead "

One of the most interesting qualities in Kipling's vision is his faculty of seeing the romance of modern life, scorning the idea that we have to fly back to a bygone age in order to catch the 'light that never was on sea or land.' Nor can we dispute him.

Romance, like humour, is merely a point of view. One man listens to a bird and thinks of lark pie, another it inspires with an immortal lyric. Nor are poets even agreed in the matter. The sound of the waterfall is more to Wordsworth than the voice of the nightingale; and both Wordsworth and Keats would have turned away scornfully from the steam engine.

"... while all unseen
Romance brought up the nine fifteen "

Romance for Kipling is no sequestered land of beauty: he finds it in the everyday life of the men about him, while no poet has got more poetry out of machinery than he. And he has stated it with characteristic vigour through the mouth of his engineer:

Romance: those first-class passengers they like it very well
Printed an' bound in little books, but why don't poets tell?
I'm sick of all their quirks an' turns—the loves an'
doves they dream,
Lord send a man like Robbie Burns to sing the song
o' Steam "

Mr Kipling has lived in the East, and has felt the conflict between Oriental fatalism and Western activity: between the primal man and the civilised man: he has felt as the home-staying Englishman cannot feel, the call of the Wild, and knows what it is to be caught up bewildered, and transfigured by the magic of the great open spaces of the earth. But being in many ways a typical Saxon himself

Mr Kipling seeks to keep his mental balance by an assumed indifference, and to distract attention from his excited imagination in irrelevant slang. It is this abrupt reserve, this persistent matter-of-factness, this dislike of expressing his inward feelings that has gained for the Englishman those John Bull qualities that offended sensitive men like Hawthorne. They did not see that much of it was partly a deliberate policy of self-repression. Kipling saw it, because he was built that way himself, but unlike the typical Saxon he had the gift of self-expression and it is the conflict between this power of self-expression and the instinct for self-repression that gives his work its peculiar quality.

Mr Kipling has been called the 'Laureate of the Music Hall.' If by that phrase it is meant that he is merely a clever, slangy, and superficial expositor of the inherent qualities of human nature, then the phrase is unjust. He is very much more than a maker of catch penny jingles, though he is not above banjo strains. Some of his admirers would indignantly reject such a suggestion by recalling poems like the Recessional. I would rather rely entirely on his colloquial "dialect" verse, and, in place of disclaiming for him this epithet, seek to show how admirable a thing it is when rightly understood. For there is a genuine art of the music hall, as well as an art of the concert room.

Mr Kipling is a genuine artist, but the genius of his art lies in his power to express the sentiments and primal passions of men in the rough and ready way of the music hall, not by eliminating its grotesque vulgarity, but by using it to express things that are neither grotesque nor vulgar, but vast and elemental. And when he does this he is at his best. When, on the other hand, he uses more conventional means and falls back upon the ordinary language of the poetic artist, as he does in the Recessional, when he wishes to be more dignified and weighty, then, curiously enough, he is really less effective and less weighty. He impresses as much as a splendid 'character' actor does when he essays what is theatrically known as a 'straight part.' The Recessional is good verse, but Mandalay is inspired verse.

HIS PROSE

Mr Kipling's romantic imagination as a verse-writer is more at home, and consequently more powerful when it seeks to transfigure, not to avoid, colloquial speech. As a prose-writer he stands on somewhat different footing. There are some writers, Charlotte Brontë and John Ruskin for instance, who are far better poets in prose than in verse. The technique of poetry shackles the imagination of such writers in place of liberating it. The same with a qualification, applies to Kipling. The qualification is that, as an artist speaking in terms of the music hall, Kipling is admirable. Otherwise he is inclined to be stiff and self-conscious. But in prose he can dispense with his music hall manner and yet can be quite as effective. But even here he is ineffective sometimes, though in another way. Why is this?

The strength and weakness of Mr Kipling lie in his journalistic faculty. He is a born journalist, and he is a great journalist. It is the journalistic flair that enables him to be Laureate of the music hall, that gives him actuality, clarity and conciseness as a writer whether in prose or verse; but it is the journalistic flair that leads him to be over-generous with banjo strains, and to overburden some of his prose with irrelevances.

It is one of the paradoxes of literature, that the more realistic you are, the less real you are. This applies to Kipling. The impression he gives us sometimes is not that he is describing a thing out of the fulness of his knowledge with an easy mastery of his material, but that he is describing a thing that he has "worked up," and is more anxious to show us how much he knows, than the artistic use he is making of his knowledge.

Mr Kipling has wandered in his writings all over the world, and has dealt with phases of life on sea as well as on land, but often, whether dealing with life at sea, or with countries other than India, the keen journalist's notebook is too much in evidence. To read Bread upon the Waters, 007, The Ship that Found Herself, is like looking at a series of educational films on the cinematograph. Their scientific interest may be considerable, their artistic interest is a trifling matter.

No one is more alive to the romantic possibilities of machinery than he, but in The Day's Work, he revels in technicalities that have no kind of imaginative interest. The Devil and the Deep Sea is sheer engineering pedantry—no layman could possibly take pleasure in it. Thus is realism without reality. And the same criticism applies to his dull Captains Courageous. Here his knowledge possesses him in place of him possessing his knowledge.

But give Mr Kipling India—the India of magic and superstition, the India of famine and pestilence, the India of the Civil Service—and the result is a series of unforgettable snapshots, clear-cut and vivid, tensely dramatic, everywhere suggestive of the clash of civilisation and barbarism, and the yawning gulf between the psychic temperaments of East and West. The story-teller tears aside the veil that hides Anglo-Indian life from the average Englishman, and makes him realise its struggles, its failures, its glories and its shame. We may read about famine in the English papers, but the words did not become alive and significant to the home-staying reader till he had followed the vicissitudes of William the Conqueror. No man has made more terribly significant the agonies of the cruel heat of India than the author of The City of Dreadful Night, or the horrors of war than he who wrote The Man Who Was. No one has brought home the banalities of short-sighted administration better than he who drew for us the unmitable picture of Grist Chunder Dé, M.A., in The Head of the District.

This brings us to the most significant thing in Kipling's work—the Imperialistic note. Imperialism was in the air before Mr Kipling took it as his inspiration. But Kipling seized on it as did no other contemporary man of letters; using it it may be added, on the whole with a sense of responsibility and with a breadth of imagination that lifts his patriotic verse far above the level of the average patriotic writer. There is no poet, from Campbell to Macaulay, who can treat the many romantic possibilities of his subject so happily, and sound the human depths so poignantly as he. Facile rhetoric has proved the artistic downfall of many a patriotic singer. There is little of this in Kipling. Neither Tennyson nor Swinburne, in their national poems, ever grasped so completely the idea of the solidarity of our Empire as Kipling has done. And he has achieved this even better in his prose than in his verse.

But there is one danger into which the Imperialistic gospeller too often falls, and Mr Kipling has not escaped it. There are times in history (as we have good reason to know) when war is inevitable, when to save your life you must lose it. But, however necessary war may be it is a stern, grim, and terrible necessity not to be approached in a mood of swagger and bluster and the too familiar "Give 'em Hell" spirit. War may be inseparable from Imperialism. "Give 'em Hell" certainly is not an essential concomitant. Unhappily it is often associated with it. Mr Kipling has shown us in fantasies like The Jungle Book, in dreams such as The Brushwood Boy, in imaginings like Mandalay, that he is alive to the pitiful tragedies of life, and to the beauty and mystery that lie outside material things. Yet a "Jingo" spirit tends at times to dull his finer sensibilities, and he drops his loftier vision for "Chops bloody once with gristle."

Yet despite the brutal strain that has fitfully shown itself in his work, Mr Kipling has proved a strong, invigorating, and on the whole salutary influence in English life and letters.

Lowell once said that the intellectual staple of the best English poetry was "understanding aerated by imagination." As a pithy expression of the essential harmony of sense and sensibility that must exist in all poetry of a high order the dictum is excellent. All great poetry is logic on fire. The mere playing with words, however beautifully done, may give us graceful and molodious verse, verse of fine artistic quality, but the epithet of greatness must be denied it, supreme poets (to illustrate only from modern times) like Coleridge, Shelley, Wordsworth, or Keats, are in their moments of inspiration as satisfying to the intellect as to the emotions. The beauty of the Ode to the West Wind is universally recognised, what is less readily perceived is the perfection of its logical presentment. Some of Swinburne's exquisite songs fail, on the other hand, to satisfy the supreme requirement, because we instinctively feel that the inner meaning has been sacrificed to the glory of tumultuous words. I do not say that every thing Shelley wrote would satisfy Lowell's definition, while some of Swinburne's work undoubtedly does. But the main difference between Shelley and Swinburne as poets is, that on the whole Shelley more often satisfies this requirement than Swinburne. On the other hand, the brainwork may be unexceptionable and the imaginative beauty of the setting faulty, or, as Lowell might have said, the aëration is incomplete. Here we could illustrate from a good deal of the intellectual verse of Browning and of Meredith. The logic is there, but it has not caught fire; it only sputters with flame.

Now while our greater poets serve as illustrations of the truth of this dictum, our lesser poets do so necessarily with greater readiness. The realistic reaction in latter-day verse has necessarily emphasized the "understanding" at expense of the "imagination." With the Pre-Raphaelites, more especially their followers and imitators, the tendency was in the opposite direction. But in spite of the "Art for Art's sake" movement that played some part in the literary life of the 'nineties, the realists were to the fore.

MR WILLIAM WATSON

MR WILLIAM WATSON (1858) is an excellent illustration of a writer plentifully endowed with the Romantic temper—one, indeed, who in his first volume, The Prince's Quest (1880), showed very considerable affinities with such Pre-Raphaelites as Rossetti and William Morris, yet whose work was gradually modified by the realistic spirit of the day. Some might contend, in view of the undoubted superiority of his later verse over his initial volume, that he was never a true Romantic, but found most congenial expression in work where the intellectual quality predominated. But on examination it will be found, I think, that Mr Watson's best work shows a true balance between "understanding" and "imagination," and that in his less satisfactory work he is affected by the two extremes, excessive romanticism on the one hand, as in The Prince's Quest, and excessive intellectualism on the other, as in some of his political and philosophical poems.

The wit and intellectual shrewdness that characterise his Epigrams (1884) is unquestionable, and the rhythmic felicities that star many of his odes and sonnets, remind us, with their deliberate, clear-visioned outlook, of such masters as Milton and Wordsworth. It reveals also the essential attitude of the man towards life. He has little really of the eager, adventurous spirit of the Romantic. That was a transient phase. He is at his best as a thinker in verso, his weakness as a poet to-day is the weakness—was it not illustrated in Meredith?—of overweighing his verse with thought. None the less in a transitional age, when extravagance of style and emotion mar so much earnest poetry, he has on the whole proved a wise and moderating force, for, while the imaginative beauty of his work has been thwarted at times by his keen intellect, he has never been betrayed into those realistic extravagances fully as mischievous as romantic extravagances. Dignity, strength, and lucidity are his, at his best—and for these things we may always be grateful.

AN UNKNOWN GOD

When, overarched by gorgeous night,
I wove my trivial self away,
When all I was to all men's sight
Shares the erasure of the day;
Then do I cast my cumbering load,
Then do I gain a sense of God.

Not him that with fantastic boasts
A sombre people dreamed they knew;
The mere barbaric God of Hosts
That edged their sword and braced their thigh
A God they pitted 'gainst a swarm
Of neighbour Gods less vast of arm;

A God like some imperious king,
Wroth, were his realm not duly awed;
A God for ever harkening
Unto his self-commanded laud;
A God for ever jealous grown
Of carven wood and graven stone;

A God whose ghost, in arch and aisle,
Yet haunts his temple—and his tomb;
But follows in a little while
Odin and Zeus to equal doom;
A God of kindred seed and line,
Man's giant shadow, hailed divine.

O streaming worlds, O crowded sky,
O life, and mine own soul's abyss,
Myself am scarce so small that I
Should bow to Deity like this!
This my Begetter? This was what Man in his violent youth begot

The God I know of, I shall ne'er
Know, though he dwells exceeding nigh.
Raise thou the stone and find me there,
Cleave thou the wood and there am I.
Yea, in my flesh his spirit doth flow,
Too near, too far, for me to know.

Whatsoever my deeds, I am not sure
That I can pleasure him or vex:
I that must use a speech so poor
It narrows the Supreme with Sex.
Notes he the good or ill in man?
To hope he cares is all I can.

I hope—with fear. For did I trust
This vision granted me at birth,
The sure of heaven would seem less just
Than many a faulty son of earth.
And so he seems indeed! But then,
I trust it not, thus bounded ken.

And dreaming much, I never dare
To dream that in my prisoned soul
The flutter of a trembling prayer
Can move the Mind that is the Whole
Though kneeling nations watch and yearn,
Does the primordial purpose turn?

Best by remembering God say some,
We keep our high imperial lot
Fortune, I fear, hath oftentimes come
When we forgot—when we forgot!
A lovelier faith their happier crown,
But history laughs and weeps it down!

Know they not well, how seven times seven,
Wringing our mighty arms with rust,
We dare not do the work of heaven
Lest heaven should hurl us in the dust?
The work of heaven! 'Tis waiting still
The sanction of the heavenly will.

Unmeet to be profaned by praise
Is he whose coils the world unfold;
The God on whom I ever gaze,
The God I never once behold—
Above the cloud, beneath the cloud,
The Unknown God, the Unknown God.

MR G. B. SHAW

MR GEORGE BERNARD SHAW was born on July 26, 1856. His father was a Civil servant who, on retirement, sold his pension to embark in a commercial undertaking that proved financially disastrous.

From his mother Mr. Shaw appears to have inherited his forceful purpose, his indifference to public opinion, and also his love of the Arts, especially music.

The responsibility of instructing his early years was undertaken by a clerical relative; later, he was sent to Wesley College, in Dublin, where he remained till he was fourteen; but was an incorrigibly lazy boy whose ignorance in ordinary scholastic attainments appalled his relatives. He then tells us that he "was experimented on desultorily in a few other schools, but the result was the same and the value received by my parents for their expenditure was simply the getting me out of the way for half a day." On leaving school he was placed in a land agent's office, but notwithstanding that at sixteen he was chosen to fill a responsible position which he held for four years, the life was distasteful. At twenty, this dissatisfied youth threw himself out of employment and journeyed to London.

Many efforts were made by his father to find him employment, but this square peg refused to be fitted into a round hole, and skilfully evaded such a course. His last attempt "to earn an honest living," to quote himself, was an endeavour in 1879 to assist in forming a company to exploit Edison's telephone. He then began to write novels.

By 1883 five volumes had been written for which no publisher could be found. His funds were at a very low ebb, his small daily wants being supplied from his ability as a musician. This, however, brought him into circles where he was to make many a life-long friend. Odd journalism had also brought him into notice, but the remuneration was poor. For an article in One and All, Mr. George R. Sims had paid him 15s; while as a poet his success was still more discouraging. For some burlesque verse he received five shillings, but his serious verse lost him his only patron.

In 1885 W. T. Stead offered him a post as reviewer on the staff of the Pall Mall Gazette; this was followed by the even more congenial appointment as art critic to the World under Edmund Yates. As "Cornetto di Bassotto" he was acting as musical critic to the Star in 1889-1890, and the play-writing period begins.

The first, Widowers' Houses, appeared in 1892, and Arms and the Man two years later. From 1895-1899 he was dramatic critic of the Saturday Review, collecting his criticisms and publishing them in two volumes of Dramatic Opinions (1906).

Eight months after the founding of the Fabian Society, Mr. Shaw joined its ranks on September 4, 1884, and immediately threw himself into the thickest of the work, whether organising, writing, or lecturing. One of his best known papers was that on Ibsen, read at St. James' Restaurant with Mrs. Besant in the chair, it was published later as The Quincentence of Ibsenism.

Dickens thought that the curse of English social life was hypocrisy. Thackeray considered the canker worm to be snobbery, Meredith, probing deeper, detected in its inveterate sentimentalism the source of our infirmities. Meredith practically restricted his attack against rose-pink sentimentalism, to the inter-relation of the sexes; other keen eyed contemporaries extended this crusade in other directions. Huxley tried to crush it in educational propaganda, the Pre-Raphaelites tilted against it in art but sentimentalism was too deep-rooted in the English character, and, we may add, too closely interwoven with its virtues as well as its failings to suffer much damage. Then came Mr. G. Bernard Shaw. Other social critics did differentiate between sentiment and sentimentality. Sentiment for them was the natural offspring of Romanticism, and Romanticism was worthy of all respect. But Mr. Shaw suspected even Romanticism. Romanticism, in his opinion, was responsible for sentimentality. Out it must all go, root and branch. The trouble was how to draw attention to a gospel so antipathetic to the Englishman's temperament. Being endowed with unlimited pertinacity, audacity and a pretty wit, he soon managed to attract attention.

Emerson advised—"Hitch your waggon to a star." Mr. Shaw felt that people might miss the stellar connection, unless he stood on his waggon and banged the drum. Having attracted attention, he could point out his astronomical steed.

Banging the drum is only a stage removed from playing the fool. That also is part of the showman's business. Mr. Shaw has admitted frankly that he was a "natural-born mountebank," and when it came to method P. T. Barnum appealed to him much more strongly than did Emerson.

The disadvantages attaching to this method are that many people will not take the clown seriously however fiercely sincere he may be at heart. But Mr. Shaw was not discouraged; he went on banging the drum and playing the fool; and although the crowd still preferred to regard his humbles in the light of an amusing jest, many of the shafts had struck home. He may not have converted his generation, but he has irritated and puzzled it. And that, as Mr. Shaw had shrewdly seen, is half the battle.

As a creative force Mr. Shaw has nothing like the originality and rich fertility of Mr. Wells and he is certainly not, as some of his disciples claim for him, a profound and original philosopher. But he has ever been a pungent and outspoken critic of his age. Nowhere is this clearer than in the following passage on Socialism.

"The Fabian declares quite simply that there is no revolution, that there exists no war of classes, that the salaried workers are far more imbued with conventions and prejudices and more bourgeois than the middle class itself, that there is not a single legal power democratically constituted, without excepting the House of Commons, which would not be much more progressive were it not restrained by the fear of the popular voice, that Karl Marx is no more infallible than Aristotle or Bacon, Ricardo or Buckle, and that, like them, he has committed errors now obvious to the casual student of economics, that a declared Socialist is, morally, neither better nor worse than a Liberal or a Conservative, not a workman than a capitalist, that the workman can change the actual governmental system if he so desires while the capitalist cannot do so, because the workman would not permit him, that it is an absurd contradiction in terms to declare that the working classes are starved, impoverished and kept in ignorance by a system which loads the capitalist with food, education, and refinement of all sorts, and at the same time to pretend that the capitalist is a scoundrel, harsh and sordid in spirit, while the workman is a high-minded, enlightened and magnanimous philanthropist, that Socialism will eventuate in the gradual establishment of public rule and a public administration set into effective action by parliaments, assemblies and common councils, and that none of these rules will lead to revolution nor occupy more place in the political programme of the time than a law for the regulation of manufactures or the ballot would do now, in a word, that the part of the Socialist will be a definitely fixed political labour, to struggle not against the malevolent machinations of the capitalist, but against the stupidity, narrowness, in a word, the idiocy (in giving to the word its precise and original sense) of the class which actually suffers most from the existing system."

While he so pitilessly exposes the Romantic illusions of his own school of thought, he is not likely to be less lenient towards the multitude of illusions that rule the average unthinking man and woman.

In Arms and the Man Mr Shaw does not, as some imagine, attack war (he is not Tolstoyan in the least). What he does is to denounce the sentimental illusion that gathers round war. "Fight if you will," says he, "but for goodness' sake don't strike picturesque attitudes in the limelight about it. View it as one of the desperately irrational things of life that may, however, in certain circumstances be a brutal necessity." In Candida he does not attack love. Here is another irrational thing, he says—well, it can't be evaded, so let us make it as matter of fact, as rational, in short, as possible.

Candida, in deliberately electing to remain with her self-confident husband because "he is the weaker of the two" and needs her the more, grounds her "duty" as a wife on no conventional code of morals, but on instinct. The doctrinaire views of Gloria on love in You Never Can Tell crumble away at the first stirring of impulsive passion, and in a flash the romance of love shines through.

It looks as if Mr Shaw, with his ascetic instincts, had started his crusade in life by attempting to rationalise existence, but, as Life is in no wise guided by logic, he had concluded perhaps that task to be an impossible one. Whatever the reason, he is only a half-hearted rationalist.

Indeed, as we read through Mr Shaw's plays, from Arms and the Man to Pygmalion, one thing is brought home very clearly to the reader. Here is a man with a keen, cold, intellectual wit combating all the illusions that spring from the irrationality of life, yet gradually coming more and more to feel that there is not so much in rationality as, apparently, he had imagined. In fact he has found, or is at anyrate finding, that even illusions, foolish as they often are, mischievous as they sometimes are, are but bungling efforts on man's part to explain mystical realities. And by mystical realities I mean all great primal qualities: love, courage, endurance, faith, hope. Anne's pursuit of Tanner is treated with irony and cynical levity throughout the play until we come to the final scene, and then her creator practically gives her case away. "It will not be all happiness for me," says Anne, "perhaps Death." Before, we had seen only the comedy of the Life Force, here is the tragedy.

It would seem, then, that Mr Shaw, like Balaam, had come out to curse and remained to bless. He starts by glorifying intellectuality and deriding sentiment, then finding that sentiment is rooted in instinct and that instinct rules life, he ends by glorifying instinct. How does he square this with his ascetic leanings?

To understand Mr Shaw's ultimate position we must examine the doctrine of the Life Force which from Man and Superman onward plays so important a part in his writings.

Two important formative influences in his outlook on life have been Samuel Butler and Schopenhauer. To Butler there was an unconscious mind in nature, while to Schopenhauer this unconscious mind, a blind dynamic force, is elaborated into an important philosophy. With many of the philosophic implications Mr Shaw did not concern himself. He was uninterested both in metaphysics and in science, but being deeply interested in man's social welfare he saw in this Life Force a solution to his perplexities. Despite his strong rationalistic tendencies, Shaw's curious dislike of and contempt for science put definite limits on his rationalism. He was rationalistic in his hatred of sentimentality and of all the pretty uncertainties that obscured men's vision of the realities of life. Romanticism bred illusions—that must go. Popular Christianity also bred illusions—that must go. Here, however, he surprises us by his hostility to Darwin and the theory of natural selection, he declares himself as "implacably anti-mysticalistic and anti-materialist."

The fact is, there are two contradictory strains in Mr Shaw's temperament—an intensely practical and utilitarian strain, and a fantastic, imaginative, and semi-mystical strain.

In his Socialistic views and in his views on Art the practical strain is to the fore. As regards the former, Commonsense of Municipal Training (1904) exhibits him in his most clear, cogent, and sober-headed mood, while his dramatic and musical criticisms illustrate happily his insistence on the artist philosopher (philosopher and moralist being synonymous for Shaw), as the only kind of artist worth consideration. The social utility of Art underlies the whole of his vigour and eulogy of Wagner and Ibsen. Of course, even when dealing with Socialism and Art, there are touches here and there of the fantastic and idiosyncratic Shaw that do not fit into the general scheme. Yet, on the whole, his Art and Economic criticisms are clear and homogeneous. But the other strain in Shaw's temperament has also to be reckoned with, and this it is that inspires his anti-rationalistic views and his insistence on the "Life-Force"; and his habit, especially in his plays, of opposing Instinct to Reason. Thus Shaw is rationalistic without being a rationalist, mystical without being a mystic. He finds his mode of reconciliation in the Life Force. It satisfies his mysticism, for it is a spiritual reality pervading matter, reaching consciousness in man, and pushing continually upwards. In short, it provides Mr Shaw with a religion and an ethic, for the Life Force is the God in Man and the dynamic impulse the Will of God. Thus we can see here his objection to Rationalism, for the Life Force justifies impulse and discards reason. On the other hand, the doctrine satisfies his practical and utilitarian side

The Life Force expresses itself in woman through her fertility; thus instinct for fertility is no "mere itching for pleasure." Sexual attraction is for Shaw only an idle appetite unless it be linked with an impulse for the betterment of the race. In short, the Life-Force in woman is a matter of eugenics, which she disregards at her peril.

Both here and elsewhere it will be noticed by students of his writings, that Shaw, while deriding moral codes and preaching the assertion of the individual will, which logically tends to anarchy, and is compatible with the grossest licence—invariably reads into the Life Force his own ascetic and virtuous loving nature. This frank immoralism, and Nietzschean gospel, in Shaw's hands is saturated with the strictest morality. If your own nature constrains you to live a sober, clear-minded, and unselfish life, you can afford to dispense with the constraints imposed from without by society. But what if you are naturally vicious, 'foul minded, and brutal'? Can you dispense then with moral codes, can you, without harming others, assert your individual will? For how does he meet the objection that the Life-Force tells one man to be kind, another to be brutal, one to be truthful, another a liar, one man to be temperate, another a sensualist? He meets it by bringing forward the very rationalism he is at other times content to spurn and deride. He says, if you choose licence and sensuality, you will have such a miserable time of it, that you will only be too glad to return to the path of rectitude. By all means, he seems to say, plunge your hands into boiling water if you wish; only you will be so uncomfortable, that you will prefer water of a normal temperature afterwards. You wish to lie? Very well, lie—but, says Shaw, "the liar's punishment is that he cannot believe anyone else." Now what is this but a defence of morality on rational grounds?

In fact, Mr Shaw's doctrine of the Life Force, suggestive as it is in many ways, especially in its insistence on certain undervalued psychological truths, and ingeniously as it meets the diverse strain in his temperament, at bottom affords no reconciliation. Whatever merits the theory of the Life Force may have as a metaphysic in the hands of philosophers like M. Bergson or scientists like Sir Oliver Lodge, Mr Shaw's more nobulous and fanciful exposition of its signification loads him into serious practical difficulties, from which he only saves himself by calling in the principle of reason which he had flouted; and he cannot have it both ways.

For this reason, Mr. Shaw's philosophy does not seem deeply illuminating. But if as a constructive thinker he may not appeal, it would be hard to exaggerate his value as a destructive force to-day. By his brilliant criticism of contemporary art and drama, he helped to raise the intellectual and moral quality of the artistic output. Ruskin and Morris had preached eloquently and earnestly Art for life's sake. Shaw took up the burden of their preaching, engineering it with all the resources of wit and dialectic cunning at his command. He helped to break down the parochial limits of the middle class; forced us to see the power and beauty of artists like Wagner, Ibsen, and Rodin, and best of all, in his splendid brochure, The Sanity of Art, gave the lie to Nordau's theory that genius is essentially morbid, vindicating the vitality and strength of all great art.

In his plays, by far the most valuable parts are those where he challenges the current moral and social values of the time, because his extravagant wit and keen observation so agreeably sugar the critical pill. Directly, however, we attempt to construct from them a new social order or a new morality, we find vague and contradictory elements that it is impossible to clarify and resolve. What does Man and Superman amount to but the will to mate treated from the eugenics standpoint, by an ascetic temperament?

The Life Force incarnate in the sensuous female makes her seek out the intellectual male (who despises her) and lay siege to him until with desperate unwillingness he succumbs. It is for the good of the race. As a contribution to the philosophy of love, this is decidedly unconvincing; but if we view the play as an agreeable entertainment (as indeed most theatrical audiences view it), showing much witty observation of contemporary life, and suggesting (as in the brilliant interlude) some capital debating points, then there is good reason to be grateful to the playwright. An intensely interesting problem is raised in The Doctor's Dilemma. A specialist, Sir Colenso Ridgeon, has discovered a wonderful vaccine treatment for tuberculosis. Two cases claim his urgent attention; one that of a fine-natured "sixpenny" doctor, the other that of a blackguard who happens to be a brilliant artist. He has only room for one more patient—which shall he take? Is it to be good morals or good art? Shaw discounts the crux of the problem by complicating his story with Ridgeon's infatuation for the artist's wife. He lets the husband die in order to marry his widow. The complication adds to the play as drama—but as a medium for ideas it suffers. Unhappily, he kills even its dramatic value by the absurd epilogue. The wife, up to this point a clever study in feminine psychology, becomes a Shaw puppet. Yet, here again (barring the last scene), the play abounds in admirable matter, and the satire on the medical profession, if a shade savage at times is on the whole excellent wise fooling. Indeed, the best way to enjoy Shaw's plays is to cheerfully ignore any attempt to construe them in terms of his philosophy, and regard them simply as wise fooling.

As a destructive force, as an intellectual irritant, Mr Shaw is a very appreciable force in modern letters, and his ultimate aim and purpose admirably summed up in his own significant apology—

'I am of opinion that my life belongs to the whole community, and as long as I live it is my privilege to do for it whatever I can.

"I want to be thoroughly used up when I die, for the harder I work, the more I live. I rejoice in life for its own sake. Life is no 'brief candle' for me. It is a sort of splendid torch, which I have got hold of for the moment; and I want to make it burn as brightly as possible before handing it on to future generations."

MR. H. G. WELLS

MR. HERBERT GEORGE WELLS was born on September 21, 1866, at Bromley in Kent. His parents were hard-working people who had embarked unsuccessfully in a small business. At thirteen he left school with little else but a well-filled storehouse of mathematics and the credit of being an extensive reader. Circumstances then forced him out to work, and he left Bromley for Windsor to learn the drapery trade. A year later we find him in a chemist's shop at Midhurst. While here he managed to attend some classes, and with a few certificates started for Wokey Hole, in Somerset, to act as a pupil-teacher, but this venture proved an absolute failure. After another short spell of the drapery trade he found a post at Midhurst Grammar School. Here he worked hard and with a scholarship entered the College of Science at South Kensington, where he worked under Professor Huxley. In due course he passed his B.Sc. with first-class honours. This success paved the way to a mastership at Henley House School, St. John's Wood.

Little money and hard work was his lot for the next few years. He became a coach for the old University Correspondence College, and employed his scanty leisure on a Manual of Biology, and some odd journalism. He was working too hard and the result was a serious breakdown. Complete rest was now his only chance of recovery, so he left London for Eastbourne.

Ill as he was, he now began to write humorous articles for the press. Several of these—Freedom in Spelling, Cheapness and my Aunt Charlotte, Chess Games—were published anonymously in the Pall Mall Gazette, and brought him the friendship of many well-known literary men.

Mr. Wells' first novel, The Time Machine, had made its first appearance in the Phoenix, still the successful College of Science magazine that he started while a student there; parts had also appeared in the National Observer and the New Review (one hundred pounds having been paid for the serial rights); yet in 1895, when issued in book form, it was absolutely ignored by the critics. His next attempt fared little better. Having collected the humorous papers that had been published earlier in the Pall Mall, they were criticised as "portentously foolish," and, to add insult to injury, the reviewer remarked "the book has a very nice cover." The Invisible Man (1897) and The War of the Worlds (1898) followed; since which time Mr. Wells has written nearly thirty novels and stories, and with each succeeding volume has gained a wider circle of thoughtful and interested readers.

Mr. H. G. Wells is known to the modern reader as a writer of scientific romances, as a social reformer, and as a sociological novelist, but he is at bottom essentially an ideologist who uses the various forms of letters, fiction or the essay as means of airing his ideas. At first sight we might be inclined to place him in the same category as Mr. Bernard Shaw, who is also, strictly speaking, an ideologist. And certainly they have this in common,—to each the literary form of their work is a secondary matter; they are primarily concerned to promulgate certain ideas and theories, and they use the form which seems to them the most convenient or suitable for the moment to effectuate their aim. Here, however, the similarity ends. Mr. Bernard Shaw has a theory of life, which, whatever be its merits or demerits, gives a homogeneity to his work—dramatic, fictional, or purely argumentative. Mr. H. G. Wells has no definite theory of life. His writings are not the varied and continuous expression of any distinctive systematised outlook. This may seem something like heresy to those who look upon Wells as a brilliant social prophet; but if they will carefully examine the thought underlying—say, his scientific fantasies, his novels of middle-class life from Love and Mr. Lewisham (1900) to The Passionate Friends (1913); his social discussions from Anticipations (1901) to The Future in America (1906)—they will find assuredly a highly stimulating mélange of ideas dealing with the conduct of life, but little organic connection between any of these ideas, and frequently a good deal of contradiction as to the relative importance of various ideas. For instance, in two of his most important social speculations, New Worlds for Old (1908) and A Modern Utopia (1905), he vacillates between emphasizing logic and will as the mainspring of an ideal society, or emotional force. Sometimes he seems to favour a rigid collectivism, at other times he leans towards unlimited individual freedom.

I do not urge this as a reproach to Mr. Wells, I mention it to show that the way to assess his value as an intellectual force, is not to regard him as the exponent of a new social philosophy, but as a brilliant free-lance skirmisher.

As a matter of fact, Mr. Wells as a writer has become progressively more and more perplexed by the complex tangle of social conditions, and the enormous difficulties attaching to any particular nostrum for the sickness of the body politic. As a keen observer he could not fail to see the intellectual poverty of modern life, the clinging by the masses to mouldering traditions, the alternate yielding to a policy of inertia and to blind instinctive passions. When he says, "Let's plan our future and at all costs get our best men on the upper dock. We must get rid of the dead weight of the middle," all thoughtful men of every shade of opinion will agree with him. But when it comes to the kind of plan, and how to get "the best men on the upper dock," then he halts perplexed, feeling acutely the enormous difficulties of the problem.

Shaw's emotional life is strictly subordinate to his intellectual; Wells' emotional life is at war with his intellectual life. The difference is well exemplified in their respective attitudes towards social problems. Both Mr. Shaw and Mr. Wells are agreed that the sex impulse is a tyrant, but Wells cannot make up his mind whether to hate or love the tyrant. So we may judge from his Ann Veronica, New Machiavelli, Marriage, and The Passionate Friends.

Yet this very uncertainty, this frank hesitancy of attitude, gives a peculiar interest to Wells' writings—and his imaginative work has a far greater objective human value than Mr. Shaw's.

For Wells has a subtler insight into character, and the tangled inconsistencies that baulk him as a theorist help him as a literary artist. Mr Shaw's dramatic faculty saves him from merely creating talking-machines (as is sometimes averred of him), but the majority of his characters are little more than view-points wittily presented; he can paint them green, blue, red, yellow, as occasion demands. Wells does more than this; he knows that the same human being, if predominantly of one colour, may greatly vary in tint—that the red may be scarlet, purple, heliotrope, or pink at various times. Subtleties do not trouble Mr Shaw. Wells' characters therefore—Kipps, Lewisham, Remington, Isabel, Margaret, to mention only a few—live as Mr Shaw's do not.

But in order to fairly appraise Mr Wells' work as a writer, we must take two elements into consideration. In the first place, his scientific bent of mind: in the second place, his power of concrete presentment.

In all of his work, whether fantasy or middle-class study, these two elements give form and value to the matter; the ideas necessarily vary, but there is far less difference of method than is sometimes imagined. It has been said that in his scientific tales, Mr Wells' characters are merely puppets, marionettes, introduced for the purpose of setting off a story about flying machines, escalators, or a peculiar form of food. This is unfair criticism. Obviously, the scientific speculations in these stories arrest the reader's imagination, more than do the characters. But these characters are anything but puppets. Jules Verne to whom Wells is often likened, took no trouble with his characterisation. But, if we examine the characters in such books as The Invisible Man (1897), The Food of the Gods (1904), The First Men in the Moon (1901), The Wonderful Visit (1895), and The Island of Dr Moreau (1896), we must realise that the dramatic persons are differentiated and drawn with delicate insight, and they are most admirably visualised. Even in The First Men in the Moon, where he troubles least of all with his personages, the two adventurers are individualised with a few clever touches. They are sufficiently vital for the purpose of the story. In the most painful of all of the fantasies, The Island of Dr Moreau, the characterisation of Dr Moreau and his assistant is remarkably well done, while in The Invisible Man, the psychology is admirable. In fact, the story owes quite as much to its excellent psychology as to its lively invention.

Mention has been made of Jules Verne, who threw so many imaginary scientific speculations into ingenious narrative form. There is a significant kinship between Verne and Wells; but it is only superficial. Jules Verne's ingenious mind never sought for any underlying human significance to his scientific speculations. Wells never, in his wildest fantasy, lost sight of the human factor and the cosmic note.

The rich satiro of Wells' sociological fictions is of course obvious, but he is as distinctly though less obviously a satirist even in his scientific fantasies. The Wonderful Visit is more than the "pleasant jeu d'esprit" that it was termed by a leading literary journal, it is a searching satirical picture of human imperfections. In The Food of the Gods, we are reminded of Gulliver: it is Swift without the bitterness. Even subtler in its satire is The Sea Lady, where Mr Wells reaches a level of high comedy writing which he rarely attains. There is a grimmer, cruder flavour about Dr Moreau—but the satirical note is unmistakable. The Day of the Comet centres round certain developments of modern journalism.

Throughout all these tales the immense possibilities of science, the power of alien outside forces, the pettiness and futility of human effort are constantly dwelt upon and emphasized.

Profoundly interesting and suggestive as his scientific "dreams" are, their appeal is necessarily less wide than that of the stories of ordinary middle-class life. Here, to the qualities we already know, though less technically displayed, he adds a peculiar retentive memory of the things he has himself seen and experienced, and a power of characterisation, that has been growing in clarity and subtlety during his earlier apprenticeship to letters. Such books as Love and Mr Lewisham, Kipps, Tono Bungay, Marriage, are fresh and valuable contributions to the fictions dealing with English middle-class life. But there is no radical change in the story-teller. The restless scientific imagination is still there, only in place of the physical sciences he gives us the science of sociology. He applies to social and political institutions what before he had applied to chemistry and biology. The matter is different, the method remains the same. He is still more of the scientist than the artist, more of the satirist than the dispassionate painter. He is still a writer with a purpose, and a dealer in problems.

From the standpoint of literary art, Mr Wells as a thinker overwhelms Mr Wells as an artist. In common with many influential writers of the day, his selective faculty is weak, and the ultimate reality of his stories suffers from his insistent realism. As a consequence, while the foreground of his picture is amazingly clear, the background is vague and shadowy. The perspective is at fault. His tenacious memory and his sharp perceptive powers prove a snare as well as a blessing. Consequently his parts are better than his whole, and the lack of perspective is further embarrassed by his fertility in ideas. They are interesting enough, but he is too prodigal with them. He inundates us with ideas and details, until we are wearied. For all his originality, his undoubted power both in narrative and in characterisation, these grave defects preclude our ranking him with the great masters of fiction. The same defect that spoils his larger canvases, despite their striking merits, is quite as noticeable in his less ambitious studies. They are rarely negligible; they have thought, humour, and imagination, but their method savours more of journalism than literature. Yet one or two—like The Country of the Blind, and The Door in the Wall—have a force and beauty about them that show what a fine literary artist the author could be, if only he took the trouble.

The majority of Wells' short stories are extraordinarily clever here there is a touch of greatness

To have written The Country of the Blind and Love and Mr Lewisham, is to rank among the writers who count, and when criticism has had its say with Mr Wells' work, he remains one of the most potent literary forces to-day, a most stimulating and original ideologist.

MR. ARNOLD BENNETT

Mr ARNOLD BENNETT (1867) has one thing in common with Mr Wells—he also has a touch of romanticism in his nature, though it is less pronounced and not mingled with the sentimentalism from which Wells is never wholly free. But unlike Mr Wells, Mr Bennett is half ashamed of his romanticism, and hurries its gay colouring into his lighter writings, in order that he may present the life he is more concerned to portray, in a stern grey light. Moreover, Mr Bennett, whatever revolutionary sentiment he may possess, allows none to colour his work as a story-teller. He is content to observe and record. Shaw's wit plays fiercely round the drab routine of middle-class life, hoping to galvanise it into activity. Wells' imagination, half fascinated half repelled by the reactionary forces that keep it drab and monotonous, is less concerned to abolish than to analyse and discuss them. Bennett neither attacks them nor dissects them. He simply notes them down—and to this extent he is a sounder literary artist than either of his contemporaries.

The Old Wives' Tale (1908) is a piece of remarkable literature in its detailed picture of domestic life in a small manufacturing town. You feel, as you follow step by step the fortunes of Constance, and Sophia Barnes, that here is that perfect illusion of reality that convinces you of its fidelity to life—not life in its finest manifestation nor in its basest, manifestation—but life as it happens to countless average men and women, with its mingling of joy, sorrow, tragedy and farce. It is an epic of lower middle-class provincial life, told plainly and soberly, without either bitterness or relish, but exhibiting clearly enough a vivid sense of the littleness of human existence and the mutability of things—

² All things have rest, and ripen towards the grave
In silence; ripen, fall and cease."

For all its multiplicity of detail the book has breadth and perspective, while its most salient quality is its consistent objectivity. The chronicler makes no attempt to satirise or to sentimentalise or to malign his subject matter—he strives his hardest to deal impartially and fairly with his various characters. No literary artist can keep his temperament out of his work, of course, however hard he tries—in his very choice of material and method of handling he displays it; and Mr Bennett's fascination, as a writer, for the ordinary routine of life with its limited perspective, is apparent enough. But nowhere does he better display his power of making the most trivial matters, the most niggling details, absorbing and arresting, than here. None of his other books are on this high level of accomplishment; although in all his serious studies, his method remains the same. In the trilogy—Clayhanger, Hilda Lessways, and We Two—there is the same easy mastery over his material, and clarity of presentment, but there are too many repetitions, and what is more serious, despite much admirable portraiture, a certain dullness and aridity at times. The creative imagination seems to have flagged—and the story is beaten too thin.

Mr Bennett's curious habit of reserving his romanticism and high spirits for what he calls his "fantasies" is partly due, as he has frankly admitted, to commercial exigencies. Humorous extravagance and ingenuous melodrama pay very much better than studies of life in homespun grey. Mr Bennett has written many extravagances because, as he has put it with cheerful directness, he wants to make money. But we suspect there is a subtler reason than this. Mr Bennett is afraid that his romanticism will play havoc with his methods as a realistic novelist. So he boxes up his romanticism in a water-tight compartment. Yet if he is to sustain his rôle as the faithful chronicler of "small beer," he feels he must give his imagination an occasional holiday or more exhilarating stimulant. And so as against Anna of the Five Towns (1902), The Old Wives' Tale, Clayhanger, we have Buried Alive, The Carol, and The Grand Babylon Hotel. "I cannot remain wise unless I play the fool at times," he says in effect. And it cannot be denied that he plays the fool with considerable resource and sprightliness. But this new version of Jekyll and Hyde, this chopping up of his literary personality, is not really a good thing for his art. What the gods have joined let no man put asunder. I venture to say that if Mr Bennett had not played tricks with his personality, he would be, not merely what he is, a distinguished novelist, but a great novelist to-day. Ordinary life is dull, uneventful, grey, it is also melodramatic, extravagant, full of colour, and it is thus just because it is so complex. Mr Bennett would not have proved less actual but more actual if he had blended his realism with his romanticism.

Putting aside his Man from the North, as a promising but immature expression in fiction, let us consider more carefully his serious pictures of life.

We have in Anna of the Five Towns, Leonora, Whom God hath Joined—, The Old Wives' Tale, Clayhanger, and its two sequels, his most characteristic work in connection with the pottery district of Staffordshire, which he has made as much his own, as has Mr Hardy the region of Wessex. The workmanship is not all on the same level, the last three being greatly superior to the first three. But one and all are distinguished by a power for vitalising the trivial minutiae of everyday life, and by a plain, straightforward, pedestrian style which is wonderfully adapted for building up the effects he wishes to create.

Mr Bennett's claim to distinction does not lie, of course, in showing that life—to use one of Holmes' phrases—is a "great bundle of little things." Many of our novelists have done that. But they have done so either as Dickens did, by investing the little things with a fantastic humour, or as Charlotte Brontë did, by freighting them with big emotional issues. Mr Bennett's treatment is otherwise. He records the little things in a detached, objective way leaving the reader to trace their relationship to the larger matters—if he will. Charlotte Brontë will expatiate on the tragedy that hinges round an irritable remark—Bennett merely mentions the irritable remark as one of the details by which he builds up the life likeness of his picture. Whether it be due to suppressed gout or active malevolence, whether it signifies little or much, he leaves you to find out. He deals with it as a chronicler, not as an oracle. Consequently his scenes have all the actuality of a series of snapshots. But while they have the merits of good snapshots, they have the corresponding disadvantages. Bennett is both too shrewd and too sincere a writer not to link them together with some unity of design; but the novelist's interest in the component parts of his scheme and his predilection for shifting the point of view, often weakens the general effect. He tries to do too much; he is over anxious to make his scenic background clear and convincing, the pall of smoke hanging over his grimy little town is so realistic that we cannot properly see the characters through it. In The Old Wives' Tale and its successors, we are long enough in the atmosphere to accustom our eyesight to its twilight greys. But few of the other novels are long enough to sink the author's meticulous method. Mr Bennett makes us realise clearly enough the narrowness and dinginess of Anna's life, but she herself as a spiritual entity who takes the first short cut out of it that she can, and marries the wrong man, is nothing like so real as, for instance, the kitchen where we often find her. Leonora is better done, but again the perspective is at fault, and we have a much clearer notion of the fussiness of amateur theatricals during the rehearsals of Patience, than of the spiritual turmoil in Leonora's soul.

This is not due to any lack of sensibility on Mr Bennett's part in big matters, it is not as if, with Jane Austen, he is peculiarly concerned quâ artist with the infinite number of trivialities that go to make up the life of so many, it is because he feels the compelling interest of so many points of view. He is for ever taking his camera to some other part of the scene.

This is where writers like Thomas Hardy impress us with a much deeper sense of reality. Had Mr Bennett written Tess, we should have heard probably quite as much of the dairymaids and other members of Tess's family as of Tess herself. In fact, Mr Bennett hurries us so resolutely from one point to another in order to give us a comprehensive picture, that in his briefer novels we get to know no one point sufficiently well. It is quite clear as we read the succession of his novels that his strength lies in showing a diversity of new points—if he can only moderate his curiosity, and deal at such length as may enable him to give perspective to his scheme. Now, he would be immensely strong here if he had not cut adrift from his romanticism and relegated that entirely to his "bread and butter" stories. Every great novelist, when properly considered, is neither an absolute realist nor an absolute idealist, but a blend. Even the Russian writers whom Mr Bennett admires and takes to some extent as a model, are half-romantic, half-realistic. The great eighteenth century novelists succeeded because of this. Scott was quite as much a realist as an idealist, Dickens as much an idealist as a realist. The perfect illusion of reality, that the great novel demands, connotes depth as well as breadth. There is more of the romantic element in The Old Wives' Tale, than Mr Bennett would admit to, and that is why it is the greatest of his books.

Save in lighter moods, Mr Bennett is too afraid of the primary colours, yet life is full of the things, and in eliminating such from his most ambitious work, he eliminates also much of the poetry in life, which is fully as insistent as its prose.

MR GILBERT KEITH CHESTERTON

The extravagances which Mr Bennett's soul revels in though his critical faculty condemns them, are boldly exalted to the skies as the one thing worth having by Mr G. K. CHESTERTON (1873). He is the most thorough-going vindicator of the romantic imagination that we have to-day, and as such he proves an excellent foil to the majority of our ablest writers, who either distrust romanticism, like Mr Shaw and Mr Galsworthy, who yield unwilling homage, like Mr Wells: or half-hearted admiration, like Mr Bennett.

There is nothing equivocal in Mr Chesterton's attitude. He is, with Mark Tapley determined to be jolly in all possible circumstances, and like that somewhat irritating optimist, Mr Chesterton's jolliness is almost more oppressive at times than the melancholy of some of his contemporaries. If Mr Chesterton were more sparing of gramophone effects in his writings on literature and life, and refrained more often from slapping us on the back and bidding us keep our pecker up, we should like him better, for his exuberant mannerisms make us do less than justice often to his fundamentally sane, thoughtful, and invigorating attitude towards life. His love of paradox, and his insistence on the paradox in promulgating his views, has made some people link his name with that of Bernard Shaw. But despite some affinity in methods, these two brilliant prose-men have little in common, beyond a fundamental sincerity as critics of life.

Both men use paradox as a means of promulgating their point of view, to each man paradox is merely truth standing on its head to attract attention, yet the truths they draw attention to are widely different. Mr Shaw throws morality overboard, frankly proclaims himself an anarchist, and bids us give free expression to the instinctive life-force within us; while all the time his ascetic temperament and intellectual tastes show very clearly that he is an immoralist and an anarchist simply because he happens to be the most moral of men, and the most orderly, and has no personal need of rules and conventions to make him a highly useful member of society Mr Shaw's life-force is not tempestuous, elemental, but a finely austere "tendency that makes for righteousness"

Mr Chesterton's temperament is not ascetic. It is no more ascetic than was Dr Johnson's—indeed the likeness between these two burly figures is remarkable in certain ways. Mr Chesterton would never have said with Sir Toby Belch, "Dost think because thou art virtuous there shall be no more oakes and ale"? for to him oakes and ale are positive symbols of virtue. In fact, they typify the pleasure-loving, full-blooded Englishman, and he is proud of the fact. Greatly as he admires Mr Shaw, he is distressed and irritated by his asceticism, which he calls Puritanism. We have only to read Mr Chesterton on Tolstoy and the Cult of Simplicity, to realise how incensed he becomes at any gospel that threatens the jollity of life. Anæmia to him is a form of ungodliness, he hates the faddist more than he does the criminal. Nothing was more characteristic of him than his objection to Swinburne's lines about the "lilies and languors of virtue" and the "roses and raptures of vice," on the score that it were truer to ascribe viciousness to lilies and virtue to roses. The colour and opulence of life to him are good and splendid things. Here then, we have a temperament at opposite poles from that of Mr Shaw. Chesterton is the true immoralist by nature. Yet, just as Shaw nullifies his intellectual immoralism by his temperamental expression, so does Chesterton nullify his temperamental immoralism by his intellectual conventionality. He approves loudly of the very conventions that Mr Shaw derides. He believes stoutly in tradition. And so, when it comes to the actual conduct of life, each is quite a decorous and respectable member of society.

The affinity is one of purpose; the difference is a question of method—not of literary method, but of spiritual tactics.

Mr Chesterton's love of extravagant statement, his partiality for paradox, his reliance on a forcible expression of his views, leaves the impression on many people that though he may disagree with Shaw and other moral revolutionaries, he is himself none the less a revolutionary, and a more or less explosive force in modern life and letters.

But this really, as Lamb said of Coleridge's metaphysics is "only his fun." Mr Chesterton typifies the average, healthy Englishman, and if he assumes a revolutionary swagger it is merely to call better attention to his message of boisterous common-sense. The difference between Chesterton and the average Englishman is that Chesterton can express himself and the average Englishman cannot. But that is a question of literary power. Chesterton, like the average Englishman, is tremendously sentimental, tremendously cheerful, tremendously straightforward. Nowhere is this better seen than in his study of Dickens who is, with all his faults and merits, one of the most English of our novelists. Much has been written about the Christmas Carol, and as a rule the literary critic either dwells so long on its crudities that the reader feels as if the tale were a kind of catch-penny affair that has somehow hypnotised the popular imagination or else, the critic drops his critical apparatus altogether and rhapsodises about it in a vague way with the same furtive haste as one rhapsodises about some estimable man who is at bottom a dull dog. Mr Chesterton divines excellently the real merits of the tale, and in a line or so satisfies both our imagination that loves Dickens and our critical faculty that boggles over him.

'The beauty and the real blessing of the story do not lie in the mechanical plot of it, the repentance of Scrooge, probable or improbable, they lie in the great furnace of real happiness that glows through Scrooge and everything round him, that great furnace, the heart of Dickens. Whether the Christmas visions would or would not convert Scrooge, they convert us. Whether or no the visions were evoked by real Spirits of the Past, Present, and Future, they were evoked by that truly exalted order of angels who are correctly called High Spirits. They are impelled and sustained by a quality which our contemporary artists ignore or almost deny, but which in a life decently lived is as normal and attainable as sleep—positive, passionate, conscious joy. The story sings from end to end like a happy man going home, and, like a happy and good man, when it cannot sing it yells. It is lyric and exclamatory, from the first exclamatory words of it. It is strictly a Christmas Carol.'

The average Englishman prefers Rudyard Kipling to William Watson, just as he prefers Dickens to Meredith. The literary critic shrugs his shoulders, "No sense of art," he murmurs. The advanced social thinker groans, "The Philistine lack of culture." I do not know what Mr Chesterton has said, if he has said anything on the point. But I can infer pretty definitely, from what he does say in his treatment of Browning, how he would regard this attitude.

It is coming to be recognised to-day that while a good deal of Browning—chiefly the later Browning—is anathema to the general reader, there is a good deal also that appeals not only to the cultured reader but to the man in the street. And this because Browning at his best is the most human and comprehensible of poets. One reason for this Mr Chesterton, with his customary clearness and vigorous common-sense has pointed out.

'Now, to say that Browning's poems, artistically considered, are fine although they are rugged, is quite as absurd as to say that a rock, artistically considered, is fine although it is rugged. Ruggedness being an essential quality in the universe, there is that in man which responds to it as to the striking of any other chord of the eternal harmonies. As the children of nature, we are akin not only to the stars and flowers, but also to the toad-stools and the monstrous tropical birds. And it is to be repeated as the essential of the question that on this side of our nature we do emphatically love the form of the toadstools, and not merely some complicated botanical and moral lessons which the philosopher may draw from them. For example, just as there is such a thing as a poetical metre being beautifully light or beautifully grave and haunting, so there is such a thing as a poetical metre being beautifully rugged.

"Nature may present itself to the poet too often as consisting of stars and lilies, but these are not poet."

who live in the country, they are men who go to the country for inspiration and could no more live in the country than they could go to bed in Westminster Abbey. Men who live in the heart of nature, farmers and peasants, know that nature means cows and pigs, and creatures more humorous than can be found in a whole sketch-book of Callot. And the element of the grotesque in art, like the element of the grotesque in nature, means, in the main, energy, the energy which takes its own forms and goes its own way. Browning's verse, in so far as it is grotesque, is not complex or artificial; it is natural and in the legitimate tradition of nature. The verse sprawls like the trees, dances like the dust, it is ragged like the thunder-cloud, it is top-heavy like the toad stool. Energy which disregards the standard of classical art is in nature as it is in Browning. The same sense of the uproarious force in things which makes Browning dwell on the oddity of a fungus or a jellyfish makes him dwell on the oddity of a philosophical idea."

This is both perfectly true and admirably expressed, and it expresses just what the ordinary man feels about a poet who appeals to him, or a story-teller who captivates him. It is the ruggedness, the familiar intimacy, if we will, of Kipling, that arrests him more than the polished and more classic style of Watson. It is the lack of intimate familiarity that makes him keep Meredith at a respectful distance. There is more of the universal in Kipling and in Dickens than in Watson and Meredith. The average intelligent man is right in his instincts, however badly he may reason about his instincts. And Chesterton voices precisely what the average man feels but cannot put well into words.

Mr Chesterton's strength as a writer does not rely on any profundity of thought, nor in any original point of view, but in the clear and witty way in which he expresses commonplace truths. He is an acute critic, not a subtle one, and he is not afraid of showing us the limitations to his sympathies. He is quite emphatic in his failure to appreciate, for instance, the Russian genius, or the greatness of Mr Thomas Hardy, pessimism and dispassionateness are qualities that enrage him in literature as in life. And he is so annoyed about them, that he will not take the trouble to find out if there is anything of value behind.

Well, here again Mr Chesterton is very English, and although we may differ with him about some of his prejudices and predilections, it is refreshing to find a man who is so honest and straightforward concerning them. He is an aggressively honest critic, and he never worries us with that spurious breadth of sympathy affected by some critics. Like most journalists who take to literature, he has tried many forms, essay, fiction, verse, and quite recently, drama. There is a breathless, less clever cleverness about a good deal of it that compels our admiration, but if he were less breathless it would be much better. Mr Chesterton writes too easily, and is too fond of constructing card-castles in order to knock them down. That is no drawback to him as a journalist, but it is a distinct drawback to him as a man of letters. Card-castles are good fun—but the fun is childish. Mr Chesterton has many of the lovable qualities of a great big child, some also of the distracting qualities. With a rich and generous sense of humour, he wastes his own time and ours by filling his books with trivial witticisms like, "The fear of the water is the beginning of dining." It sounds smart—it is simply meaningless. And Mr Chesterton is too fond of spoiling good writing with this shoddy wit. It is a pity. But if Mr Chesterton annoys us with his childishness, he is to do him justice, splendidly childlike. He is childlike in his capacity for enjoyment, childlike in his power of enthusiasm. In an age that is inclined to be blasé and cynical, it is a joy to have a writer who is not afraid of enthusiasm, and who sees the dynamic force of enthusiasm.

And we may add this. Writers to-day are for the most part either violently progressive or violently reactionary. Mr Chesterton is neither. With all his emotional sensibility there is no writer more full of good, solid common-sense than he. Whether we agree or disagree with his religion or politics or purely literary standpoint, he never talks without saying something worth the saying, which is not admitting that all he says is worth the saying. Some of our writers to-day are for over peering into the future, others less venturesome turn round and hug the past. Mr Chesterton realises—to adopt a striking phrase of Edward Dowden's—that the sanest critic is he who "resumes the past and prophesies the future."

But this chronicle of English life and letters must now draw to a close.

Whatever influence the War may have upon English life and letters, one thing surely it will make as clear as noonday—that is, the spiritual degradation of Force worship.

Force worship lays emphasis on realism in literature and on militarism in life. Realism as a heaven and as a neutraliser of sentimentalism is, as we have seen, obviously a good thing just as militarism in so far as it brings organisation and corporate efficiency into national life is a good thing. But as understood and exaggerated by Force worship, both realism and militarism are bad things.

The more immediate effect of the War may well be, not merely to check the realistic tendency in letters, but even to bring about for a while the revival of a more conventional, more artificial literature, since a psychological rebound is natural enough, but need give no ground for anxiety. Sooner or later the Art-faculty, stunned and half paralysed as it is to-day, and blindly groping for some temporary relief and distraction as it may be doing to-morrow, will resume its normal balance.

To expect, as some seem to have expected, that this catastrophic war should at once inspire our men of letters, is unreasonable. Here and there a younger writer of the day, like Rupert Brooke, reacted to its heroic thrill. But its effect on the whole has been to stun not to stimulate the imagination. It may be quite true, as Shelley urged, that we "learn in suffering what we teach in song." Art feeds upon the drama of life, shaping its raptures and agonies into forms of beauty; but there is a period when one can only feel—not express; a time when the poignancy of the drama strikes us into silence. It is not to the actors in the drama then, but to those who, coming after, will view the battle from afar, that we must look for the song. We to-day are far too near its bloody horrors; too wearied by its dreadful tedium. We lack the perspective; we lack that necessary detachment and deliberation that is essential to the great artist. The great flowering time of the English Renaissance was not the moment when Drake and Hawkins were defying Philip of Spain. After the defeat of the Armada came the triumphs of Shakespeare.

The Literature of to-morrow lies in the womb of to-day. What the precise character of that literature will be, it would be folly to try and forecast; but assuredly, every action, every attitude of ours to-day, is helping to mould the nature and destiny of these unborn children.
